B. SECOND DIVISION.—Chs. 4–14.—Attempts have been made to divide these chapters into sections illustrating particular ideas, but without success. Ewald found three sections—first, the arraignment, 4^1–6^{11a}; second, the punishment, 6^{11b}–9^9; and third, retrospect of the earlier history, exhortation, and comfort, 9^{10}–14^{10}. Driver (LOT^{6} 303) finds the thought of Israel's guilt to predominate in 4–8; her punishment in 9^1–11^{11}; while both ideas are combined in chs. 12. 13, with a glance into the brighter future in ch. 14. But in truth the passage is scarcely divisible; it consists of a multitude of variations all executed on one theme, Israel's apostasy or unfaithfulness to her God. This unfaithfulness is a condition of the mind, 'a spirit of whoredoms,' and is revealed in all the aspects of Israel's life, though particularly in three things: (1) The cultus, which, though ostensibly service of J″, is in truth worship of a being altogether different from Him; (2) the internal political disorders, the changes of dynasty, all of which have been effected with no thought of J″ in the people's minds; and (3) the foreign politics, the making of covenants with Egypt and Assyria, in the hope that they might heal the internal hurt of the people, instead of relying on J″ their God. The three things are not independent, the one leads to the other. The fundamental evil is that there is 'no knowledge of God in the land,' no true conception of Deity. He is thought of as a nature-god, and this conception exercises no restraint on the passions or life of the people; hence the social immoralities and the furious struggles of rival factions; and these, again, lead to the appeal for foreign intervention. The prophet sometimes couples (1) and (2) together, as in $8^{4ff.}$, and sometimes (2) and (3), as in 5^{13} 12^{1}. Chs. 4–13 are one long indictment of Israel and threat of punishment; a few passages illustrating the unchanging love of J″ at the beginning (9^{10} 11^{1}), and all through the people's history ($11^{3.4}$, cf. 2^{8}), only throw their unfaithfulness into deeper shadow.*

(1) The Cultus.—Chs. 4–6 are mainly devoted to the cultus, though it is often alluded to all through the chapters (8. 9^{1} $10^{1.6.8}$ 11^{2} 13^{2}). The term 'whoredom' is specially applied to the cultus. The idea may have been suggested by the gross immoralities practised at the sanctuaries ($4^{13.14}$), or it may be a corollary from the conception of the marriage relation of J″ to Israel. The cultus is whoredom or unfaithfulness, because, whatever be the name which the people give the god they serve, he is another than J″. There is 'no knowledge of God in the land'; under the name of J″ they are worshipping a baal. The feasts of J″ are 'the days of the baals' (2^{13}), the local Jehovahs are baals. They are not the true husband of Israel, but 'her lovers' or paramours; she goes after them and forgets J″ ($2^{5.13}$). Israel is a harlot, following her 'lovers' for the hire which they give her on all the corn-floors (9^{1} 2^{5}). The judgment of Hosea is that the genuine Israelitish spiritual conception of J″ has been changed, and another conception substituted for it. He goes further, and asserts that the people are not unconscious of the change: 'I will return to my first husband' (2^{7}, cf. 5^{15} $6^{1ff.}$). The conception of J″ that has taken the place of the true idea of Him is that of a local nature-god, from whom nothing higher is expected than the fruits of nature (2^{5} 9^{1}), and who seeks nothing in return but such nature gifts (5^{6}). But this is not J″. He desires piety (or goodness, חֶסֶד), not sacrifices (6^{6}); He has no pleasure in the flesh which they sacrifice and eat (8^{13}). His service is that of the mind and life. Such has been their God from the land of Egypt (12^{9} 13^{4}), who has continuously spoken to them by His prophets, for by a prophet J″ brought up Israel from the land of Egypt, and by a prophet was he preserved; and He has multiplied visions ($12^{9f.13}$). The ritual cultus, because of the perverted notion that it is what J″ desires, is 'sin' (4^{8}): Ephraim multiplies altars to sin (8^{11} 10^{8}). And it is the priests, whose office it was to instruct the people in the true knowledge of God, who are responsible for the people's ignorance. They themselves have rejected knowledge (4^{6}). For interested reasons they foster the people's propensity to sensuous service: 'They feed upon the sin of my people'—the sacrificial cultus (4^{8}). And it is in vain that J″ writes or might write moral Torahs ever so many, revealing the 'knowledge' of Him; they are accounted a foreign thing (8^{12}). A 'spirit of whoredom' possesses the people. Their mind is wholly away from J″ as He truly is.

Hosea's judgment is that the religion of Israel has become Canaanitized; it is the old native gods that are worshipped, though under the name of J″. The Dionysiac revelry at the feasts is not Israelitish, it is that of 'the peoples,' the heathen (9^{1}). He hardly ascribes real existence to the baals, it is a distinction of conceptions of J″ which he draws. As for the 'calves,' he will not allow that they have any relation to J″—'a workman made it: it is no god' (8^{6}). Its wooden kernel shall become splinters, and its gold hull shall be a present to king Jareb (8^{6} 10^{6}). With mock sympathy he describes the people and priests of Samaria as 'mourning' over its fate (10^{5}), and makes merry over the spectacle of human worshippers kissing calves! (13^{2}). But though the loss of 'knowledge of God' be the worst form of Israel's declension and the source of all other forms of it,—for religion ramifies into all the channels of life, and the nature-god instead of restraining human passions is rather served by the indulgence of them ($4^{2.13.14}$),—Hosea sometimes suggests a broader ground for Israel's corruption. It was due to their entrance upon the Canaanite civilization: 'according to the goodness of his land they made goodly images' (10^{1} 4^{11} 11^{2} $13^{2.6}$). In their whole mind the people has become Canaanitized: 'He is Canaan; the balances of deceit are in his hand' ($12^{7f.}$). Not till all the forms of Canaanitish life be swept away (2^{3}) and Israel have again to go through the wilderness will she learn to know J″ as the chief good, and respond to Him as in the days of her youth ($2^{14.15}$ 12^{9}, cf. Jer 2^{2}). See iv.

(2) The Internal Misrule.—Whether Hosea directly calls the internal political condition 'whoredom' is not quite certain. He does so name the external politics: making alliances abroad is 'hiring loves' (8^{9}). And there was no reason why he should not have given the same name to the internal politics, for 'whoredom' is less particular actions than a state of the mind, indifference to J″. In 8^{4} 'setting up kings' and making images are coupled together, and perhaps called 'their two transgressions' (10^{10}). The term 'to be unfaithful' (בגר) appears used both of political and religious defection (5^{7} 6^{7}, possibly 10^{9} for 'stood'). The term 'adulterers' (7^{4}) hardly refers to political immorality, but J″ complains of the people that 'they have departed from him' and 'speak lies against him' (7^{13}), that they surround Him with lies and deceit (11^{12}), and multiply lies and violence (11^{7} 12^{1} 13^{16}). They are untrue to J″; they make and unmake kings, with no regard to Him or the principles of His religion: 'They have set up kings but not by me, princes and I knew it not' (8^{4}); 'all their kings are fallen, there is none among them that calleth upon me' (7^{7}). The 'pride' (גָּאוֹן) of Israel, i.e. his self-confidence and indifference to J″, testifieth to his face (5^{5} 7^{10}).

The picture which the prophet draws of the internal condition of the kingdom in his day is a terrible one. Jeroboam, who is supposed to have died c. 746–5, was succeeded by his son Zechariah, who, after a reign of six months, was assassinated by Shallum. The murderer was able to maintain himself no more than a month, when he was attacked and slain in Samaria by Menahem. In all likelihood Menahem would have shared the same fate at the hand of some other conspirator but for the assistance of Pul, king of Assyria, to whom he paid 1000 talents of silver that his hand might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand (2 K 15^{19}). As an Assyrian vassal (5^{13} 7^{11} 8^{9} 12^{1}) Menahem was able to maintain himself for some years against other factions, which probably sought the help of Egypt (7^{11} 8^{13} $9^{3.\,6}$ 11^{5}). Under the long and successful reign of Jeroboam the country had advanced greatly in material prosperity. There were ample resources in the land to nourish the various factions, and they struggled with one another with a fury which the prophet can compare to nothing but the raging heat of an oven, though the figure contains the darker trait of a long-sighted policy which suppressed the fire till the time came to let it blaze out ($7^{4\text{-}7}$). Society appears completely dissolved: there is nothing but 'false swearing, and murder, and stealing, and committing adultery,' and one deed of blood follows on the heels of another (4^{2}). The prophet alludes to incidents which would be understood by his hearers, though they are obscure to us. We cannot identify that scene of revelry and possibly regicide which signalized 'the day of our king' (7^{5}); nor tell why Gilead (Gilgal?) is said to be 'tracked with blood' (6^{8} 12^{11}); nor why it is said that 'all their wickedness is in Gilgal' (9^{15}); nor what is meant by 'transgressing the covenant,' nor what there refers to (6^{7}); nor explain the allusion, 'the company of priests murder in the way to Shechem' (6^{9}); nor what is meant when the rulers and priests are charged with being 'a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread on Tabor' (5^{1}). These and other allusions, such as to 'the days of Gibeah' (9^{9} 10^{9}), are obscure, but they indicate that internal convulsions were breaking the nation to pieces (5^{10} $7^{1.\,9}$ 8^{8}).*

* How entirely threats pervade chs. 4–13 may be seen from these passages: $4^{16ff.19}$ $5^{5.8.9.10}$ $7^{12.16}$ $8^{1.3.5.6.13}$ $9^{1\text{-}6}$ $9^{7.11.15.17}$ $10^{1\text{-}8}$ $10^{9\text{-}15}$ $11^{5.6.7}$ $12^{2.9.14}$ $13^{1\text{-}4}$ $13^{5\text{-}8}$ $13^{9\text{-}11}$ $13^{12f.}$

When Hosea assails 'king and princes,' he is scarcely condemning monarchy in principle as a form of government incompatible with the idea of the theocracy. His judgment is practical and historical, not theoretical. As a matter of history, and particularly in the prophet's day, the monarchy has failed to secure the peace and well-being of the people: 'Where now is thy king that he may save thee, and thy princes that they may deliver thee?' (13^{10}). It has, on the contrary, been the constant source of faction and anarchy. It is the motives and methods of setting up and deposing dynasties that Hosea condemns, of which the revolution of Jehu is an example (1^{4}). It is true that in his picture of the final condition of Israel ($2^{18\text{-}23}$ 14) the king finds no place; but this is due to his personification of the community, and his thinking not of its form but of its mind. Following the Targum, some scholars interpret 'the days of Gibeah' (9^{9} 10^{9}) of the election of Saul; but though Saul belonged to Gibeah he was not made king there, but at Mizpah according to one tradition (1 S $10^{17\text{ff.}}$), or at Gilgal according to another (1 S 11^{15}). Hosea speaks of the days of Gibeah as signalized by some crime (10^{9}), though the story of Jg 19 ff. scarcely corresponds to his allusions. At any rate, his reprobation of 'king and princes' must not be read as merely a condemnation of the 'schism' of the North; his idea is much wider and more general. He is weary of Politics. His ideal is already that of the Church of God.

(3) External Politics.—Reliance on foreign help is also 'unfaithfulness' to J″ (8^{9}). The love of J″ elevates the subject of it into a personality. Corresponding to His mind there must be another mind, with a sense of benefit and capacity for affection. And when Israel leans on foreign powers, this reveals not only distrust of J″, but alienation of mind from Him, and dissatisfaction with the whole range of affections and duties which the relation to J″ imposes.

To the prophet the issue of all this is certain: J″ will drive Israel out of His house (9^{15}). Hosea has no clear idea of the instrument or means of Israel's destruction. It is 'the sword' (7^{16} 11^{6}), the 'enemy' (8^{3} $5^{8.\,9}$); or it is natural, internal decay ($7^{8.\,9}$ 9^{16}), the moth and rottenness (5^{12}). Israel shall be made to go through the wilderness (2^{14}); but they shall also eat unclean things in Assyria (9^{3} 8^{9}); and again, Egypt shall gather them, Moph shall bury them (9^{6} 7^{11} 8^{13} 9^{3} 11^{5}); and again, they shall be wanderers among the nations (9^{17} 10^{10}). The question sometimes put, whether it was the prospect of national overthrow that impressed upon the prophets the national sin, or the sin that led them to forecast the overthrow, receives a ready answer so far as Hosea is concerned. He perceives that apostasy from J″ contains destruction in it (7^{13} 13^{9}?), that moral law operates as infallibly as natural law: 'they have sown the wind and reap the whirlwind' (8^{7}), 'ye have plowed wickedness, ye have reaped iniquity' (10^{13}; cf. on the other hand 10^{12}); unchastity tends not to increase but to childlessness ($9^{10\text{ff.}}$ 4^{10}); Egypt and Assyria whose help they seek shall swallow them up.

iv. Some General Ideas.—(1) God and Religion.—J″ is God: 'there is no knowledge of God' has for parallel 'they do not know J″' (5^{4}, cf. 2^{20}). His nature as revealed in Israel's history is Love. It was in love that He redeemed them from Egypt: 'when Israel was a child I loved him' (11^{1}); and He has an emotional delight in the object of His love (9^{10}). His love has followed Israel all through their history ($11^{3.4}$ 7^{15}); even His chastisements are not without love—'I will speak to her heart' (2^{14} 3); and their restoration and everlasting peace will be due to His love (14^{4} $2^{18\text{ff.}}$ cf. $11^{8\text{ff.}}$). J″ is spiritual, and religion is piety ($6^{4.\,6}$): it is a state of the mind, not external service. It is partly this feeling of the inwardness of religion that leads to the prophet's personification of the community. He thinks of the community as a personal mind, an individual soul, in its relation to God and in His relation to it, with all the mutual, mystical interchange of thoughts and affections towards each other of the two minds. And it was in the wilderness at the Exodus that this true religious relation was perfectly realized, when Israel possessed nothing, through no medium, but mind to mind. And it is in the wilderness that it shall be perfectly realized again, when Israel, destitute of all sacramental tokens of J″'s favour, land, corn, and wine, shall feel that she possesses Himself, and shall respond as in the days of her youth (2^{15}). Such a surprisingly inward conception of religion implies two things: first, that the commonplaces of Israel's faith must have been long familiar, such as J″'s redemption of His people, His constant goodness, the freeness of His choice of them, and the moral nature of His whole relation to them (cf. reference to covenant 8^{1} and fatherhood 11^{1}), together perhaps with the consciousness on Israel's part that it had declined to a lower stage of religious life than it once occupied (2^{7}). And secondly, that the prophet transcends the stage of religion reached in OT times, and anticipates a more perfect future. In his day the religious unit or subject was the community, but his personification of the community as an individual soul implies that his conception of religion requires a true personal subject—that only the individual mind can be truly in religious communion with God.

(2) The People.—The history of the patriarchal age and of the Exodus might almost be constructed out of Hosea's allusions. This history is his Bible, where he finds the texts of his homilies. Israel is to him a moral person, and it is not so much her actions as her mind towards J″ that he has regard to. He has, however, the idea that a course of conduct leads to a state of mind in which amendment is hopeless; as, on the other hand, the state of mind reveals itself in all manner of insensate actions—'Ephraim is joined to idols: let him alone' (4^{17}); 'my people ask counsel at their stocks, for a spirit of whoredom causeth them to err' (4^{12} $5^{3.\,4}$) They have better moments when the thought of a return to J″ fascinates them ($6^{1\text{ff.}}$); but it is a passing emotion like the morning cloud, a dramatic ideal which they have not depth and earnestness to realize ($7^{14.\,16}$). J″ is at His wits' end with them (6^{4}). On account of his conception of Israel as a moral person, Hosea draws no distinction between classes among the people. It is Israel His spouse whom J″ drives out of His house, and it is she whom He again betrothes to Himself for ever (2^{19} 14). Hosea confines his eschatology to the destiny of Israel; the nations find no place in his picture of the end. It was the Assyrian empire that brought the idea of the world, the nations, before the prophets' minds, and Hosea had probably passed away before Assyria closely touched on Israel. His prophecy ends with the prediction of the restoration, the holy beauty and eternal endurance of God's people: 'they shall bloom like the lily, and cast forth their roots like Lebanon' (14^{5}).

Comparisons of one prophet with another are usually unjust to one of the two compared. Amos' mind is filled with great general ethical principles, valid eternally and enforcing themselves universally whether in heaven or on earth; Hosea starts from a religious relation of J″ and people, historically formed, the mutual, mystical intimacies of which engross his thoughts. It is less in ideas than in apt terms to express them that the prophets advance on one another. Am. speaks of the goodness of J″, Hos. first calls it 'love'; Am. inculcates compassion, 'humanity,' Hos. first finds the right word for this (חָסֶר 4^{1}). On the other hand, while Hos. laments the want of trust in J″ revealed in the foreign alliances of Israel, it is Isaiah that first uses the positive word 'faith' (7^{9}). And again, though Hos. expresses the idea of the 'new covenant' when he speaks of J″ betrothing Isr. again to Himself (2^{19}), it is Jer. that coins the right phrase.

v. INTEGRITY AND TEXT.—Jerome already described Hosea's style as commaticus—consisting of short clauses. His fondness for asyndetous construction gives a monotonous, dirge-like music to his verses—'the days of visitation are come; the days of recompense are come' (9^{7}); 'Egypt shall gather them, Moph shall bury them' (9^{6}). He little addresses the people; rather, turning his face away from them, he speaks of them to himself in shuddering disjointed monologue. A number of passages have been regarded by recent scholars as interpolations, particularly those referring to Judah (see i. note*), and those describing the material blessings of Israel restored ($2^{16\text{ff.}}$ 14; for list of passages athetized by various scholars see Driver, LOT^{6} 306). Reference to Judah in itself need not excite suspicion any more than Isaiah's references to N. Israel. The abruptness of some of the references is strange (5^{10}), though the general unconnectedness of Hosea's style must be considered. Ch 1^{10}–2^{1} is either a later amplification of something briefer, or it is wholly late; its right place seems after 3^{5}. Nowack goes to an extreme in his excision of passages: $2^{6.\,7}$ are supported by $5^{6.\,15}$ $6^{1\text{ff.}}$; 2^{14} by 12^{9}, and 2^{20} by 4^{1} 5^{4}; and in many other cases the reasons urged for excision appear inadequate.

The Text of Hosea has been imperfectly handed down. A multitude of passages are corrupt, some incurably, e.g. $4^{4.\,18}$ (in v.^{19} read the last word altars), $5^{2.\,7.\,11}$ (צו), 6^{7} 7^{4} $8^{10\text{b}}$ (LXX 'and they shall cease a little from anointing king and princes'—though the ironical 'a little' is unnatural), 8^{13} (הבהבי), 9^{8} 9^{13} 10^{9} 11^{3} (read אקחם and ורועתי), $11^{6.\,7.\,12}$ and others.

HOSEN is AV translation in Dn 3^{21} of פַּטִּישִׁין,* which is probably better represented by RV 'tunics' (Siegfried-Stade and Strack [the latter doubtfully], Rock; RVm has 'turbans'). RV has 'hosen' in the same verse and in v.^{27} as tr$^{\text{n}}$ of סַרְבָּלִין (AV both times 'coats'; Siegfried-Stade, Unterkleider; Strack says 'an article of dress, probably trunk-hose' (Pluderhosen)). See, further, art. DRESS in vol. i. p. 625$^{\text{b}}$.

The Eng. word 'hosen' is the plu. of a Teut. word 'hose' (of which the root is unknown) denoting a covering for the leg, 'breeches,' 'trousers.' Hose is also used for the plu., but the sing. occurs in Shaks. (Taming of the Shrew, v. i. 69, 'A silken doublet! a velvet hose! a scarlet cloak!') and elsewhere. The 'doublet' for the body, and the 'hose' or 'hosen' for the legs, were the necessary articles of male attire in Shakespeare's day; the cloak being needful for full dress or for cold weather, as Merry Wives, III. i. 47, 'In your doublet and hose, this raw rheumatic day!' The hosen generally covered the feet as well as the legs; and when the coverings of legs and feet were afterwards separated, they were called respectively 'upper stocks,' and 'nether stocks' or 'stockings.' By and by both 'hosen' and 'stockings' were restricted to the covering of the feet. Coverdale (from whom comes 'hosen' in Dn 3^{21}) intended to denote the long Eastern trousers.

HOSHAMA (הוֹשָׁמָע, abbrev$^{\text{n}}$ or textual error for יְהוֹשָׁמָע 'J″ hath heard').—A descendant of David, 1 Ch 3^{18}. See GENEALOGY.

HOSHEA (הוֹשֵׁעַ 'deliverance,' represented by Ausi on the Assyrian monuments, LXX Ὡσῆε, Syr. ܗܘܫܥ) was the son of Elah. The accession of this king of Israel took place in the twelfth year of king Ahaz according to the biblical chronology, 2 K 17^{1}. But this scheme it is impossible to maintain in its integrity [see art. CHRONOLOGY OF OT], as it is inconsistent in some details with itself (see Stade, GVI 88 ff., 558 ff.; Wellhausen, Prolegg. zur Gesch. Isr.^{2} 285 ff.). It is also inconsistent with the date of the Assyrian inscriptions, mainly established by the Eponym Canon (Schrader, COT ii. pp. 161–195, 320 ff.). According to the annals of Tiglath-pileser III. (3 Rawl. 10, No. 2, line 28), Pekah, king of Israel (bit Ḥumri), was slain, and Hoshea ascended the throne as the nominee of the Assyrian conqueror in the same year. The original passages may be found in transcribed form in Schrader, COT i. p. 247, KIB ii. p. 32. The biblical narrative describes Hoshea, the son of Elah, as a conspirator against Pekah, whom he slew. On the other hand, it seems fairly clear, from the annals of Tiglath-pileser, though the text is mutilated in many portions, that we should render 'Pekah I slew, Hoshea I appointed . . . over them.' But there is no real contradiction between this statement and that of Scripture. Hoshea was the head of an Assyrian party in Samaria,[*] whereas Peḳah represented a policy of resistance to the encroachments of Assyria. This policy underlies his attack on Ahaz in concert with Rezin; see Cheyne's remarks (Comment. on Isaiah), introductory to Is 7. There are significant passages in the oracles of the contemporary prophet Hosea in which Ephraim is compared to a silly dove hovering between homage to Egypt and homage to Assyria (Hos 5^{13} 7^{11}). This theory of Ephraim's shifting foreign policy affords a very probable explanation of the course of events. Accordingly, Hoshea made himself the facile instrument of Assyrian power, which in 733 was threatening the very gates of Samaria. It is also probable that from the commencement of his reign (B.C. 732), down to the death of Tiglath-pileser (727), he paid tribute to Assyria like Jehu and Menaḥem before him. This may be clearly inferred from the mutilated conclusion of the inscription already quoted, and it is in consonance with the statement in 2 K 17^{3}. But we also learn from this verse that soon after the accession of Tiglath-pileser's successor, Shalmaneser (Shulmânu-asharidu) IV., the payment of the annual subsidy ceased. Probably, the Ephraimite king expected that the death of Assyria's energetic ruler, Tiglath-pileser, the combatant king (Jareb [?]) of Hosea's oracles, would bring the Palestinian states some respite. In our opinion, Isaiah's beautiful poem, 9^{7}–10^{4} 5^{25-30}, belongs to this time[†] (B.C. 726). The language of the opening verses which describe 'Ephraim and the inhabitants of Samaria saying in pride and exaltation of heart "bricks have fallen, but with hewn stone will we build; sycomores have been hewn down, but with cedars we will replace them,"' clearly suggests that Ephraim at this period was beginning to recover in a material sense from the disastrous effects of the invasion of 734–732.

* On the vocalization of this word, see note in Kamphausen's 'Daniel' in SBOT, ad loc.

The new political developments that arose in Samaria were doubtless anxiously watched from the banks of the Nile. Palestine was of great strategic importance to Egypt. For the possession of Samaria, Ashdod, Jerusalem, or Lachish by the ever-encroaching Assyrian power would be a menace to security on the Nile. During the preceding decades Egypt had been weakened by intestine divisions, but now it had passed under the hands of an energetic Ethiopian ruler Shabaka[‡] (Meyer, Gesch. des alten Ægyptens, pp. 343 f. 346). Henceforth Egypt sought to confront Assyria by supporting the Palestinian and Hittite states. Hoshea of Israel and Hanno of Gaza were sustained in this policy of resistance to the Ninevite power by promises of aid by the Egyptian monarch. After the death of Tiglath, the Egyptian party and policy, which opposed Assyrian domination, were in the ascendant at Samaria, just as we find in later times took place in Jerusalem (comp. Is 20. 30^{1-5} 31^{1-3}). But bitter experience was destined in the coming years to prove that the Egyptian power was a broken reed. Within the next fifteen years Samaria, Gaza, and Ashdod were in succession fated to discover that Egypt's 'strength was to sit still,' and a terrible overthrow was to overtake them from the arms of Assyria through the procrastinating impotence of their South-western ally.

The cessation of tribute by the king of Israel, which had hitherto been paid annually, was the first serious indication to the Assyrian monarch that Ephraim was preparing to throw off his yoke. In the summer of the year B.C. 724 the armies of Assyria were directed against the Israelite capital. Hoshea at once endeavoured to avert disaster by gifts to the Assyrian monarch, but Shalmaneser had by this time discovered that Hoshea was playing a double part. Perhaps the Assyrian troops intercepted the emissaries which the latter was despatching to the king of Egypt. At this point it is by no means easy to discover the precise order of events narrated in 2 K $17^{3\text{ff.}}$. Fritz Hommel (Gesch. Babyl. u. Assyr. p. 675) thinks that a decisive battle was fought before the walls of Samaria, in which king Hoshea was taken prisoner. The biblical statements (v.^{4}) would seem to warrant this view. It would somewhat simplify the chronological problem and allow nine years for the reign of Hoshea (Tiele, Bab.-Assyr. Gesch. i. p. 232 ad fin.).[*] But it is by no means certain that the capture and imprisonment of the Israelite king did not take place after the final overthrow of Samaria.

Shortly before this time the prophet Hosea uttered his last oracles. The final four chapters evidently belong to the closing years of the Northern kingdom. The shadows of the last overwhelming calamity rest on the prophet's soul. There is indescribable pathos in these closing appeals. J" pleads with Ephraim (11^{7}): 'My people are bent to backsliding from me [?] . . . How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? how shall I abandon thee, Israel? How shall I make thee as Admah? how shall I set thee as Zeboim? Mine heart is turned within me, my compassions are kindled together.' But, alas! Israel's doom is irrevocable. 'The iniquity of Ephraim is bound up, his sin is laid up in store. . . . Samaria shall bear her guilt, because she hath rebelled against her God: they shall fall by the sword, their infants shall be dashed in pieces' (13^{12} 14^{1}).

At nearly the same time Isaiah delivered his oracle against Ephraim ($28^{1\text{ff.}}$): 'Woe to the crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim and to the fading flower of his glorious beauty, which is on the summit of the fertile valley of them that are overcome with wine. Behold, the LORD hath a mighty and strong one; as a tempest of hail, a destroying storm, a tempest of mighty waters overflowing, shall he cast down to the earth violently. The crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim shall be trodden under foot.'

[†] Cheyne, Dillmann, and Duhm would place it some nine years earlier, i.e. shortly before the Syro-Ephraimite war; but it is not easy to see what substantial grounds exist for placing it so early. If we take the Assyrian invasion of 734 as the historic background, the refrain becomes doubly significant, and the graphic description of the advancing Assyrian hosts in Is 5^{26-28} (forming, as Dillmann rightly considers, a natural pendant or conclusion to the poem) seems to be based on a vivid and not too remote historic experience. 9^{11} remains obscure, whether we accept the earlier or later date; and even when we regard the Hebrew text as sound (certainly doubtful in the opening part of the verse), the phrase 'enemies of Rezin' would be thoroughly intelligible under the historic conditions which we have suggested.

[‡] The ordinary identification of the סוא (wrongly pronounced Sô by the Massoretes) with this Ethiopian ruler can hardly be maintained. LXX Σηγωρ; Lucian, ed. Lagarde, reads, πρὸς Ἀδραμελεχ Αἰθιοπα τὸν κατοικοῦντα ἐν Αἰγύπτω. In line 25 of the Khorsabad inscr. of Sargon mention is made of Sibi, tartan or generalissimo of the Egyptian forces who co-operated with Ḥanunu (Hanno) of Gaza in resisting the arms of Assyria. In all probability, we ought to identify this Sibi (properly Sib'i) with the סֶוֶא (as we should pronounce it) of the Hebrew text. But this personage was not the supreme king of Egypt or Pharaoh. This is clear from the same passage in Sargon's inscription, for in line 27 this monarch is referred to under his usual title Pir'u as quite a distinct personage from Sibi. It is this Pharaoh whom we may identify with Shabaka or Sabaco. The Assyrians were quite able to pronounce this name, as the great Rassam cylinder (Rm), col. ii. 22, testifies, where it occurs in the form Shabakû. See Winckler, Untersuch. zur altorient. Gesch. p. 92 ff. On the complex text of 2 K 17^{1-6} see AT-liche Unters. p. 15 ff.

[*] Fritz Hommel in his Gesch. Bab. u. Ass. pp. 964 ff. 669 ff. places the overthrow of Peḳah in 733, but in his art. ASSYRIA (wh. see) places it two years later. This appears to be too late, though exact chronological sequence in the events of Tiglath-pileser's campaigns (734 ff.) is difficult to attain. See Winckler, Gesch. Babyl. u. Assyr. p. 230.

The fulfilment of these prophecies of doom followed swiftly. We know that in the year 724 Samaria was invested by the Assyrian armies. Towards the end of the siege (B.C. 722) Shalmaneser died. Meanwhile, the beleaguered inhabitants were anxiously expecting a relieving force to arrive from the banks of the Nile, which should divert the forces of Assyria and raise the siege of the hard-pressed city. But a fatal paralysis seemed to hamper the movements of Egypt. Time went on—more than two years elapsed—and no relieving force appeared. The numbers of the garrison were doubtless thinned by constant battles with the besiegers, and by the ravages of grim famine. Sargon (Šarrukinu), in all probability a usurper, and certainly an able Assyrian general, succeeded to the throne of Assyria in B.C. 722. The siege was pressed on with vigour under this energetic commander. Egypt's procrastination was now Israel's ruin, and the fatal end was at hand. It is summarized in barely two ruthless lines of the great Khorsabad inscription (lines 23 and 24): 'Samaria I besieged, I captured. 27,290 of her inhabitants I carried away. 50 chariots I collected from their midst. The rest of their property I caused to be taken (?). My viceroy I placed over them, and imposed the tribute of the previous king.'

From 2 K 17[6] we learn that the inhabitants were deported to Eastern localities in or near Babylonia (see Schrader, COT ii. p. 267 ff.), while Babylonian inhabitants were settled in the districts of Canaan vacated by the exiled Israelites (v.[24]). Illustrative passages confirming these facts may be found in the annals of Sargon.

And so the curtain falls upon the remarkable and chequered history of the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. Respecting king Hoshea, we do not know whether he survived the tragic close of the kingdom which he ruled, or suffered the barbarous tortures too frequently inflicted on Assyrian captives. About his personal character we know little. We may infer that it lacked decisive energy and lofty patriotism. Beginning his reign as a mere puppet in Assyria's hands, he shaped his career as an opportunist. He was too astute to offend any national susceptibilities by abandoning the worship of J″, too cautious and politic to play the rôle of a purist in religious practices. Indeed an accurate historic treatment of Israel's religious history may esteem it highly improbable that such a course, forestalling the reformation of the 7th cent., could ever have entered into Hoshea's thoughts. Whether amid the syncretic tendencies in the traditional religious practices which then prevailed he was at all influenced by the teachings of the contemporary Ephraimite prophet Hosea towards higher ideals, is a question suggested, but suggested only, by the clause (17[2]), that though he committed evil it was not 'as the kings of Israel who were before him.' The impartial historian will not judge this last king of Ephraim too severely, but will unhesitatingly admit that he lived in times of direst difficulty and peril, when nothing but miraculous divinely guided statesmanship, like that of Isaiah, could have saved the realm from overwhelming disaster.

OWEN C. WHITEHOUSE.

HOSPITALITY, HOST.—No customs have taken a deeper and more permanent hold on the mind and life of the Orient than those which gather round the reception and entertainment of the guest. Few legal enactments, by whatever sanctions enforced, have met with such hearty and universal obedience as the unwritten laws of hospitality. The main practices evidently originated amid nomadic conditions. When applied to the more settled order of village or town, they were of necessity more or less modified. In modern times the influence of the tourist, and the growing usages of the West, have done much to corrupt the old simplicities. Yet in many towns and villages, remote from the annual streams of sightseers and pilgrims, and the encroachments of civilization, the traveller will find hospitable and generous welcome, and an aversion to anything like payment. Even in such centres as Safed and Tiberias, one or two wealthy men keep open house for all-comers, where friend and foe are alike free to enjoy food and shelter for the night. In the villages, where poverty reigns supreme, a guest-chamber, usually the best room in the place, is often attached to the sheikh's dwelling; and there the stranger is provided for at the cost of the community. The desert Arabs, however, have preserved almost unchanged through four millenniums the customs presented in the scriptural pictures of patriarchal life.

Among the nations of antiquity the virtue of hospitality was highly esteemed. In the Egyptian Book of the Dead, in the Hall of two Truths, the god who tests the spirits thus speaks in commendation of one who has passed the judgment: 'The god has welcomed him as he wished. He has given food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, clothing to the naked.' The Greeks thought that any stranger-guest might be a god in disguise; and the hospitable entertainment of helpless strangers, not self-declared enemies or robbers, was well-pleasing to Ζεὺς ξένιος, under whose protection they were. The ties established by hospitality were hereditary on both sides. The Romans regarded any violation of the rights of hospitality as a crime and impiety; while the Sibylline books declared that the age of the Messiah, when the happiest conditions for humanity would be realized, should witness the triumph of faith, love, and hospitality.

Turning to the Arabs, among whom are best reflected the immemorial usages of the East, we find that among them a man's hospitality is largely the measure of his reputation. 'A close fist and a narrow heart,' they say; and the niggardly soul shall not hold rule over them. To be described as 'a man of much ashes,' is a coveted distinction; the heap of ashes by his tent indicating the extent of his cooking for the entertainment of guests. 'A man whose dogs bark loudly' is one held in esteem; the dogs guiding the wanderer who might not otherwise find his dwelling. The sheikh's tent always stands in the camp nearest the travelled way, to offer first welcome to the approaching stranger. His superior position must be vindicated by superior liberality. Ibn Rashîd, in Hâyil, who exercises a somewhat uncertain sway over the wandering tribes of central Arabia, entertains at least 200 guests daily; and every stranger in Hâyil is invited to his table. The name of this ruler is accordingly highly honoured. But the poorest man will not turn the needy away. The guest, indeed, is often regarded as a benefactor, whose arrival affords his host the opportunity of honourable service.

Baitî baitak, 'my house is yours,' is part of the hospitable salutation with which the guest is welcomed. The phrase survives in the towns and cities most influenced by Western civilization; only, however, as an expression of courtesy. In remote villages, and in the desert camps, it is a simple statement of fact. As the proverb has it, 'The guest while in the house is its lord.' The present writer has been frequently thus promoted to the lordship of a house of hair, the owner waiting without until the guest bade him enter, and standing up until invited to recline on his own cushions. The stores, be they small or plentiful, are equally at the guest's command. The best of everything is placed before him; and whatever he may desire will be procured if the possibility exists. No sacrifice is too great to be made for the comfort of the guest: many will not stop even at the honour of wife and daughter (cf. Gn 19[8], Jg 19[24]). No man is demeaned by any service to his guest, even by pouring water on feet and hands, and waiting on him at meat. As one said, 'I am the slave of my guest as long as he is with me, but save in this there is no trace of the slave in my nature' (Ḥamâsa, p. 727, quoted by W. R. Smith, RS[2] p. 68).

There are certain well-understood provisions for preserving the honour of the host, which all guests are expected to observe. No pains should be spared to reach the resting-place before sunset. The proverb runs, 'He who arrives after sundown goes supperless to bed.' The reason being that this leaves the host too little time to prepare such a repast as his own credit requires. The law may not be enforced; but, while shelter may be demanded, in such a case there is no obligation to give food. This explains the seeming lack of hospitality in the parable (Lk 11[5-9]). Again, the guest is careful not to eat all that is brought to him, especially if his host be a poor man; somewhat must be left over, as evidence that he has had enough, and more than enough. Usually, supplies are too liberal to permit of complete consumption; but when a large company settles on a man for the night there is need for care, that he be not put to shame. Clean dishes would 'blacken his face' in presence of his guests. It is his pride to furnish over and above necessities. Yet, again, it is permissible to manifest great satisfaction with the fare whilst partaking. In drinking coffee, e.g., pleasure is fittingly expressed by drawing in the liquid with considerable noise, smacking of the lips, etc. Such visible tokens of appreciation greatly delight the host. But the offer of anything in payment would be taken as an insult. The Arab eats not in the morning; the guest departs with a simple 'goodbye.' He has had no more than his right; and presently his host will enjoy like treatment at his or some other brother's hands. The recognition of this obligation to the needy stranger must often have been the very condition of life to wanderers in waste lands.

That the guest is inviolable is one of the first principles of Arab hospitality. To be safe, the stranger needs but enter the tent, or only touch a tent rope; then, even if he be an enemy, no hand will be raised against him. The homicide may claim the rights of sanctuary from the slain man's next-of-kin himself, the avenger of blood, on whom lies the chief obligation of revenge. And as the duty of vengeance belongs to all the family or tribe of the murdered man, so protection granted by one is binding upon all. To slay an enemy in battle, or when meeting him in the open field, is esteemed an act of true and valorous manhood; to fall upon one seeking shelter in his tent, would stain an Arab's name with everlasting dishonour. To injure the guest is the mark of deepest depravity. The Arabs of el-Lejâ are held in reprobation as the greatest of rascals; it is said of them that 'they will even murder the guest.' An Arab tradition points to the reputed site of Sodom as the place where stones rained down from heaven upon the people who abused 'some travellers seeking hospitality there.' In Mal 3[5] the LORD is announced as a swift witness against such as turn aside the stranger in judgment.

But the ties of hospitality receive a more weighty sanction when a meal is partaken of in common. For an Arab to injure one who has eaten with him from the same dish, would be equivalent to lifting his hand against his own flesh and blood. They are 'brothers of the bread,' pledged by this act to do each other no harm, and also actively to promote each other's safety to the full extent of their ability. This obligation, however, lasts no longer than they may be supposed to retain the food thus eaten in their bodies; and the limit usually recognized is thirty-six hours. But constant repetition of eating and drinking in common may give permanence to the bonds. W. R. Smith (RS[2] p. 270 f.) quotes several illustrations of the length to which these ideas are sometimes carried. Zaid al-Khail, a famous warrior in the days of Mohammed, refused to slay a vagabond who had stolen his camels because the thief had surreptitiously drunk from his father's milk-pail before the theft. In Amthâl of Mofaḍḍal al-Ḍabbi, a man claims and obtains help of Al-Ḥârith in recovering his stolen camels, because the water which was still in their stomachs when they were taken from him had been drawn with the help of a rope borrowed from Al-Ḥârith's herdsmen. On the other hand, after the battle of Coshâwa, a captive refused to eat the food of his captor, who had slain his son, and thus kept alive his right of blood revenge.

The protection of the stranger may anticipate his arrival at the tent of his host. It is not uncommon for one in danger to shelter himself under the name of some powerful chief, whose dakhîl he claims to be. It is then the duty of all to assist him in reaching his protector's dwelling: any injury done to him is regarded as an outrage upon the honour of the man who, his name thus invoked, has become the stranger's patron and avenger. Thus are deliverance and safety found in 'the name of the LORD' (Pr 18[10], Jl 2[32], Ac 2[21], Ro 10[13] etc.).

The guest may claim entertainment for three days and three nights; and for so long the host may require him to stay. This latter right, although seldom exercised, is always acknowledged. Should the stranger remain beyond this period, he may be put to some useful work—a provision, probably, against idlers and hangers-on. Permanent abode in the dwelling of his host (Ps 23[6]) the guest may secure only by becoming identified with the family through marriage or adoption. See GER.

The religious significance and origin of these customs is suggested by the name universally given to the stranger entertained. He is 'the guest of God,' daif Ullah, that is, one for whom loyalty to God demands hospitable treatment. The Arab is himself a sojourner with God, under the blue canopy of His mighty tent. All that comes to him, whether by robber raid or natural increase of his flocks, he takes as the gift of God, the Generous and Bountiful; in the stranger whom night-fall brings to his tent, he sees a fellow-guest, to be treated according as God has dealt with himself. The spirit in which the obligation is accepted is well expressed in the proverb, 'He who has bread is debtor to him who has none'; which, in turn, suggests comparison with Ro 1[14].

The rights of asylum, associated with temples and holy places, are survivals from the times when, by retreat to the sanctuary, direct appeal was made for the protection of the deity there worshipped; and in certain temples these refugees, guests receiving the gods' hospitality, were organized for service. Ezekiel (44[7]) denounces this practice, which had obtained a hold even in Jerusalem; and the Phœnician inscription at Larnaca affords evidence of its existence among surrounding nations. With the movement of the peoples, there grew up the idea that in migrating to any country it was wise to submit to the god of the land, and to claim his protection, since only by his favour, and as his guests, might they continue to dwell there. This was the relation in which Israel stood to God. All directions for the generous treatment of the poor and the stranger are based upon recognition of this fact (Ex 22[21] 23[9], Lv 19[33. 34] 25[23], Dt 10[19] 14[29] 15[7], 2 Ch 7[20]). To use the stranger ill was to insult the god on whose hospitality he was thrown. See GER.

The ties established between host and guest by eating together carry us back to the days when all worshippers of a god were believed to partake with their deity in the sacrificial feast. Traces of this idea are found in Lv 3[1-9] with 7[15] and Dt 27[7]. Admission to this meal signified acknowledgment of the bond between the one so admitted and the god, and therefore that of brotherhood in the common faith. This involved sacred obligations of mutual help and protection. And it is interesting to note that the animal killed by the Arab for the entertainment of his guest still bears the ancient name dhabîḥah, 'sacrifice'; and to the feast thus provided every member of the tribe may come freely, uninvited, as a simple matter of right (RS 236, 247, 266, 439).

These considerations cast over the customs of hospitality the spell of antiquity and of religious sanction, than which nothing could more powerfully affect the mind of the Orient. This influence is seen in the practice of sealing friendship in a common meal, e.g. Gn 26[30], and esp. 31[54]. Israel was thus beguiled into a covenant with the Gibeonites (Jos 9[14]), which held good notwithstanding discovery of their deceit. The bitterness of the Psalmist's lot is accentuated by the fact that one who had eaten of his bread lifted up the heel against him (Ps 41[9]). Old Testament illustrations of ancient hospitality are found in Gn 18[1-8] 19[1-3], Ex 2[20], Jg 13[15], Ps 23[5]; Rahab received the reward of hospitality in the safety of herself and her relations (Jos 2). The outrage on hospitality committed by the inhabitants of Gibeah was terribly avenged (Jg 20).

There are two apparent violations of hospitality mentioned with approval. One is the case of Joab, who claimed asylum in the tent of the LORD, and who was slain there by Solomon's order. But Joab had put himself beyond the pale of this benign law by his own breach of its most solemn obligations (1 K 2[31-33]). The other is that of Jael, who drove the tent-peg through the head of her sleeping guest. It may be taken as evidence of the fearful degeneracy and lawlessness of these times, that this dastardly action finds honourable mention in a song of praise. But, while applauded in the excitement of triumph by those whom it so largely helped, the deed was one which, in calm judgment, would be pronounced infamous.

In the NT the customs of hospitality are recognized as binding (Lk 7[44-46]). It is commended and enjoined as a Christian virtue (Ro 12[13. 20], 1 Ti 3[2], Tit 1[8], He 13[2], 1 P 4[9]); and, affording a curious parallel to the passage quoted above from the Egyptian Book of the Dead, the exercise of hospitality is taken as affording the evidence on which final judgment is based (Mt 25[35] with 10[40] and Jn 13[20]).

Host occurs but twice in our Eng. Bible, Lk 10[35] and Ro 16[23]. In the former case it stands for πανδοχεύς, the keeper of an inn or place of entertainment, where all were received on an understanding as to payment. The πανδοχεῖον or πανδοκεῖον might be a simple khân, or a place affording accommodation to travellers. From this we have the modern Arabic funduḳ, used for 'inn' or 'hotel.' ξένος in Ro 16[23] is used in classic Greek for the 'guest-friend,' i.e. any citizen of a foreign State with whom one has a treaty of hospitality for self and heirs, confirmed by mutual presents and an appeal to Ζεὺς ξένιος. In this sense both parties are ξένοι' (Liddell and Scott). While mostly denoting the receiver of hospitality, it was also used for the entertainer; and in that sense it is employed here. The generous hospitality of Gaius, not limited to St. Paul, but extended to 'the whole Church,' marks him out for special honour.

W. EWING.

HOST.—Hostis, in classical Lat. 'an enemy,' came to mean 'the enemy's army,' and then, in mediæval Lat., 'an army' simply. This was its meaning when taken into Eng. from Old Fr. host; and this is its meaning always in AV, where it occurs as tr. of all the usual Heb. words for 'army.' Tindale uses it specially for the army in camp, Lv 9[11] 'the flesh and the hyde he burnt with fyre without the hoste.'

J. HASTINGS.

HOST OF HEAVEN, THE (צְבָא הַשָּׁמַיִם).—An expression occurring several times in the OT, and denoting most frequently the stars, but sometimes angels. The word 'host' is the ordinary Heb. word for army; and its use implies that those whom it characterizes are conceived partly as numerous, and partly as forming a regularly organized body, obedient to the commands of its lord or head.

A. As applied to the stars, it (1) denotes them (often coupled with the sun and moon) as objects of religious veneration, Dt 4[19] 17[3], Zeph 1[5], Jer 8[2] 19[13], 2 K 17[16] 21[3. 5] 23[3. 5] (2 Ch 33[3. 5]); so also Ac 7[42]. It appears from these passages that the idolatrous worship of the heavenly bodies—though there are traces of it previously *—first became prominent in Israel in the 7th cent. B.C.: it was patronized by Manasseh, who 'built altars for all the host of heaven in the two courts' of the Temple (2 K 21[5]); it is mentioned in Dt as a form of idolatry which might prove specially seductive to the Israelite; according to Jer 19[13], Zeph 1[5], it was carried on upon the roofs of houses. Josiah, in his reformation, destroyed the altars built by Manasseh in the Temple, burnt the vessels used in the rites, and put down the priests who took part in them (2 K 23[3. 5. 12]). From the terms of 2 K 23[12] 'the altars which were on the roof of the upper chamber of Ahaz,' taken in conjunction with what is stated in Jer 19[13], Zeph 1[5], it is difficult to avoid the inference that, though the 'host of heaven' itself is not expressly mentioned, the worship had in fact been introduced into Judah before Manasseh by Ahaz. This systematic worship of the heavenly bodies was in all probability imported from Assyria and Babylonia, where there was a deeply rooted popular belief in the power of the stars to rule the destinies of individuals and nations, and where from a remote antiquity the events which had been observed to follow from given celestial phenomena had been tabulated for future reference (above, vol. i. p. 194; Sayce, Hibb. Lect. 396-403).

* Proper names, as Beth-shemesh, En-shemesh, and (probably) Jericho imply an ancient worship of the sun and moon: see also Am 5[26] (c. 750 B.C.); and (under Ahaz) Is 17[8] ('sun-pillars,'—though some scholars think this and the preceding word a later addition): 2 K 23[11] 'the horses which the kings of Judah had given to the sun' and 'chariots of the sun' (though, the kings not being specified, the date when these were introduced is uncertain). 2 K 17[16], also, attributes the worship of the 'host of heaven' to the people of the northern kingdom; but the statement (which occurs in a Deuteronomic passage) may be only a rhetorical generalization.

Ahaz and Manasseh were both addicted to heathen observances, and both were also vassals of Assyria;* so that there is no difficulty in understanding their readiness to patronize Assyrian superstitions.†

The expression (2) denotes the stars as witnessing, in virtue of their apparently countless numbers, and the order and regularity of their appearance, to J‴s creative and administrative power. So Jer 33^{22} (as innumerable), Is 34^{4} (as dependent for their existence upon J‴s will, and so as mouldering away in the day of His wrath); and 'their host' in Is 40^{26} ('that bringeth out their host by number; he calleth them all by name . . . not one is lacking'), 45^{12} ('I have stretched out the heavens, and all their host I have commanded'), Ps 33^{6}, Gn 2^{1} (where 'their host' is referred to 'earth' only zeugmatically), Neh 9^{6a} ('thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, and all their host'). The expression also denotes the stars in Dn 8^{10} (as audaciously assailed by the 'little horn' [Antiochus Epiphanes]), God being (v.^{11}) their 'captain' or 'prince.'

B. 'Host of heaven' denotes celestial beings in attendance upon J″, in 1 K 22^{19}=2 Ch 18^{18} (Micaiah's vision), and Neh 9^{6b}; probably in Dn $4^{35\,(32)}$ (where the Aram. חַיִל is the word which in the Targ. regularly corresponds to צָבָא in this expression): and so also in Lk 2^{13}. 'All ye his hosts' in Ps 103^{21}, and 'all his host' (Ḳerê, 'hosts') in Ps 148^{2}, are meant, probably, in the same sense. J‴s celestial attendants are alluded to frequently elsewhere, though not under this name, as Ps 29^{1} 89^{5-7}, Is 6, Job 1^{6} 2^{1} 5^{1} 15^{15} 21^{22b} 38^{7}, Dn 7^{10} (see further ANGEL, vol. i. p. 95); and the term 'host' designates them, like the stars, as an organized body. For passages in which they are spoken of in terms suggestive of an army, see Gn 32^{2} (a 'camp'), Jos $5^{14f.}$ ('captain of J‴s host'), 2 K 6^{17}, Ps 103^{20}, and Jl $3(4)^{11}$ ('mighty ones,' or warriors), Job 25^{3} ('troops' or 'bands').

An ambiguous position is taken by Is 24^{21}, where mention is made of the 'host of the height' (sc. of heaven), whom J″ will 'visit' (punish) in the day of judgment on the world which the (post-exilic) prophet depicts. This expression is understood by Delitzsch to refer to angels (the allusion being taken to be to a germinal form of the doctrine, which was afterwards more fully developed, of patron-angels, presiding over the different nations of the earth);‡ but others (as Oehler, AT Theol. § 196; Schultz, OT Theol. ii. 228; Baudissin, Sem. Rel.-gesch. i. 121–123; Dillm., Duhm, Cheyne;§ cf. LXX) think the stars are intended.

The question arises, in what relation these two senses of the expression 'host of heaven' stand towards each other. Of course the connexion may be a merely verbal one: angels and stars were equally pictured by the Hebrews as forming a 'host'; both belonged to the heavens; and both were accordingly called independently by the same name. Nevertheless, it is the opinion of many scholars that the connexion between the two senses is closer than this. Ewald (Lehre von Gott, ii. 294 f.) suggested that the stars were regarded as the 'visible image,' or counterpart, of the host, or army, of angels, by which J″ was conceived to be surrounded. Stade (Gesch. ii. 236–238) supposes that the divinities, whom the heathen nations, and the unspiritual Israelites, supposed to inhabit the heavenly bodies, and whom they venerated accordingly, were harmonized with monotheism by being incorporated into the ranks of the angels, as subjects of the supreme God: the 'host of heaven,' originally denoting these divinities, became thus the name for the countless ministers of the heavenly King. Others remind us that the stars, moving (as it seemed) in the heaven with surprising order and regularity, were regarded by the Greeks and other ancient nations as animate beings;* and suppose that this facilitated their being called by the same name as angels. Thus Montefiore (Hibb. Lect. 429) writes: 'The stars, to the Jews, no less than to the Greeks, animate beings, become a portion of the heavenly host which attended Yahweh on high'; cf. Baudissin, l.c. p. 120 (Hebrew popular belief regarded the stars as animated beings, similar to angels). In estimating this last view, it should, however, be remembered that there is no passage in the OT which actually speaks of the stars as animated, or distinctly identifies them with angels; for the poetical passage in Jg 5^{20} (the stars from their courses fighting against Sisera) is no evidence of the former belief; and the fact that in Job 38^{7} 'morning stars' stand in poetical parallelism with 'sons of God' does not prove that the poet treated them as identical. No doubt, in a later age, the stars were treated as conscious beings, and even sometimes identified with angels (as Enoch 18^{12-16} 21^{1-6}, where seven stars are represented as bound in a prison-house of fire, for disobedience in not rising at their appointed time, just as angels themselves are in 21^{7-12}; and Rev $9^{1.\,11}$, where the star which falls from heaven and receives the key of the abyss, is called the 'angel' of the abyss): but it is a question how much such passages prove for the beliefs of the 8th or 7th centuries B.C. Our knowledge of the origin and history of the expression 'host of heaven' is too imperfect to enable us to pronounce with any confidence upon these theories; but, so far as we can judge (1 K 22^{19}), it seems to have been first applied to denote angelic beings. Whether its application afterwards to the stars was connected merely verbally with this usage, or whether it was facilitated by one or other of the considerations just alluded to, cannot be definitely determined; at the same time, we may at least agree (cf. above, vol. i. p. 95^{b}) that the movements and appearance of the stars may well have suggested to the Hebrews, as they did to other ancient nations, the idea that they were animated, and that hence a tendency may have arisen—though how far it was consistently carried out we do not know—to place them in the same class, or even to identify them, with angels, who also formed an order of heavenly beings, regarded by the Hebrews as in a special degree the ministers and instruments of Divine Providence (cf. Dillm. AT Theol. 320). S. R. DRIVER.

HOSTS, LORD OF.—See LORD OF HOSTS.

HOTHAM (חוֹתָם 'seal').—1. An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{32}. 2. Father of two of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{44}. In this latter instance AV has incorrectly Hothan. See GENEALOGY.

HOTHIR (הוֹתִיר).—A son of Heman, 1 Ch 25^{4}. See GENEALOGY, III. 23 n.

HOUGH.—The 'hough' (mod. spelling hock) of a quadruped is the joint between the knee and the fetlock in the hind leg; in man the back of the knee joint, called the ham. To hough is to cut the tendon of the hough, to hamstring. The subst. occurs in 2 Es 15^{36} 'unto the camel's hough' (usque ad suffraginem cameli, AVm 'pastern or litter'). The vb. is found Jos $11^{6.\,9}$, 2 S 8^{4}, 1 Ch 18^{4} of houghing horses (עִקֵּר in Piel). Tind. translates Gn 49^{6} 'In their selfe-will they houghed an oxe,' which is retained in AVm, and accepted by RV for AV text 'they digged down a wall' (see Spurrell). In his Diary (Wodrow, p. 123), Melvill says of 'Mr Jhone Caldcleuche, a daft wousten man,' that he 'bosted that he wald houche Mr Andro [Melvill], with mikle mair daft talk,' where the word is shown in its later and more general sense of doing one a serious injury. HOUSE (בַּיִת [etym. uncertain; Ges. derives from a root='spend the night'], οἶκος, οἰκία, domus).—This article deals with the fixed dwellings of man in Syria and Egypt, exclusive of tents and temporary dwellings, which are treated of under other headings (CAVE, PALACE, TEMPLE, TENT); but, in a hot climate, where life is spent in a great measure in the open air under the shade of trees, rocks, and in booths in connexion with permanent habitations, it is not practicable entirely to divide the several subjects. It will be found that the difference to be met with in the habits of the people is not so much between those who live in permanent and in temporary dwellings, as between those who live in fixed abodes and in movable habitations.

The dwellers in towns and villages have fixed abodes, though often of a very frail character; while the nomadic tribes, roving over the country in quest of pasture for their herds and flocks, require habitations which, though they can be readily packed up and carried away, are often of a very permanent texture.

Permanent fixed dwellings existed from the very earliest times (Gn 4^{17} $10^{11\text{f.}}$ [both, however, prehistorical] 12^{15} [Hyksos period ?]), and in the days of Abraham cities of considerable antiquity were already in existence in Palestine and Egypt ('Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt,' Nu 13^{23}, which, however, may refer only to the rebuilding by Ramses II., cf. Sayce, HCM 190 f.). Evidence to the same effect is supplied by the Babylonian (Nippur) and Egyptian discoveries as well as by Bliss's excavations at Lachish.

Although the family of Lot, on separating from Abraham, dwelt in the cities of the plain (Gn 13^{12}), yet the Hebrews throughout their sojourn in Canaan, until going down into Egypt, were dwellers in tents (Gn 13^{18} 26^{25} 31^{33} 35^{21}): in Egypt they lived in houses (Ex $12^{7.\,27}$), and on entering the Promised Land, after forty years' camping in the wilderness, took possession of the towns and cities built by the Canaanites (Dt $6^{10\text{f.}}$): they thus had no opportunity of establishing any distinctive style of architecture, as did the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Greeks, and there is no class of buildings which can be described as characteristically Hebrew, unless perhaps the synagogues, which do not appear to have been numerous in Palestine till after the time of John Hyrcanus (B.C. 135). The houses of the Hebrews, therefore, were the houses of the people of the land where they dwelt, and we have thus to seek for them in Syria and Egypt.

We have the following records for our use, viz.: The pictures on the monuments of Egypt and Assyria, the ruins remaining on the ground, the descriptions given in the Bible and by early writers, and the modern dwellings themselves.

In drawing inferences as to the arrangements of houses in ancient times from the system adopted in modern dwellings, we must make due allowance for the more jealous seclusion of Moslem women at the present day, and also for the present method of sitting with the legs tucked up, which necessitates taking off the out-door shoe. There was far more social equality of the two sexes among the Hebrews in ancient times than there is now among the Moslems. This affected all the household arrangements, and did not require the careful seclusion of the women's apartments, which complicates the construction of modern houses. Hebrew women, instead of being immured in a harem, mingled freely with the other sex in carrying out their social duties. They attended the flocks (Gn 29^{6}), prepared the meal (Gn 18^{6}), invited guests (Jg 4^{18}), and even on occasion criticized the conduct of their husband (1 S 25^{25}). They conversed with strangers in a public place with propriety (Gn 24^{24} $29^{9\text{f.}}$), and took part in public affairs of any special kind (1 S 18^{6}, which would suggest that they sat in an agora). This freedom of action naturally influenced the arrangements of the apartments in the house, and caused them to differ from those of the present day. The custom of sitting on a divan with the legs tucked up instead of sitting on a chair or stool also affects greatly all household arrangements, even to ceremonials and cleanliness, as may be seen at present in the life of the Chinese, who use chairs, and the Japanese, who sit on divans or couches. Another matter not to be lost sight of in considering the nature of the houses in early days, is the patriarchal customs of the Hebrews, and the improbability of their having many wants, accustomed as they were to living so much in tents.

The houses of the poor in early days must always have been of a very primitive character. Very often they were built of clay (mud or sunburnt brick), 'whose foundation is in the dust'; 'which are ready to become heaps'; 'by slothfulness the roof sinketh in, and through idleness of the hands the house leaketh' (Job 4^{19} 15^{28}, Ec 10^{18}, Is 9^{10}). These houses, as at the present day, were of a very unstable description, and if not instantly attended to were liable to be overthrown by heavy rainfall, hailstorm, and strong winds (Ezk $13^{10\text{f.}}$). Another inconvenience of mud houses is their liability to be 'dug through' or broken into by thieves (Job 24^{16}, Mt 6^{19} 24^{43}).

In other instances houses might be built of stone with plaster (Lv $14^{40\text{f.}}$) and mortar (Ezk 13^{11}), and wood of sycomore, holm tree (but see HOLM) and the oak (Is 9^{10}). These stone houses were also very insecurely built; the mortar, frequently made with mud and slime instead of burnt limestone, becomes as slippery as soap during heavy rains, and whole villages have been known to be overthrown in one night during bad weather (Land and the Book, ii. 57). In some parts of the country, however, the houses are very carefully built of squared stone throughout, owing to the total absence of wood; and those houses do not readily decay, Mt 7^{24} (Buckingham, Arab Tribes, 180, 326).

In the fenced cities the houses forming the walls are necessarily built solidly, 'great, and fenced up to heaven' (Dt 1^{28}), but those within the city do not differ materially from those in villages, except that for want of space the roofs are made more use of, and there are two storeys and often a court within the house. These houses, whether of mud or stone, are also very insecurely built, and are constantly falling down.

The people congregated, as they still do, for safety in villages and towns, and did not build isolated houses in the fields. The houses of the poor are quadrangular, usually of one storey in villages, and containing but one apartment, in which in cold weather the cattle also are housed; the portion for the use of the family being raised on a dais some 2 ft. or more above that where the cattle are herded. On this raised platform are the beds, chests, cooking utensils (1 S 28^{24} (?)). The light comes through the door, and when there are windows they are merely apertures raised some height above the ground, sometimes with wooden gratings. There is no chimney, and the smoke from the fire finds its way out through the holes in the building.

The roofs are usually flat, except where no wood is to be obtained. They are formed of rough rafters or boughs of trees with brushwood laid across, and over all a plaster of mud, rolled flat in showery weather with a stone roller. Upon the roofs are often temporary erections of straw or boughs of trees, for sleeping under, though in dry climates the roof is generally used without any covering except a quilt. It was prescribed by Dt 22^{8} that a parapet (EV 'battlement') should be erected round the roof, for the protection of those using it for recreation or other purposes. A stairway outside the house frequently gave access to the roof without the necessity of passing through the house. This arrangement is probably alluded to in our Lord's words, 'Let him that is on the housetop not go down nor enter in to take anything out of his house' (Mk 13^{15}). Rahab hid the spies 'with the stalks of flax which she had laid in order upon the roof' (Jos 2^{6}); Peter 'went up upon the housetop to pray' (Ac 10^{9}). For similar uses of the roof cf. Jg 16^{27} (where see Moore's note), 1 S $9^{25f.}$, 2 S 11^{2} 16^{22}, Is 22^{1}, Jer 19^{13}, Zeph 1^{5}, Neh 8^{16}.

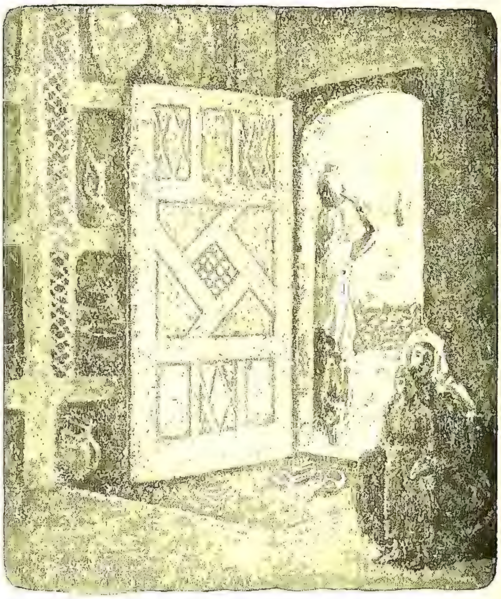
A considerable amount of discussion has been occasioned by the narrative of the healing of the paralytic (Mt $9^{2ff.}$, Mk $2^{3ff.}$, Lk $5^{18ff.}$), and the means adopted by his four friends to bring him into the presence of Jesus. Both Mark and Luke imply that the sick man's bearers first made their way to the roof, which would be readily accessible by an outside stairway or a ladder. Their further proceedings are described thus in Mk 2^{4} 'they uncovered the roof where he was, and when they had broken it up, they let down the bed whereon the sick of the palsy lay' (ἀπεστέγασαν τὴν στέγην ὅπου ἦν, καὶ ἐξορύξαντες χαλῶσι τὸν κράββατον, κ.τ.λ.); in Lk 5^{19} 'They let him down through the tiles with his couch into the midst before Jesus' (διὰ τῶν κεράμων καθῆκαν αὐτὸν σὺν τῷ κλινιδίῳ, κ.τ.λ.). It is not quite clear whether Jesus was teaching in the 'upper room' of a house with more than one storey, or on the ground floor of a one-storeyed house, or, as some think, in a gallery outside the house. In any case there would have been no difficulty either in getting rid of the covering of the roof or making an opening in the battlement that surrounded it. For a full discussion of the meaning of the passage the reader may refer to such works as Gould (on Mk 2^{4}) and Plummer (on Lk 5^{19}), both in Internat. Crit. Comm.; Bruce (on Mk 2^{4}) in Expositor's Gr. NT; Thomson, Land and the Book (1880), p. 358; Tristram, Eastern Customs, 34 f.

In the villages there is usually a court attached to the house, in which the cattle, sheep, and goats are penned; and in towns they are all brought within the walls and penned in courts and cellars belonging to the houses.

The monuments of Assyria and Egypt represent the houses much as they appear at present (Layard, Nineveh; Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians).

In examining the ruins of ancient cities east of the Jordan, one is much struck with the prominence of the temples and the complete effacement of the private dwellings, showing that the latter were built of materials that have readily decayed. This had been noticed elsewhere; and even at Athens in the time of Pericles, foreigners were struck by the contrast between the splendour of the public buildings and the mean dwellings of the common people (Thuc. ii. 14, 65; Dicaearch, Stat. Græc. p. 8).

The most striking peculiarity in the aspect of houses at the present day is their blank and desolate appearance from the outside: streets 8 ft. or less in width, houses 40 to 60 ft. high, with blank stone walls and little ornament of any kind, except the door and the projecting window over it, all peeping into which is jealously guarded against by the wooden lattice which fills up the window aperture; it is pierced with holes, and often elaborately carved. The doorways and the doors are often highly ornamented (Is 54^{12}, Rev 21^{21}) and enriched with arabesques, and have sentences from the Korân inscribed on them (cf. Dt 6^{9}). The doors are usually of hard wood, studded with iron nails or sheeted with iron, opening inwards, and furnished with bars and bolts. They are fastened with wooden locks, and wooden keys are required, often of enormous size, large enough for a stout club (Is 22^{22}; Land and the Book, i. 493). There is an opening in the door to insert the hand and key from the outside, the lock being on the inside (see below, Lock and Key). On entering the gate there is usually a porch or vestibule with a long stone bench for the doorkeeper and servants, where the master of the house receives visits and transacts business (Gn 19^{1} 23^{10} 34^{20}, Job 29^{7} may serve to illustrate this custom, although in these passages it is the gate of a city, not the door of a house, that is referred to). This porch is separated from the chambers within by a twisted passage, so that a view inside cannot be obtained from it. The house is built round one or more courts according to the wealth of the family, each room opening into the court, and seldom one into the other; there is a verandah round the court. In the larger houses at Damascus there are often several courts, all fitted up with great magnificence, the floors paved with marble, the walls lined with faïence, the ceilings have carved ornaments and tracery and are painted in gay colours, and ornamented wooden screens separate the several chambers.



CARVED HOUSE-DOOR OF PEASANT'S COTTAGE (MT. LEBANON).

In towns there are generally two or more storeys, and on each floor the chambers open on to a common balcony running round the inside of the court, with a staircase open to the sky, usually in a corner of the court.

The passage from the entrance doorway leads into the court, which is usually paved with marble or flagging, and may have in the centre a well (2 S 17^{18}) or a fountain, with citron and orange trees around, and overhead an awning may be stretched to keep off the sun.

As it is customary for the married sons to remain under their parents' roofs and bring up families, a house may often have forty or fifty inmates exclusive of the servants and slaves.

Opening into the first court on the ground floor, in smaller houses, are the principal apartments, the women's apartments being either in an inner court or on the floor above; but in larger houses where there are several courts, the first floor of the first court is used for the reception rooms, one large chamber being specially reserved for entertaining guests, who are treated with great honour (Lk 22^{12}, Ac 1^{13} 9^{37} 20^{8}). In addition to the guest-chamber of the house, in every village or encampment there is a public guest-room for entertainment of strangers, kept up at the expense of the inhabitants (cf. Gn 18^{1}, Ex 2^{20}, Jg 13^{15} $19^{17\text{ff.}}$). In wealthy houses the principal reception chamber opening into the first court is highly ornamented, paved with marble, with a fountain, and at the farther end the floor is raised and called the lîwan, with a divan running round the sides, formed of mattresses and cushions covered with carpets. The ceilings and walls are elaborately ornamented and brilliantly painted (Jer 22^{14} of a palace).

Moslems drop the slipper or shoe at the door when they enter an inner room or step on to the lîwan. And this is necessary both for comfort and cleanliness, as they sit with their feet tucked under them; but it would not be safe to assume that this custom prevailed among the Hebrews in early days in private life, though it was their custom so far as sacred ground was concerned (Ex 3^{5}, Jos 5^{15}, Lk 7^{38}). There is no clear indication of the Hebrews before the Captivity having used a divan on a raised lîwan, and the words signifying 'seats' in the Hebrew do not throw much light on the subject. The ancient Egyptians are shown in one picture squatting on the ground at dinner (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 58, 181). A bas-relief on the walls of Khorsabad represents the guests seated on high chairs at a festival (Layard, Nineveh, ii. 411).

The inner courts are often planted with fine trees, and the interior walls, verandahs, and staircase clothed with vines and creepers.

Ewald (Geschichte^{2}, iii. 451, 602) suggests that the 'armōn, 'keep,' of a palace was the harem or women's apartment, the most securely guarded portion of Eastern houses; but Gesenius (Lex.) says, 'None of the ancients rendered the word "women's apartment," as very many of late have done, after J. D. Michaelis,' and gives the meaning as 'fortress,' 'palace' (so Oxf. Heb. Lex., and Siegfried-Stade). The harem of the king of Persia is spoken of in Est 2^{3}, and also the chamberlain, keeper of the women. It is also probable that king Solomon, after his foreign marriages, kept a harem at Jerusalem; but this was not part of the life of the Hebrews. And the customs of Moslems regarding the seclusion of women can throw little light upon the customs of people among whom the sexes were on almost equal terms.

The doors of the inner court are not usually furnished with locks and bolts, and a curtain is often all that separates it from the outer court, the idea being that all is private within the outer gate or outer court (Dt 24^{10}, Ac 10^{17} 12^{13}).

The upper rooms of the house are called the 'ălîyah, which is also the Hebrew word (עֲלִיָּה) for upper chamber. Thomson (Land and the Book, i. 235) states that in northern Syria this is the most desirable part of the establishment, is best fitted up, and is still given to guests who are to be treated with honour. The women and servants live below, and their apartment is called 'arḍîyeh, or ground floor; in common parlance beit, or house. Every respectable dwelling has both winter and summer house, beit shatawy and beit seify. If these are on the same floor, then the exterior and airy apartment is the summer-house, and that for winter is the interior and more sheltered room (2 K 4^{10}, Jer 36^{22}, Am 3^{15}; see Driver's note). In the Lebanon the upper rooms are used in summer and the lower rooms in winter. In some parts of the country where the cold in winter is severe, vaults under ground are used during the cold weather. With regard to the use of the roof of the house, the 'housetop,' see ROOF.

The only mention of cooking-places is in Ezk 46^{23} (the temple). The kitchens would probably, as with the Romans and Greeks, have had a hearth, with stone divisions for resting the pots on. There were no other fireplaces (Jer 36^{22} RV). It is supposed that there were no chimneys, but a smoke-hole is spoken of (Hos 13^{3}; see Window), and it is difficult to understand how the smoke could be got rid of in two-storeyed buildings without chimneys of some kind.

Leprosy of houses (Lv $14^{34.\ 55}$) is described by Gesenius as probably a nitrous scab; Thomson (Land and Book, ii. 518) alludes to leprosy in garments and in buildings as phenomena not only unknown, but utterly unintelligible at this day.

In considering the household arrangements of the Hebrews, the gradual advance of civilization and luxury must not be forgotten, and the probability that even the rich in early days lived with a roughness of surroundings which would be considered as squalor in later days. The influence of the Greeks and Romans on the customs of Palestine and the East has also to be considered. In the very earliest days of the entry of the Hebrews into the Promised Land, the Philistines from Caphtor (which is generally identified with Crete) were in possession of the lowlands of Judah; from B.C. 332 to B.C. 63 Palestine was more or less directly under Greek influence, and from the latter date for many centuries it was directly under Roman influence. The customs of the people have therefore been influenced by Egypt, Assyria, Syria, Persia, Greece, and Rome; and though the dwellings of the poor may have been little affected by these influences, there can be no doubt that those of the rich would have reflected the feelings of the masters of the day. 'How apt we all are to look at the manners of ancient times through the false medium of our everyday associations! How difficult it is to strip our thoughts of their modern garb, and to escape from the thick atmosphere of prejudice in which custom and habit have enveloped us! and yet, unless we take a comprehensive and extended view of the objects of archæological speculation, unless we can look upon ancient customs with the eyes of the ancients, unless we can transport ourselves in the spirit to other lands and other times, and sun ourselves in the clear light of by-gone days, all our conception of what was done by the men who have long since ceased to be must be dim, uncertain, and unsatisfactory, and all our reproductions as soulless and uninstructive as the scattered fragments of a broken statue' (Niebuhr, Kleine Schriften, p. 92).

Chamber (bed-, guest-, inner, upper).—When a particular apartment of a house is alluded to, the word 'chamber,' 'parlour,' or 'closet' is generally used in AV, the word 'room' being used in a general sense, 'Is there room in thy father's house for us?' 'We have room to lodge in' (Gn 24^{23}), except in three instances in the NT (Mk 14^{15}, Lk 22^{12}, Ac 1^{13}).

The word 'closet' occurs only once in the OT (Jl 2^{16}), where it is used for the nuptial tent (see Driver, ad loc.), as is the word 'chamber' in Ps 19^{5}. It is used twice in NT, where it represents ταμεῖον, 'store-house' or 'closet' (Mt 6^{6}, Lk 12^{3}). The word 'parlour' is used only three times. In Jg $3^{20f.}$ the summer parlour (עֲלִיָּה) of Eglon means the roof-chamber, raised above the flat roof at one corner or upon a tower-like annexe to the building (Moore). In 1 Ch 28^{11} RV 'the inner chambers' (חֲדָרִים) is tr^{d} 'inner parlour' in AV. In 1 S 9^{22} 'parlour' is used for לִשְׁכָּה, which signifies a room in which the sacrificial meals were held (see Driver, ad loc.). In RV it is tr^{d} 'guest-chamber.'

There are thus only three Hebrew words used in connexion with chambers of houses. 1. חֶדֶר a chamber: Job 9^{9} 37^{9} ἀποθήκη, cubiculum; inner chamber: Gn 43^{30}, 1 K 20^{30} 22^{25}, 2 K 9^{2}, 1 Ch 28^{11}, 2 Ch 18^{24}; bed-chamber: 2 S 4^{7} 13^{10}, 2 K 6^{12}, 2 Ch 22^{11}, Ec 10^{20}; women's apartment: Ca 1^{4} 3^{4}; bridal-chamber: Jg 15^{1} 16^{9}, Jl 2^{16} (chamber); store-house: Pr 24^{4}.

2. עֲלִיָּה (ὑπερῷον, cœnaculum), an upper chamber on the roof of a house: Jg $3^{20ff.}$ (Eglon), 2 K 1^{2} (Ahaziah), 4^{11} (Elisha), 23^{12} (Ahaz).

3. לִשְׁכָּה (κατάλυμα, triclinium), a sacrificial dining-room: 1 S 9^{22}; used in later times for the chambers in the Temple Court in which the priests lived: Jer $35^{2.4}$, Ezk 40^{17} etc.

In the smaller houses there were probably no bedrooms, and in houses generally all rooms could be used for sleeping in, as is the case at the present day; but the inner chambers appear to have been more particularly set apart for sleeping, or were used as closets in which the bedding was kept (2 S 4^{7}, Ec 10^{20}; Jos. Ant. XII. iv. 11; 2 K 11^{2}). The furniture of a chamber for sleeping in is given (2 K 4^{10}) as 'a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick'; its position in a retired portion of the house is indicated in Ex 8^{3}, 2 K 6^{12}, and other passages. Joash and his nurse were hidden in a chamber for the beds (2 K 11^{2}, 2 Ch 22^{11}), probably a closet for the bedding. In the poorer class of houses the place set apart for laying down the beds was often merely a portion of the common room devoted to daily avocations, with the floor somewhat raised, or else a room in which the family all slept together (Lk 11^{7}). The constant reference to chambers for withdrawing to and inner chambers among all classes, shows that it was usual to have more than one room in the house, except with the very poor. Houses were often two storeys in height, and the upper chamber or 'ălîyah was used for withdrawing to or sleeping in (Jg 3^{20}, 2 K 4^{11}). The chamber from which Ahaziah fell through the lattice was of this nature. Altars appear to have been erected in these upper chambers on the roof (2 K 23^{12}).

Doorway (פֶּתַח 'opening,' 'entrance'), Door (דֶּלֶת).—The doorway of the house differs from the gate of the city (שַׁעַר, πύλη, porta) in that the first was for private and the latter for public purposes. When דֶּלֶת is used of the gate of a city, it appears to differ from שַׁעַר, which denotes the whole structure, including posts, open space, etc., in being restricted to the actual door which swings on its hinges (Oxf. Heb. Lex.).

The doorway consisted of three parts:—The threshold or sill (סַף, which is used in some cases for door, 2 K 12^{9} 22^{4}, Jer 35^{4}), the two side posts (מְזוּזוֹת), and the lintel (מַשְׁקוֹף), Ex $12^{7f.}$. The door itself was of wood, stone, or metal, according to circumstances. Wooden and metal doors have disappeared; but in Asia Minor, and east of the Lake of Gennesaret, stone doors exist to the present day in situ, the stone hinges resting in the sockets (Burckhardt, Syria, p. 58).

These doors were often made with two leaves, and had bolts and bars (Jg 3^{23} 16^{3}, Neh 3^{3} 7^{3}, Ca 5^{5}). See Bar, Bolt, Key.

The doorways were often highly ornamented and enriched with tracery (Is 54^{12}, Rev 21^{21}), and inscribed with sentences of Scripture in accordance with the Mosaic Law, 'Thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates' (Dt 6^{9} 11^{20}). In Moslem countries the same practice exists at the present day. The mĕzûzâh, the distinctive mark of a Hebrew habitation, is a kind of amulet like the phylacteries, and consists of a tube of vellum, inside of which are scrolls with various scriptural texts. These at the present day are hung up inside the doorway on the doorpost. Inside the doorway was a bench for the doorkeeper and servants, and there the master of the house sat and transacted business.

The door could be broken in readily. 'They pressed, and came near to break the door' (Gn 19^{9}). The willing bondman was received into the household by having his ear thrust through with an awl into the door (Ex 21^{6}, Dt 15^{17}). The inner chamber in Amnon's house had a door with a bolt (2 S 13^{17}).

Bar (בְּרִיחַ).—(1) A cross-beam, a bar which was passed from one side to the other through the rings of the several boards of the holy tabernacle, which were thus held together (Ex $26^{26f.}$ 35^{11} $36^{31f.}$, Nu 3^{36} 4^{31}). (2) A bolt or bar for shutting a door of a gate or house.

The bar was used principally at night time (Neh 7^{3}, Rev 21^{25}), as it is at the present day, to keep the door closed. It was made of wood or iron (Is 45^{2}), and was inserted into sockets in the gateposts or doorway of houses (Ovid, Amor. i. 6). The door could not be opened until the bar was removed. Chamber doors were sometimes barred as well as bolted (2 S 13^{17}; Eurip. Orest. 154 b). The first mention of the use of bars with gates is in the account of the taking of the cities of Og king of Bashan by Moses (Dt 3^{5}). Samson carried away the gates of Gaza, posts, bars, and all (Jg 16^{3}). In the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem in the time of Artaxerxes, both bars and bolts of the gates of the city are mentioned (Neh $3^{3f.}$).

In the Bible, bars are mentioned in connexion with city gates only, and not with reference to houses. In Jon 2^{6} the term is used in a metaphorical sense.—'The bars of the earth' (pictured as a house out of which Jonah is shut—Oxf. Heb. Lex.). The gates of Damascus, Jerusalem, and other walled cities in the East are closed at night and barred.

Bolt or lock (מַנְעוּל, from the root נָעַל, to fasten with a bolt, or to bind sandals to the feet).—In Dt 33^{25} this word (in the form מִנְעָל) is given as 'bars' (RV) or 'shoes' (AV, RVm), κλεῖθρον, sera. The idea of binding and loosing with a key appears in Mt 16^{19} 'I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.'

The bolt or lock is referred to in connexion with the doors both of city gates and of houses; but in the two instances in which the Heb. word is tr^{d} 'lock' in AV, it is given as 'bolt' in RV (Ca 5^{5}, Neh $3^{3f.}$). It does not appear that city gates and palaces which had both bars and bolts would require the bolt to be opened with a key, both because they were not opened from the outside, and because guards were present to protect them from being opened by unauthorized persons (Neh $3^{3f.}$ 7^{3}).

The bolt was shot into a socket made to receive it in the threshold on the inside of a gate or doorway. In the Pompeian doorways two holes in the sill correspond to the two bolts of the leaves of the doors (Gell, Pompeiana, 2 ser. vol. i. p. 167); in doorways with a single leaf the bolt would shoot into a socket in the doorpost. In the Odyssey (i. 442, iv. 802, xxi. 6, 46–50) the door was drawn to with a silver ring and the bolt fastened with a thong; to open the door from the outside the thong of the ring was loosed, and the 'well bent key' (of brass with an ivory handle) was put in, and by means of it the bolt was struck back. By degrees improvements were made in bolts until locks and keys of very advanced design came into existence, among the Greeks and Romans. In Jg $3^{23f.}$ an account is given of a door which could be locked by means of a key from inside or outside. Ehud locked the doors of Eglon's summer parlour, and Eglon's servants, after waiting for their master to open the doors from the inside, took a key and opened them from the outside. In Ca $5^{4.5}$ reference is made to the hole in the door through which the hand was put in with the key in withdrawing the bolt; the handles of the lock (AV) or bolt (RV) are also mentioned. 'My beloved put in his hand by the hole in the door.' In Dt 33^{25} bars or bolts are spoken of as of iron and brass. Reference to the bolting of an inner chamber is made in the account of Amnon and Tamar (2 S $13^{17f.}$). Ancient Egyptian doors, with two leaves, had central bolts and bars (Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. i. 15).

Key (מַפְתֵּחַ, from the root פָּתַח, 'open,' κλεἰς, clavis). This instrument to open a lock or withdraw a bolt is mentioned only once in its literal sense (Jg $3^{25f.}$). In other instances the term is used figuratively (Is 22^{22}, Lk 11^{52}, Mt 16^{19}) as a symbol to denote power and authority delegated to a steward, chamberlain, or minister, 'And the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; and he shall open and none shall shut: and he shall shut and none shall open.' Merchants and others at the present day in Palestine and Egypt are accustomed to carry large keys of wood or iron over their shoulders, if too long to hang at the girdle. Thomson (Land and the Book, i. 493) mentions the enormous wooden keys used in Palestine; in some cases almost a load to carry.

The lock or bolt for magazines, houses, and garden gates is made of wood and hollowed out, about 2 ft. long for a gate and 6 to 9 in. long for a chamber door. It slides through a groove in a piece of wood attached to the door, and shoots into a socket in the doorpost or sill. When the bolt is shot, some pins in the groove drop into corresponding holes in the bolt, and it cannot be withdrawn without an instrument to force up these pins out of the holes and pull the bolt back. This instrument is called the key, and consists of a piece of wood furnished with a number of pins in exactly the same position (reversed). It is introduced into the hollow bolt, and, raising the groove pins, it draws back the bolt. Unless these pins exactly fit, the bolt cannot be released (Lane, Mod. Eg. i. 42).

In some cases doors were sealed with clay. Job 38^{14} 'It is changed as clay under the seal.' At Athens a jealous husband sometimes sealed the door of the woman's apartment (Aristoph. Thesm. 422). The king sealed with his own signet the stone brought to the den of lions into which Daniel was cast (Dn 6^{17}). The sepulchre of our Lord was made sure by sealing the stone at the door (Mt 27^{66}).

Hinge (צִיר).—In early days doors were poised, not hung, on hinges (Pr 26^{14}); that is to say, hinges were door-pivots let into sockets in the threshold and lintel on which the door swung. Remains of stone doors with the hinges or pivots attached are found in various parts of Syria and Egypt and Asia Minor.

The Greeks and Romans used hinges for doors like those now in use in Europe; four hinges of bronze are preserved in the British Museum.

Knock (דָּפַק).—There is no mention of a knocker having been affixed to doors, as with the Greeks and Romans. In Jg 19^{22} the word (מִתְדַּפְּקִים) is used of beating violently (till they were tired) against a door. In Ca 5^{2} we hear of the beloved knocking (דּוֹפֵק) at the door. At the present day one stands on the outside of the house and knocks, and calls loudly (Mt 7^{7}, Lk 12^{36} 13^{25}, Ac 12^{13}, Rev 3^{20}).

Window (חַלּוֹן, θυρίς).—The Hebrew word is derived from the root חָלַל 'pierce.' This word appears to be used generally where the windows of houses are referred to, which originally were but openings pierced in the walls, without shutters. The word casement in Pr 7^{6} (AV) appears as lattice in RV, being the tr^{n} of 'eshnâb. The windows in Daniel's chamber, open towards Jerusalem (Dn 6^{10} [Heb. ^{11}], represent an Aram. word (כַּוִּין) whose derivation is quite uncertain (the root כוא means to burn). The words (מֶחֱזָה אֶל־מֶחֱזָה) tr^{d} 'light over against light' (1 K $7^{4.5}$) are derived from חָזָה 'see.' The meaning of שְׁקֻפִים and שֶׁקֶף in same verses tr^{d} 'windows' in AV is uncertain. There are three words signifying 'lattice-' or 'net-work' filling up the aperture of a window. 1. אֲרֻבָּה. It is used to denote the smoke-hole of a room (Hos 13^{3}); the windows of a dove-cote (Is 60^{8}); and the aperture of the window as being closed with lattice-work and not with glass. It is also used for the 'windows of heaven' (Gn 7^{11} 8^{2}, 2 K $7^{2.19}$, Is 24^{18}, Mal 3^{10}). 2. חֲרַכִּים (Aram.) lattice-work or net-work of a window, Ca 2^{9} (only), 'He glanceth through the windows.' 3. אֶשְׁנָב (of doubtful etym. synonymous with חַלּוֹן), lattice through which the cold air passes (?). Jg 5^{28} 'The mother of Sisera looked down (see Moore) through the lattice'; Pr 7^{6} 'In at the window of my house I looked forth through my casement' ('lattice' RV) [all].

There is another word tr^{d} 'lattice,'—שְׂבָכָה, lattice- or net-work, which is principally used with reference to the lattice- or net-work surrounding the capitals of the columns (1 K $7^{17f.}$), but it is also used for the lattice or balustrade in the upper chamber of Ahaziah in Samaria through which he fell; this word has probably no connexion with window.

At the present time in Eastern towns there is usually a large window prominently projecting over the doorway into the street, and fitted with lattice-work, which is opened only upon the occasion of high ceremonies. It is probable that in early days also one or perhaps more windows of the palaces and larger houses opened into the street, as there is constant reference to windows opening into the street or into the city wall. In the houses of the poorer classes, however, it is doubtful whether any windows existed, and what did exist were only apertures to admit light and let out the smoke. At the present day in the houses in the Lebanon the walls of the rooms are perforated with small openings (in addition to the windows), which let in light and air. Where there are courts, however, there are windows opening inwards. Among the Greeks, windows were not uncommon (Aristoph. Thesm. 797). The Romans had few windows, the bedrooms being lighted from the principal apartments, and the rooms on the upper floor only being lighted from the street (Juv. iii. 270). In Pompeii it can be seen how very few houses have windows opening on to the streets, and even in these cases the sills of the windows are over 6 ft. above the footway, and are very small, about 3 ft. by 2 ft.

The discoveries at Pompeii prove that glass was used for windows under the early emperors, as glass windows have been found in several of the houses; glass may therefore have been in use in Palestine in the houses of the wealthy at an earlier date. Pliny (c. 70 A.D., HN xxxvi. 45) states that windows were made of mica, from countries near Palestine, viz. Cyprus and Cappadocia.

The references in the Bible to windows to look out from are almost all in connexion with palaces.

'Abimelech king of the Philistines looked out at a window' (Gn 26^{8}). The mother of Sisera looked forth through a window (Jg 5^{28}). 'Michal the daughter of Saul looked out at the window' (2 S 6^{16}). 'Jezebel looked out at the window' (2 K 9^{30}). In the following cases, however, there are windows in houses of the less opulent classes—Rahab the harlot let the spies down through a window on the town wall of Jericho (Jos 2^{15}); Elisha when sick in his own house directed king Joash to 'open the window eastward' (2 K 13^{17}); St. Paul at Damascus was let down by the wall in a basket through a window (2 Co 11^{33}); Eutychus, asleep on the window-seat of an upper chamber at Troas, fell down from the third storey, ἀπὸ τοῦ τριστέγου (Ac 20^{9}). Windows are spoken of (Jer 22^{14}) in connexion with a wide house and spacious chambers, ceiled with cedar and painted with vermilion. It is threatened (Jl 2^{9}) that locusts shall enter in at the windows like a thief. The pelican and the porcupine singing in the windows is a sign of desolation (Zeph 2^{14}).

HOW.—1. How is sometimes used for 'that,' introducing a dependent sentence which states a fact, without reference to the manner of it. Thus 1 S 2^{22} (RV 'how that'), 1 Ch 18^{9} 'Now when Tou king of Hamath heard how David had smitten all the host of Hadarezer king of Zobah' (RV 'that'); especially in NT (Gr. ὅτι), Lk 1^{58} 21^{5} ('And as some spake of the temple, how it was adorned with goodly stones and gifts'), Jn 4^{1} 12^{19} 14^{28}, Ac 14^{27} ('they rehearsed all that God had done with them, and how he had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles,' RV 'how that'), 20^{35}, Gal 4^{13}, Philem ^{19}, Ja 2^{22} ('Seest thou how faith wrought with his works,' RV 'Thou seest that'), Rev 2^{2}. Cf. Shaks. Tit. Andron. II. iii. 207—

> 'Now will I fetch the king to find them here,
> That he thereby may give a likely guess
> How these were they that made away his brother.'

2. Still more frequently we find 'how that' where mod. usage would use 'that' alone. Ex 9^{29} 'that thou mayest know how that the earth is the Lord's' (כִּי, RV 'that'), 10^{2}, Dt 1^{31}, Jos 9^{24}, Ru 1^{6}, 1 S 24$^{10.18}$, 2 S 18^{19}, 1 K 5^{3}, 2 K 9^{25} etc., and esp. in NT (again for ὅτι). The older versions have this form yet oftener, as in Tindale, Gn 20^{13} 'This kyndnesse shalt thou shewe unto me in all places where we come, that thou saye of me, how that I am thy brother'; Mt 6^{18} 'that it appere not unto men howe that thou fastest'; Jn 9^{18} 'But the Jewes dyd not beleue of the felowe, how that he was blynde and receaved his syght.'

Howbeit (=nevertheless, notwithstanding) is common. In writers of the period 'howbeit' sometimes stands for 'notwithstanding that,' 'although,' as Melvill, Diary, p. 371, 'the King sattelit and dimitted us pleasandlie, with many attestationes that he knew nocht of the Papist Lords' hom-coming till they war in the countrey; and whowbeit the esteates had licenced them to mak thair offers, they sould nocht be receaved till they tham selves war furthe of the countrey again.'

Howsoever is once found with its parts separated, 2 S 24^{3} 'how many soever they be.' Cf. Knox, Hist. p. 30, 'how suspitious and infamous so ever they were.' Howsoever means either 'in whatever way,' Zeph 3^{7} 'howsoever I punished them'; or 'come what may' (rather more than 'nevertheless') Jg 19^{20}, 2 S 18$^{22.23}$. J. Hastings.

HOZAI (חוֹזָי) is given as a prop. name in RV of 2 Ch 33^{19}, where AV and RVm give 'the seers.' AVm has Hosai, LXX τῶν ὁρώντων. The latter may have read הַחוֹזִים, which appears to be supported also by the Syriac. If we retain the MT, the tr. of RV seems the only defensible one; but perhaps the original reading was חֹזָיו 'his seers' (so Kittel in Haupt, ad loc.). J. A. Selbie.

HUCKSTER.—Huckster is properly the fem. of 'hawker,' but the distinction between the Anglo-Sax. fem. termination -ster and the masc. term. -er was early obliterated. The root of the word is held by Skeat to be Du. hucken, to stoop (under a load). The huckster has always been distinguished from the merchant as a retailer of small wares, a pedlar; and the word has from very early times carried a certain opprobrium. Thus Sir T. Moore, Workes, p. 1304, 'To shewe him selfe a substanciall merchaunt and not an hukster, he gently let them have it even at their owne price'; and Glanvill, Vanity of Dogmatizing, Pref., 'Therefore I seek no applause from the disgrace of others, nor will I huckster-like discredit any man's ware, to recommend mine own.' The word occurs in Sir 26^{29} (and in the heading to the chapter) 'A merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong; and an huckster shall not be freed from sin' (κάπηλος, which occurs elsewhere in LXX only Is 1^{22}, and not at all in NT, though the vb. καπηλεύω is found in 2 Co 2^{17}, EV 'corrupt,' RVm 'make merchandise of'). Here the κάπηλος stands parallel to the ἔμπορος, and the charge of not being without sin applies equally to both. The sentiment is in accordance with Rabbinic notions. See Edersheim's note. J. Hastings.

HUKKOK (חֻקֹּק).—A place near Tabor on the west of Naphtali, Jos 19^{34}. It is the present village Yâḳûḳ (but see Dillm. Josua, ad loc.), near the edge of the plateau to the N.W. of the Sea of Galilee, between Tabor and Hannathon, marking the border of Zebulun and Naphtali, Jos 19^{14}.

Literature.—SWP vol. i. sh. vi.; Guérin, Galilée, i. 354 ff.; Robinson, BRP^{2} iii. 81 f.; Asher, Benj. of Tudela, ii. 421, where R. Parchi locates the tomb of the prophet Habakkuk at Yâkûk. C. R. Conder.

HUKOK (חוּקֹק) of 1 Ch 6^{75} [Heb.^{60}] is a textual error for Helkath (which see) of Jos 21^{31}.

HUL (חוּל).—The eponym of an Aramæan tribe (Gn 10^{23}) whose location is quite uncertain. The various attempts that have been made to establish its identity will be found in Dillmann, who does not consider that any of them has been successful.

HULDAH (חֻלְדָּה 'weasel' (?); for bearing of this name on Totem theory, see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 90, 101, 103).—A prophetess who lived during the reign of Josiah. All we know concerning her is recorded in 2 K 22$^{14-20}$ (reproduced almost verbatim in 2 Ch 34$^{22-28}$). She is described as the wife of Shallum 'the keeper of the wardrobe,' who dwelt in the second quarter (mishneh) of the city. See College. In spite of our scanty information, she must have had a well-recognized standing as a prophetess, for it was to H. that the messengers of Josiah betook themselves when they were sent to 'inquire of the Lord.' The king's alarm at the contents of the book found in the temple by Hilkiah was only partially allayed by the answer of H., which was in many points far from reassuring, although Josiah on account of his personal piety was to escape the worst of the coming evils. J. A. Selbie.

HUMILITY (עֲנָוָה, ταπεινοφροσύνη; on the special Christian sense of the latter and on its relation to πραότης, see Trench, NT Syn.^{8} 142 ff.).—In one aspect the whole Bible may be viewed as a revelation of the character of God, and the divine love of humility is a feature of that character which is traceable throughout. In Ps 18^{35} 113^{6} the virtue of humility is attributed to God Himself, who humbleth Himself to behold the things that are in heaven and earth; and recent advances in our knowledge, both of the infinitely great in heaven and of the infinitely little on earth, have deepened our wonder at God's providence, at the contrast of His greatness and His minute care for the least of His works (cf. Mt $10^{29.\ 30}$). But, after all, our words 'great' and 'little' can have no direct significance to Him who is absolute and eternal; and, while in men different qualities often stand out sharply distinct, in the transparent simplicity of the divine character we at once see through the humility to the love which underlies it; so that on both grounds it seems unnatural to us to dwell upon 'the great God's great humbleness,' in distinction from the love that moved Him to create, and to deign to take notice of that which He created.

But when we turn to consider the Bible record of God's dealings with the moral natures of men, there is scarcely any divine characteristic so marked as that which is expressed in the words, 'Surely he scorneth the scorners, but he giveth grace to the lowly' (Pr 3^{34}=Ja 4^{6}), and 'Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones' (Is 57^{15}). From Babel (Gn 11^{4}) to Nebuchadnezzar (Dn $4^{30.\ 37}$), from the song of Hannah (1 S 2^{3}) to the Magnificat (Lk 1^{51}), the lessons of history and the insight of the prophet have taught that 'pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall' (Pr 16^{18}), while 'blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth' (Ps 37^{11}= Mt 5^{5}). Especially is the duty of humility enforced in Ps and Pr and in some of the Prophets. For though God is known to bless the humble, yet the sense of His special favour is apt to beget pride, and therefore the Deuteronomist and Ezekiel are led to insist on the utter absence of merit in Israel; and to explain that God's choice of His people was not determined by any good qualities in them on which they should pride themselves (Dt 7^{7} $8^{17.\ 18}$ 9^{4-7} 26^{5} 32^{10}, Ezk 16, where Jerus. is charged with having used God's gifts to minister to her own vanity, cf. Ro 11^{17-24}); while Amos protests that other races besides the children of Israel are equally the objects of God's providence, 9^{7-10}.

So far, the Bible idea might not seem to be very far removed from the familiar conception of Herodotus and the Greek tragedians, that God looks askance as with envy on human presumption, and even on innocent success. Yet the Bible at least dwells rather on God's love of the lowly than on His hatred of the proud, and there is no sign of His displeasure at mere prosperity. But our sense of the contrast between the Greek idea and that of the Bible will be deepened if we consider the relations of humility to other virtues.

(1) Humility towards God is based on truth. It is the simple recognition of facts as they really are —see Ro 12^{3}. No man can dare to boast before God (Ps 143^{2}, 1 Co 1^{29}), and whatever of merit or success he has he owes to God's bounty (1 Co 4^{7}). Hence walking humbly with God is put by Micah (6^{8}) as a climax after doing justly and loving mercy. Pride comes from forgetting God and forming false judgments on oneself or others from the world's standpoint, e.g. Dt $8^{17.\ 18}$, Is 10^{12-15}, Lk 17^{10} 18^{10-14}, 2 Co 10^{12}. (2) From man's dependence upon God follows the principle that there can be no true advance without readiness to receive grace, i.e. humility. God demands of man that he should humbly ask for help, that he should open his mouth wide that God may fill it. St. Paul attributes the Jews' failure to their not subjecting themselves to this condition (Ro 10^{3}). Abraham is an example of the humility whose prayer God hears (Gn 18^{27-32}). (3) As sons who owe all to their Father, men are bound to obey, and humility is thus closely connected with obedience. The command to perform acts, even those which to the natural man seem foolish, is the test of the humility and faith which God will bless: thus Naaman (2 K 5^{13}). Similarly, circumcision is, in metaphor, connected with humility (Lv 26^{41}, Dt 10^{16} 30^{6}). (4) In 2 Ch 32^{26} 33^{12} 34^{27} repentance and conversion are identified with humbling oneself. God sends chastisements to humble men and bring them to a better mind (Ps 119^{75}, La 3^{33} עָנָה, the same root as is commonly used for humble); but man can refuse to learn the lesson (Ex 10^{3}, 2 Ch $36^{12.\ 13}$). Fasting as a self-imposed chastisement is often connected with humility (1 K $21^{27.\ 29}$, Ezr 8^{21} etc.).

Humility as regards one's fellow-men fills a much smaller space, especially in OT, than humility towards God. It was often inculcated by Christ (Mt 18^{1-4} 20^{25-28}); and St. Paul connects it directly with love (1 Co 13^{4}), while jealousy and envy, sins which have their root in pride, are reckoned among the manifest works of the flesh (Gal $5^{20.\ 21}$). So in Ph 2^{3-5} he condemns faction and vainglory, and commends the 'lowliness of mind' in which each counts 'other better than himself; not looking each of you to his own things, but each of you also to the things of others.' Such a 'mind' conforms to the pattern of the humility of the Son of God, who emptied Himself and became incarnate.

We can only touch lightly on the humility of Christ, which was shown in His earthly life from beginning to end. He abhorred not the Virgin's womb, and the lowly circumstances of His birth have ever been the theme of Christian artists and poets. The humility of the thirty years' subjection to His parents, and of the three years of unceasing toil, privation, and opposition, was crowned when He endured the cross, despising shame (He 12^{2}). We may notice specially His praying (Lk 9^{18} etc.), His admitting weariness, distress, and pain (Jn 4^{6}, Mk 14^{34}, Jn 19^{28}), and the solemn words and acts by which He inculcated humility (Mt 11^{29} and Jn 13^{12-16}). At the same time, He asserted His authority (e.g. to forgive sins, to judge men, to found an undying Church); He proclaimed Himself as the only way to God, etc. (Jn 14^{6}); He claimed that He alone knew the Father of right (Mt 11^{27}). And He felt and expressed burning indignation at bigotry, hypocrisy, and blind self-complacency. St. Paul followed His example, and in him too we see that humility is compatible with righteous indignation, and even with just and true self-assertion.

It is worth observing also that St. Peter, who was at first the type of self-reliant boldness (Mt 16^{22} 26^{33-35}), is afterwards particularly careful to dwell on the need of humility (1 P $2^{13.\ 17.\ 20}$ $3^{4.\ 8}$ $5^{3.\ 5.\ 6}$). W. O. BURROWS.

HUMTAH (חֻמְטָה).—A city of Judah, noticed next to Hebron, Jos 15^{54}. The site is doubtful.

HUNGER.—See FOOD.

HUNTING (צוּד, θηρεύειν, ἀγρεύειν, venor, capio, capio venatione, capio prædam, 'to hunt'; צַיִד, צֵידָה, θήρα, θήρευμα, ἐπισιτισμός, venandi, venatio, cibaria, 'hunting,' 'venison'; צַיָּד, θηρευτής, venator, 'hunter'; חַיָּה, θηρίον, especially in חַיְתוֹ אֶרֶץ, חַיַּת הָאָרֶץ, τὸ θηρίον τῆς γῆς, τὸ θηρίον τὸ ἄγριον, bestia terræ, agri, etc.).

When the earliest extant documents originated, the Israelites had not only passed out of, but had entirely forgotten that Israel ever passed through, that stage in the development of primitive tribes at which men's chief business and resource is hunting. Adam (Gn 3^{17}) and Cain (4^{2}) cultivate the soil, and Abel is a shepherd (ib.). Israel, in the persons of Isaac and Jacob, is contrasted with the hunting tribes, Ishmael, the 'archer' (Gn 21^{20} E), and Esau, the 'cunning hunter' (Gn 25^{27} J); it is Nimrod, the founder of Assyria, who is 'a mighty hunter before J″' (Gn 10^{9} R). Hebrew, however, preserves a trace of the hunting stage of primitive society. צֵידָה ẓêdâh, by etymology 'hunting' or 'game,' and so used in Kethîbh of Gn 27^{3}, is regularly used for provision (Gn 42^{25} etc.); thus suggesting a time when game was the ordinary food.

Moreover, in historic times, hunting was neither a common nor a favourite occupation in Israel. The account of Jacob and Esau shows that the Israelites were not addicted to hunting. Other references to hunting are general and casual; no actual hunt is ever mentioned. The references to lions, leopards, bears, etc. etc., and the lists of clean and unclean animals (Dt 14), show that both big and small game were abundant. But the only instances we meet with are where a shepherd or wayfarer has to defend himself or his charge; cf. the supposed fate of Joseph (Gn 37^{33}), Samson (Jg 14^{6} 15^{4}), David (1 S 17^{34-37}), Benaiah (2 S 23^{20}, apparently something more than an act of self-defence), the unnamed prophet of 1 K 13^{24}; cf. also Is 5^{29} 31^{4}, Am 3^{12}. On the other hand, the allusions in Lv 17^{13}, 1 S 26^{20} 'as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains,' Job 10^{16} 38^{39} 41^{26}, Pr 12^{27} etc. etc., show that the Israelites were familiar with hunting; and the gazelle (צְבִי) and the hart (אַיָּל) are referred to as ordinary articles of diet (Dt $12^{15.\,22}$), and are mentioned with the roebuck (יַחְמוּר 1 K 4^{23}) as part of the provision made for Solomon's table. Bows and arrows (Gn 27^{3}), slings (1 S 17^{40}), nets (Job 19^{6}, Ps 9^{15}, Is 51^{20} etc.), snares and traps (פַּח Am 3^{5}, מוֹקֵשׁ Am 3^{5}), cf. the group of terms in Job 18^{8-10}, were used to catch game, especially wild birds. Also pits (פַּחַת Is 24^{17}, שַׁחַת Ps 35^{7}) were dug as traps for larger animals; and sometimes a net was concealed (Ps 35^{7}) in such a pit. The few references to hunting furnish us with names of some of the animals hunted and instruments used, but afford scarcely any data as to details in the nature of the instruments or the methods of hunting.

The comparative indifference of the Israelites to hunting is the more striking when we remember how devoted Egyptian and Assyrian kings and nobles were to the pursuit; their monuments depict many hunting scenes. It is true that our Hebrew documents probably come from the central districts at a time when they were too densely populated for much sport. We might hear more of hunting if we had earlier writings from the frontier lands south of Judah and east of Jordan.

In the Apocrypha we read in Sirach of a decoy partridge in a cage (11^{30}), of a gazelle taken in a snare (27^{20}), and of the use of game for food (36^{19}).

Jos. (Ant. IV. viii. 9) refers to hunting dogs, which are never mentioned in OT, and tells us that Herod the Great was a mighty hunter (Ant. XV. vii. 7, XVI. x. 3; BJ I. xxi. 13).

NT only uses a few metaphors borrowed from hunting (e.g. Lk 11^{54} θηρεῦσαι; Lk 21^{35}, Ro 11^{9}, 1 Ti 3^{7} 6^{9}, 2 Ti 2^{26}, παγίς; Mt 22^{15} παγιδεύειν). See, further, NET, SNARE, and the articles on animals.

HUPHAM (חוּפָם, LXX omits), Nu 26^{39}.—See HUPPIM.

HUPPAH (חֻפָּה 'canopy,' 'chamber').—A priest of the 13th course, 1 Ch 24^{13}. See GENEALOGY.

HUPPIM (חֻפִּים, perh. 'coverings').—The head of a Benjamite family, his precise parentage being obscure, Gn 46^{21} P, 1 Ch $7^{12.\,15}$, Nu 26^{39} (Hupham) P.

HUR (חוּר).—1. (Ὤρ) mentioned with Aaron as the companion of Moses during the battle between the Israelites under Joshua and the Amalekites (Ex $17^{10.\,12}$). He was also with Aaron while Moses ascended Mt. Sinai (Ex 24^{14}; all E).

2. (Ὤρ) a Judahite, the grandfather of Bezalel the chief artificer of the Tabernacle (Ex 31^{2} = 35^{30} 38^{22}; all P). The Chronicler traces back his descent through Caleb and Hezron to Perez (1 Ch $2^{19.\,20.\,50}$ 4^{1-4}, 2 Ch 1^{5}), while Josephus (Ant. III. ii. 4, vi. 1) makes this Hur the husband of Miriam and identical with Hur No. 1 above.

3. (Οὔρ) one of the five kings of Midian, who, with Balaam, were slain by the Israelites under Phinehas after the 'matter of Peor' (Nu 31^{8}). The incident is referred to in Jos 13^{21}, where the kings are described as 'chiefs' (נְשִׂיאִים) of Midian, and 'princes' (נְסִיכִים) of Sihon, king of the Amorites.

4. According to the Hebrew, an Ephraimite, the father of one of the twelve officers of Solomon who 'provided victuals for the king and his household every month' (1 K 4^{8}, where RV reads BEN-HUR). Klostermann (in loc.) restores 'Azariah, the son of Zadok the priest (from v.^{2}), in Beth-horon in the hill-country of Ephraim.' He appeals to B and Luc. Βαιώρ, which he regards as an error for Βαιθώρ = Beth-horon (בֵּית־חוֹרֹן, corrupted in the Hebrew to בֶּן־חוּר; A Bὲν υἱὸς Ὥρ). The further reading of A (Βεέν) he takes as presupposing בחן, in itself a corruption of הַכֹּהֵן = the priest. K.'s conjectural emendation of the text is very ingenious, but can hardly be considered as probable. No doubt the text is corrupt, and it seems probable that the name of the officer in question has been lost.

5. (LXX omits) The father of Rephaiah, who ruled over half the district of Jerusalem and assisted Nehemiah in repairing the walls (Neh 3^{9}).

HURAI.—See HIDDAI.

HURAM (חוּרָם).—1. A Benjamite (1 Ch 8^{5}). See GENEALOGY. 2. 3. See HIRAM.

HURI (חוּרִי).—A Gadite, 1 Ch 5^{14}. See GENEALOGY.

HUSBANDRY.—The 'husband' is originally the 'master of the house' (Icel. hús, a 'house,' and búandi, 'inhabiting'), but the word is used in AV only in the mod. sense of a married man. See FAMILY, MARRIAGE.

So a husbandman is a householder, as Mt 20^{1} Wyc. 'The kyngdam of hevenes is lic to an husbond man' (Tind. and all others 'householder'), but in AV it always means a tiller of the ground, a farmer. Then 'husbandry' is first the occupation of a husbandman, 2 Ch 26^{10} 'he had much cattle, both in the low country and in the plains: husbandmen also, and vinedressers in the mountains, and in Carmel: for he loved husbandry' (אֲדָמָה, lit., as AVm, 'ground'); 1 Es 4^{6} 'Those that are no soldiers, and have not to do with wars, but use husbandry' (γεωργοῦσιν τὴν γῆν); Sir 7^{15} 'Hate not laborious work, neither husbandry' (γεωργίαν). But, secondly, in 1 Co 3^{9} 'husbandry' is used figuratively in the sense of 'that which is cultivated': 'ye are God's husbandry' (θεοῦ γεώργιον, lit., as RVm, 'God's field'). The first meaning is common. Thus Shaks. As You Like It, II. iii. 65—

> 'But, poor old man, thou prun'st a rotten tree,
> That cannot so much as a blossom yield,
> In lieu of all thy pains and husbandry.'

Golding, Justine, fol. 181, 'The women have all the doyng in houskeping and husbandrie, and the men geve themselfs to warre and robbyng.' The second meaning is rare, being in 1 Co 3^{9} an adaptation of the word to suit the Gr., as Shaks. uses 'husbandry' of the product of husbandry in Henry V. V. ii. 39—

> 'Alas! she hath from France too long been chased,
> And all her husbandry doth lie on heaps,
> Corrupting in its own fertility.'

HUSHAH (חוּשָׁה, Ὡσάν), the son of Ezer, the son of Hur (see HUR 2), and therefore of the tribe of Judah. Probably H. represents the name of a place, otherwise unknown, in Judah (1 Ch 4^{4}). See HUSHATHITE.

HUSHAI (חוּשַׁי, Χουσεί, Chusai).—An Archite (2 S 15^{32} $17^{5.14}$), i.e. a native of 'the border of the Archites' (Jos 16^{2}) to the W. of Bethel. See ARBITE. He is further described as 'the friend of David' (רֵעֶה דָוִד 15^{37}), while at 2 S 16^{16} the two titles are united. It is probable, therefore, that the LXX is right in reading 'the Archite, the friend of David,' at 2 S 15^{32}, though its rendering ὁ ἀρχιέταιρος represents a strange combination of the gentilic name (in a Græcized form) and ἑταῖρος, the whole='chief companion.' At the rebellion of Absalom he was induced by David to act as if he favoured the cause of the king's son. By so doing he was enabled both to defeat the plans of Ahithophel and to keep David informed (by means of Ahimaaz and Jonathan, the sons of Zadok and Abiathar the priests) of the progress of events in Jerusalem (2 S 16^{16}–17^{23}). He is probably to be identified with the father of Baana, one of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers (1 K 4^{16}). G. Buchanan Gray (Hebrew Proper Names, p. 323) suggests that חוּשַׁי may be a parallel formation to אֲבִישַׁי (Abishai), the א being dropped as in חִיאֵל, חִירָם. J. F. STENNING.

HUSHAM.—A king of Edom, Gn $36^{34.35}$ (חֻשָׁם)= 1 Ch $1^{45.46}$ (חוּשָׁם).

HUSHATHITE (הַחֻשָׁתִי; B ὁ Ἀσταρωθεί, Ἀνωθείτης, Αθεί, Θωσαθεί, Ἰσαθεί; A Ἀουσαστωνθεί, Ἀσωθείτης, Ἰαθεί (א ὁ Ἀσωθι), Οὐσαθι), probably=an inhabitant of Husha. This description is applied to SIBBECAI (wh. see), one of David's 'thirty' heroes (2 S 21^{18}= 1 Ch 20^{4}, 2 S 23^{27}=1 Ch 11^{29} 27^{11}). In the latter passage of 2 S the Hebrew reads מְבֻנַּי (Mebunnai), but a comparison with the parallel lists makes it clear that we must read Sibbecai as in 21^{18} (סִבְּכַי). B A read ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν (=מִבְּנֵי); but many MSS have Σαβουχαί, Luc. Σαβενί. In 1 Ch 11^{29} 27^{11} the gentilic name appears as Hushshathite (הַחֻשָׁתִי).

J. F. STENNING.

HUSHIM (חֻשִׁים).—1. The eponym of a Danite family, Gn 46^{23}, called in Nu 26^{42} Shuham. In 1 Ch 7^{12} Hushim seems to be a Benjamite, but it is possible that for 'sons of Aher' we should read 'sons of another' (אַחֵר, not a proper name), i.e. Dan (so QPB, ad loc.). See further GENEALOGY, VIII. 6 note. 2. The wife of Shaharaim the Benjamite, 1 Ch 8^{8} (חוּשִׁים) 8^{11} (חֻשִׁים). J. A. SELBIE.

HUSKS (κεράτια).—These are the pods of the Carob Tree, Ceratonia Siliqua, L., the kharnûb or kharrûb of the Arabs. It is a fine tree with a hemispherical comus, often 40 ft. in diameter. The foliage is dark, glossy evergreen. The leaves are pinnate, of three to four pairs of oblong, obtuse to retuse, or obovate leaflets, 2 to 3 in. long, and 1½ to 2 broad. The tree is diœcious. The flowers are in short racemes, the staminate reduced to five stamens on a top-shaped calyx. The pods are from 5 to 10 in. long, 1 to 1½ broad, and ¼ to ⅓ of an in. thick. They consist of a leathery case, enclosing a sweet pulpy substance, in which the seeds are embedded. This pulp is edible and nutritious, and often eaten by the poorer people. The pods are ground and boiled, in order to extract the saccharine substance, which has the colour and consistence of treacle, and is used as food. The name St. John's Bread, applied to these pods, is from a tradition that they were the locusts which that prophet ate in the wilderness (Mt 3^{4}, Mk 1^{6}). But this tradition is contrary to the text of the Gospels. There are also no carob trees in the wilderness. There can be no doubt as to the possibility of the prodigal son eating the pods (Lk 15^{16}).

(On the left side is a hedge of Indian Fig, the plant on which the Cochineal grows.)

HUZZAB (הֻצַּב).—A word of uncertain meaning, which occurs only in Nah 2^{7}. It may be taken either as a verb or a noun. Gesenius adopts the former of these alternatives, connects the word with the preceding verse, and translates, 'the palace is dissolved and made to flow down' (הֻצַּב being Hoph. of צָבַב, unused in Qal=flow). Others make it Hoph. of נָצַב and tr. 'it is decreed' (RVm). Far better suited to the context is the interpretation followed in the text of both AV and RV, which finds in H. a reference to the Assyr. queen. It may be questioned, indeed, whether the Massoretic vocalization of the word is correct. Both Luther and Wellhausen content themselves with the simple rendering 'die Königin'; Kautzsch leaves the clause untranslated, holding that the text is corrupt, and that הצב represents a noun with the article, which is intended to be a designation of the queen of Assyria. Wellhausen (Klein. Prophet. 32, 158) suggests that Assyriology may yet clear up the question. The LXX ἡ ὑπόστασις gives us no help (cf. Nowack and A. B. Davidson, ad loc., also the latter and Cheyne in Expos. Times, vii. 568, viii. 48). J. A. SELBIE.

HYACINTH.—See JACINTH.

HYÆNA (צָבוּעַ [prob. textual error for צָבוֹעַ ẓâbhôa', ὕαινα]. Ẓâbhûa' is almost identical with the Arab. ḍab' [pl. ḍubu'], which signifies a hyæna).—This animal is quite common in all Syria and Palestine. Its den is often in a rock-hewn tomb or a cave. It freq. exhumes the bodies of the dead, and devours them. It breaks or gnaws the bones of its hideous meal to extract the marrow. It will, when pressed by hunger, attack large animals, and even men. The passage in which ẓâbhûa' occurs (Jer 12^9) is a part of a series of images illustrating the state of God's heritage. If it be rendered 'mine heritage is to me the ravenous hyæna (although ה in הַעַיִט is generally taken as interrogative); birds of prey are against her round about; go ye, assemble all the beasts of the field, bring them to devour,' the picture is that of a collection of the hyæna, jackals, foxes, vultures, ravens, and crows around a carcase. The meaning then would be that the chosen people have become ravenous beasts and birds, which are assembled to devour the prey they have slain. But even if ה be taken as the article, it is difficult to regard צָבוּעַ as other than predicate. Another objection to translating הַעַיִט צָבוּעַ the ravenous hyæna, is that עַיִט is always in OT employed for birds of prey (Gn 15^{11}, Job 28^7, Is 18^6 46^{11}, Ezk 39^4). But it may mean a ravenous beast as well as bird, the root signifying 'one that rushes' on its prey (cf. Arab. saba'a, to ravin). If we tr. the first 'ayiṭ beast and the second bird, we have a play on language conformable to Oriental taste. The tr^n 'speckled bird' (AV, RV and the majority of modern commentators) is derived from the root צבע 'dye' (cf. Jg 5^{30} צֶבַע 'dyed stuff'). Siegfried-Stade (s. עַיִט) suggest the emendation טְרֵפַת צָבֻעַ 'torn by the hyæna.'

The expression 'Valley of Zeboim' (1 S 13^{18}) means Valley of Hyænas. G. E. Post.

HYDASPES (Ὑδάσπης).—The name of a river mentioned along with the Euphrates and the Tigris (Jth 1^6), and in such a context as to imply that it must be sought for on the Babylono-Median frontier. Probably, however, there is a confusion with the Hydaspes in N.W. India, a circumstance which, considering the unhistorical character of the Bk. of Judith, is not to be wondered at. Hydaspes (for Vitasta) is an assimilation to the Eranian personal name Hudhâspa, 'possessing well-equipped horses' (Diod. II. vi. 1; Heliodor. 106, 17; Pseudo-Callisth. II. x. 2; Horace, Sat. II. viii. 14). Of course no river could possibly be called by such a name, and it is simply a mistake of Strabo or his authorities when the Vitastā (the modern Bêhat or Jalam) appears in his pages as the Hydaspes. F. Hommel.

HYMENÆUS (Ὑμέναιος).—A false teacher of the time of St. Paul. His name occurs twice in the Epp. to Timothy, but there only in the NT. On the first occasion he is mentioned along with Alexander (see Alexander, No. 4) as having 'made shipwreck concerning the faith,' and in consequence both have been 'delivered unto Satan, that they might be taught not to blaspheme' (1 Ti 1$^{19, 20}$). On the second occasion he and Philetus (which see) are characterized as 'men who concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already, and overthrow the faith of some' (2 Ti 2$^{17, 18}$). Mosheim, indeed, and others have held that two different persons must be referred to, on account of the milder terms of condemnation used in the second passage. But these arise naturally from the fact that in the first case it is the man's diseased moral state which is in view, a state requiring for its amendment the severest personal treatment; while in the second the apostle is thinking rather of the doctrinal error into which H. had fallen.

This error is described generally as 'saying that the resurrection is past already,' and in the absence of further particulars it is impossible to determine the full extent of the heresy. But it seems most probable that H. had yielded to what we know to have been a very prevalent Gnostic tendency, springing from an undue contempt for the body, namely, denying the resurrection in its literal sense, and attaching to the word only a spiritual meaning. Everything in Scripture, according to this view, that referred to a future state of being, in so far as it involved a bodily resurrection, was explained or allegorized away, and stress was laid only on the resurrection of the soul from sin, regarding which it could be said that it was 'past already.' The deadly danger of this error is shown by the apostle's description of it as 'a gangrene,' which, if not at once destroyed, would spread and corrupt the whole community; and in support of this prediction, and as helping further to define the erroneous character of H.'s teaching, commentators generally adduce from the Fathers such passages as Irenæus, Hær. II. xxxi. 2, where certain heretics are described as holding 'that the resurrection from the dead is simply an acquaintance with that truth which they proclaim,' and Tertullian, de Resurr. 19, where we read of some 'who distort into some imaginary sense even the most clearly described doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, alleging that even death itself must be understood in a spiritual sense. . . . Wherefore that also must be held to be the resurrection, when a man is reanimated by access to the truth, and having dispersed the death of ignorance, and being endowed with new life by God, has burst forth from the sepulchre of the old man.'

With regard to the sentence of condemnation passed upon H., considerable difference of opinion has prevailed. By the 'delivering unto Satan,' or more literally 'the Satan' (τῷ Σατανᾷ), 'the Evil One in his most distinct personality' (Ellicott, in loc.), some have understood simply excommunication from the Church. But in the parallel passage 1 Co 5^5, 'delivering unto Satan' seems to be distinguished from excommunication in itself, which is denoted by 'taking away' or 'putting away from among you' (cf. v.^{5} with vv.$^{2, 13}$). Others in consequence refer the words rather to the infliction of some bodily loss or suffering, such as we find, for example, in the case of Job. But this does not meet the full and authoritative nature of the apostle's language, 'Whom I delivered (παρέδωκα) unto Satan.' It is best, therefore (with Meyer, Ellicott, and others), to combine both interpretations, and to understand by the expression the highest form of excommunication, by which the condemned person was not only cut off from all Christian privileges, but subjected besides to some bodily disease or death. It was a sentence apparently which on account of its awful nature was not pronounced by the Church, but only by an apostle (cf. the somewhat analogous cases of Ananias and Sapphira Ac 5, and Elymas Ac 13^{11}), though in certain circumstances the apostle could empower others to pass sentence for him (1 Co 5$^{3, 4}$). It is further of importance to observe that both here and in 1 Co 5^5 the remedial intention of the punishment is emphasized. In the latter case the flesh is destroyed, 'that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus'; while H. and his companion were delivered to Satan, not for their final destruction, but that 'they might be taught (παιδευθῶσιν in NT sense of teaching by disciplining or chastening) not to blaspheme.' [See further Church, vol. i. p. 432; Curse, p. 534^b; and in addition to the commentators, cf. Suicer, Thesaur. ii. p. 940, and Bingham, Antiq. XVI. ii. 15].

G. Milligan.

HYMN in NT (for OT see Poetry and Song).—The use of hymns among Christians was common from the first existence of the Church, both in public worship and in private life (1 Co 14$^{15, 26}$, Eph 5^{19}, Col 3^{16}, Ja 5^{13}, Ac 16^{25}), such hymns being treated not only as the natural expression of religious emotion, but also as a method of instruction (διδάσκοντες καὶ νουθετοῦντες ἑαυτοὺς ψαλμοῖς, Col l.c.). The fullest description of them is the triple division into ψαλμοί, ὕμνοι, ᾠδαὶ πνευματικαί (Eph-Col). Of these ψαλμός is properly 'a song with musical accompaniment,' and doubtless includes the OT Psalms: ὕμνος, a song in praise of God or of 'famous men' (cf. Sir 44^{1} πατέρων ὕμνος), such as that in Ac 4^{24-30}; ᾠδὴ πνευματική, any song on a spiritual theme, such perhaps as Eph 5^{14}. But the distinction is not technical, and cannot be pressed rigidly, for ὕμνος is used of the Psalms of David (Ps 71^{20}, Jos. Ant. VII. xii. 3), and both ὕμνος and ᾠδή occur frequently in the titles of those Psalms [see Trench, NT Syn. s.v.; Ltft. on Col 3^{16}].

Such Christian hymns would naturally be either direct importations from the services of the Jewish Temple and Synagogue, or the fresh utterances of Christian inspiration influenced in form by these Jewish models (cf. He 2^{12}; Philo, in Flacc. 14, de Vit. Cont. §§ 3. 10. 11; Driver, LOT^{6} pp. 359–367; Edersheim, The Temple, its ministry and services, pp. 56, 143). A reference to a purely Jewish hymn is found in Mt 26^{30}, probably the latter half of the Hallel, Pss 115–118, used in the paschal services; but an entirely different hymn, professedly Christian, yet of a strong Gnostic tinge, and undoubtedly spurious, will be found attributed to our Lord on this occasion in the Acta Johannis, c. 11 (Texts and Studies, v. 1), and fragments of it are discussed by Aug. Ep. iv. 237, §§ 4–8.

The fresh utterances of Christian inspiration often fell into an exalted and poetic form of expression which make it difficult to draw the line between prose and poetry. Thus the enthusiastic acclamation of the crowd (Mt 21^{9}=Mk 11^{9}, Lk 19^{38}), the thanksgiving of the Church on the release of the apostles (Ac 4^{24-30}), the hymn of the love of man (1 Co 13) and of the love of God (Ro 8^{31-39}), the praise of God's blessings in Eph 1^{3-14} with the triple refrain εἰς ἔπαινον τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ ($^{5.\ 11.\ 14}$); even the Lord's Prayer itself, in the more elaborate form given by Mt 6^{9-13} 'with its invocation, its first triplet of single clauses with one common burden expressed after the third but implied with all, and its second triplet of double clauses variously antithetical in form and sense' (see WH, ii. pp. 319, 320),—all these have a quasi-rhythmical structure which only just falls short of the level of poetic hymn.

In other passages we have probably fragments from hymns already in use in the Church, e.g. Eph 5^{14} (perhaps a baptismal hymn addressed to the new convert), 1 Ti 3^{16}, which should be arranged in two strophes, each containing three lines; perhaps 1 Co 2^{9}, and the half-stereotyped doxologies of 1 Ti 1^{17} 6^{16}, 2 Ti 4^{18}, Rev $4^{8.\ 11}$ $5^{9.\ 12.\ 13}$ 7^{10-12} $11^{15.\ 17.\ 18}$ 12^{10-12} $15^{3.\ 4}$ $19^{1.\ 2.\ 5-8}$. Finally, the most elaborate structure is to be found in the Evangelical Canticles given by St. Luke, viz.:—

(a) 1^{46-55}. The Magnificat, based very largely upon the language of the OT, especially of the Song of Hannah (1 S 2^{1-10}), and falling naturally into four strophes (i.) $^{46-48}$, (ii.) $^{49.\ 50}$, (iii.) $^{51-53}$, (iv.) $^{54.\ 55}$ (Plummer, ad loc.).

(b) 1^{68-79}. The Benedictus, modelled upon the language of the OT prophets and upon the eighteen Benedictions used in the Temple service. This falls into two halves ($^{68-75.\ 76-79}$), the first half containing three strophes ($^{68-69.\ 70-72.\ 73-75}$), and the second only two $^{76-77.\ 78-79}$ (Plummer, ad loc.; Edersheim, Jesus the Messiah, i. p. 158).

(c) 2^{14}. The Gloria in Excelsis. In this the clauses are carefully balanced, whether arranged in a double or triple form. It was early used in the Church as a morning hymn (Apost. Const. vii. 47), and is found in a collection of hymns at the end of the Psalter in Codex Alex. of the LXX. It was also incorporated in the Latin Liturgies; but from very early times it existed in a double form; for while the morning hymn seems always to have read εὐδοκία, the text of St. Luke and the translation of the Latin Liturgies support εὐδοκίας (Plummer, ad loc.; WH, ii. App. 52–56).

(d) 2^{29-32}. The Nunc Dimittis: falling into three strophes $^{29.\ 30-31.\ 32}$, and early (Apost. Const. vii. 48) used as an evening hymn (Plummer, ad loc.).

HYPOCRITE.—The ὑποκριτής is primarily 'one who answers,' ὑποκρίνεται; and hence (1) 'an interpreter,' and (2) 'an actor.' This is the commonest meaning in classical Greek (Aristoph. Plat. Xen. etc.). The use of the word for 'a pretender,' 'hypocrite,' is not classical. On the other hand, the word is never found in biblical Gr. of an actor on the stage. It means either 'one who acts a false part in life,' i.e. one who pretends to be pious when he is not, or (even worse than this) 'one who is utterly bad,' whether he acts a part or not. In Job it is twice used in the general sense of 'impious'; βασιλεύων ἄνθρωπον ὑποκριτὴν ἀπὸ δυσκολίας λαοῦ (34^{30}); and ὑποκριταὶ καρδίᾳ τάξουσιν θυμόν (36^{13}). In Pr 11^{9} and Is 33^{14} Aq. Sym. and Theod. have ὑποκριταί, where in the LXX we have ἀσεβεῖς. The same is true of Aq. and Theod. in Job 15^{34}, where in the LXX we have ἀσεβής; and Aq. has it Job 20^{5}, where παράνομος is the tr. in LXX. In AV of OT 'hypocrite' occurs in Job 8^{13} 13^{16} 15^{34} 17^{8} 20^{5} 27^{8} 34^{30} 36^{13}, Pr 11^{9}, Is 9^{17} 33^{14}, and 'hypocritical' in Ps 35^{16}, Is 10^{6}—in all these instances as a mis-rendering of חָנֵף 'godless' or 'profane,' the rendering of RV. So also 'hypocrisy' in AV of Is 32^{6} is correctly rendered by RV 'profaneness' (חֹנֶף).

In NT, although the meaning of 'pretending to be religious and devout' prevails (Mt $6^{2.\ 5.\ 16}$ 7^{5} 15^{7} 23^{13-29}, Mk 7^{6}, Lk 6^{42} 13^{15}), yet the more general meaning sometimes occurs. In Mt 24^{51} 'shall cut him asunder and appoint his portion with the impious' makes better sense than 'with the hypocrites'; and here Lk has 'with the unfaithful,' μετὰ τῶν ἀπίστων (12^{46}), instead of μετὰ τῶν ὑποκριτῶν. In Lk 12^{56} this general meaning is perhaps as suitable as the other. Comp. Mk 12^{15} with Mt 22^{18} and Lk 20^{23}; where Mk has ὑπόκρισιν, Mt πονηρίαν, and Lk πανουργίαν, which does not prove that the three terms are equivalent, but is some evidence that ὑπόκρισις may mean 'wickedness' (Hatch, Biblical Greek, p. 92). The term includes dissimulatio (Gal 2^{13}) as well as simulatio; and concealment of convictions was common among opponents of the gospel.

Hypocrites are compared to 'whited sepulchres, outwardly beautiful, but full of uncleanness' (Mt 23^{27}); to 'the tombs which appear not,' and which defile all who come in contact with them, without their being aware of them (Lk 11^{44}); and to leaven (Lk 12^{1}). And hypocrisy is condemned, not merely as a gross form of deceit, but as folly, for it never succeeds. Sooner or later the inevitable exposure comes, and the hypocrite is unmasked (Lk $12^{2.\ 3}$).

A. PLUMMER.

HYRCANUS, AV HIRCANUS (Ὑρκανός).—The son of Tobias, 'a man in very high place,' who had money deposited at Jerus., in the temple treasury, at the time of the visit of Heliodorus (2 Mac 3^{11}). Jos. speaks of 'the sons of Tobias' as supporters of Menelaus (Ant. XII. v. 1); also of H. the son of a farmer of the revenue named Joseph, who was the son of Tobias and nephew of Onias II. But it is doubtful whether we should, with Rawlinson (Speaker's Comm.), identify this H. with the person mentioned in 2 Mac.

The name seems to be a local appellative. Its use among the Jews is perhaps to be explained from the fact that Artaxerxes Ochus transported a number of Jews to Hyrcania (cf. Schürer, HJP I. i. 273 f.). H. A. WHITE.

HYSSOP.—The problem in regard to this plant has been much complicated by attempting its solution first in OT. The difficulties will greatly lessen if we approach the question first from the NT side. The word occurs twice in NT. Once in a recital of the ordinances of the first covenant, the author of the Ep. to the Heb. summarizes the sprinklings of blood and water by means of a wisp of scarlet wool and hyssop (He 9^{19}), as these had been laid down in various places in the Pentateuch. Here it is clear that he adopts the rendering of the LXX ὕσσωπος. The other passage (Jn 19^{29}) says that 'they filled a sponge with vinegar, and put it upon hyssop, and put it to his mouth.' Here the evangelist alludes to a plant, known to his readers by the name by which he called it. He is not quoting a passage from the OT, but recording a new fact. What was this plant? Here again the problem has been complicated by assuming that κάλαμος, in the parallel passages (Mt 27^{48}, Mk 15^{36}), is the same as ὕσσωπος. In these passages it is said that, after filling the sponge with vinegar, 'they put it on a reed (καλάμῳ), and gave him to drink.' Now, the meaning of κάλαμος is indubitably a reed or cane, not a rod or stick, as some would have it. The word has in it no suggestion of hyssop, and would not have been so understood by the readers of Mt and Mk. It is therefore an unwarrantable assumption that reed and hyssop are the same (although it is fair to add that the present writer has against him, on this point, almost all modern commentators, who hold that Mt and Mk's περιθεὶς καλάμῳ and Jn's ὑσσώπῳ περιθέντες are identical in meaning). Admitting their diversity, the passages are easily harmonized by noting that St. John mentions both the articles used to mitigate the thirst of our Saviour, but omits telling how they 'put it to his mouth.' It is clear that this could not have been done by the hand alone. Mt and Mk omit the hyssop, but mention the reed by which the sponge, vinegar, and hyssop were 'put to his mouth.'

The word ὕσσωπος appears to have been used by the Greeks, with some latitude, for plants of the Labiate Family, much as we use the words marjoram, thyme, mint, sage, and hyssop itself. Several different genera were doubtless included. The genus Hyssopus is of modern creation, and none of the species grow wild in Sinai, Pal., or Syria. There are, however, several species of marjoram which grow wild, and are known under the Arab. name sa'tar, which according to high rabbinical authority was the hyssop. We are inclined to think that it was from one of these, probably Origanum Maru, L., that the hyssop of Jn was taken. This plant, the leaves and heads of which have a pungent, aromatic flavour, has been used from remote antiquity as a condiment. Its powder, sprinkled over bread, is eaten largely in Bible lands at the present day. Like the peppermint, it tastes at first hot, but this is followed by a cooling, refreshing feeling, and a flow of saliva which quenches thirst. The addition of this substance to the vinegar or sour wine on the sponge would be eminently suited to the purpose of moistening and cooling the mouth of the parched sufferer on the Cross.

We are now in a position to ask whether the plants known to the Arabs as ṣa'tar suit the requirements of OT hyssop. Hyssop is mentioned alone in connexion with the sprinkling of the passover (Ex 12^{22}), 'and ye shall take a bunch of hyssop and dip it into the blood that is in the basin, and strike the lintel,' etc.). This species of Origanum is eminently adapted for this purpose. It has straight, slender, leafy stalks, with small heads. Several of these stalks grow from one root, so that the hand could enclose and break off, at one effort, a suitable bunch or wisp for sprinkling. In certain of the sprinklings, as in leprosy (Lv 14), there was added to the bunch some cedar wood (prob. a twig of Juniperus Phœnicea, L., or one of its congeners), scarlet, and a living bird. 'Purge me with hyssop' (Ps 51^{7}) no doubt refers to such ceremonial purification, as the succeeding clause, 'wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow,' refers to the ceremonial washing which followed the cleansing of the leper. It is a gratuitous assumption here to attribute to the hyssop medicinal virtues of a detergent sort. It was not used internally, but for sprinkling. A similar bunch, with the exception of the bird, was thrown into the fire which consumed the red heifer (Nu 19^{6}).

This species suits well 'the hyssop that springeth out of the wall' (1 K 4^{33}). It grows in clefts of rocks, in chinks of old walls, and on the terrace walls throughout the land. Thus it will be seen that it suits perfectly all the requirements of OT as well as of NT. Thymbra spicata, L., has been suggested, but it is a plant not found in the desert or the interior.

Royle proposed as the equivalent of אֵזוֹב 'êzôbh, the Heb. original of ὕσσωπος, the caper, Capparis spinosa, L. His argument was based on the supposed etymol. resemblance between אֵזוֹב and Arabic 'aṣaf, one of the two Arab. names for the caper. It is fatal to this theory, however, that it does not explain the passage in Jn. It is improbable that St. John would have written ὕσσωπος if he had meant κάππαρις, the well-known Gr. name of the caper. These words are never interchangeable. Nor could St. John have been biassed, as the writer of He 9^{19}, by a LXX rendering, for, as above pointed out, he was narrating, not quoting. In order to strengthen his etymol. theory, Royle assumes that ὕσσωπος and κάλαμος were the same, and shows how a stick, 3 or 4 ft. long, could be obtained from the caper, suitable for the purpose for which the reed was used. But, even if it were possible philologically to apply the term κάλαμος to a rod from the caper, any one familiar with the mode of its growth would be likely to reject this plant. The branches of the caper are slender, straggling, and usually beset with hooked prickles. They are eminently unsuitable for the purpose described. On the other hand, the reed, a general term for the straight, stiff, hollow stems of the larger grasses, as Arundo Donax, L., and Saccharum Ægyptiacum, L., would precisely suit the narrative, and was doubtless then as now used to tie things to, in order to hand them up. A further objection to Royle's theory is, that the caper would have been wholly unsuitable to make a bunch. Its branches are straggling, prickly, noli-me-tangere, with large, stiff leaves and flowers 3 in. broad. It is impossible for us to think that such an intractable plant should have been selected for sprinkling. Finally, the etymology is weak, even for the OT 'êzôbh, which is composed of the radicals aleph, zayin, and beth, while 'aṣaf is composed of alif, ṣod, and fê. For the passage in John it has been shown above that the etymol. argument not only fails to confirm the claims of the caper, but is wholly fatal to them. The Arabic zûfa is etymol. much nearer to 'êzôbh, and zûfa is doubtless the same as ṣa'tar. G. E. POST.

I AM.—See under God, vol. ii. p. 199^{b}.

IADINUS (A 'Ιάδινος, B -ει-, AV Adinus), 1 Es 9^{48}.—One of the Levites who taught the people the law of the Lord after the return under Ezra. The name corresponds to Jamin in Neh 8^{7} (om. LXX), who with the other persons there mentioned is distinguished from the Levites.

IBHAR (יִבְחָר '[God] chooses'; 2 S 5^{15}, B 'Εβεάρ, A 'Ιεβάρ; 1 Ch 3^{6} 14^{5}, B Βαάρ, A 'Ιεβαάρ; Jebahar, Jebaar), one of David's sons, born at Jerusalem: his name occurs in all three lists immediately after that of Solomon and before that of Elishua. According to 1 Ch 3^{6} he was the son of a wife and not of a concubine; otherwise he is unknown alike to history and to tradition. It is noteworthy that in the Peshiṭta to 2 S 5^{15} his name is given as ܝܘܟܒܪ (Juchabar), a form which occurs elsewhere as the equivalent of Jochebed (Ex 6^{20}, Nu 26^{59} יוֹכֶבֶד) and of Ichabod (1 S 4^{21} אִי כָבוֹד): in 1 Ch the form given (ܝܒܚܪ) agrees with that of the MT. J. F. Stenning.

IBLEAM (יִבְלְעָם).—A town belonging to West Manasseh, Jos 17^{11} (JE; wanting in the LXX, see Budde, Richt. u. Sam. 13 f.), Jg 1^{27}. It is mentioned also in 2 K 9^{27} in connexion with the death of king Ahaziah, who fled by the way of Beth-haggan (En-gannim [?]; 'the garden house' AV, RV), and 'the ascent of Gur, which is by Ibleam.' The biblical data seem to be well satisfied by the modern ruin Bel'ame, some 13 miles E. of N. of Samaria, more than half-way to Jezreel. Conder (SWP ii. p. 98) prefers Yebla, N.W. of Beisan, while Wilson and others favour Jelame, 3½ miles S. by W. from Zer'in (Jezreel).

In 2 K 15^{10} קָבָל־עָם (AV, RV 'before the people') should certainly be emended to בְּיִבְלְעָם ('in Ibleam'; so Siegfried-Stade, Oxf. Heb. Lex. etc., following Luc. ἐν 'Ιεβλαάμ). Gath-rimmon (wh. see) of Jos 21^{25} is a scribal error for Ibleam. It is the same place which is called in 1 Ch 6^{55} [Eng.^{70}] Bileam (wh. see).

IBZAN (אִבְצָן, meaning doubtful, cf. אֶבֶץ a town in Issachar, Jos 19^{20}, 'Αβεσσάν), one of the Minor Judges, following Jephthah, Jg 12$^{8-10}$. He came from Bethlehem, probably the Bethlehem in Zebulun (Jos 19^{15}), 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth. He had 30 sons and 30 daughters, an evidence of his social importance, and arranged their marriages. He judged Israel 7 years, and was buried at Bethlehem. Nothing is said of Ibzan's exploits, and his name does not occur elsewhere; but, on the analogy of other Minor Judges, Tola, Jair, and Elon, we may suppose that he represents a clan, with numerous branches and alliances. See Moore, Judges, p. 271 n. According to Jewish tradition, Ibzan was the same as Boaz (Talm. B. Baba Bathra, 91*a* and comment.; Rashi, Comment. on Jg 12$^{8f.}$). G. A. Cooke.

ICHABOD (אִי כָבוֹד; B οὐαὶ βαρχαβώθ; A οὐαὶ χαβώθ; Ichabod), son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli. His mother died in giving him birth, overwhelmed by grief at the news of the sudden death of her husband and her father-in-law. The name is usually explained as 'inglorious' (from אִי, the ordinary negative in Ethiopic and Phœnician [cf. Job 22^{30}], and כָּבוֹד 'glory'), in accordance with the meaning suggested by 1 S 4^{21} ('The glory is departed from Israel'; B omits). Possibly, Ithamar (אִיתָמָר) and the Zidonian Jezebel (אִיזֶבֶל 1 K 16^{31} etc.) are words of the same formation, cf. Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, p. 246 n. The rendering of the LXX points to a different interpretation (אִי being treated as=אוֹי; in 1 S 14^{3} LXX has 'Ιωχαβήλ). J. F. Stenning.

ICONIUM ('Ικόνιον), an ancient city near the borders of Lycaonia and Phrygia, still retains its ancient name in the form Konia, and is at present the terminus of a railway that extends from the Bosphorus southwards. Its situation, amid luxuriant orchards at the western edge of the vast plains of central Asia Minor, level and uncultivated, watered by a stream which issues from the hilly region on the west, and loses itself in the plain after making this part of it a garden, is strikingly like that of Damascus (though hardly equal to it in beauty); and this has made the city always a centre of life and the most important in the district. It is commonly described by the ancient writers as a city of Lycaonia, e.g. Cicero, Fam. xv. iv. 2; cf. iii. v. 4, vi. 6, xv. iii. 1; Att. v. xx. 2; Strabo, p. 568; Pliny, NH v. 25 (95); Stephanus Byzant. s.v., and many others. It is not consistent with its Lycaonian character that Ac 14^{6} represents Paul and Barnabas as fleeing from Iconium into Lycaonia; but the discrepancy is one of those unstudied touches which prove the originality and accuracy of the narrative. The author conceives that, in traversing the 18 miles separating Iconium from Lystra, the apostles crossed the frontier and entered Lycaonia. Now, Xenophon (Anab. i. ii. 19) describes Iconium as the easternmost city of Phrygia; and immediately on leaving it, he entered Lycaonia. The evidence of other visitors or natives proves that the Iconians always considered themselves to be by race Phrygians and not Lycaonians. Stephanus quotes a legend about a king Annakos of Iconium, on whose death followed the Deluge, which destroyed the whole population; and his subjects are called Phrygians in the legend. Pliny, NH v. 41 (145), gives a list of famous Phrygian cities, and among them is Conium: the list contains several which had disappeared in Pliny's time, and is doubtless taken from some older Greek writer. In a.d. 163, at the trial of Justin Martyr, one of his associates named Hierax described himself as a slave from Iconium of Phrygia. Firmilian, bishop of Cæsareia Capp., who attended the council of Iconium, describes it as a city of Phrygia (Cyprian, Epist. 75, 7). Iconium does not on its coin boast itself as a member of the Koinon Lycaoniæ, which was formed soon after A.D. 137. Though claiming Phrygian stock, Iconium (like most cities of Asia Minor) loved to connect itself with Greek legend, deriving its name from the image (εἰκών) of Medusa, brought there by Perseus (Eustath. ad Dionys. Per. 856), or from the clay images of men made by Prometheus there after the Flood to replace the drowned people (Steph. Byz.).

Iconium, as a rule, shared the fate of Lycaonia (wh. see). Ruled by the Seleucid kings of Syria in the 3rd cent., it was assigned to the Pergamenian kings in B.C. 190, but was never actually made part of their kingdom, and probably passed soon after under the power of the Galatæ, forming part of the Tetrarchy Proseilemmene, which was transferred from Lycaonia to Galatia (Pliny, NH 25 (95); Ptolemy, v. iv. 10), probably about 164 (Studia Biblica, iv. p. 46 ff.; see GALATIA, p. 87). Then, along with Galatia,[*] it probably passed to the Pontic kings not later than B.C. 129; but it was set free during the Mithridatic wars. Its lot is uncertain, until in B.C. 39 Antony gave it to Polemon along with Cilicia Tracheia.[†] In 36 Antony transferred it to Amyntas, who was at the same time made king of Galatia. At his death, in B.C. 25, it was incorporated in the Roman empire as part of the Province Galatia. Under Claudius it was honoured with the name Claudiconium (probably in compensation for the bestowal of the name Claudioderbe on the frontier city Derbe). Under Hadrian it was constituted a Roman colony with the title Colonia Aelia Hadriana Iconiensium.[‡] It seems to have remained during the 2nd and 3rd cents. part of the Province Galatia (Ptol. v. 4. 12),[§] whereas Lycaonia was made part of the triple Province Cilicia-Isauria-Lycaonia, probably in 137. About 295 Diocletian constituted southern Galatia with parts of the surrounding country into a new Province Pisidia, of which the capital was Antioch, and Iconium the second metropolis (μετὰ τὴν μεγίστην ἡ πρώτη, Basil, Epist. 8 (137 Mi.)), while eastern Lycaonia was perhaps still united with Isauria Provincia; hence Ammianus describes Iconium as a city of Pisidia (xiv. 2). But about A.D. 372 it became the metropolis of a new Provincia Lycaonia, extending from the shores of Karalis and Trogitis (Bey-Sheher and Seidi-Sheher Lakes) to the western end of Ak-Göl near Cybistra. This arrangement lasted till the end of the Byzantine Provincial system, and is found in all Notitiæ Episcopatuum.

Iconium, like most of Asia Minor, was several times overrun by the Saracens, but its fate is hardly alluded to by historians. It shared in the recovered prosperity of the reviving Byzantine empire, till it was overrun by the Seljuk Turks in 1070, and passed by treaty into their hands, probably in 1072. Though John and Manuel Comnenus approached Iconium more than once (Nicet. Chon. pp. 42, 72; Cinnam. p. 42), and Frederick Barbarossa occupied it in 1190, it remained a Turkish city permanently (the Christian population being permitted to reside in the large village Tsille, 6 miles N.). Konia was the capital of the Seljuk empire, and is still capital of a vilayet.

Being an important commercial city situated on one of the great routes between Cilicia and the west, Iconium was naturally a centre for Jewish settlers, Ac 14^{1}; but the only memorials of the colony are CIG 9270, and perhaps 3995*b*, 3998, 4001*b* (Jewish-Christian ?). Lystra is only 18 miles S.S.W. from Iconium, and hence the character of an inhabitant of Lystra was naturally well known among the Iconians (Ac 16^{2}), for Lystra, though in the same district as Derbe (Ac 14^{6} 16^{1}), was actually much closer to Iconium.

Christianity was introduced into Iconium by St. Paul and St. Barnabas on their first missionary journey (Ac $14^{1ff.}$), and the city was visited on the second journey ($16^{2ff.}$). St. Paul's sufferings and difficulties there are mentioned 1 Ti 3^{11}. The interesting legend of St. Thekla is connected with these visits: the legend as we have it was composed by a presbyter of Asia about the middle of the 2nd cent., but contains some details that go back to the 1st cent.; and it probably rests on a historical basis. It rightly traces St. Paul's journey from Pisidian Antioch along the 'Royal Road' (i.e. Imperial Highway) that connected Antioch the military centre with the garrison city Lystra, relating how on the way (probably not far from Selki-Serai) he was induced by Onesiphorus to diverge from that road and go across the hill-country to Iconium. It tells that queen Tryphaina (of Pontus) had estates somewhere in this neighbourhood; and this may well be true, as she was granddaughter of Polemon, who formerly possessed Iconium: it rightly makes her a relative of the Roman emperor (Claudius). On this legend see Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelgesch. ii. p. 424 ff.; Zahn, GGA, 1877, p. 1307 ff.; Ramsay, Church in Rom. Emp. pp. 31 f. 380 ff. (with many other authorities there quoted).

According to the North-Galatian theory, nothing else is recorded in NT about Iconium. On the South-Galatian view, soon after St. Paul's second journey, it was visited by Jewish emissaries (coming doubtless from Jerusalem), who persuaded the Iconians that St. Paul was not a real apostle of God, but the mere messenger of the superior apostles, and that the keeping of the whole Jewish law was incumbent on all zealous Christians (urging that St. Paul by circumcising Timothy had practically become a preacher of circumcision, Gal 5^{11}). St. Paul, learning this defection, wrote the Epistle to the Galatians, probably from Syrian Antioch (Ac 18^{22}; or, according to Zahn and Rendall, from Corinth), and soon afterwards visited Iconium again on his way to Ephesus. The Iconian church was evidently thoroughly reconciled to the Pauline teaching, remained in communication with St. Paul during his stay at Ephesus (1 Co 16^{1}), and joined in the contribution which he organized among all his churches for the benefit of the poor Christians in Jerusalem. St. Peter's first Epistle was addressed to it among others.

According to legend, Sosipater (Ro 16^{21}; Sopater of Berœa, Ac 20^{4}) was first bishop of Iconium; Terentius or Tertius (Ro 16^{22}) succeeded him. Cornutus or Coronatus, a martyr bishop (12 Sept. sub Perennio præside), is perhaps historical. Celsus, bishop earlier than c. 260, is mentioned by Eusebius (HE vi. 19) as permitting a qualified layman Paulinus to do church work. Nikomas, bishop about A.D. 264 and 269, is also mentioned by Euseb. (vii. 28). A council was held in Iconium about 232 (Cyprian, Epist. 75, 7). Numerous Christian inscriptions are found in the country round Iconium, some of which are probably of the 3rd cent., showing that Christianity spread comparatively early round the city as centre (see GALATIA, p. 88). A monastery τῶν Γαλατῶν in the neighbourhood of Iconium is mentioned by Gregorius Magn. (Dial. iv. 38, p. 441). St. Chariton, a native of Iconium, is said to have been arrested under Aurelian and released, and afterwards to have founded several monasteries in Palestine.

[†] Appian, B.C. v. 75; Strab. p. 568. Being thus summed up with Cilicia, it is occasionally mentioned as a Cilician city, Pliny, NH 22 (93), Jerome, Lib. Nom. Loc. ex Actis, vol. iii. p. 1302; there is no reason to infer that a distinct Cilician Iconium ever existed.

[‡] Some writers erroneously regard the bestowal of the title Claudiconium as implying that it was made a colony by Claudius.

[§] Ptolemy does not here mention Iconium (which, in v. vi. 16, he puts in Cappadocia by a pure blunder); but he gives Lystra, Antioch, and Apollonia in Galatia, and à fortiori Iconium must have been in that province. Firmilian, l.c., mentions Galatia and (the triple Province) Cilicia as most closely connected with Iconium.

IDALAH (יִדְאֲלָה).—A town of Zebulun, named between Shimron and Bethlehem (Jos 19^{15}). The site is uncertain.

IDBASH (יִדְבָּשׁ).—One of the sons (acc. to LXX) of Etam, 1 Ch 4^{3}. The MT is undoubtedly corrupt. See GENEALOGY.

IDDO.—1. אִדּוֹ (? אדר 'strength') Ezr 8^{17} 'The chief, at the place Casiphia,' who provided Ezra with Levites and Nethinim. The text implies that I. was himself one of the Nethinim, but it is impossible that the head of a Levitical seminary should have belonged to the lowest order of ministers. Read, with Ryle, 'unto Iddo and his brethren (i.e. Levites) and the Nethinim.' 1 Es $8^{45.46}$ has 'Loddeus the captain who was in the place of the treasury . . . Loddeus and to his brethren and to the treasurers in that place,' connecting the name Casiphia with keseph 'silver' (so LXX ἐν ἀργυρίῳ τοῦ τόπου). It must have been near Babylon, and can have no connexion with the Caspian Mountains or Caspiæ Pylæ. 2. (יִדּוֹ 'beloved') 1 Ch 27^{21} son of Zechariah, captain of the half tribe of Manasseh in Gilead, perh. = No. 4. 3. Ezr 10^{43} (יַדּוֹ Kethib RV, יַדַּי Kerê, RVm Jaddai, AV Jadau, 1 Es 9^{35} Edos) one of those who had taken strange wives. 4. 1 K 4^{14} (עִדֹּא 'timely,' Ges.) father of Abinadab, who was Solomon's commissariat officer in Mahanaim in Gilead (see No. 2). 5. (עִדּוֹ) 1 Ch 6^{21} a Gershonite Levite called Adaiah in v.^{41}. 6. A seer (ḥozeh) and prophet (nabi) cited by the Chronicler as an authority for the reigns of (a) Solomon, 2 Ch 9^{29} (Kethib יֶעְדִּי Jedai, Kerê יֶעְדּוֹ Jedo, LXX Ἰωήλ) 'the visions of I. the seer concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat'; (b) Rehoboam, 2 Ch 12^{15} (עִדּוֹ) 'the history of I. the seer after the manner of (or, in reckoning the) genealogies'; and of (c) Abijah, 2 Ch 13^{22} (עִדּוֹ) 'the midrash of the prophet Iddo.' The first passage cited is probably the ground of the tradition adopted by Jos. (Ant. VIII. viii. 5) and Jerome (*Qu. IDOLATRY.—The idolatry of Israel, in ordinary usage, is held to include two forms of aberration from true religion. The more heinous type was the worship of alien or fictitious divinities, best described as heathenism (Götzendienst); the less heinous was the worship of the God of Israel by the mediation of images (Bilderdienst). The particular problems arising under these two heads being dealt with in separate articles (see ASHTORETH, BAAL, CALF, EPHOD, etc.), the main object here must be to indicate the general drift and features of the protracted conflict between the religious ideals and the popular religious tendencies which are mirrored in the OT.

Idolatry (εἰδωλολατρεία), which occurs once in AV (1 S 15^{23}) as tr. of תְּרָפִים, has no exact Heb. equivalent. There are, however, nine or ten Heb. words which AV, and, in the main, RV (following LXX) render by 'idol,' and which give lively expression to the varied sentiments of contempt, loathing, and apprehension excited in the prophetical writers by idolatry. The terms are: אָוֶן nothingness (Is 66^{3}), אֵימִים objects of terror (Jer 50^{38}), אֵל neutral expression for any divinity (Is 57^{5}), אֱלִיל a cypher (often, esp. in Is), גִּלּוּלִים massy blocks (Lv 26^{30}), מִפְלֶצֶת a terror (1 K 15^{13}), סֶמֶל or סֵמֶל a figure (2 Ch 33^{7}), עֲצַבִּים carvings, with perhaps a play on sorrow (Hos 4^{17}), cf. עֹצֶב צִיר a figure (Is 45^{16}). Image in AV is used as the equivalent of about an equal number of terms, of which the following alterations in RV may be noted: חַמָּן a sun-image (Lv 26^{30}), מַצֵּבָה a pillar, תְּרָפִים untranslated. פֶּסֶל is the graven image (Ex 20^{4}), but is sometimes used comprehensively (Is 40^{19}). מַסֵּכָה (Ex 34^{17}) and נֶסֶךְ (Is 41^{29}) denote the molten image. In NT 'image' translates εἰκών and once χαρακτήρ (He 1^{3} 'express [RV 'very'] image'). See more fully under IMAGE. The common idol was an uncouth figure of clay or wood; the more pretentious was of gold or silver, or at least plated. The process of manufacture is contemptuously described in Is $44^{11ff.}$.

I. HEATHENISM IN ISRAEL.—Not the least interesting chapter in the history of this subject is that upon which the narrative of Genesis throws little if any light, viz. the religion of the stock from which the Hebrews sprang. The teaching of Genesis is to the effect that there was a primitive knowledge of the true God, which was handed down through Noah to the line of Shem, of which Abraham became the custodian, and which he transmitted to his posterity. It is, at the most, implied in the story of the Call of Abraham (Gn 12^{1}), and first stated explicitly in Jos $24^{2ff.}$, that the patriarchal religion had a background of idolatry. For the reconstruction of this primitive Semitic heathenism there is some material available. It is reasonable to suppose, in the first place, that vestiges of the older beliefs and customs survived to the later period illuminated by the OT. A second source, which has been closely examined in the same interest, especially by Wellhausen (Skizzen und Vorarbeiten, Heft 3) and W. R. Smith (RS^{2}), is the type of heathenism which prevailed in Arabia before the rise of Islam, and which, it is assumed, had not widely diverged from that of the common ancestor of the Semitic peoples. The examination of this evidence has shaken the older view that Semitic idolatry began in the worship of the heavenly bodies (so, e.g., Maimonides, De Idololatria, who explains star-worship by an intelligible desire to honour what God had honoured, but traces the later phase of image-service to the designs of false prophets, cap. i. § 4). The suggestion of Ewald (Gesch. Isr.^{3} i. p. 380), that a polytheistic system may be detected in the genealogies of Gn 4 and 5, where the gods and goddesses of an earlier age have been degraded to patriarchal rank, has not met with much favour. By other writers, esp. Stade, it is held that an important, if not the most important, element in the early religious life of the Semites was ancestor-worship—sacrifices having been offered at Hebron and Shechem to Abraham and Joseph ere they were offered to Jahweh; and for proof stress is laid on significant features of burial and mourning (cf. Is 65^{4}), the long persistence of the worship of a species of household gods known as Teraphim, and the specific designation of spirits as Elohim (1 S 28^{13}). The special purpose of W. R. Smith's work in this field, on the other hand, was to draw attention to the vestiges of a primitive totemism or animal-worship both among Arabs and Hebrews; and these he found to linger, in the case of the Hebrews, in the denomination of tribes and families after animals, birds, and reptiles; in a vigorous animal-cult, described by Ezekiel as flourishing so recently as the eve of the Exile (Ezk 8^{10}); and in the distinction of clean and unclean beasts, where the totem of the earlier survived as the unclean animal of the later period (Journ. of Philology, ix. 75 ff.). There are, however, reasons for regarding both ancestor-worship and animal-worship as secondary in the development of the religions of nature; and others are of opinion that the evidence rather points to a polydæmonism as the original type of Semitic heathenism. Of this the fundamental conception is that men are in contact with a realm of spirits which take to do with their concerns, and to which they can draw near in some spot or object in which these are housed—as the well, the tree, the sacred stone (so Kayser, Theologie des AT, p. 21 ff.). From polytheism it is distinguished by the fact that the spirits have not yet attained to a clear-cut individuality, or to the possession of a mythology, while it tends to run down into fetishism through the adoration of the tenement in place of the tenant. In one of the most speculative regions of history a certain conclusion is, of course, unattainable, but the view in question at least harmonizes with what is known of the primeval modes of Semitic thought, while such an animistic religion formed some sort of a preparation for the introduction of the higher faith. In particular, it could offer no such opposition as a developed polytheism to the claim of one God upon the undivided allegiance of a people.

When Israel emerges into the light of history, it has broken, at least in principle, with heathenism. In the national memory the momentous step was connected with Abraham; and although the date of the patriarchal narratives makes them in large measure the vehicle of prophetic ideals, there is no reason to doubt that Mosaism reposed on and appealed to a religious past, in which the light of revelation had dawned. The work of Moses was to widen and perpetuate the breach with heathenism, and this he accomplished through the coincidence of the divine deliverance of Israel with the hour of his prophetic mission. Mosaism, whatever else it may have included, was at least a revolt from heathenism, from which it sought to protect Israel by prohibiting the worship of any divinity save J″ its God (Ex 20^3), and by bringing under His ban immoral acts and practices to which the genius of heathenism is at the best indifferent. From this standpoint there are two notable declensions related in the history of the period. The story of the golden calf, though its main significance belongs to the sphere of the minor idolatry, is also conceived as an apostasy to other gods than J″ (Ex 32^8). The second reported lapse is the idolatry with Moab at Peor, where Israel succumbed to the fascinations of a Baal-cult that consecrated sexual licentiousness (Nu 25). These incidents, however, even if historical,—and it may be noted that they belong in substance to our oldest capital source,—were mere episodes of temporary reaction natural to a period of intense religious fervour. The Israel which hurled itself upon Canaan was the people of J″, and saw in the gods of the nations real gods indeed, but His and their enemies.

Upon the settlement in Canaan there followed a heathen revival. The history of the Book of Judges moves through a succession of cycles: the people forsake J″ and serve the Baalim and the Ashtaroth; J″ in anger delivers them into the hands of the spoiler; then it repents Him, and He raises up judges who save them; then once more they turn back, and deal more corruptly than their fathers (Jg $2^{11ff.}$). For this relapse various causes are plausibly assigned—intermarriage with the Canaanite population, association of the Baal-cult with the agricultural year, a sense of the possession of proprietary rights by the old divinities in the land of Canaan (Smend, AT Religionsgeschichte, p. 50). But doubtless the strongest enticement lay in the character of the Canaanitish worship, which, in the main resting on a deification of the productive forces of nature, gathered up into religion all that is comprehended in laughter and licence. And if it had also quite another side, which revealed the divinity as cruel, and lusting for agony and blood, there was an element in the Hebrew nature to which this also appealed. The divine remedy for the backsliding was war. When Israel was attacked and spoiled, or when the hand of the oppressor was heavy upon them, they remembered that of old time J″ had been their deliverer, the religious enthusiasm welled up afresh, and under a leader whom it possessed they marched to victory. Such a leader also, without doubt, was Saul, although the history lays most stress on his later defection from, and his desertion by, J″. But among those who delivered Israel in the name of J″ the noblest and the best character was that of David, whose piety, even if allied with the superstition of divination, and marred by sensuality and cruelty, in some respects was the model of Christian communion with God; and the final outcome of the experiences of the period of the Judges, and esp. of the career of David which established the monarchy, was to place the sovereignty of J″ on as firm a basis as in the first flush of the wars of conquest. But again with an era of peace there came a heathen reaction, beginning in the seduction of Solomon to Canaanitish and cognate cults through the influence of his wives (1 K 11^{1-8}), and extending throughout a great portion of the history both of the Northern and the Southern Kingdoms.

In the Northern Kingdom the religious life took in the first instance an opposite direction. Antagonism to the heathenish innovations in Jerusalem may have been a factor in the power behind Jeroboam, as the setting up of the worship of the golden calves in two ancient sanctuaries may have been conceived in the interests of the ancestral religion; at all events, there is no reason to charge Jeroboam and his immediate successors with deliberate apostasy from J″. The recrudescence of heathenism in the Northern Kingdom is connected with Ahab, who built a temple in Samaria to the Zidonian Baal (1 K 16^{32}), and supported a heathenish priesthood. How far the hostile designs of Ahab against the religion of J″ extended is less certain. Many modern writers are of opinion that Ahab remained loyal to the national God—for which the names of his sons, Ahaziah and Jehoram, afford some evidence, and that the story of the persecutions is at least exaggerated (see, e.g., Smend, op. cit. p. 154 ff.). But, while it is true that the OT annals give broad effects and neglect fine distinctions, the Elijah traditions make it impossible to doubt that we have to deal in the case of Ahab with a dangerous assault on the national religion; and this impression is confirmed by the observation that the house of Omri was shortly afterwards destroyed with all its works in the name of the God of Israel (2 K 10). At all events, the intrusion of the alien cult received an effectual check. The annalist grants that the successors of Jehu stopped short in the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, however persistently the heathen leaven may have continued to work in the local sanctuaries.

The main sources for our knowledge of heathenism in this period are the writings of the 8th cent. prophets. Their testimony is, however, somewhat obscure, owing to the difficulty of distinguishing between the degraded worship of J″ and the rites of heathenism proper. It appears that J″ could be worshipped in name while the conception formed of Him was no higher or purer than that of the heathen. 'God has so utterly abolished the idols with whom Satan contested with Him the allegiance of His people that we have no certain knowledge what they were' (Pusey on Am 5^{26}). The final commentary on the history of the Northern Kingdom mentions as the chief forms star-worship, Baal-worship, accompanied by the most cruel rites, and magic (2 K 17). By the Baal-cult we have doubtless to understand the worship, not of a simple mighty rival of J″, but of a multitude of local divinities characterized by alternating moods of prodigality and ferocity. According to Amos, the worship of the Baalim (?, see Driver, ad loc.) was one of the four great sins of Israel, aggravated by its association with inhumanity, fornication, and drunkenness ($2^{7.8}$). As the places of worship, are mentioned hills and mountains and groves (passim). The central object was the altar, with which were associated the sacred pillar and post—doubtless conceived as 'houses of God.' The rites included the offering of incense (1 K 11^{8}) and of sacrifices, in times of crisis human sacrifices (2 K 17^{17}). In expostulating with his countrymen, Hosea pleads that J″ was from of old the God of Israel who conferred on them great benefits ($11^{1\text{-}4}$), and from whose hand they receive their present blessings (2^{8}); while the Baalim are mere creations of their own, who, as proved by experience, are powerless to protect them (13^{1}).

In the Southern Kingdom we discover a more vigorous and developed type of heathenism, but also a more passionate and energetic resistance. A significant note in the record of Rehoboam's reign shows that the idolatry of Solomon left as a legacy the vilest form of consecrated prostitution (1 K 14^{24}); and of this, as well as of the seducing idols, Judah was purged by Asa (1 K $15^{9\text{ff.}}$). A similar tribute of praise is accorded to Jehoshaphat, and especially to Hezekiah (2 K 18^{4}); and that the latter had to deal with a true heathenism, as well as with a debased worship of J″, may be collected from the contemporary witness of Isaiah.

'The land,' Isaiah declares, 'is become full of not-gods' (2^{8}). As the chief abominations he mentions the Asherahs and the sun-images (17^{8}), of which, however, the former is not necessarily a clue to heathenism. He also mentions the popularity of magicians, soothsayers, etc. (2^{6} 3^{2} 8^{19}). Specially noticeable is the rise to a pure monotheism in the contemptuous dismissal of the rival gods as mere human handiwork (2^{8}), things of naught (31^{7}), and his extension of J″'s sovereignty to the ends of the earth.

From the reforms of Hezekiah there is a sudden descent to the corruptions of the reign of Manasseh, who introduced the worship both of the heavenly bodies and of the Canaanitish divinities, and along with the latter their cruel and licentious rites (2 K 21). To understand such a lapse from the general tradition of the Davidic house we have to bear in mind two facts: the apparent political expediency of showing reverence for the celestial gods of the great empire in the North, and the doubts which the course of events may have aroused as to whether there was indeed in J″ power and will for effectual deliverance (cf. Smend, AT Theologie, p. 270 ff.). But in Josiah, another, and the greatest of the reformers, was to follow. In centralizing the worship at Jerusalem he dealt at heathenism the most effective blow possible, while he suppressed with a stern hand the innovations of his father, and the abominations that had crept in in their wake (2 K 23^{5}).

The programme of the reformation under Josiah contained in Deut. is terrible in its thoroughness. Not only does it embody the threat of destruction as the penalty of national apostasy (6^{15} 8^{19} etc.), but it prohibits the individual from practising idolatry, under pain of death ($17^{2\text{ff.}}$). Further, those who persuade others to idolatry are to be punished with death (13^{6}). Nay, the subject was not even to be looked into (12^{30}). The destruction of the furniture of heathenism is a most sacred duty ($7^{5.\,25}$ 12^{2}). How deeply and harmfully heathenism had eaten into the life of the people may be inferred from the fierceness of these enactments, which occur in a code otherwise marked by exceptional mildness and humaneness.

How far short the reformation fell of fulfilling the prophetic expectations is indicated by the prophets of the Chaldæan period. It would seem that the closing decades of the monarchy were marked by yet wilder excesses, as if the nation were making a last desperate cast in a losing game with fate. 'Thy gods, O Judah,' cries Jeremiah, 'are according to the number of thy cities' (2^{28}). Specially instructive is the vision of Ezekiel (ch. 8), in which he enumerates the three main forms of heathenism by which Judah was polluted—an animal-worship embracing loathsome beasts and reptiles, the cult of Tammuz, which drew the women after it, and the adoration of the sun-god. And the last of the kings succumbed to the contagion of the times, and scouted the counsel that was delivered to them by the prophets in the name of J″.

The purification came in the discipline of the Exile. Surrounded by the emblems of foreign idolatry, the exiles became deeply conscious of the grandeur and truth of the spiritual religion taught by their prophets; and although we know that a large number remained in Babylon, of whom many would become merged in the adjacent heathen mass, the remnant which returned brought with them the contempt of the great exilic prophet for the manufactured gods of gold and silver and wood, and the stubborn loyalty to J″ which was to become in Roman times the wonder and the hatred of the world. That even after the Exile heathen practices lingered in the community is argued by Smend (loc. cit. p. 39) from Ps $16^{1\text{ff.}}$, Zec 10^{2} 13^{2}, Job 31^{26}, cf. Is 27^{9},; but in any case it was a rapidly vanishing quantity. And the lessons of past experience had been carefully gleaned. The dissolution of mixed marriages by Ezra excluded the most dangerous of the influences which made for heathenism, while the Law sought to guarantee the purity of religion by an uncompromising policy of national isolation.

II. Idolatrous Worship of J″.—In the age of the Judges, as we have seen, and in the middle period of the Northern Kingdom, the imminent danger had been the submersion of Jahwism under the refluent wave of heathenism. In the 8th and 7th cents. the object on which prophetism concentrates its fervent energy is the purification or spiritualization of the worship which was rendered to the national God. Of that worship an ancient and increasingly marked feature was the use of images, and with Hosea there begins an attack upon image-service as inconsistent with the spirit of Jahwism, and virtually substituting fetishes for the living God ($8^{5.\,6}$ 10^{5}).

That the practice was ancient, and sanctioned by high authority, does not admit of dispute. After his victory over Midian, one of the chosen instruments of J″, Gideon, made an ephod out of the spoils—by which the context suggests that we are to understand a gold-plated image (Jg $8^{24\text{ff.}}$). Still more instructive is the story of Micah the Ephraimite, who out of 200 shekels of silver framed a graven image and a molten image, and hired Jonathan, a descendant of Moses, to be his priest (Jg 17^{3}). Even David has closely associated with him emblems of idolatry; for besides that he tolerates the probably ancestral cult of the human figures called Teraphim (1 S 19^{13}), the interrogation of the Ephod, here again most likely an image of J″, is a habit of his religious life (1 S 21^{9} $23^{6.\,9}$ 30^{7}). It could not therefore, as above hinted, impress the national mind as an impious innovation when Jeroboam associated the worship of J″ with the symbols of the golden bulls, and the absence of any polemic against the image-worship in the crusade of Elijah is generally regarded as proving that it was acquiesced in even by the enlightened conscience of the time. (On the other side König, Hauptprobleme der altisraelitischen Religionsgeschichte, p. 65). That the idolatrous worship of J″ had even reached back to the Mosaic age, and was sanctioned by Moses, it is not necessary to admit. Apart from the case for the originality of the second commandment, there are independent grounds for believing, on the analogy of other faiths, that primitive Mosaism embodied the conception of an imageless worship (Reichel, Vorhellenische Götterculte). Sufficiently significant is the obvious fact that from the Judges to the 8th cent. the idols became more and more numerous and costly, and that only in the Assyrian period were they realized to be alien to the genius of the national religion.

In the prophetic campaign against the historically legitimated idolatry we may distinguish three important phases. Were it made out that Ex 34 contains an older Decalogue, we might have to recognize an earlier attempt at reformation, as it is possible to hold that that code, in prohibiting 'molten gods' (Ex 34^{17}), tacitly sanctioned the simpler type of the graven images (Smend, AT Theol. p. 195). The great effort was put forth in the Northern Kingdom, but the prophets were unable even to weaken the idolatry which was embedded in the political framework, and the kings persisted to the last in the sin of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat. In Judah the first notable contribution to a more spiritual ritual was made by Hezekiah, in whose reforming spirit may be detected a reflection of the zeal of Isaiah. In the report of some of his acts, especially of his suppression of the high places and their insignia, critics have suspected the ante-dating of later reforms; but there is at least unmistakable evidence of his active aggression against the idolatrous elements of the traditional religion (2 K 18^{4}). Specially noteworthy is his removal of the brazen serpent, by which he withdrew the most sacred of sanctions, the Mosaic, from the approach to J" through figured symbol. The Reformation under Josiah is here memorable, not merely as consolidating the worship in an imageless sanctuary, but as energetically acting on the Deuteronomic prohibition of the posts and pillars (Dt 16$^{21\text{ff.}}$), which, before there had been images to give expression to the character of a divinity, had been venerated as places of a god's abode. 'He brought out the Asherah from the house of the Lord, and burned it at the brook Kidron' (2 K 23^{6}). On the whole it may be said that in Judah more energy was shown in, and more success followed on, the purification of the Jahweh-worship than was the case in Israel, but that in Judah also the purer Jahwism had its reaction in a grosser heathenism.

On two general features of the OT idolatry as exhibited by the sacred writers a remark may be made. The first feature is the astonishing strength of its fascinations. The perverse obstinacy of the chosen people in opposition to the logic of conscience, history, and heaven, can only be explained on the assumption that idolatry offered some deeply-satisfying provision for human nature. Wherein did this attraction lie? As regards the form which has been described as heathenism, the answer is obvious: it was popular because it was not ethical. There are many things which are felt to be attractive if only they were lawful, and the genius of heathenism, especially of the Canaanitish type, was to make it possible to overleap the boundaries of right and wrong with an appeased conscience. Were we confronted by a new religion which in a solemn spirit, and with a reasoned claim, threw its mantle over all which we assign to the world, the flesh, and the devil, we should realize something of the strength of the opposition with which the prophets of J" had to contend. As regards idolatrous worship of God, again, the need which it met is a universal one. The invisible God of the infinite attributes is a being whom thought with difficulty grasps, to whom the heart hardly warms—and the necessity of a more vivid and concrete manifestation of His essence is common ground of all the great religions save one. As a fact, we can approach God only through the aid of symbols—mental pictures and words are no less symbols than paintings and statues; and it is not clear that there is any difference in principle between the verbal representation of God as our Father and the more graphic representation of the same conception which can be given in His special material by the artist. The prophet did not scruple to use imagery which represented God as flying and even as roaring and ravening like a beast of the forest, and the image of the idolater was more effective than the imagery. But the justification of the prophetic attitude is that the image was too effective. Where a certain spiritual level has been reached, the visible symbol may be a real aid to devotion; but on lower levels the worshipper stops at the outward form, and sinks back into a true heathenism. And so it worked out, against the wise opposition of the prophets, in Israel: the symbol became to the unspiritual people a fetish, and the fetish poisoned the national life.

From what has been said, we are in a better position to appreciate the scheme of retributive justice which the prophetical writers find exemplified in the history of Israel and Judah, and of their kings. Because of idolatry Israel was removed from its place, and Judah after it went into captivity. The religious reformation is followed by a prosperous reign, the backsliding is avenged by the Philistine, the Assyrian, or the Chaldæan. That, says criticism, is not history. As a fact it is, in the main outline, history, and it is besides the vehicle of the grandest and most certain of historical generalizations—viz. that the Ruler of the world is on the side of purity and righteousness. The idolatry of Israel was, as we have seen, a description from the religious side of the evil doings which God hates, and it is therefore rightly written down as the cause of His vindictive and chastening judgments upon Israel.

Idolatry in NT.—The references to idolatry in NT are naturally of much more contracted scope. With the Jews the opposition to idolatry had become since the days of Antiochus Epiphanes a fanaticism, and the subject scarcely finds a place in the sayings of our Lord. From the circumstances of his mission it occupied a considerable space in the thoughts of St. Paul. Of peculiar importance is what we may call his philosophy of heathenism expounded in Ro 1, where he traces it to its origin in a sin against the light of nature, shows that this was punished by the withdrawal of the former light, and sets forth the hideous moral corruption of the Roman world as the result of the religious apostasy. A somewhat milder judgment of the heathen world is passed in the speech at Athens (Ac 18), where ignorance of God is not insisted on as matter of guilt, and an appeal is made to men on the ground of the dignity of their origin to rise to the recognition of the true God, and hearken to His latest accredited word. A special problem arose for Christian casuistry in connexion with meats offered to idols, which the apostle resolves by referring it to the arbitrament of a conscience enlightened by the twin principles of Christian liberty and Christian sympathy (1 Co 8). To the view popularized by Milton that the idols of the heathen were in reality devils, some colour is lent by 1 Co 10$^{14\text{ff.}}$; but, against this is to be put the emphatic protest, 'we know that no idol is anything in the world' (1 Co 8^{4}). Idolatry appears in the catalogue of the works of the flesh (Gal 5^{20}), and of those which exclude from eternal salvation (1 Co 6^{9}); but, as is characteristic of NT thought, the apostle widens the old religious conception, and makes it include all practices which are tantamount to a dethronement of God in favour of a creature. So gluttony and covetousness, where 'non objecto sed solo acto peccatur,' are species of idolatry (Eph 5^{5}, Ph 3^{19}). The recollection of the blessed deliverance from the darkness of heathenism is appealed to as furnishing a motive to sanctification (1 Th 1^{9}). Finally, St. John predicts an idolatrous apostasy in the last days (Rev 9^{20}).

LITERATURE.—The OT idolatry is naturally one of the capital topics in the histories of Israel and in the monographs on the Biblical Theology of the OT. For the presentation of the subject from the purely evolutionist point of view, see Wellhausen, Isr. u. jüd. Geschichte; Stade, Geschichte des Volkes Israel: for a more conservative treatment, Kittel, Hist. of Hebrews. In addition to the works on Biblical Theology above mentioned, among which Smend's AT Religionsgeschichte is full and suggestive, may be mentioned Duhm, Theologie der Propheten. See also art. 'Baal,' by Ed. Meyer, in Roscher's Lexicon. IGNORANCE is spoken of in Scripture mainly in connexion with sin; it modifies to some extent the sinner's responsibility. Thus even of a sin in which the chief actors knew well that they were doing wrong—the crucifixion—St. Peter says, 'Ye did it in ignorance' (κατὰ ἄγνοιαν, Ac 3^{17}); St. Paul, 'if they had known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory' (1 Co 2^{8}); and the Lord Himself, 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do' (Lk 23^{34}). They all knew something, but not everything; not, for instance, what the apostles only grasped through the resurrection and the teaching of the Risen One, that He was the Son of God, and His death a propitiation for the whole world; hence, according to NT, though their guilt was deep, in some cases awful, it was not unpardonable. The choice of evil, by one who knows clearly and fully what it is, removes the possibility of pardon: such a choice would be the αἰώνιον ἁμάρτημα of which Jesus speaks in Mk 3^{29}—sin, final and irretrievable.

On a broad view, the pre-Christian ages of human history, or the pre-Christian part of any one's life, may be characterized as 'times of ignorance' (Ac 17^{30}, 1 P 1^{14}). The meaning is not that the heathen know nothing; there is a light which lightens every man, a law written on the heart, however blurred or even misleading the writing may have become. But they do not know everything, and therefore, according to NT teaching, their sin is pardonable, and repentance and forgiveness are to be preached to them. Ignorance, such as it is, does not entirely exculpate; but it precludes final condemnation out of hand. When those who have lived in heathen ignorance are converted, their past life will not appear guiltless; on the contrary, they will be ashamed and confounded when they look back on it; when it stands out before them in the light of God's eternal law, and of the life of Jesus, they will be unable to understand how they lived as they did; they will condemn themselves, and humbly acknowledge their guilt. They were ignorant, but not innocent; yet, because of their ignorance, not without hope. Such guilt as theirs leaves the possibility of feeling in the moral nature; they may yet be pricked in their hearts, and repent and be saved. It is thus St. Paul interprets his own experience: 'I was a blasphemer, etc.; but I obtained mercy, because I did it ἀγνοῶν ἐν ἀπιστίᾳ' (1 Ti 1^{13}).

The gradual enlightenment of the Christian conscience, its entrance under the teaching of experience into fuller possession of the mind of Christ, has to be considered, in applying the plea of ignorance in extenuation of guilt. Thus to keep slaves might once have been done ignorantly —κατ' ἄγνοιαν, like the crucifixion—by a Christian; now it would be a sin against the light. Each generation is amazed at what its fathers perpetrated or tolerated or did not see; to say they knew no better is to utter at once their excuse and their condemnation, for such is the connexion between moral integrity and moral enlightenment that we feel sure they might have, and ought to have, known better. St. Paul not only mentions 'the times of ignorance,' which God 'winked at' (Ac 17^{30}), but indicates the genesis of that ignorance in a way which makes it itself an ominous feature of non-Christian life (Ro 1$^{18-23}$, Eph 4$^{17-19}$). In the last resort it is due to an immoral suppression, and even extinction, of divine light. It keeps pace with, as it is due to, a πώρωσις of the heart; though the two things, once initiated, are mutually cause and effect. Men act in the hardness of their hearts, and the light is dimmed; they act in the darkening light, and the capacity for feeling is deadened. If this process had its perfect work in any one, so that he had lost utterly the power of distinguishing good and evil, the result would not be the ἄγνοια which mitigates guilt; it would be that ignorance of the 'moral universal' which is itself a final condemnation.

The verb ἀγνοεῖν is used in He 5^{2}, and the subst. ἀγνοήματα in He 9^{7}, to describe sin in the character of 'sin of ignorance.' For the OT conception see Nu 15, Lv 4. The main idea is that of unwitting error or inadvertence. For such sins a sacrifice was provided, more serious in proportion to the culpability of the offender. Thus more was expected—or ignorance was less of a plea—in the case of a priest or a ruler than in that of a private person. Sins of ignorance were sins, and therefore had to be expiated; but they were not high-handed sins, and therefore they could be expiated. They were not renunciations of the covenant, which could not be purged with sacrifice or offering for ever, but had to be punished by extermination. What are commonly called 'infirmities' in Christians may be said to answer now to 'sins of ignorance.' There is a disproportion, so to speak, between our nature and our calling. We are flesh and blood, with inherited vices perhaps, and it is our calling to be holy as God is holy. In spite of faith and vigilance the Christian may be overtaken in a fault. The sudden fall, from which the heart instantly revolts, which it condemns, which it deeply mourns, is the sin of ignorance under the new covenant. If we had only known, if we had seen at the moment how it grieved God, scandalized others, hurt ourselves, we should never have done it. This leaves pardon possible, and we have a High Priest, who was Himself compassed with infirmity (though with none that issued in sin), that He might be able to bear gently with those who sin in ignorance and go astray (τοῖς ἀγνοοῦσι καὶ πλανωμένοις, He 5^{2}).

IGNORANCES.—This plural form is given as the tr^{n} of ἄγνοιαι in 1 Es 8^{75}, Sir 23^{3}, and of ἀγνοήματα in To 3^{3}, Sir 23^{2} 51^{19}. It is a literal rendering of the Greek, and can scarcely be illustrated from Eng. secular literature, though other abstract words like 'impenitences' are found, and this plu. is quoted with other meanings. RV retains the form, except in 1 Es 8^{75} 'errors.' For sins of ignorance see the previous article and article SIN. J. HASTINGS.

IJON (עִיּוֹן).—A town in the north part of the mountains of Naphtali, noticed with Dan and Abel-beth-maacah in 1 K 15^{20} (=2 Ch 16^{4}) as taken by the captains of the armies of Benhadad. It was captured also and depopulated by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15^{29}). The name is thought to survive in the Merj 'Ayun or 'meadow of springs,' a plateau N.W. of Dan. The most important site in this plateau is Tell Dibbîn, immediately south of the Leontes ravine, which Robinson and others have suggested may be the site of Ijon.

LITERATURE.—Robinson, BRP iii. 375; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.^{2} 349; Porter, Handbook (Index); Guérin, Galilée, ii. 280; Buhl, GAP (Index, s. 'Ijon'). C. R. CONDER.

IKKESH (עִקֵּשׁ).—The father of Ira, one of David's heroes, 2 S 23^{26}, 1 Ch 11^{28} 27^{9}.

ILAI (עִילַי; B Ἠλεί, A Ἠλί; Ilai), an Ahohite, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11^{29}). In the parallel list (2 S 23^{28}) the name appears as ZALMON (צַלְמוֹן; B Ἐλλών, A Σελλώμ, Luc. Ἀλιμάν). It seems probable that the Chronicler has preserved the more correct text. Klostermann conjectures עַלְיָן or אֶלְיוֹעֵנַי as the original form; Wellhausen עלון: Thenius, however, adheres to the text of Samuel.

ILIADUN (B Εἰλιαδούν, A Ἰλ-, AV Eliadun), 1 Es 5^{58} (^{56} LXX).—Perhaps to be identified with HENADAD, Ezr 3^{9}.

ILL.—Like 'evil' (of which it is a contraction), 'ill' is used in AV as adv., adj., and subst. The only occurrence of the subst. is Ro 13^{10} 'Love worketh no ill to his neighbour' (κακόν). Cf. Rhem. NT Note to Mt 3^{10} 'It is not only damnable to doe il, but also not to doe good.' The adj. was formerly, with the meaning of 'bad,' applied to persons as well as things. Thus in the Rhem. NT, the Note on 'Thamar' (Mt 1^{3}) is, 'Christ abhorred not to take flesh of some that were il, as he chose Judas among his Apostles: let us not disdaine to receive our spiritual birth and sustenance of such as be not alwayes good'; and in the Note on the Penitent Thief (Lk 23^{43}) occurs, 'Learne only not to despaire, though thou hast been il [=wicked] to the last moment of thy life.' Again, T. Adams on 1 P 1^{4} says, 'If thy words and works be ill meal, thank the miller, thy heart, for such corrupt thoughts'; and on 1^{6} 'The husband told his wife that he had one ill quality, he was given to be angry without cause; she wittily replied that she would keep him from that fault, for she would give him cause enough.' The adj. occurs in Dt 15^{21} 'any ill blemish'; Jl 2^{20} 'his ill savour'; Jth 8^{8} 'ill word'; Wis 5^{23}, Sir 29^{7} 'ill dealing'; 9^{18} 'ill tongue,' 41^{11} 'ill name.' The adv. is found in Gn 43^{6} 'Wherefore dealt ye so ill with me?' Job 20^{26}, Ps 106^{32} 'go ill'; Is 3^{11} 'be ill'; Jer 40^{4} 'seem ill'; Mic 3^{4} 'they have behaved themselves ill in their doings'; and Wis 18^{10} 'an ill according cry' (ἀσύμφωνος βοή); as well as in the phrase 'ill-favoured,' Gn $41^{3.\,4.\,19.\,20.\,21.\,27}$, for which see FAVOUR, and cf. North, Plutarch, 889, 'He had no further leysure, but to cast an ill-favoured cloke about him, the first that came to hand, and disguising himselfe to flie for life'; Fuller, Profane State, v. 3, p. 365, 'The suspicion is increased if the party accused be notoriously ill-favoured; whereas deformity alone is no more argument to make her a Witch, then handsomenesse had been evidence to prove her an Harlot.' J. HASTINGS.

ILLUMINATE, ILLUMINATION.—Milton uses the verb to illuminate ('give light to,' 'enlighten') literally in PL vii. 350—

> 'And made the stars,
> And set them in the firmament of heaven,
> To illuminate the earth.'

He has it figuratively in Sam. Agon. 1689, 'Though blind of sight . . . with inward eyes illuminated'; so T. Fuller, Holy State, iii. 12, p. 184, 'Of Naturall Fools'—'God may sometimes illuminate them, and (especially towards their death) admit them to the possession of some part of reason.' It is figuratively that the vb. occurs in AV, Bar 4^{2} 'Walk in the presence of the light thereof, that thou mayest be illuminated'; and He 10^{32} 'after ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions' (φωτισθέντες, RV 'enlightened').

AV has followed the Rhem. NT here, which (after Vulg.) has 'illuminate' in the foll. passages in which the Gr. is φωτίζειν, Eph 1^{18} 3^{9}, 2 Ti 1^{10}, He 6^{4} 10^{32}, Rev 18^{1} 21^{23} 22^{5}, having 'lighten' in the remaining places, viz. Lk 11^{36}, Jn 1^{9}, 1 Co 4^{5}. No other version uses the word; but in He 6^{4} Wyc. (1380) has 'illumyned,' 1388 'lightned.' It may be noted that Shaks. uses the three forms of the vb. 'illume,' 'illumine,' and 'illuminate'; Milton only 'illume' and 'illuminate.'

Illumination occurs in AV but once, Sir 25^{11} 'The love of the Lord passeth all things for illumination' (εἰς φωτισμόν; RV after edd. omits). Cf. the Rhem tr^{n} of 2 Ti 1^{10} 'But it is manifested now by the illumination (ἐπιφάνεια, Vulg. illuminatio) of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath destroied death, and illuminated (φωτίζειν, Vulg. illuminare) life and incorruption by the Gospel'; and the heading to Jn 9 'Our Lord . . . foretelleth by this occasion the excecation of the Jewes (because of their wilful obstinacie) and illumination of the Gentils who confesse their owne blindnes.' J. HASTINGS.

ILLYRICUM (Ἰλλυρικόν) was a term used in various senses; but in the mouth of St. Paul (Ro 15^{19}) it must undoubtedly be interpreted in its Roman sense, as denoting the Roman province which extended along the Adriatic from Italy and Pannonia on the north to the Macedonian province on the south. That this Roman sense was in the apostle's mind is shown, not merely by his consistent practice of using geographical terms in the Roman sense (Zahn, Einleitung, p. 130) and by the fact that it was natural and almost necessary in writing to a Roman church to follow the Roman usage, but also by the very form of the word. The Greek term was Ἰλλυρίς or Ἰλλυρία; and the strict and regular Greek noun, used to translate the Latin Illyricum, was Ἰλλυρίς (so in Strabo, pp. 323, 327; while Ptolemy formally gives Ἰλλυρίς in the Greek version of 2 Ch 16 corresponding to Illyricum in the Latin version). But St. Paul simply transliterates the Roman form into Greek as Ἰλλυρικόν; Ro 15^{19} is probably the only passage in Greek where a noun Ἰλλυρικόν is used (showing how Roman St. Paul was in his expression of political or geographical ideas); elsewhere Ἰλλυρικός is always an adjective.

The conquest of Illyricum had been a very slow process; a province Illyria had been formed as early as B.C. 167, and during the following two centuries all new conquests east and north-east of the Adriatic were incorporated in Illyricum, until in A.D. 10 Augustus separated Pannonia from it, and gave a final organization to Illyricum. The province was important and warlike; a large force of troops was required to maintain order, two legions, vii and xi, being stationed there by Augustus; and the governor was a consular legatus Augusti pro prætore. The northern half of the province was called Liburnia, and the southern, Dalmatia (wh. see). The name Dalmatia, however, gradually came into use to denote the province as a whole; and from the Flavian period onwards it became the regular and usual term. Pliny, writing before 77, uses both terms. Suetonius uses Illyricum for the time of the earlier emperors (distinguishing Dalmatia as a part of the country under Augustus), while he uses both names for the time of Otho and of Claudius. It is therefore interesting to find that St. Paul in a later epistle (2 Ti 4^{10}) uses the later term Dalmatia, and not the older term Illyricum. This affords no argument for a post-Pauline date. The name Dalmatia was coming into use during his lifetime; and such changes first affect the usage of ordinary life before they affect the formal official and literary usage. If Pliny, who was so much affected by the expression of his authorities (who, being early, would all use the name Illyricum), could use the term Dalmatia before 77, St. Paul might use it ten years earlier. In fact, we may from the usage of St. Paul date the definite change in popular Roman usage from the one term to the other about A.D. 57 to 67.

In Ro 15^{19} St. Paul says he has preached the gospel 'even unto Illyricum.' He is here stating the exterior limit up to which his work had extended; and there is no reason to understand (contrary to Ac) that he had actually preached in Illyricum. The doubt whether an exterior or a contained limit is meant in geographical expressions is observable in many cases, and must be determined by the context and by other evidence (see, for example, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, i. p. 319 f.). IMAGE, IMAGERY.—Image is loosely used in AV and RV as the trⁿ of many different Heb. words. A complete list of these words may be given for reference from other articles and for the proper interpretation of this important expression.

1. צֶלֶם zelem, a copy or counterpart, is translated 'image' by AV and RV in all its occurrences (Gn $1^{26.27}$ bis 5^3 9^6, Nu 33^{52} [צַלְמֵי מַסֵּכֹתָם 'their molten images'], 1 S 6^{5} bis$^{.11}$, 2 K 11^{18}, 2 Ch 23^{17}, Ps 73^{20}, Ezk 7^{20} 16^{17} 23^{14}, Am 5^{26}), except Ps 39^6 'vain shew,' AVm 'image,' RVm (badly) 'shadow.' See next article.

2. סֶמֶל, ṣemel, a resemblance or likeness, is rendered 'image' in Ezk $8^{3.5}$ (AV and RV); but 'figure' in Dt 4^{16} and 'idol' in 2 Ch $33^{7.15}$. See IDOLATRY.

3. תְּמוּנָה, tĕmûnâh, similitude, is rendered 'image' in Job 4^{16} only; elsewhere 'likeness' (Ex 20^4, Dt $4^{23.25}$ 5^8, Ps 17^{15}), or 'similitude' (Nu 12^8, Dt $4^{12.15.16}$). RV has 'form' everywhere except Ps 17^{15} 'likeness,' m. 'form.' See FORM.

4. מַשְׂכִּית maskîth, representation, picture, is translated variously: Lv 26^1 (אֶבֶן מַשְׂכִּית) AV 'image of stone,' RV 'figured stone'; Nu 33^{52} AV 'pictures,' RV 'figured stones'; Ps 73^7 (עָבְרוּ מַשְׂכִּיוֹת לֵבָב) AV 'they have more than heart could wish,' AVm 'they pass the thoughts of the heart,' RVm 'the imaginations of their heart overflow'; Pr 18^{11} AV 'conceit,' RV 'imagination'; 25^{11} AV 'pictures,' RV 'baskets,' RVm 'filigree work'; Ezk 8^{12} AV and RV 'imagery.' See PICTURE.

5. מַצֵּבָה mazzêbhâh, pillar, is translated simply 'pillar' by AV and RV in Gn $28^{18.22}$ $31^{13.45.51.52}$ bis $35^{14\text{-}20}$, Is 19^{19}; in Dt 12^3 AV and RV 'pillar,' RVm 'obelisk'; in Ezk 26^{11} AV 'garrison,' RV 'pillar,' RVm 'obelisk'; elsewhere AV has 'image' with 'statue' or 'standing image' in marg., RV always 'pillar' with 'obelisk' in marg. (Ex 23^{24} 24^4 34^{13}, Lv 26^1 [AV 'standing image'], Dt 7^5 [AVm 'statue or pillar'] 16^{22}, 1 K 14^{23}, 2 K 3^2 $10^{26.27}$ 17^{10} 18^4 23^{14}, 2 Ch 14^3 31^1, Jer 43^{13}, Hos 3^4 $10^{1.2}$, Mic 5^{13} [AV 'standing image']). See PILLAR.

6. [חַמָּן] only in plu. חַמָּנִים ḥammânîm, pillars for sun-worship. AV translates by 'images' in Lv 26^{30}; by 'images' with marg. 'sun images' in 2 Ch 14^5 34^4, Is 17^8 27^9, Ezk $6^{4.6}$; and by 'idols' in 2 Ch 34^7; RV always 'sun-images.' See IDOLATRY and SUN.

7. תְּרָפִים, only plu., tĕrâphîm, is always simply transliterated in RV 'teraphim.' AV has 'teraphim' in Jg 17^5 $18^{14.17.18.20}$, Hos 3^4; but 'images' in Gn 31^{19} (m. 'teraphim') $31^{34.35}$, 2 K 23^{24} (m. 'teraphim'), Ezk 21^{21} (m. 'teraphim'), with the sing. 'image' in 1 S $19^{13.16}$; 'idolatry' in 1 S 15^{23}; and 'idols' with marg. 'teraphims' in Zec 10^2. See TERAPHIM.

8. [עָצָב] only in plu. עֲצַבִּים 'ăẓabbîm, is translated 'idols' almost everywhere by both AV and RV (1 S 31^9, 1 Ch 10^9, 2 Ch 24^{18}, Ps $106^{36.38}$ 115^4 135^{15}, Is 10^{11} 46^1, Hos 4^{17} 8^4 13^2 14^8, Mic 1^7, Zec 13^2); but both give 'images' in 2 S 5^{21}, and RV gives 'images' though AV has 'idols' in Jer 50^2. See IDOLATRY.

9. [גִּלּוּל] only in plu. גִּלּוּלִים or גִּלֻּלִים gillûlîm, a distinctive word, properly 'idol blocks,' or such term of disparagement, in Ezk thirty-nine times; elsewhere only nine times (Lv 26^{30}, Dt 29^{17}, 1 K 15^{12} 21^{26}, 2 K 17^{12} $21^{11.21}$ 23^{24}, Jer 50^2). It is trᵈ 'idols' in AV and RV everywhere except Jer 50^2 in AV 'images.' See IDOLATRY.

10. אֱלִיל 'ĕlîl, worthlessness, is often applied in derision to foreign gods. Its translation (when plu.) is usually 'idols' in both AV and RV, Lv 19^4 (RVm 'things of nought') 26^1, 1 Ch 16^{26} (RVm 'things of nought'), Ps 96^5 (RVm 'things of nought') 97^7, Is $2^{8.18.20}$ bis $10^{10.11}$ $19^{1.3}$ 31^7 bis, Ezk 30^{13}, Hab 2^{18}. In Jer 14^{14} both versions give 'a thing of nought'; in Job 13^4 rôph'ê 'ĕlîl is in both 'physicians of no value'; while in Zec 11^{17} hoi rô'î ha'ĕlîl is translated in AV 'Woe to the idol shepherd' (where 'idol' is apparently used as an adj.), in RV 'Woe to the worthless shepherd.' See GOD, IDOLATRY.

11. פֶּסֶל peṣel (from פָּסַל to carve) is translated 'graven image' by RV everywhere (Ex 20^4, Lv 26^1, Dt $4^{16.23.25}$ 5^8 27^{15}, Jg $17^{3.4}$ $18^{14.17.18.20.30.31}$, 2 K 21^7, 2 Ch 33^7, Ps 97^7, Is $40^{19.20}$ 42^{17} $44^{9.10.15.17}$ 45^{20} 48^5, Jer 10^{14} 51^{17}, Nah 1^{14}, Hab 2^{18}). AV has 'carved image' in Jg 18^{18}, 2 Ch 33^7; elsewhere it agrees with RV.

12. [פְּסִיל] from same root, only in plu. פְּסִילִים pĕṣîlîm, is also translated by RV 'graven images' in all its occurrences (Dt $7^{5.25}$ 12^3, 2 K 17^{41}, 2 Ch $33^{19.22}$ $34^{3.4.7}$, Ps 78^{58}, Is 10^{10} 21^9 30^{22} 42^8, Jer 8^{19} 50^{38} $51^{47.52}$, Hos 11^2, Mic 1^7 5^{13}), except Jg $3^{19.26}$ where both versions have 'quarries' in text, with 'graven images' in margin. AV gives 'carved images' in 2 Ch 33^{22} $34^{3.4}$; elsewhere as RV.

13. מַסֵּכָה maṣṣêkâh, lit. 'a pouring out,' is used of molten metal, and (with the word for 'calf' added) of a 'molten calf' in Ex $32^{4.8}$, Dt 9^{16}, Neh 9^{18}; or 'molten gods' Ex 34^{17}, Lv 19^4 (with word for 'gods'); but generally it stands alone and is translated 'molten image' (Nu 33^{52} [Heb. here adds zelem], Dt 9^{12} 27^{15}, Jg $17^{3.4}$ $18^{14.17.18}$, 1 K 14^9, 2 K 17^{16}, 2 Ch 28^2 $34^{3.4}$, Ps 106^{19}, Is 30^{22} 42^{17}, Hos 13^2, Nah 1^{14}, Hab 2^{18}). In Is 30^1 the words לִנְסֹךְ מַסֵּכָה are rendered in AV and RV 'that cover with a covering'; in RVm 'weave a web or pour out a drink-offering or make a league.'

14. נֵסֶךְ nêṣek, or נֶסֶךְ neṣek, from the same root as the last, is the word for a 'drink-offering,' and is so translated by AV and RV in all its occurrences, except Is 41^{29} 48^5, Jer 10^{14} 51^{17} where both versions have 'molten image,' and Nu 4^7 where קְשׂוֹת הַנָּסֶךְ is rendered in AV 'covers to cover withal,' in RV 'cups to pour out withal.'

In the Apocr. 'image' occurs in the following places: 2 Es 5^{37} 8^{44} (both imago), Wis 2^{23} 7^{26} $13^{13.16}$ 14^{15} (all εἰκών), 14^{17} (ἐμφανῆ εἰκόνα, AV 'an express image,' RV 'a visible image'), 15^4 (εἶδος, RV 'form'), 15^5 (εἰκών), 15^{13} (γλυπτά, EV 'graven images'), 17^{21} (εἰκών); 1 Mac 3^{48} (εἴδωλον, RV 'idol'), 5^{68} (γλυπτά, EV 'carved images'); 2 Mac 2^2 (ἀγάλματα, EV 'images').

In NT χαρακτήρ is translated 'express image' in He 1^3 (χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ, 'the express image of his person,' RV 'the very image of his substance,' RVm 'the impress of his substance'; it is the only occurrence in NT of χαρακτήρ, which gives us our word 'character'). Elsewhere image is always εἰκών, and that Gr. word is always so translated in both versions.

Imagery occurs twice: Ezk 8^{12} 'Son of man, hast thou seen what the ancients of the house of Israel do in the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery?' (בְּחַדְרֵי מַשְׂכִּיתוֹ, RV 'in his chambers of imagery'); and Sir 38^{27} 'give themselves to counterfeit imagery' (εἰς ὁμοιῶσαι ζωγραφίαν, RV 'to preserve likeness in his portraiture'). In the Prol. to Deut. Tindale uses the word in the sense of images or idols, 'And to beware ether of makynge imagerye or of bowinge them selves unto images.' Sir T. Elyot is very near the use in Sir when he says (The Governour, ii. 403), 'It is written that the great kynge Alexander on a tyme beinge (as it hapned) unoccupyed, came to the shoppe of Apelles, the excellent paynter, and standyng by hym whyles he paynted, the kynge raisoned with hym of lines, adumbrations, proportions, or other like thinges pertainyng to imagery, whiche the paynter a litle whyles sufferynge, at the last said to the kynge with the countenance all smylyng, Seest thou, noble prince, howe the boye that gryndeth my colours dothe laughe the to scorne?' Bp. Atterbury uses the word in the same sense as Ezk, 'It might be a mere dream which he saw; the imagery of a melancholick fancy.'

J. HASTINGS.

IMAGE.—About a score of Heb. words are rendered in AV 'idol' or 'image.' See preceding art. and IDOLATRY. The terms reserved for the expression which in Christian doctrine (to which the present art. is confined) represents 'image' or 'likeness,' are צֶלֶם and דְּמוּת, to which correspond εἰκών and ὁμοίωσις in the NT. For the latter Heb. word the LXX once at least uses ἰδέα (Gn 5^3). צֶלֶם sometimes (Dn 3^{19}) signifies an aspect or expression of countenance. In biblical Greek κατ' εἰκόνα is sometimes used adverbially = 'after the manner of,' as e.g. Hos 13^2 κατ' εἰκόνα εἰδώλων, 'after the fashion of idols.' Wis 13^{13} εἰκόνι ἀνθρώπου, 'in the manner of a man.'

There are two main biblical doctrines which find expression under these terms, viz. that of (1) man as made in the image of God, and (2) that of Christ the Son, as the image of the Father, or of the invisible God.

I. The passages in which this view of man is expressly stated are: Gn $1^{26.27}$ $5^{1.3}$ 9^6, 1 Co 11^7, Col 3^{10}, Ja 3^9. To these should be added Ps 8, which, though not containing the phrase 'image of God,' is a poetical replica of the creation-narrative of Gn 1 as far as it refers to man. St. Paul's address at Athens is another passage where the idea of 'likeness' between man and his Maker is fully implied, though the word is not used. A quite factitious importance has been attached to the difference between צֶלֶם and דְּמוּת in the primal passage. There is really no difference. At the utmost, it is that between an original or pattern and that which is framed according to the pattern. The double expression in Gn 1^{26} and 5^3 is simply intended to strengthen the idea. The divine image which man bears is one corresponding to the Original.

This grand assertion is the distinctive feature of the Bible doctrine concerning man. It distinguishes the revealed teaching about him from all ethnic or naturalistic views, and is the real foundation of all our ideas about the dignity of man. Although thus definite and significant, however, the phrase is not explicit. Large place is left for discussion as to whether this definition refers to something in man's own nature or mainly to his relations: and among these whether to his aspect towards the other creatures or his relation to God. This is why the doctrine of the Divine Image in man has been a topic so fruitful of differences in theology. For long the theological bent was to make the imago Dei distinctive of man unfallen. In the loss of the image by sin lay man's need of redemption. 'What we lost in Adam,' says Irenæus, 'to wit, the divine image and similitude, that we receive again in Christ Jesus.' But later on, it was seen that this was too sweeping. Then set in the tendency to expound the idea in a double sense. The cruder form of this was the Romish, as expressed by Bellarmin—that by the Fall man lost the 'likeness' of God, though he retained the 'image.' But Protestants held a not dissimilar view, viz. that the image had two meanings. In one sense it is essential to man's nature, and in this sense consists of his intellectual powers, his liberty of will, and his superiority among the creatures,—features which can never be wholly lost, but remain with man though fallen. In the other sense it includes those ornaments or complements of the idea—immortality, grace, holiness, righteousness—which were defaced or blotted out by man's transgression. One point of unity and consistency with Scripture holds fast amid these variations of view. For it is certain that in the passages cited above the divine image is recognized as existing in man fallen as well as unfallen. Among recent evangelical divines of a philosophical cast the tendency has been to return to the position of the early Eastern Church, and place the image mainly in that which distinguishes man among created beings, rather than in that which marks off the unfallen from the fallen condition. The Greek Christian Fathers did define it as something rather metaphysical than ethical. But to place the image mainly in the possession of 'Spirit' and 'Free Will' is to overlook the moral and religious elements essential to man's nature. Man in his ideal is a 'spirit' and 'will' under the dominion of conscience, developed freely no doubt, but in subjection and obedience to God. That this biblical notion of the divine image is a profoundly simple and consistent one, is made clear by the NT passages which speak of its renewal in grace (Col 3^{10}, cf. Eph 4^{24}), where the moral elements are prominent and supreme. But they cannot be read as defining what the divine image was in man at the first, for they treat expressly of the 'new man.' The unity and simplicity of the idea are conserved, if we note that this description of the 'new man' presupposes corresponding outlines in the first man which were broken off by sin, and are for the first time fully realized in man redeemed and renewed.

Another suggestive point in the discussion comes out of the question, long debated, whether the divine image in man was a gift of grace added to his nature, i.e. was in a sense something 'supernatural,' or was wholly natural and concreated from the first, as Protestants have always maintained. The real point in dispute is much confused and hidden. The mediæval view is really one of dualism or divergence in man's nature. It splits his life into two. It accentuates the distinction between nature and grace, between things secular and sacred; whereas the true view is that of an original unity in the creature made after God's image, and a harmonious development of the human and divine elements in him. For there is a truth in the mediæval idea of a 'supernatural gift of righteousness' to man, though it was crudely expressed. Human nature only attains its ideal when cultivated by divine grace. The nature of man is incomplete without its Godward development, and this can take place successfully only through grace. For it is essential to man's highest to be not left to himself. Mere human nature or 'unassisted reason,' as the phrase goes, is a contradiction of the Bible idea of man. That idea is that human nature rightly and fully developed manifests the divine, and is a reflection of what it has received of God.

II. That Christ is 'the Image of the Father' belongs to the doctrine of the Saviour's pre-existent Godhead as taught in the NT. It is one of the ways in which that truth is set forth. The precisely relevant passages are 2 Co 4^4, Col 1^{15-17}, He $1^{2.3}$. The idea is not restricted to the term εἰκών which occurs in the first two citations, but is also expressed by two kindred phrases in He 1^3 ἀπαύγασμα τῆς δόξης, 'the effulgence of his glory,' and χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ, 'the very image of his substance.' It will be noted from the context of all these passages that the terms are used not so much of the incarnate Redeemer as of the eternal Son. No doubt, according to the teaching of Jesus and that of all His apostles, the 'Christ come in the flesh' is for us the mirror and reflection of God. 'He that hath seen me,' says Jesus, 'hath seen the Father' (Jn 14^9). This is the prominent and prevailing sense of the Christian doctrine that Christ is the Revelation or Image of God. This is the central teaching of the Incarnation. But in the few places where the word 'image' or its equivalents is used in this connexion by the writers of the NT Epistles, it is employed in support of a special doctrine of Christ's essential divine personality. In this respect it stands on the same plane as the title ὁ υἱός, 'the Son,' used so widely throughout the NT writings, and ὁ λόγος in the Johannine passages.

Notice (1) that in the Hebrews passage, where Christ as υἱός is the subject of the assertion, the other terms supplement and complete the idea of His divine Sonship. To say that He who is the Son is the 'effulgence of God's glory' and 'the very image or impress of his substance,' is not only to reassert the Sonship, but to add to it the idea of 'likeness.' It affirms community of nature with the Father in the same way as when He is called 'the Son of God.' It thus strengthens the expression of Christ's place in the Godhead by affirming at once His likeness to God and yet His personal distinctness, for how can any one be spoken of as 'the image' of himself?

Further, note (2) how this term 'image' as used of the pre-existent Christ, echoes, like ὁ λόγος, a form of older or pre-Christian speech. Εἰκών and ἀπαύγασμα are both applied to the 'Wisdom' of Old Testament literature, e.g. in Wis 7^{26} 'For she is the "brightness" of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the "image" of his goodness.' Χαρακτήρ is applied by Philo to the Logos; so also εἰκών, as where he says the Logos is εἰκὼν δι᾽ οὗ ὁ κόσμος ἐδημιουργεῖτο. It is probable, therefore, that the writer of the Fourth Gospel, the writer 'to the Hebrews,' and St. Paul were all drawing on ancient terms, common to the Jewish Alexandrian schools, which had been applied in pre-Christian thought to a personified divine attribute. The NT writers are in these passages rescuing these terms to describe their Master's Person and glory. Judaizing Gnosticism had employed some of these expressions to uphold the doctrine of a graduated hierarchy of divine manifestation, more especially that of a secondary or representative divine being alongside of the supreme and invisible God,—a notion which, when applied to the Person of Christ, became afterwards the Arian heresy. The apostolic writers apply these terms ὁ λόγος, ἡ εἰκών, and the like, to their Lord in a way fitted to bring out what is true in them and to repudiate what is false;—conspicuously, so as to repel the notion of inferiority in the second member of the divine Trinity.

Note (3) how this is clenched by the fact that in the context of the three passages Jn 1^{1-3}, Col 1^{15-17}, and He $1^{2.3}$ the special function of creating and upholding the universe is ascribed to Christ under His titles of Word, Image, and Son respectively. The kind of Creatorship so predicated of Him is not that of a mere instrument or artificer in the formation of the world, but that of One 'by whom, in whom, and for whom' all things are made, and through whom they subsist. This implies the assertion of His true and absolute Godhead. It was evidently meant so to do. For there is no more direct and successful method of affirming that Christ is God than to ascribe to Him the making and governing of all things in the supreme form which the ascription takes in these passages.

Something remains to be said of a possible connexion between these two facts noted by biblical theology, viz. that 'man is made in the divine image,' and that 'Christ is,' in the supreme sense, 'the Image of God.' The older dogmatic was wont to distinguish the two, by saying that the divine image in man was accidentalis compared with that Godlikeness which belonged to the eternal Son as Imago substantialis. But what Scripture teaches of their connexion can be briefly stated. It has two distinct lines—one referring to the original creation of man, the other to his redemption.

Man is represented in Scripture as the crown or goal of that earthly creation of which the Eternal Word is the Author. He who is the 'Image of the Invisible God' is also declared to be the 'Firstborn or First-begotten of all creation' (Col 1^{15}), i.e. the absolute heir and sovereign Lord of all things. There is thus a propriety in holding man to be a copy of the Logos. But there is no express Scripture for the assertion that man was created in the likeness of the eternal Son. On the contrary, it is always the image or likeness of God that is spoken of in this connexion. No doubt, it is implied that the Logos or Image of God is He 'in whom and for whom' man was created. But it would be a misreading of these passages to take them as affirming that man was created after the likeness of the Son, and not of the Father or of the Holy Spirit. Everywhere Scripture represents man as created after the image of the Elohim, or of the Godhead. Man is said to be 'the image and glory of God,' not of Christ alone.

On the other hand, when the new creation of man is referred to, the NT is explicit in asserting that Christ is the prototype of the redeemed or renewed humanity. The 'divine image' is restored in those who are predestinate to be 'conformed to the image of his Son.' We are 'renewed in the spirit of our mind' only as we put on 'the new man—renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him' (Col 3^{10}), —a new creation in which 'Christ is all in all' (Col 3^{11}). Likeness to His Image is only to be completed when the redeemed shall see their Redeemer as He is (1 Jn 3^{2}). The likeness shall then extend even to the outward form. 'He shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation, that it may be conformed to the body of his glory' (Ph 3^{21} RV); 'As we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly' (1 Co 15^{49}).

All this is explicit and clear. There has long been a desire and tendency among theological thinkers to complete the connexion of the two statements. It looks extremely probable to infer that man must have been created from the first in the image of Him who was afterwards to be incarnate for man's redemption, and who in redeeming men conforms them to His own likeness. It is a tempting and perhaps innocent speculation, but not an ascertainment of biblical theology.

IMAGINE, IMAGINATION.—The verb to 'imagine' has always in AV the obsolete meaning of purpose, scheme, contrive. Thus Gn 11^{6} 'Nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined to do' (יָזְמוּ, RV 'they purpose'); Zec 7^{10} 'Let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart' (אַל־תַּחְשְׁבוּ, Amer. RV 'devise'). Cf. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 74, 'It was reported to the noble emperour Octavius Augustus that Lucius Cinna, which was susters sonne to the great Pompei, had imagined his dethe'; and Tindale, Notes to Deut., 'Zamzumims, a kinde of geauntes and signifieth myschevous or that be all waye imagininge.' RV generally retains 'imagine,' but Amer. RV prefers 'think' in Job 6^{26}, 'meditate' in Ps 2^{1} 38^{12}, and 'devise' in Ps 10^{2} 21^{11} 140^{2}, Pr 12^{20}, Hos 7^{15}, Nah $1^{9.\,11}$, Zec 7^{10} 8^{17}.

Imagination has always the sense of evil purpose, contrivance. This is so even in Ro 1^{21} 'became vain in their imaginations,' where the Gr. is διαλογισμός, more consistently tr$^{\text{d}}$ 'reasoning' in RV; and in 2 Co 10^{5} 'casting down imaginations,' where the Gr. is λογισμός, and AVm RVm give 'reasonings'; in the only other occurrence in NT of this Gr. word (Ro 2^{15}) AV and RV have 'thoughts,' RVm 'reasonings.' But 'reasoning' is plainly too colourless, the evil intent in the Gr. words here being lost. For 'imagination' in the sense of mischievous intention, cf. Is 55^{7} Cov. 'Let the ungodly man forsake his wayes, and the unrightuous his ymaginacions, and turne agayne unto the LORDE.' Tindale uses the word in the sense of a visible representation of a thought, Nu 33^{52} 'Se that ye dryve out all the inhabiters of the londe before you, and destroy their Ymaginacions and all their Ymages of Metall.' The Heb. subst. shĕrîrûth expresses firmness in a bad cause, and is mistranslated by 'imagination' in AV: RV gives 'stubbornness' in all its occurrences (Dt 29^{19}, Ps 81^{12}, Jer 3^{17} 7^{24} 9^{14} 11^{8} 13^{10} 16^{12} 18^{12} 23^{17}).

IMALCUE, AV Simalcue (Σιμαλκουή A, 'Ιμαλκουέ ℵV, Εἰμαλκουαί; Simalchue, Emalchuel, also Malchus), 1 Mac 11^{39}.—An Arab prince to whom Alexander Balas entrusted his youthful son Antiochus. After the death of Alexander, in B.C. 145, Imalcue reluctantly gave up the boy to Tryphon, who placed him on the throne of Syria as Antiochus VI. in opposition to Demetrius II. Nikator (1 Mac $11^{39\text{-}54}$; Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 1; Diodorus in Müller's Frag. Hist. Græc. ii. p. xvii n. 21). Elsewhere Diodorus (op. cit. n. 20) names Diocles, prince of Abæ in Arabia, as the guardian of the young (νήπιος) Antiochus. Josephus and the Syriac give the name as Malchus, Diodorus as Jamblichus, both representing the Heb. ימלכו, a name which appears on Palmyrene inscriptions. IMLA (יִמְלָא; 2 Ch $18^{7.\,8}$=IMLAH [יִמְלָה], 1 K $22^{8.\,9}$; perhaps 'he is full,' and so 'fulness,' the first form of the name being etymologically the more correct).—The father of Micaiah, a prophet of J″ in the days of Ahab. C. F. BURNEY.

IMMANUEL (עִמָּנוּאֵל, 'Εμμανουήλ, 'God is with us,' or, as others, 'God with us').—The name of a child whose birth was predicted by Isaiah, and who was to be a sign from God to Ahaz during the Syro-Ephraimitic war (Is 7). The name does not occur again in Scripture; and much difference of opinion has prevailed on the question wherein the point of the sign lay, whether in the person of Immanuel himself, or in the meaning of his name, or in the time of his birth, or in the conditions of his life, or in several of these things together. Other things in the prophecy are also obscure. The mother of Immanuel is described as the 'almah (LXX ἡ παρθένος), a term which means merely 'young woman' (cf. the masc. 1 S 17^{56} 20^{22}), though in usage it appears said only of unmarried persons. Even if the more technical word for 'virgin' (בְּתוּלָה) had been employed, the term might have described the young woman merely at the moment when the prophet spoke; the idea of a virgin conception and birth could have been expressed without ambiguity only by a circumlocution. The force of the art. (הָעַלְמָה) may also be variously understood. Some take the art. as generic, referring to the class of persons called 'almah (Ec 7^{26}), in which case the meaning would be that any or many of this class would exemplify the prediction, calling their children Immanuel. But perhaps the 'almah becomes definite to the prophet's mind just from the circumstances connected with her and the part she performs (2 S 17^{17}). There is nothing in the passage to suggest that the 'almah is of mean birth or estate; but the generality of the term is unfavourable to the idea that the wife of the prophet —called 'the prophetess' 8^{3}—or the wife of king Ahaz is meant. Neither is there anything in the passage to suggest that the 'almah is a personification of the house of David or the people of Judah.

The prophecy is to be explained partly from the historical circumstances, partly from the circle of thoughts which had filled the prophet's mind from the beginning (chs. 1–6), and in the light of which he interpreted the circumstances, and partly from ideas regarding the house of David that had long formed part of the national faith. It cannot be altogether without significance that it is 'the house of David' that is addressed and spoken of throughout the chapter.

The historical circumstances were these: In the days of Ahaz the kings of Syria and Ephraim formed an alliance and made war on Judah. The object of the allies was possibly to compel Judah to enter into a confederacy against Assyria, and not improbably Egypt had its hand in the game (7^{18}). Ahaz being reluctant, the allies resolved to dethrone the house of David and set a tool of their own upon the throne of Judah. Amidst the terror inspired by the alliance (7^{2}), the prophet was bidden go to meet the king and say to him in regard to the purpose of the allies, 'It shall not stand.' He added the solemn warning that faith in J″ was the condition of deliverance. Shortly after, the prophet offered the corroboration of any sign which the king might ask. This offer Ahaz rejected, putting it away under the pretext that he would not put God to the proof. Roused to passion by the king's unbelief or obstinacy, the prophet exclaimed, 'Is it too small a thing for you to weary men, that ye weary my God also? Therefore the Lord himself shall give you a sign.'

The subject may be approached by asking: Of what is Immanuel the sign or corroboration?

1. Some answer, of the promise, 'It shall not stand'—of the failure of the northern coalition, and of the deliverance of Judah from Ephraim and Syria. In this case the sign lies partly in the meaning of the name Immanuel, 'God is with us,' and partly in the time of his birth. His mother and he are no persons in particular—they are any young woman and her son. By the time young women conceive and bear sons they will be calling their children 'God is with us,' in token of Judah's deliverance from Syria and Ephraim: 'Before the child shall know to reject evil and choose good, the land before whose two kings thou fearest shall be depopulated,' v.^{16} (Duhm). This interpretation is simple, but difficult to accept. (1) It requires the excision of vv.$^{15.\,17}$. For, whoever Immanuel and his mother be, they are Judæans, and when it is said that the child shall eat thick milk and honey (v.^{15}), it is implied that Judah shall be reduced by war to a pasture land no more cultivated (v.$^{21\text{ff.}}$)—a thing in direct contradiction to the supposed meaning of the sign. (2) The sign becomes virtually a duplicate of that of Mahershalal ($8^{1\text{-}4}$), for though Assyria is not named as the destroyer of Syria and Ephraim in 7^{16}, it is admittedly in the prophet's mind. A duplication of the same sign is highly improbable. (3) Is it probable or possible that Isaiah should conceive Judæan mothers expressing their thankfulness for deliverance from Ephraim and Syria by using the name Immanuel? He has himself the utmost contempt for the northern alliance (7^{4}). The danger does not seem to him to lie there (8^{12}). Further, that which will make the northern alliance abortive is the Assyrian invasion, but everywhere in the passage he assumes that the Assyrian will devastate Judah also ($7^{18.\ 20}$ $8^{7.\ 8}$). The Assyrian invasion will extend over Israel and Judah in common. Immanuel cannot be a sign of deliverance from Ephraim and Syria, for the deliverance will be effected only through a calamity infinitely greater. (4) Though the sign first offered to Ahaz was to be a token of deliverance from the allies ($7^{11.\ 12}$), the change of tone on the prophet's part suggests that the sign now given will be of a different sort. It is a mistake to suppose that the sign must be something which Ahaz could see, in corroboration of something else. The sign may be just the coming fact, or some aspect of it, as it was said to Moses, 'And this is the sign to thee that I have sent thee: when thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain' (Ex 3^{12}; cf. Is 37^{30}).

2. Some regard the sign as lying partly in the meaning of the name Immanuel, and partly in the circumstances of his birth and life; that is, the sign is twofold, first, of deliverance from the northern coalition (Immanuel), and second, of the Assyrian devastation of Judah ('milk and honey shall he eat,' vv.$^{15.\ 17}$). But, as before, against this is the utter uselessness of giving Ahaz a sign of deliverance from the allies when that deliverance is effected only by the complete desolation of his own country at the same time.

3. It is therefore probable that the sign is of larger significance. Several things must be taken into account. First, that which others would call a national crisis, the prophets, and particularly Isaiah, consider a religious crisis. His statement to Ahaz, 'if ye do not believe ye shall not be established' (v.^{9}), is not the enunciation of a commonplace. It is the central thought of his prophetic life ($6^{9\mathrm{ff.}}$ and often). And this faith is wanting both in prince and people ($7^{12.\ 13}$ $8^{5\mathrm{ff.}}$). Secondly, throughout this interview the prophet's mind is in a state of extreme exaltation, as his offer to Ahaz of a sign anywhere in all the universe of things shows. And this exaltation is intensified by the king's rejection of the sign offered him—'Will ye weary my God also'? (7^{13}). The sign now given will not be a favourable one forced upon Ahaz, but one of a wider kind. The prophet casts his eye forward over the whole destiny of the kingdom of J". He sees his conceptions of this destiny about to take shape in history. The conditions and the instruments of fulfilling what he had from the beginning foreseen to be inevitable are now present. A great judgment shall sweep over the land, 'the Lord will bring on thee days that have not been since Ephraim departed from Judah' (v.^{17}); 'milk and honey shall every one eat that is left in the land' (v.^{22}). The country shall be reduced to a pasture land, whose scanty inhabitants shall live on milk and wild honey. But this is not the end; a remnant shall turn: amidst the desolation and behind it there will be those who say, 'God is with us.'* The sign has no reference to Syria and Ephraim; it refers to the destiny of the people, though, of course, to the prophet's mind or his vision this destiny had two steps—the Assyrian devastation, and the repentance and salvation that would follow it. This view is supported by the fact that where Immanuel is mentioned again it is in connexion with the Assyrian invasion ($8^{8.\ 10}$). But does not this interpretation require the omission of v.^{16} 'Before the child know to reject evil and choose good, the land shall be depopulated, before whose two kings thou art in terror'? (so Budde). Even if this should be the case, we must choose that side on which there appears to lie the greater probability. The chapter and the succeeding ones have not escaped interpolation. V.^{16} might be due to the same hand that inserted the words 'within sixty-five years Ephraim shall be broken that it be not a people' (v.^{8}, cf. 8^{7}). The verse in its present form cannot be read along with v.^{17}. Perhaps, however, it might be sufficient to omit the last words of the verse, 'before whose two kings thou art in terror.' With this omission 'the land' would be Judah as in 6^{11}, and the whole passage v.$^{14\mathrm{ff.}}$ have reference to the desolation of Judah. It is certainly very improbable that Isaiah should have spoken of Syria and Israel as a single 'land,' though a reader might have so understood the word and helped out the sense by the gloss 'before whose two kings,' etc.*

This view still leaves room for different interpretations of Immanuel. The 'almah and her son might be considered merely examples of something general, in which case Immanuel would represent the new generation rising up after the desolation (v.^{15}), the 'holy seed' of 6^{13} (cf. the change of mind described in $8^{21\mathrm{ff.}}$). The force of the sign to Ahaz would lie in the threat of invasion and the destruction of the order of things now existing of which he and his house was a great part, though the prophet's own interest would be chiefly in that which was to follow this, the new faith in J", expressed in the words 'God is with us.' He himself and his children, not by their names, but by their faith amidst the darkness already as good as fallen on the nation, are a 'sign' of this future faith of the people ($8^{16\text{-}18}$). There are some things, however, which rather suggest a more precise meaning for Immanuel. (1) The whole passage relates to the 'house of David.' It was the design of the allies to dethrone this house, a purpose which could not but awaken wider thoughts in the prophet's mind. As represented in Ahaz this house had pronounced judgment on itself ($7^{9.\ 13}$), and with his assured conviction of the imminent destruction of the nation the prophet cannot have helped forecasting also the fate of the royal family. If, as is likely, the prophecies, chs. 9. 11, belong to this period, they show that he contemplated its downfall (11^{1}). (2) The words 'thy land, O Immanuel' (8^{8}) suggest that Immanuel, in the prophet's mind, is an individual person, to whom the land in some way belongs. (3) The general line of the prophet's thoughts at this time may be fairly appealed to. In $9^{1\text{-}7}$ the 'child born' is certainly a member of the house of David, and he is there introduced in such a matter of course way as to suggest that he had been already referred to and was known. Such a reference could only be found in ch. 7. (4) The names given to the child in ch. 9 may all be summed up in the name Immanuel, of which they are an analysis. These considerations may suggest that Immanuel is identical with the child of ch. 9 and the 'shoot' of ch. 11. If so, the sign does not lie in the meaning of the word Immanuel, but in the person who was the embodiment of the meaning, and who was 'called' Immanuel because he was Immanuel.

* Whether it can also be said through the desolation, i.e. by its discipline, will depend on whether לְדַעְתּוֹ (v.^{15}) is to be rendered 'that he may know' (AV) or 'when he knows' (RV), and on whether 'to reject evil and choose good' be a moral act. To dispose of the sense 'that he may know' by saying that eating milk and honey will hardly 'promote the formation of ethical character,' is to use a pleasantry which misses the point. Eating milk and honey is a token and synonym of desolation and hardship, and it is the teaching of all the prophets from Hosea downward that it is just through the discipline of such things that the people shall be brought to a right ethical mind.

* This reading of v.^{16} was suggested in Expos. Times, 1894. The same idea has occurred to others, e.g. Buhl, Jesaja oversat og fortolket, Kjöb. 1894; Kittel, 'Jesaja' (Exeg. Handb.^{6}), Leip. 1898).

If Immanuel be an individual person of this significance, the question of the 'almah perhaps rises in importance. The art. 'the' 'almah would be easiest explained if in some previous prophecy she had been already mentioned. But the assumption of such prophecies may not be held admissible. The passage Mic 5^{3} 'until the time that she (or, one) that travaileth hath brought forth' alludes to the prophecy of Isaiah. The authenticity of the passage has been doubted, though, of course, not everything which has been doubted is doubtful. If the passage belonged to Mic, it would show how the prophecy of Is was read perhaps 20 or 30 years after it was spoken. It was held to refer to the Messiah, and to be still awaiting fulfilment; and, what is of interest in regard to the way prophecy was interpreted in those days, Isaiah's apparent expectation of the nearness of the Messiah's birth (if 7^{16} be original) was not held of any importance so far as the general meaning of the prophecy was concerned. All these things hold good if the passage be younger than Mic, though we should not in that case have a contemporary, but a later interpretation of the prophecy of Isaiah.

It is uncertain whether the LXX interpreters found anything mysterious in the passage, for Gr. παρθένος, like Lat. virgo, was used generally for 'girl' or 'young woman' (Gn $24^{14.\,43}$). Possibly to evade the technical sense put on the word by the Christians, the three newer Gr. translators (Aq., Theod., and Symm.) adopt the term νεᾶνις, a change of which Irenæus takes notice and disapproves. There is some evidence that the idea that the Messiah would be born of a virgin was to some extent prevalent both in Palestine and Alexandria. The idea may have been suggested by the somewhat mysterious language of Is, or by the LXX version, or by both. In general, it was more the actual life of Christ that suggested to NT writers the application to Him of OT passages, than a prevalent method of interpreting the passages. They saw in His life the full religious meaning of the passages, and the question of their original sense or application did not occur to them. As Bleek long ago argued (Comm. on Ep. to Heb.), historical interpreters may have to distinguish between the things which NT writers affirm and corroborate by OT passages, and the proofs or corroborations which they adduce. The things they assert we take on their authority, but the kind of confirmations by which they support them, however valid they may have seemed to those to whom they were addressed, and however well they served as evidence then, may not seem of such importance now. We believe in the resurrection of Christ because it is testified to by eye-witnesses; St. Peter's interpretation of Ps 16 is at best only a corroboration of it. And in like manner we believe in the virgin birth because it is affirmed by one 'who had traced the course of all things accurately from the first' (Lk 1^{3}); the interpretation put on Is 7 (Mt $1^{22\text{f.}}$) occupies but the secondary place of a confirmation of it.

IMMORTALITY.—See ESCHATOLOGY.

IMNA (יִמְנָע).—An Asherite chief, 1 Ch 7^{35}. See GENEALOGY.

IMNAH (יִמְנָה).—1. The eldest son of Asher, Nu 26^{44} (AV Jimna), 1 Ch 7^{30}. 2. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, 2 Ch 31^{14}. See GENEALOGY.

IMNITES (הַיִּמְנָה).—Patronymic from Imnah (No. 1), Nu 26^{44} (AV Jimnites). See GENEALOGY.

IMPLEAD.—Ac 19^{38} 'The law is open, and there are deputies: let them implead one another,' i.e. 'accuse' as RV; Gr. ἐγκαλεῖν, to summon one to answer a charge, to bring a charge against; cf. Cotgrave, Fr. Dict. s.v. Emplaider, 'to sue, to bring an action against'; and Hakluyt, Voyages, i. 117, 'They shall not be bound to come before the justices aforesaid, except any of the same barons doe implead any man, or if any man be impleaded.' J. HASTINGS.

IMPORTABLE, in the sense of 'unendurable,' is used in Pr. Man, 'And thine angry threatening toward sinners is importable.' The Rhem. NT uses the word in Mt 23^{4} 'For they binde heavy burdens and importable, and put them upon men's shoulders.' Other examples are: Elyot, The Governour, i. 14, 'And all thoughe Hietro, Moses' father in lawe, counsailed hym to departe his importable labours, in continual jugementes, unto the wise men that were in his company, he nat withstandynge styll retayned the soveraintie by goddis commandement'; Becon, Works, i. 53, 'He alone shall tread down the wine-press, and take upon his back the great and importable burden of your sins all.' J. HASTINGS.

IMPORTUNITY occurs only in the Parable of the Loaves, Lk 11^{8} 'because of his importunity he will rise and give him as many as he needeth.' The word means radically 'difficulty of access' (from portus, a harbour); but the Lat. adj. means 'unsuitable,' 'troublesome,' 'rude'; and the subst. importunitas, 'unfitness,' 'insolence,' as Cic. De Sen. iii. 7, 'importunitas et inhumanitas omni ætate molesta est.' In the course of its history as an Eng. word 'importunity' has lost some of its force. Even when introduced by Tindale in 1526, it was scarcely strong enough to translate the Gr. ἀναίδεια [T, WH ἀναιδία] of Lk 11^{8}, since that word is literally 'shamelessness.' Christ spoke by contrast, not comparison; if shameless persistence can win a boon from one who is not a friend, surely we may offer prayer that is earnest enough to obtain our Father's blessings. J. HASTINGS.

IMPOTENT.—Impotent is 'without strength,' 'weak,' as the Geneva trⁿ of Gal 4^{9} 'how is it, that ye are tourned backwarde unto impotent and beggerly ceremonies?' (ἀσθενής, Wyc. 'feble,' Tind. and others 'weak'). The word is applied in AV to persons who are infirm of body: Bar 6^{28}, Ac 14^{8} (ἀδύνατος); Jn $5^{3.\,7}$ (ἀσθενεῖν, RV 'sick'); Ac 4^{9} (ἀσθενής). So Fuller, Holy Warre, i. 18, p. 28, 'In which compasse (i.e. in Palestine) in David's time were maintained thirteen hundred thousand men, besides women, children, and impotent persons'; and Holy State, ii. 19, p. 124, 'When Religion is at the stake, there must be no lookers on (except impotent people, who also help by their prayers), and every one is bound to lay his shoulders to the work.' Adams contrasts it with 'potent' in his Exposition of II Peter (on 1^{3} p. 26), 'But is there nothing that God cannot do? Yes, he cannot lie, he cannot die, he cannot deny himself. He is for potent, not for impotent works.' J. HASTINGS.

IMRAH (יִמְרָה).—An Asherite chief, 1 Ch 7^{36}. See GENEALOGY.

IMRI (אִמְרִי).—1. A Judahite, 1 Ch 9^{4}. 2. Father of Zaccur, who helped to build the wall, Neh 3^{2}. See GENEALOGY.

IN.—1. 'In' is sometimes used in AV where we should now use at, as Mt 11^{24} 'But I say unto you, That it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee'; but in 11^{22} 'But I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon at the day of judgment, than for you.' The Gr. is ἐν ἡμέρᾳ κρίσεως in both places, and RV has 'in the day of judgement' in both. This apparent looseness is due to two causes: (1) the wide range of meaning of the Heb. prep. בְּ, much of which was taken up in NT by ἐν; and (2) the greater freedom about 1611 and earlier in the use of the smaller Eng. prepositions. Shaks. has 'at the day of judgment' in Merry Wives, III. iii. 227, the only place in which that phrase occurs; but he says in Othello, I. ii. 93—

> 'How! the Duke in council
> In this time of the night;'

and Merch. of Venice, II. iv. 1—

> 'Nay, we will slink away in supper time.

So also To 2^{1} 'there was a good dinner prepared me, in the which I sat down to eat' (καὶ ἀνέπεσα τοῦ φαγεῖν, RV 'and I sat down to eat').

2. The Heb. בְּ being used for the agent and the instrument, and being often followed in this respect by the Gr. ἐν, it is not surprising to find the instrumental ἐν represented in Eng. by 'in' instead of 'by' or 'through.' So Gal 3^{19} 'it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator' (δι' ἀγγέλων ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου, RV 'through angels by the hand of a mediator'). It is difficult to decide in many places whether the ἐν is instrumental or (spiritually) local. RV often prefers 'in' to AV 'by.' Thus He $1^{1.2}$ 'God having of old time spoken unto the fathers in (AV 'by') the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in (AV 'by') his Son.' See the Heb. Grammars and Lexicons on בְּ, the Gr. NT Grammars and Lexicons on ἐν, and the commentaries on the various passages, as Sanday-Headlam on Ro 1^{19}, Lightfoot on Gal 1^{16} and Col $1^{4.16}$, Abbott on Eph 4^{17}; also Westcott in Expos. Times, iii. 396; and cf. 1 P 3^{18} Wyc. 'made dede in fleisch, but made quyk in spirit' (so Tind. 'was kylled as pertayninge to the fleshe; but was quyckened in the sprete,' AV 'by the Spirit,' RV 'in the spirit'). In 2 P $1^{1.2}$ Wyc., Tind., and Rhem. have 'in the righteousness,' and 'in the knowledge,' but Cran. and AV 'through,' Geneva 'by.' Aldis Wright refers to Gn 21^{18} where AV and RV have 'Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand,' under the influence of Heb. בְּ, though the meaning is 'take him by the hand,' and he quotes Shaks. Rich. III. IV. i. 2—

> 'Who meets us here? my niece Plantagenet,
> Led in the hand of her kind aunt of Gloucester.'

3. The Gr. prep. εἰς, which expresses movement and corresponds with mod. Eng. 'into' or 'unto,' is often translated 'in' (Clapperton in Preacher's Magazine, viii. 499, says 'one hundred and thirty-one times'). In that way some significant shades of meaning are lost, as in Ac 8^{16} 'they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus' (εἰς τὸ ὄνομα, RV 'into the name'; all other versions as AV); 1 Co 8^{6} 'God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him' (εἰς αὐτόν, AVm 'for him,' RV 'unto him'); Eph 4^{13} 'Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man' (εἰς τὴν ἑνότητα . . . εἰς ἄνδρα τέλειον, AVm 'into the unity,' RV 'unto the unity'). In mod. Eng. 'in' and 'into' are kept easily apart, 'into' being expressive of movement, 'in' of rest (though we still say 'fall in love,' 'come in question'). But in 1611 they were not so sharply distinguished. Thus Shaks. has (Merch. of Venice, V. i. 55)—

> 'How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank!
> Here we will sit, and let the sounds of music
> Creep in our ears';

Rich. III. I. ii. 261—

> 'But first I'll turn yon fellow in his grave';

and Sonnets 112—

> 'In so profound abysm I throw all care.'

And so at an earlier time Coverdale translates Is 52^{1} 'For from this tyme forth, there shal no uncircumcised ner uncleane person come in the.' On the other hand, but more rarely, 'into' was used for 'in,' as Lk 13^{21} Wyc. 'It is lijk to sourdough, that a womman took, and hidde it in to thre mesuris of mele, til al were sourid'; and Shaks. Tempest, I. ii. 361—

> 'Therefore wast thou
> Deservedly confined into this rock.'

It is not surprising therefore that we should find 'in' for 'into' frequently in AV, as Gn 43^{22} 'We cannot tell who put our money in our sacks' (so RV); 50^{26} 'he was put in a coffin' (so RV); Dt 24^{1} 'Then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand' (so RV); Neh 2^{12} 'What my God had put in my heart' (RV 'into'). Cf. Ps 73^{5}, Pr. Bk. 'They come in no misfortune like other folk'; 136^{13} Pr. Bk. 'Who divided the Red Sea in two parts.'

4. 'In' is occasionally found for 'on,' as in the familiar example, Mt 6^{10} 'Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven' (ὡς ἐν οὐρανῷ καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς, RV 'Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth'; 'in earth' is probably due to Vulg. 'in cælo, et in terra'; it is found in all the Eng. versions). So Gn 1^{22} 'let fowl multiply in the earth' (so RV); 6^{5} 'in the earth' (AV and RV), but 6^{6} 'on the earth' (AV and RV); Wis 10^{4} 'For whose cause the earth being drowned with the flood, wisdom again preserved it, and directed the course of the righteous in a piece of wood of small value' (δι' εὐτελοῦς ξύλου, Vulg. per contemptibile lignum, RV 'by a poor piece of wood,' Ball 'on a paltry plank': 'in' was probably used because the translator had the ark before his mind). Cf. Mt 5^{heading} 'The Sermon in the Mount'; Ac 13^{14} Wyc. (1388) 'and thei entriden in to the synagoge in the dai of sabatis' (Tind. 'on the saboth daye'); Shaks. Othello, I. iii. 74—

> 'What in your part can you say to this?'

and Milton, Lycidas, 185—

> 'Henceforth thou art the genius of the shore,
> In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
> To all that wander in that perilous flood.'

5. 'In' is used along with a verbal subst. to signify 'in process of,' 'while,' as Gn 35^{18} 'as her soul was in departing'; 2 Mac 4^{30} 'while those things were in doing'; Jn 2^{20} 'Forty and six years was this temple in building.' Cf. Joy, Apology to Tindale (Arber's ed. p. ix), 'he knew yat I was in correctynge it myselfe'; Knox, Hist. 107, 'While these things were in doing in Scotland.'

6. 'In that' = because, has now gone out of use. It occurs Gn 31^{20} 'And Jacob stole away unawares to Laban the Syrian, in that he told him not,' and other places. Cf. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, 'Some things they do in that they are men . . . some things in that they are men misled and blinded with error.'

Literature.

This term shortly expresses the fundamental fact of Christianity, as St. John describes it in his Gospel (1^{14}), ὁ Λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο. It signifies the act of condescension whereby the Son of God, Himself very God and of one substance with the Father, took to Himself human nature in order to accomplish its redemption and restoration. The NT insists upon the I. as a physical, historic fact (1 Jn 1^{3}), but points for its true explanation to the grace, or love, of God (Jn 3^{16}, 1 Jn 4$^{9.10}$). The expression of St. Paul, 'mystery of godliness' (1 Ti 3^{16}), implies, on the other hand, that the redemptive action of God is beyond our power completely to analyze or comprehend. Such being the general aspect of the fact, we find the most comprehensive statement of it in the prologue to St. John's Gospel (1$^{1-18}$). St. John begins by intimating a plurality of persons within the Godhead; he describes the functions of the Logos, the objective utterance or self-expression of Deity, in His relation to the created universe of which He is the author and sustainer, and to man, whose conscience and reason owe whatever illumination they possess to His presence and operation. St. John also teaches, as a further presupposition of his doctrine of the I., the occurrence of a fall, or process of aversion from God, whereby man became subject to the power of 'darkness' or moral evil. It was to recover man from his state of alienation, and to raise him into the life of divine sonship, that the Word was finally manifested in a human form. After being heralded by the witness of creation, and by the voice of Heb. prophecy which culminated in the testimony of the Baptist, the Word finally made His appearance within the pale of an elect people of God; His manifestation, however, had a twofold issue: the incarnate Word was rejected by the chosen nation to which, as touching His manhood (Ro 1^{3}), He belonged; on the other hand, to those individuals who welcomed Him and recognized His true nature and claim, He communicated a due measure of the fulness of 'grace and truth' which resided in Himself, imparting to them 'power to become children of God,' and unveiling to them the glory, i.e. the essential character and life, of the Most High. St. John in this passage strikes the keynote of many varied representations of the Incarnation. It was before all else a unique exhibition of divine grace; a supreme manifestation of divine truth. The NT writers dwell now on one, now on the other, of these two aspects of the fact. Thus the Son is spoken of as 'given' (Jn 3^{16}), or 'sent' (3$^{17.34}$, 1 Jn 4^{9}, Gal 4^{4}), by the Father; but it was not less true that He gave Himself (Eph 5^{25}, 1 Ti 2^{6}, Gal 2^{20}). That which displayed the grace of God the Father (Tit 2^{11}), 'the kindness and love of God our Saviour' towards man (ib. 3^{4}), is also to be regarded as exhibiting the grace of the Son (2 Co 8^{9} 13^{14}). The motive of the I. is, in short, the redemptive love of God. On the other hand, the I. was a signal manifestation of truth: a revelation of the divine character, supplementing and qualifying that which was revealed of God in nature, conscience, and history. St. John says expressly that 'No man hath seen God at any time; God only-begotten, which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him' (1^{18}, cf. 14^{9}).

Such, then, is the dominant point of view from which NT writers regard the I.: it is an act of unmerited grace—a movement of divine love towards fallen man for his restoration and re-creation; it is also a culminating moment in a progressive and continuous self-revelation of God (He 1$^{1.2}$); nor is there any hesitation in identifying this divine movement with the historic career of Jesus Christ. Historically, however, the recognition of His higher nature started from the acknowledgment of His Messiahship. He was first recognized as one whose advent had been foretold, and awaited with eager expectation, for a period of many centuries; as the promised seed of Abraham in whom all families of the earth were to be blessed (Gn 12^{3}). Jesus Christ did, in fact, claim to fulfil and satisfy the hopes and anticipations to which successive prophets had given utterance. In 'the fulness of time' (Gal 4^{4}) He appeared, to crown the hopes of the elect people from whom, as touching the flesh, He sprang. It is accordingly necessary to briefly summarize the testimony of OT to the fact of the Incarnation.

i. Witness of OT.—There are elements in the theological conceptions of OT which prepare the mind for the mystery of a divine I., e.g. the doctrine that man is made in God's image (Gn 1^{27}), and is capable of intercourse and union with God. Thus Ezk 1^{26} implies that man's bodily structure was essentially adapted to represent the form of Deity; and the revelation of God in nature (Ps 19^{1} etc.) would suggest the possibility of His self-manifestation under the form of human nature. Further, the so-called 'Theophanies' of OT—the manifestations of J″'s presence in a created 'angel'—point in the same direction. Again, the ascription by OT of various titles, functions, and relationships to the Godhead, served to prepare the Jewish mind for the Christian doctrine of a triune Deity, which is necessarily connected with that of the Incarnation. Further, the striking personification of the divine Wisdom which meets us in such passages as Pr 8$^{22\text{f.}}$ (cf. Wis 7$^{22\text{f.}}$ 8$^{1\text{f.}}$ 18$^{15\text{f.}}$) seems to anticipate St. John's doctrine of the creative Logos, or St. Paul's teaching in passages like Col 1$^{15-19}$. Of special importance, however, is the witness of prophecy, the 'Messianic hope' being at its root an anticipation of the union of divine and human attributes in a single personality. The main points of Messianic doctrine may be summarized as follows: In its earliest stages prophecy is vague and indeterminate. Starting with the promise recorded in Gn 3^{15}, it points to a victory of the woman's seed over the evil principle represented by the serpent, the 'seed' being afterwards more precisely described as 'the seed of Abraham,' in whom all the nations of the earth are to be blessed (Gn 12^{3} 18^{18} 22^{18} etc.). The tribe of Judah is indicated in Gn 49^{10} as the future depositary of sovereignty over the nations (cf. Nu 24^{17}). The passage Dt 18^{15} contributes a further element to the Messianic idea, viz. the notion of a prophetic mediator between God and His people, probably in a comparatively late literary form giving expression to the hopes and ideas which the career and work of Moses had suggested. For it is noticeable, in regard to the Messianic hope in its earlier stages, that the actual history of Isr. itself gives birth to Messianic conceptions, e.g. the Exodus from Egypt helped to give form and colour to the national expectations of future deliverance from foes and oppressors; the rise of prophecy and of the kingdom suggested the image of an ideal prophet and a righteous king. At any rate, it is in the early period of the kingdom that the Messianic hope takes a clear and definite shape.

(a) The oracle, 2 S 7^{5-16} (cf. Pss 2. 89. 132), points to a future descendant of David whose throne is to be everlasting, and who is to stand in a unique relation to God as His 'Son.' This title, solemnly transferred from the nation (Ex 4^{22}) to the king, implies that the 'Son of David' is to be henceforth regarded as the representative of the chosen nation. This oracle is specially important as determining the scope and future direction of Heb. prophecy. In the prophets and psalmists we find successive pictures of a monarch who is extolled either as a warrior victorious over Judah's foes (Ps 2), or as a royal bridegroom taking to himself the daughter of an alien people (Ps 45), or as a monarch reigning in righteousness and peace (Ps 72), and blessed with signal marks of divine favour, length of days and perpetual communion with God (Pss 21. 61). These predictions of an ideal ruler culminate during the crisis of the struggle with Assyria. Thus Am 9^{11-15} points to the revival of David's house as Judah's last remaining hope; Hos 1^{11} 3^{5} goes further, and foretells the appearance of a second David. Mic 5^{1-5} directs the thoughts of the faithful to Bethlehem, the original home of the Davidic family, and predicts its future greatness as the birthplace of the Messianic deliverer. Isaiah describes the Messiah's righteous rule, directed and inspired by the Spirit of J″ (11), and dwells on the glory and peace of the city which Messiah chooses as his metropolis (4. 32, cf. Zec $9^{9\text{f.}}$). Indeed it may be said that at this period (c. 750–700) the Davidic monarch becomes the central figure of prophecy; and Ro 1^{3} shows that the Davidic descent of Christ was ever regarded as an essential element in the Messianic claim (cf. Ac 2^{30}, 2 Ti 2^{8}), and our Lord Himself bears witness to the current belief that Christ was 'the son of David' in Mk 12^{35}.

(b) Closely connected, however, with this conception is another, viz. that of a personal advent of J″ to set up His throne in Zion, as the Judge and Saviour of His people. This thought indeed (Am 4^{12} etc., Is 2. 32, etc.) is not actually combined with the picture of a Davidic king; the figure of the son of David is nowhere identified with the self-manifesting J″. Both elements enter into the general current of Messianic thought, but they find fulfilment and mutual adjustment only in the person of Jesus Christ. In Ezk $34^{11.24}$ we find an instance of the juxtaposition of the two ideas. In this and in other instances it is evident that there were parallel streams of prediction which, owing to necessary limitations in the prophetic faculty, were not brought into combination.

(c) New elements were added to the Messianic picture by the prophets of the pre-Chald. and exilic period (700–538). The most impressive of these is the wonderful conception of the 'servant of J″,' the representative of the faithful remnant of God's chosen people, who by his vicarious sufferings makes atonement for their transgressions, and by his loyal fulfilment of the divine mission entrusted to him becomes the 'light of the Gentiles' and the missionary of the nations, so accomplishing in his own person the ideal functions of the chosen people (Is 40–66, passim). In the post-ex. period of prophecy the priestly and mediatorial work of the coming Messiah rises into prominence (Ps 110) together with his relation to humanity at large as 'the Branch' (Zec 3^{8} 6^{12}, cf. Jer 23^{5} and the phrase 'Son of Man,' Dn 7^{13}). At the same time is indicated his close relation to J″. He is called J″'s 'fellow' (Zec 13^{7}), His 'angel' (Mal 3^{1}), one in whom J″ Himself is pierced (Zec 12^{10}). Such expressions are to be compared with earlier passages which they elucidate or develope: e.g. the prophecy of Immanuel (Is 7^{14}), or of the king whose name 'shall be called J″ is our righteousness' (Jer $23^{5.6}$, cf. Is 9^{6}). The deepest and most permanent element pervading the varied imagery of the prophets is the thought of the advent of J″ Himself to judge, redeem, and govern His people, and to sanctify them by the bestowal of His Spirit (Ezk 36^{25-27} 37^{27}). The Redeemer who should come to Zion would be Himself divine (cf. Is 59^{16-20}).* See MESSIAH.

ii. NT account of Jesus Christ.—A. It was through experience of the Manhood and human life of Christ that men gradually arrived at the recognition of a higher nature, of which the lower was only a veil. Thus the preaching of the I. began with an appeal to facts and incidents open to ordinary observation; Jesus Christ was first known as 'a man' (Ac 2^{22}), and NT lays special stress on the verity and completeness of His manhood. The Gospels describe His birth (Mt $1^{18\text{ff.}}$, Lk $2^{6\text{ff.}}$), His growth 'in wisdom and stature' (Lk 2^{52}), His liability to the ordinary and innocent infirmities of human nature, e.g. hunger (Lk 4^{2}, Mk 11^{12}), weariness (Jn 4^{6}), thirst (Jn 4^{7} 19^{28}), pain and weakness (cf. He 5^{2}), death. His body was subject to ordinary conditions of nurture and development; it was the apt instrument of creaturely service and obedience to the will of God (He 10^{5-7}), and of self-sacrifice on behalf of His fellow-men (Mt 26^{28}). The soul of Christ was subject to human affections and emotions: compassion (Mt 9^{36}), love (Mk 10^{21}, Jn 11^{5}), grief (Jn 11^{35}, Lk 19^{41}), fear and anguish (Lk 22^{44}, cf. He 5^{7}), anger (Mk 3^{5}, Jn $2^{15\text{ff.}}$). He had a true human will (Jn 6^{38}, Mt 26^{39}), which, however, is described as ever subjecting itself to the guidance of the divine will. This subjection necessarily implied the possibility of temptation, and of painful effort of will (Mt 26^{38}, Lk 22^{42}), so that 'He learned obedience by the things which he suffered' (He 5^{8}). Finally, Jesus Christ possessed a human spirit (Lk 2^{40} 10^{21}, Jn 11^{33}, Mk 8^{12}), which was apparently the seat or sphere of His divine personality (Ro 1^{4}), and which in the hour of death He commended into the hands of God (Lk 23^{46}). After death this human spirit of Christ, divinely 'quickened' (1 P 3^{18}), is found to have preached the gospel to certain of the departed (ib. 4^{6}).

Thus the humanity of Jesus Christ was real and complete. He was made like His brethren in all things (cf. He 2^{17}); 'in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin' (ib. 4^{15}). On the other hand, there is nothing in Scripture to support the idea that Christ's humanity was docetic or unreal, or that He failed to undergo a real human experience. In all the main conditions of human life He was on a level with His fellow-men; a partaker of flesh and blood (ib. 2^{14}); submitting to a life of hard toil, poverty, suffering, moral conflict with keen and varied temptation, alternations of success and failure, honour and dishonour, favour and disrepute. Specially noteworthy is the fact that Christ's life was one of continual prayer (Mt 14^{23}, Mk 1^{35}, Lk 3^{21} 5^{16} 9^{29} 22^{41}, Jn 11^{41} etc.). It is in virtue of a general similarity of conditions that Christ is described as the 'captain of faith' (He 12^{2}), i.e. He exhibited those very virtues which are appropriate to man's creaturely condition: trust, reverence, submission, faith, obedience. For the same reason He is pointed to as the true pattern of manhood (Jn 13^{15}, 1 Jn 2^{6}, 1 P 2^{21}). He is the great exemplar of humanity, because the circumstances of His life and probation were, speaking broadly, similar to those of ordinary men. He was found in outward guise or fashion as a man (Ph 2^{7}); on a level with other men 'in all points' that can fall under human observation, 'yet without sin' (He 4^{15}, 2 Co 5^{21}, 1 Jn 3^{5}).

* The Messianic beliefs of the period between 165 and our Lord's birth do not come within the scope of this article. A brief survey of them will be found in Loofs, Dogmengeschichte, § 7. See also Schürer, HJP § 29; Drummond, The Jewish Messiah; Stanton, The Jewish and the Christian Messiah.

This brings us to two points in which, according to NT, Jesus Christ was different from other men: (a) He was supernaturally born, (b) He was without sin.

(a) The birth of Christ is described by Mt and Lk. They tell us that He was conceived by the Holy Spirit (see p. 405^{b}), without the intervention of a human father (Mt 1^{20}, Lk $1^{32.33}$). By the operation of the 'creator Spirit' the 'Word was made flesh.' It is to be observed that this account of the birth is not contradicted, but rather suggested, by the teaching of other NT writers. Thus St. John speaks of Christ as ὁ ἄνωθεν ἐρχόμενος (Jn 3^{31}), and St. Paul calls Him 'the second man from heaven' (1 Co 15^{47}), a phrase which evidently describes the origin of the second Adam in contrast to that of the first. Further, as has been already observed, NT speaks of Christ as sinless, holy, sanctified by God (Jn 10^{36}); 'knowing no sin' (2 Co 5^{21}); 'holy, harmless, undefiled, and separated from sinners' (He 7^{26}); 'a lamb without spot and blemish' (1 P 1^{19}); 'the righteous one' (1 Jn 2^{1}, cf. Ac 3^{14} 22^{14}). True, He appeared 'in the likeness of the flesh of sin' (Ro 8^{3}, cf. Ph 2^{7}), i.e. He took the very flesh which had been the instrument of human sin, but in assuming it He purified it from the sinful taint:[*] His flesh was, in fact, 'like' ours, inasmuch as it was flesh; but it was only 'like,' for it was also sinless. Christ, then, was without sin, and NT suggests a close connexion between His sinlessness and His miraculous birth by constantly representing Christ as the Head or First Principle of a new race (ἀρχή, Col 1^{18}), 'the firstborn among many brethren' (Ro 8^{29}), the 'second Adam' (Ro 5^{14}, 1 Co 15^{45}), the 'new man' (Eph 2^{15}). Thus the tradition of the Church which first meets us in Mt and Lk is corroborated to some extent by antecedent considerations. If NT writers are correct in representing Jesus Christ as a new moral creation, it might be asked whether this new creation can have involved anything short of a new mode of generation. 'Must not the physical generation of the second Adam have been such as to involve at once His community with our nature and His exemption from it?'[†] If, in fact, Jesus Christ was what NT writers believed Him to be, a pre-existent being, the narrative of the virginal birth would have antecedent credibility. 'The chief ground,' says Prof. Stanton, 'on which thoughtful Christian believers are ready to accept it [the miraculous birth] is that, believing in the personal indissoluble union between God and man in Jesus Christ, the miraculous birth of Jesus seems to them the only fitting accompaniment of this union, and so to speak the natural expression of it in the order of outward facts.'[‡] If it be rejoined that the 'fact of its necessity from a doctrinal point of view would tend to the formation of a legend,' it may with equal justice be urged that the evangelists' account of the birth testifies to the early prevalence of the belief in the Divinity of Christ. The ultimate reason, in fact, for belief in this, as in all the other miraculous occurrences recorded in the Gospel, is faith in the higher nature of Jesus Christ. What Augustine says of the Gospel miracles strictly applies to the supernatural birth of Christ: Mirum non esse debet a Deo factum miraculum . . . Magis gaudere et admirari debemus quia Dominus noster et salvator Jesus Christus homo factus est, quam quod divina inter homines fecit.[*] The accounts of miracles, it must be remembered, were written for those who were already Christians, i.e. who already believed in Christ as a superhuman person. The Gospels were not primarily intended to create such a belief; they rather presuppose it.

(b) The sinlessness of Christ appears at first sight to conflict with the possibility of His being tempted. We have, however, already noticed that NT describes Christ as liable to temptation (Mt 4, Lk 4, esp. He 4^{15}, Lk 22^{28}); but it never allows us to suppose that He suffered from any disordered affections, any inward propensity to sin. He had no illicit desires, no discord between the flesh and the spirit;[†] sin could have no enticing or illusive power in His case (Ja 1^{14}); He had no affinity for sin, no experimental knowledge of it (1 Jn 3^{5}, 2 Co 5^{21}). On the other hand, He possessed in their perfection and integrity all those human faculties and senses to which moral temptation appeals,—all necessary and innocent affections and instincts to which some things appear naturally desirable, others naturally repugnant. Accordingly, He was capable of being tempted: for 'if the highest virtue does not exclude that instinct inseparable from humanity, to which pain is an object of dread, and pleasure of desire, which prefers ease and quiet to tumult and vexation, the regard and esteem of others to their scorn and aversion; to which ill-requited toil or experienced unkindness are sources of corroding anguish and depression: then every conjuncture which presents but one of these objects of dread as the concomitant of doing God's will, or associates one of their desirable opposites with neglect or disobedience,—every such conjuncture must produce a conflict between duty and these necessary instincts of humanity sufficient to constitute temptation in the strictest sense.'[‡] Christ, then, could be really tempted; He felt the pressure of moral evil; He experienced the pain of resistance to it, and He endured, He remained stedfast even under the full weight of manifold difficulties. There is nothing in the Gospels to warrant the idea suggested by John Damascene that 'He repelled the assaults of the enemy like smoke.' They rather suggest that the strength conferred on His human nature by the Divine Spirit was 'infallibly sufficient, but not more than sufficient, to sustain Him in His conflict, and bear Him through the fearful strife.'[§] He verily 'suffered being tempted'; He was made morally 'perfect through sufferings' (He $2^{10.18}$ 5^{9}). In the power of the Divine Spirit (Lk $4^{1.14}$, Mk 1^{12}) He was enabled to prevail over the tempter, but it was by a process of moral struggle ending in victory; indeed the writer of Rev seems to summarily describe the human life of Christ as a continuous victory over evil (Rev 5^{5} 6^{2} 19^{11}, cf. Jn 16^{33}).

With the above significant exception NT depicts Jesus Christ as one who shared in all points the nature of man. He was (to use a later theological term) 'consubstantial' with men. Accordingly, the general conditions of His human life enable Him to be the perfect pattern of human goodness (see below, p. 466^{a}). And indeed there are facts recorded in the Gospels which plainly indicate that Christ underwent a real human development, moral and mental, and that He was even subject to some necessary human limitations in respect of knowledge. At this point it is necessary to touch on these points only so far as they concern the perfection of Christ's humanity. Morally, then, Christ is said to have developed; He grew in wisdom (Lk 2^{52}); He was 'made perfect'; 'He learned obedience by the things which he suffered' (He 2^{10} 5^{8}). There were some qualifications necessary for the discharge of His high-priestly functions which He acquired through the moral discipline of actual human experience, esp. the graces of sympathy (He 2^{17} 4^{15} 5^{2}), patience, faith (cf. Westcott on He 12^{2}). He was perfected in the sense that He was progressively educated by His human experience; He became a consummate 'leader of salvation' (He 2^{10}), a perfect high priest (ib. vii. 28). Further, Christ is represented as subject, at least in some degree, to ordinary laws of mental growth and development. 'He advanced (προέκοπτεν) in wisdom' as well as in stature (Lk 2^{52}). Occasions are mentioned on which He expresses surprise (Mt 8^{10}, Mk 6^{6}); and He also appears at times to desire information as to matters of fact (Mk 9^{21}, Jn 11^{34}, cf. Mt 21^{19}, Mk 11^{13}). Finally, in regard to one special point He professes ignorance (Mk 13^{32}). From these phenomena it may be inferred that Christ's human faculties, supernaturally exalted and illuminated though they were by the operation of the Holy Spirit, were yet subject to limitation; and so far the impression produced by the records, that Christ lived as very man among men, is further strengthened. The Synop. Gospels especially portray a real human life and character; they present to faith as its immediate object the figure of a true man, 'the man Christ Jesus' (1 Ti 2^{5}, cf. Jn 8^{40}).

B. Besides giving ample evidence of their belief in the real manhood of the historical person Jesus Christ, NT writers endeavour in different ways to express their sense of something transcendent and superhuman in His personality. There is no question, it may be observed, in regard to the actual belief of the apostles themselves, which may be gathered from their Epistles. The importance of the Gospels is that they describe the way in which this belief was arrived at. Speaking broadly, the apostles believed that in the historical Christ a pre-existent being had manifested Himself,* a being to whom belonged the dignity of a unique divine sonship. This common belief is by no means equally prominent in all the apostolic Epistles; but it is always latent, and even where not expressed it is usually implied in the attributes or functions ascribed to Christ. This belief, then, was slowly and hesitatingly reached by successive steps which can be traced with some clearness in the Gospel narrative. The Gospels record those utterances of Christ which suggested the idea of His higher nature. He Himself proposed the question to His disciples, 'Whom say men that I, the Son of Man, am?' (Mt 16^{13}); He Himself ascribed to His own person a particular significance (e.g. Mt 10^{37}); He pointed men to Himself, and the Gospels record the effect on His hearers of Christ's utterances. They describe the moral authority of His teaching (Mt 7^{29}, Mk 1^{27}, Lk 4^{32}), the impression produced by His personality, the claim He put forward to forgive sins (Mt 9^{2-6}, Lk 5^{20-24}), to judge men according to their personal relation to Himself (Mt 7^{23}), to revise, expand, interpret the Mosaic Law (Mt $5^{21ff.}$ 12^{3} 19^{4}), to be the giver of rest to the burdened soul (Mt 11^{28}), to be an object of devotion to the heart of man superseding all other interests (Mt 10^{37}, Lk 14^{26}). There can be no serious doubt, moreover, that Christ claimed to be the Messiah. In calling Himself 'the Son of Man' He adopted a title which indisputably involved Messianic pretensions. Further, He claimed to stand in a unique relation to God; although He very rarely applies to Himself the title 'Son of God,' He never disclaims it; on occasions of exceptional urgency He refuses to disown it (Mt 16^{16} 26^{63}); indeed, He habitually speaks of God as 'my Father' (Mt 23 times), and He attributes to Himself powers and prerogatives which imply coequality with God. He exercises sovereign authority over souls, claiming them as His own, and putting forward that jealous, exclusive claim which can rightfully belong only to the Creator Himself (Mt $10^{37.40}$, Lk 10^{16}, Mt 24^{35} 13^{41}, Lk 21^{33}). He promises to bestow the Holy Spirit (Mt 10^{19}, Lk 12^{12}, cf. 21^{15}); He speaks of Himself as having given a commission to the ancient prophets of Israel (Mt 23^{34}, cf. Lk 11^{49}). Finally, in one solemn passage common to Mt and Lk, He claims an exclusive knowledge of the Father (Mt 11^{27}, Lk 10^{22}), and an exclusive power of manifesting Him. On the other hand, the negative consideration is important, that although Christ is the preacher of humility, repentance, conversion, and the vehement rebuker of Pharisaic self-righteousness, He never betrays any consciousness of guilt, such as OT prophets frequently exhibit, nor any sense of a personal need of reconciliation with God.

But the Gospels do not merely preserve characteristic utterances of Christ, they describe the process of apostolic belief in Him. We can trace more or less distinctly the successive stages through which the faith of the apostles advanced to the point of acknowledging the higher, or pre-existent personality of Christ. The Fourth Gospel seems, indeed, to serve, among other purposes, that of depicting the development of faith. To sum up briefly the gist of the evangelic testimony: it would seem that the apostles discerned in Jesus Christ first a Teacher or Rabbi sent from God, then successively the expected Messiah, the Holy One, the Lord of nature, the searcher of hearts, the revealer of God, the supreme example of suffering love, the conqueror of death, the Son of God. Faith, finally, bows before Him as 'Lord and God' (Jn 20^{28}). This point is arrived at only after a long and heart-searching discipline of suspense and hesitation; but it unquestionably represents the final answer of the apostles to a question which was morally inevitable, and which, as a matter of fact, had been repeatedly and openly raised,—the question 'who is this?' (Mt 21^{10}, Lk 5^{21} 7^{49} 9^{9}; cf. Mt 8^{27}, Mk 4^{41}, Lk 8^{25}). The ultimate answer seems to have been based on a number of convergent considerations: on the effect of Christ's personality, and the 'self-evidencing' power of His appeal to heart and conscience, on the superhuman claims which His teaching disclosed, and on the symbolic acts of power by which He at once illustrated and authenticated His teaching. For much of the evidential importance of the Gospel miracles depends on their moral character. They are in keeping with all that Christ reveals of God's nature and attributes. They are exactly such phenomena as we should expect in a universe in which physical forces are subordinated to righteous law and a purpose of grace. They reveal power, but the power is that of righteous will; and they are symbolic of the redemptive action of God which the doctrine of Christ proclaims. But what finally crowned and justified the faith of the apostles was the actual resurrection of Jesus Christ from death. Their testimony is concentrated on this fact, the real occurrence of which alone explains their spiritual transformation and the stedfastness of their belief in face of hostile opinion. The apostles seem to have recognized, some more quickly than others, but all sooner or later, that the resurrection was in fact inevitable, Christ being what He claimed to be. It afforded a key to the entire life; it was the ground of a final assurance that under the veil of mortal flesh the eternal Son of God Himself had 'tabernacled' among men (Jn 1^{14}). It was the supreme revelation to the apostles of the glory of the Divine Word, who, as man, had lived and conversed with them on earth. It was the starting-point of a new and higher life, and of a more exalted faith. The resurrection followed by the ascension 'declared,' determined, or proved Jesus Christ (Ro 1^{4}) to be, not merely the promised Messiah and 'the Lord' to whom all power was given in heaven and earth (Mt 28^{18}), but a heavenly being who had been manifested in a human form, and had returned into the divine glory whence He originally came. Thenceforth Jesus Christ became an object of worship, and the gospel of redemption preached by the apostles had His person for its central theme (Ac 28^{31}).

* Notice the use of the vb. φανεροῦσθαι in relation to the Incarnation, e.g. 1 Ti 3^{16}, 1 P 1^{20}, 1 Jn $3^{5.8}$.

Such, then, seems to have been the conception of Christ to which the apostles were led by their long intercourse with Him. When, however, we turn to the apostolic teaching in regard to Christ's higher nature, we cannot fail to recognize a striking diversity of treatment. All the writers are at one in their general conception of the I. as a supreme self-manifestation of God; but we seem to trace, not only a certain advance in clearness of perception, corresponding to differences of phraseology (e.g. contrast the OT Messianic title παῖς in Ac 4^{27} with λόγος in St. John's Gospel), but to a certain extent distinct aspects of Christ's person.* These must be recognized even though they form no sufficient basis for the idea of radically different and mutually exclusive types of NT Christology—'adoptianist,' 'pneumatic,' etc. Thus (1) the simple objective view of Christ as fulfilling in His person and life the OT Messianic expectations is characteristic of St. James and St. Peter; (2) the earlier Epistles of St. Paul estimate Christ's person from the side of anthropology: man's yearning for reconciliation and union with God finds its satisfaction in Christ; (3) a more transcendental treatment of Christ's person marks the later Pauline and Johannine writings; they deal with cosmological and mystical aspects of the Incarnation. And it must be remembered that 'between the clear-sighted apostle of the Gentiles and the straitest of [Jewish or Ebionite] zealots there lay every conceivable gradation of intermediate positions.'† But the apostles themselves seem to have a fundamental bond of union in their belief about Christ as one who may be worshipped,‡ and whose name may be co-ordinated with that of God. It cannot be shown that St. Paul taught anything about Christ that was not implied in the belief of his fellow-apostles; but we must remember that 'what to them was the result of their belief in Christ, was to him the starting-point from which logical conclusions were seen to follow, practical applications made, in every direction.'

What, then, was the earliest conception of Christ's higher nature current in the Church? We turn to Ac, and find that the earliest preaching of Christ is naturally conditioned by conceptions of God already current among those to whom the gospel message was proclaimed. St. Peter is a Jew speaking to Jews, to whom any unqualified declaration of Christ's Deity or pre-existence would have appeared perplexing, and even blasphemous. We notice in his preaching an avoidance of the phrase υἱὸς θεοῦ (contrast Mt 16^{16}); his starting-point is the well-known historical figure, the facts of whose life, ministry, and recent passion were notorious in Jerus. (Ac 2^{22} 3^{13} 4^{10} 5^{30} 10$^{37f.}$). St. Peter dwells repeatedly on the exaltation of One who had been known as man. This man, 'approved of God' (2^{22}), bearing all the marks of God's commissioned 'servant' (παῖς, 3^{13}, cf. Is 52^{13}), manifesting clear tokens of divine unction, was 'made' by God 'both Lord and Christ' (2^{36}). The main points in St. Peter's preaching which would naturally strike a Jewish audience would be (1) his references to the fulfilment of Messianic prophecy in Christ (2$^{23f.}$ 3^{22} 4^{11}), for we must remember that to Jewish ears the very title 'Messiah' would imply a superhuman being; (2) his insistence on the resurrection as at once the seal of Christ's divine unction and mission (2^{32} 3^{15} 4^{10} 5^{31}, cf. 13^{30}), and a decisive manifestation of the glory of His person. The resurrection had proclaimed Him 'prince of life' (3^{15}), source of spiritual blessing and power (3^{26}), 'prince and saviour' (5^{31}), 'judge of quick and dead' (10^{42}). Speaking generally, the same point of view is characteristic of St. Peter's 1st Epistle. He regards Christ as the exalted man, enthroned at God's right hand, and bestowing the gift of the regenerating Spirit (1 P 1^{23}). Christ is One whose human acts and sufferings have preternatural virtue; who is destined to judge mankind (4^{5}); who is the author of Messianic salvation, 'both in its negative aspect as a rescuing from the wrath under which the whole world is lying, and in its positive aspect as the imparting of eternal life.* On the other hand, it is doubtful whether the two passages 1^{11} and ^{20} necessarily imply the doctrine of Christ's pre-existence.† With St. Peter we may couple St. James and St. Jude, each of whom calls himself 'slave of Christ.' St. James even speaks of Christ as 'Lord of glory' (2^{1}), and looks for His appearance in judgment (5$^{8.\,9}$); he also uses language (1$^{18.\,21}$) implying that in Christ is revealed a principle of supernatural power which the law was unable to bestow (cf. Ro 8^{3}).

On the whole, it may be taken for granted that St. Peter's sermons in Ac, together with his 1st Ep. and the Epp. of St. James and St. Jude, present us with the general conception of Christ current in the earliest apostolic age. By the first Christians Christ was regarded as the promised Messias, whose mission had been sealed by His resurrection and exaltation, and in whom the Jewish expectations concerning the 'kingdom of God,' and anticipations of future 'salvation,' were spiritually fulfilled. There can be little doubt that both these ideas ('the kingdom' and 'salvation') were coloured by Jewish preconceptions. There was, for instance, a widespread expectation of the speedy second coming of Christ—an idea which seems, indeed, to have been shared by the apostles themselves. But, at any rate, the conception of Christ just indicated formed the starting-point, so to speak, for the deeper conceptions of St. Paul, the writer of He, and St. John. In proceeding to gather up the main christological theses of the apostolic teaching regarded as a whole, we are for the most part, but not exclusively, dependent on these last-mentioned writers.

† See Harnack, Dogmengeschichte, vol. i. appendix i. Harnack believes in regard to 1 P 1$^{18f.}$ that the writer holds to the old Jewish conception of 'pre-existence,' i.e. predestination in the counsels of God. Christ 'was manifested in these last days for our sake, that is, He is now visibly what He already was before God. What is meant here is not an incarnation, but a revelation' [Eng. tr. vol. i. p. 322]. The passage 1$^{11f.}$ may refer to the prophets either of the old or of the new dispensation, but according to the usual interpretation the OT prophets are meant.

The following points appear to be of main importance: (1) The conception of Christ's Lordship. The name κύριος meets us in St. Peter's sermons, in Ja and Jude, in Jn and Rev, and in St. Paul's Epistles, passim. The word does not necessarily imply Divinity,* but in NT it meets us in contexts and connexions which, taken together, involve the ascription of Deity to Christ. The 'Lordship' of Christ means His 'sovereignty' in the sphere of nature and in that of grace. To Christ belongs a lordship which He has merited by His life of creaturely service and obedience (Ro 10^{9}, 1 Co 12^{3}, 2 Co 4^{5}). He is supreme over the universe and over His Church (Col 1^{16-18}, Ph $2^{10f.}$). Christians belong to Him (Ro 14^{8}, 1 Co 3^{23}); they are 'under law to Christ' (1 Co 9^{21}, Gal 6^{2}). He is the fountainhead of all grace, authority, disciplinary and ministerial power (1 Co 5^{4}, 2 Co 10^{8} 13^{10}). He is to be awaited as judge (2 Co 5^{10}). St. Paul applies to Christ OT Jahweh passages (e.g. Ro 10^{13}=Jl 2^{32}; cf. Ro 10^{11-13}, 1 Co 2^{16} 10^{22}); he ascribes to Him the absolute title ὁ κύριος (1 Co 16^{23}, 2 Co 1^{14} 11^{31} 12^{8}, Ro 14^{14}), and in one passage, which is of the nature of a climax, he uses an even stronger expression, 'God over all blessed for evermore' (Ro 9^{5}).†

(2) Parallel to the idea of lordship is that of Sonship. Christ is υἱὸς θεοῦ—a recognized title of Messiah, which, like κύριος, is often illustrated by its context; often by other characteristic NT phrases with which it is closely associated. The 'Sonship' of Christ is spoken of as unique (ὁ ἴδιος υἱός, Ro 8^{32}; ὁ ἑαυτοῦ υἱός, ib. 8^{3}; μονογενής, Jn 1^{18}, 1 Jn 4^{9}), i.e. it is not ascribed to Christ merely as a Messianic title, but as connoting a personal relationship to God. The phrase is used in contexts which imply a literal pre-existence; the Son of God is 'sent' (Ro 8^{3}, Gal 4^{4}, 1 Jn $4^{9.\,14}$); He 'comes' (1 Jn 4^{2} 5^{6} 5^{20}); He was originally an inhabitant of heaven (1 Co 15^{47}); the I. was a change of state in the life of a pre-existent being, of the Word Himself (Jn 1^{18}), of One who is essentially 'spirit' (2 Co 3^{17}).‡ The 'Sonship' of Christ is thus defined, and acquires a new significance. It is not merely 'ethical,' i.e. such as any man may acquire by moral affinity to God; nor merely theocratic; it denotes a special, unique, incommunicable relationship (Jn 10^{36-38}). Hence, especially in St. Paul's earlier Epistles (Th, Ro, Co, Gal), a position is habitually assigned to Christ which inevitably implies His real Deity. He is co-ordinated with God in greetings and farewells (e.g. 2 Th 1^{2}, 2 Co 13^{14}). He is the source of St. Paul's apostolate (Gal 1^{1}); the agent or mediator in creation (1 Co 8^{6}) and in redemptive history (1 Co 10^{4}). The I. was, in fact, an act of self-abnegation whereby a life of creaturely limitations was accepted in exchange for the glories of heaven (2 Co 8^{9}, Gal 4^{4}).

In two passages of later Epp. these christological thoughts are more fully developed. In Ph 2^{5-11} St. Paul deals with the method of man's redemption. Christ is set forth as the example of one who foregoes prerogatives that might be claimed, and renounces for a season a state of divine glory, bliss, and sovereignty which was His by natural right. The passage exhibits specially the original divine dignity, the unity, and the continuous action of the person who passed voluntarily from a state of heavenly bliss to a condition of creaturely servitude and suffering. This process St. Paul speaks of as one of self-emptying (ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν, 5^{7}); it was an action by which a being, possessing the attributes of Deity itself, took upon Himself conditions non-natural to Deity, while continuing in a real sense to be what He was before. The reward of His self-sacrificing 'obedience' (5^{8}; cf. Ro 5^{19}) was exaltation according to an essential law of divine action. In the human nature which He vouchsafed to assume, He was raised to the throne of divine lordship as the object of universal worship. In Col 1^{15-20} St. Paul deals with the cosmic significance of the I. of the Son. As the 'image of the invisible God,' He occupies a position of unique pre-eminence and sovereignty, both over the physical universe and over the new or moral creation, the Church of redeemed humanity. He is the essential mediator in nature, the 'firstborn of all creation,' i.e. prior to creation, and sovereign over it; in relation to history He is the inheritor of the Messianic promises (Ps 89); in relation to the Church He is the essential mediator in the sphere of grace, the firstborn from the dead, the fountainhead and principle of a new supernatural life. In this majestic statement St. Paul seems to unfold a conception essentially identical with that of the prologue to St. John's Gospel.

(3) In Christ God reveals Himself; in Him man is able to discern the character and nature of 'the invisible God' (Col 1^{15}). The word εἰκών in the passage here quoted is found in an earlier Epistle (2 Co 4^{4}). It may be compared both with the Johannine phrase Λόγος, and with the expression in He 1^{3} χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως. The 'Image' of God is at once the adequate expression and the essential revealer of Deity (cf. Jn 1^{18} 6^{40} 12^{45} 17^{3}, Gal 1^{16}, He 1^{2}, and consider Mt 11^{27}=Lk 10^{22}). In Him the divine Fatherhood is manifested, not as a mere creative relationship in which God stands to mankind, but as an internal and ultimate mystery of the Godhead (Ro 8^{15}, Eph 4^{6}, Jn $14^{6.\,9}$ 16^{27}); in Christ the love of God (1 Jn 4^{9}) and His holiness (Jn 17^{11}, Rev 4^{8} 16^{5}) are alike revealed. But beyond this, the inner mystery of the divine nature is in part unfolded. An essential Fatherhood, an essential Sonship, eternal and intemporal, subsists within the sphere of Deity: a necessary relationship of communion and dependence between two divine Persons (Jn 1^{1-4}). St. Paul seems to recognize the perfect equality of these divine Persons, especially in such a phrase as that of Ph 2^{6} (ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων); while in 1 Co 15^{24-28} he teaches the fundamental relation of dependence in which the Son stands to the Father. Thus the revelation of God 'in a Son' (He 1^{2}) is the manifestation of the divine 'glory' in a twofold sense; the Son manifests at once the moral perfections of the Godhead, and the internal distinctions of Person subsisting within the divine essence. In Him the whole fulness of Deity has its permanent abode (Col 1^{19}); to faith it can be manifested (2 Co 4^{6}); by human souls it can be apprehended as a source of life-giving grace (Jn 1^{16}).

(4) All the apostles agree in attributing a unique significance to the work and death of Christ. In Him the divine purpose of 'salvation' was realized: deliverance from wrath, and the imparting of eternal life (1 Th $5^{9.\,10}$).* Jesus Christ stands in relation to human sin not merely as judge, but as 'saviour' and deliverer (1 Th 1^{10}, Ph 3^{20} etc.). He gives Himself a ransom (λύτρον, 1 Ti 2^{6}; cf. Mt 20^{28}, Jn $11^{51.\,52}$ etc.); He dies 'for our sins' (1 Co 15^{3}; cf. Mt 26^{28}, 1 P 2^{24} 3^{18}), thus inaugurating a new covenant, the distinctive features of which are remission of sins (1 Co 11^{25}), a new right of access to God (He 7^{19} etc., Eph 2^{13-18}), life and immortality (Ro 2^{7}, 1 Co 15^{42}), the gift of the Holy Spirit (Gal 3^{2}, Eph 1^{13}, He 6^{4}; cf. Ac 2^{38}, 1 Jn 3^{24}). The effects of the redemptive work are described under several different aspects. In Ro and Gal St. Paul connects his doctrine of justification with the Person of Christ. He is the justifier of humanity; through faith in Him the merits of His death are appropriated by men (Ro $3^{25f.}$), and they are brought into a new relation to God, they are treated as righteous (δικαιούμενοι, Ro 3^{24}), 'accepted in the Beloved' (Eph 1^{6}). The shedding of His blood was, in fact, a sacrifice which had propitiatory value (Ro $3^{25f.}$). It was parallel to, while it transcended, the sacrifices of the Levitical law; they were material in quality, often repeated, ineffective in result; Christ's sacrifice was spiritual, and therefore real; one only because perfect in moral quality, effectual for the entire removal of sin (He 10^{1-18}). Under another aspect Christ is the High Priest of humanity (He 4^{14}): its perfect representative and adequate intercessor before God; quick to sympathize and powerful to save (ib. 4^{15} 5^{2} 7^{25}). He appears in the innermost sanctuary of the true tabernacle, there to present Himself in the presence of God on man's behalf (He 7^{25} $9^{23f.}$). Once again, Christ is the second Adam, the Head of a new race (Ro $5^{12f.}$, 1 Co $15^{45ff.}$). His influence on humanity is parallel to that of the first Adam in the extensiveness of its range, but transcendent in the beneficence and power of its effects (Ro 5^{15-21}). The result of Adam's sin was death; the mediatorial work of Christ has its issue in the triumphant reign of grace in 'eternal life' (Ro 5^{21} 6^{23}; cf. Jn $3^{15.\,16.\,36}$ 5^{24} $6^{40.\,47}$ 20^{31}).

In Eph, one very prominent thought is that of the extension of the life of the incarnate Redeemer, risen and glorified, in the Church. The Church is His body, the complement or fulness of His being (Eph 1^{23}); Christ is her Head, infusing into her the grace and virtue of His humanity (Eph 1^{22} 4^{11} 5^{23}); present in the manifold operations of His Spirit; uniting His people in fellowship with Himself. St. Peter teaches characteristically that the Church is the true people of God, inheriting by right of spiritual descent the titles of ancient Isr. (1 P 2^{9}; cf. Gal 4^{26}, He 12^{22}); while St. John dwells on the mystery of fellowship with God attained in Christ (1 Jn 1^{3}), and on the grace of sonship vouchsafed to individual believers (Jn 1^{12}). In a word, the work and passion of Christ are regarded by the apostles as the source of all spiritual blessing; as the means of bringing all Messianic promises to accomplishment.

(5) It remains to notice that all the apostolic writers seem to presuppose an authoritative tradition as to the historic events of Christ's career, and a general acceptance in the Church of His Messianic claim. In his sermons (Ac 2, etc.) St. Peter appeals, as we have seen, to the known facts of the Passion and Resurrection; while St. Paul, in spite of the fact that his starting-point is that of one who had not known Christ after the flesh, but was called to believe in a glorified Saviour, alludes in various passages to recognized incidents of Christ's human life (see Ro 1^{3} 8^{3}, Gal 4^{4}, 2 Co 8^{9} 5^{21}, 1 Co 15^{3}, Ph $2^{5f.}$, and other passages). There was, in short, an apostolic 'tradition' (παράδοσις) or 'traditions' which formed the common groundwork of teaching (cf. Ro 6^{17}, 1 Co 11^{2}, 2 Th 2^{15} 3^{6}). The Messianic conception of Christ's person specially distinguishes St. Peter's sermons in Ac, but it is by no means absent from the earlier thought of St. Paul,* and in St. John's teaching occupies a prominent place. In Rev, for instance, the image of Christ is Messianic. He is described in terms suggestive of His human descent from the chosen people (Rev 5^{5} 11^{15} 12^{10} 22^{16}); and His kingly dominion is Messianically conceived as a victorious conflict with enemies (6^{2} 12^{5} 19^{11-16}), though His lordship and royalty are the fruit of humiliation (see especially 5^{6}; cf. Jn $1^{29.\,36}$). There is also a strong Messianic element in the Gospel of Jn, e.g. the titles 'Lamb of God,' 'Son of God,' 'King of Israel,' 'He that should come' (6^{14}), 'sent' (9^{7}), etc.*

Such are the leading points of view under which the apostles describe the higher nature of our Lord. Taken together they combine the various lines of Messianic prediction in a single conception, that of the God-man. Jesus the Messiah of prophecy is the central object of their thought and devotion. Nothing more significantly illustrates this than the use by NT writers of the designation δοῦλος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ; in this case the name of Christ replaces that of J″ in an already familiar OT phrase (δοῦλος θεοῦ or κυρίου). Further, we may notice that prayer is addressed to Christ (Ac 7^{59}, 2 Co 12^{8}, Jn 9^{38}); and that He is the object of universal adoration in heaven (Rev $5^{8f.}$); that He is, in a word, God.

It has been found convenient to survey NT teaching in regard to the person of Jesus Christ as a whole. But it is important to bear in mind the fact that the Christian idea of the God-man was one which would not be readily apprehended in all its bearings by men who, like the twelve apostles, had been educated in Jewish modes of thought, and had perhaps imbibed to a great extent the national spirit of their countrymen. It was not till after the fall of Jerus., and the beginnings at least of the movement by which the message of the gospel was extended to the heathen world, that Christians could become fully conscious of the significance of the divine fact on which their religion was based—the appearance of the God-man on earth.† When we consider that our Lord confined His own ministerial activity and that of the Twelve to the 'house of Israel' (Mt 10^{6}), we shall not be surprised that there appears in NT a lower, as well as a higher, form of christological doctrine; a form which is, roughly speaking, represented by the teaching of the Synoptists, and St. James, and St. Peter, as contrasted with that of St. Paul and St. John. But, as we have pointed out, the distinct aspects under which different NT writers present the figure of Christ cannot fairly be construed as representing radically different types of belief in regard to His person. See SON OF GOD.

iii. It may be next inquired what light Scripture throws upon the purposes and results of the Incarnation. The significance assigned to the event in Scripture presupposes something much more than the mere inspiration, 'adoption,' or exaltation of a man. The I. was no mere presence of God in a man; no mere mode of mystical indwelling; no mere moral relationship such as might subsist between friends. It was a real, permanent, indissoluble union of two perfect natures, divine and human; an assumption of manhood into personal unity with a divine being, so that the Godhead employs the manhood as an organ, and wears it as a vesture; so that all the acts and sufferings of the human nature properly belong to the Godhead. This is the doctrine of the NT; it is implied in the express statement of Jn 1^{14} (ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο); in all references to the personality of the Son of God as single and continuous (e.g. 1 Co 8^{6}, Eph $4^{5.\,10}$, Ph $2^{5f.}$, He 1^{3} etc.); in such 'theopaschite' language as that of Ac 20^{28}; in the ascription of life-giving properties to the flesh of Christ (Jn $6^{53f.}$), or of cleansing efficacy to His blood (He 9^{14}); in the mention of His human nature as an object of adoration (Ph 2^{10}). In fact, speaking generally, the NT regards the I. not as the birth of a unique man, but as a momentous event in the eternal life of God: a manifestation, a forthcoming, a mission, a redemptive movement, a visitation, a great descent. In the I. the selfsame Person who had pre-existed in the form of God, who had created and sustained in being the universe of things visible and invisible, 'descended' from heaven (Eph 4^{10}), and submitted Himself to a fresh series of experiences in the sphere of human life and history, without ceasing to be in essence what He ever had been, the Son or Word of the Father. He and none other lay in the cradle, grew in wisdom and stature, was tempted and troubled, suffered, died and lay in the grave, rose again, and ascended to the right hand of God. He is 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever' (He 13^{8}). It follows that in virtue of this unity of Person, subsisting in two different states, heavenly and earthly, both human and divine attributes are ascribed to Christ, and may be rightly interchanged. An instance of this 'cross and circulatory' mode of speech (technically called communicatio idiomatum) may be found in 1 Co 2^{8}, and possibly also in Jn 3^{13}.

The belief of the first Christians as to the real nature of the I. may, in fact, be gathered rather from the significance attached to Christ's work than from express statements in Scripture about His person. All the NT writers are at one in ascribing to the appearance and work of Jesus Christ an element of finality. St. Peter and St. James reflect to some extent the current Messianic belief in the nearness of Christ's return to judgment (1 P $4^{7.17}$, Ja $5^{8.9}$). The 'revelation' of Christ is the goal of human hope and expectation (1 P 1^{13}). St. Paul teaches that Christ is the supreme object of faith; religion consists ultimately in a right relation of the soul to Him (Ro 3^{26} etc.). Christ is a Being in whom souls are mystically incorporated by baptism. They share sacramentally the acts, experiences, and sufferings of His earthly life (Ro $6^{3\text{ff.}}$, Gal 2^{20}, Col 2^{12}, Eph $2^{5.6}$ 5^{30}). They are 'in Christ' (Ro 8^{1} 12^{5}, Gal 1^{22} $3^{26.28}$, Eph 1^{1} 2^{10}, Ph 1^{1} etc.) 'and Christ in them' (Ro 8^{10}, Gal 2^{20} etc.); their souls and bodies are His temple (2 Co 13^{5}).

The writer of Hebrews regards Christianity mainly under one aspect—as the final religion. Christ as 'Son' of God brings to man a final authoritative message from God. The religion which is based on His revelation and finished work has the characteristic of 'perfection' (τελείωσις). It establishes that unimpeded fellowship between God and man which was impossible under the Levitical system (7^{11}). Christianity is 'the better hope whereby we draw near to God' (7^{19}). In this verse we have the 'dogmatic centre' of the Epistle. To St. John Christianity is the absolute religion—the final disclosure of God, revealing the possibility of perfect fellowship between God and man. It is final because it rests on the fact of a real I. of God. 1 Jn 'is probably the final interpretation of the whole series of divine revelations. . . . It declares that in the presence of Christ there has been given and there will be given that knowledge of God for which man was made, issuing in fellowship which is realized here in the Christian society, and which reaches to the source of all life.'* The collective testimony of the apostles, viewed as a whole, irresistibly proves the power of the impression which Christ's life and personality had made. No doubt they varied in their power of analyzing that impression. But the doctrine of the true Deity of Christ is the necessary inference from all that they ascribed to Him, and taught concerning Him.

The august dignity and glory of the event corresponds to the importance of the purpose it was designed to serve: the consummation of the universe, the disclosure of God, the restoration of humanity.

1. The cosmic significance of the I., and the view that it was eternally purposed independently of the fact of human sin, seems indeed to be implied in such passages as Eph $1^{4\text{-}10}$, and possibly He 2^{10}—passages which seem to suggest that the I. of the Son was an event predestined before the foundation of the world. The universe may well, so far as human reason can judge, have been framed with a view to the I. of its Creator. When, however, the question is raised whether this event was predestined in view of man's foreseen fall, scriptural testimony fails us, and we are left to the consideration whether it is a priori probable that God would have made His highest gift to His creatures contingent on human transgression. On the other hand, the evolutionary movement, whether in physical nature or in human history, which tends towards a 'fulness of time' (Gal 4^{4}, cf. Eph 1^{10}), seems unaccountably to fail unless crowned by the appearance of One who is the flower of human kind, and whose coming marks a climax in revelation. But here, again, we have to fall back on a priori reasoning.

2. At least we know that the I. is a crowning disclosure of God. He who had revealed something of His nature, His 'power and Godhead,' in the works of creation (Ro 1^{20}); who had spoken to man in divers ways, through the warnings of conscience, through visions, dreams, and oracles; who had manifested His purposes in judgment, type, and inspired prophecy, finally spoke to man 'in a Son' (He 1^{2}). In Christ the will, mind, and character of God were finally revealed. 'If we searched all space,' says Luthardt, 'we should discover only the gospel of power; if we surveyed all time, only the gospel of righteousness. Only in Jesus Christ do we learn the gospel of grace.' Christ indeed revealed the essence of God's being: fatherly love and self-imparting holiness. In the character of Christ, in His life of self-forgetful love, in His compassion for sinners, in the severity of His judgment on sin, is manifested the essential character of God: 'He that hath seen me,' He said, 'hath seen the Father' (Jn 14^{9}; cf. 12^{45}, Col 1^{15}, εἰκὼν τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ἀοράτου). Further, by His claim to stand in a unique relation to God, He manifested the distinctions of relationship existing within the divine essence. He unfolded the name of God as Triune (Mt 28^{19}). The formula of baptism, in fact, supplements those passages in which the Son and the Spirit are represented as subordinate to God, or ministering to His will. It implies that these two blessed Persons are co-equal with the Father in nature and state, and in their claim to be, together with Him, worshipped and glorified.

3. The mystery of the I. was intended for the restoration of man, for the removal of sin and its effects (Lk 15^{4} 19^{10}, Jn 1^{29} $3^{14\text{f.}}$, Gal 4^{4}, Ro $5^{2.6\text{f.}}$, 1 Co $15^{21\text{-}26}$, 1 Ti 1^{15}, 1 Jn 3^{5}). The coming of Christ made all things new; it restored all things to their original unity (Eph 1^{10}). The Redeemer gathered up into Himself elements which the Fall had disintegrated; He represents manhood to God in its initial truth and purity, corresponding to the divine thought, fulfilling its true law, attaining its ideal destiny, perfection through suffering (He $2^{8\text{f.}}$). In Him is exhibited the fact that sin is no true or necessary element in human nature, but a vice or corruption of it. The first step in the re-creation of humanity must be the exhibition of a true pattern of manhood in a life perfectly well-pleasing to the Father (Jn 8^{29}; cf. Lk 3^{22}, Mt 17^{5}). It is needless to illustrate the way in which NT writers constantly point to the example of Christ. He Himself bids men 'learn of him' (Mt 11^{29}) and follow His example (Jn 13^{15}); and St. Paul tells the Thessalonians that they themselves 'are taught of God to love one another' (1 Th 4^{9}; cf. Jn 6^{45}). But, further, Christ removes the barrier which sin had raised between man and his Creator; He 'takes away the sin of the world' (Jn 1^{29}); He makes atonement for it (cf. He 2^{17}); He offers a propitiatory sacrifice for it (cf. Ro 3^{25} ἱλαστήριον, 1 Jn 2^{2} 4^{10} ἱλασμός), the sacrifice of Himself (He 9^{26}). He assumed human nature, in its outward aspect such as the Fall had left it, with all its obligations (cf. Mt 3^{15}), its accumulated heritage of weakness and pain, its necessary subjection to vanity (Ro 8^{20}); He 'laid hold of it' (ἐπιλαμβάνεται, He 2^{16}) in its weakness indeed, but not in its perversion and corruption, for He was without sin, though He suffered for sin (Ro 8^{3} etc.); and by a continuous act of perfect obedience (Ro 5^{19}) He discharged the debt of entire self-devotion by which alone man could satisfy the jealous love and the righteous claim of his Creator (cf. He 10^{1-10}). His death on the cross was a representative and vicarious act of submission to the just penalties of human sin (see different modes of expression: in Gal 2^{20} ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ, 1 Co 15^{3} ὑπὲρ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἡμῶν, Ro 8^{3} περὶ ἁμαρτίας, Mt 26^{28} περὶ πολλῶν, 20^{28} λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, etc.); and the effects of Christ's acceptance of death are described under different metaphors: 'redemption' (i.e. according to OT associations, deliverance from slavery at a mighty cost), 'propitiation' (i.e. an act or process by which sin is neutralized), 'remission' of sins (Ro 3^{25} etc.), 'reconciliation with God,'* 'salvation,' etc.

* Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, p. viii.

But the work of redemption is followed by the work of re-creation and sanctification. The resurrection, by which the seal is set on the mission and work of the Son, and the ascension, by which as High Priest He passes within the veil to appear in the presence of God in our behalf (He 9^{24}), are followed by the outpouring of the Comforter, in whose coming the presence of Christ in His Church is accomplished; He comes as a 'quickening spirit' (1 Co 15^{45}) to inspire, enlighten, heal, strengthen, and sanctify His members, to unite them to Himself and to God, to dwell permanently in their hearts, to impart to them 'by habitual and real infusion' His own righteousness, to make them partakers of His life, to enable them for the life of divine service and sonship, to conform them to the likeness of Himself, and raise them into the glory of the risen life (Ro $8^{9f.}$, Gal 2^{20} etc., Jn $6^{54f.}$).

These three aspects of the work accomplished by the incarnate Son of God may be otherwise distinguished, according to Messianic conceptions, as prophetic, priestly, and kingly functions. Thus (1) as Prophet, Christ places Himself, so to speak, in line with the ancient prophets of Israel (Mt $23^{29f.}$). Like them, He teaches, He reveals the will of God, He preaches the divine requirement; like many among them, He is dishonoured, rejected, and slain (cf. Lk $4^{24f.}$ $13^{33f.}$). It is in the exercise of His prophetic office that He preaches the kingdom of God, and reveals its principles and mysteries (see Mt 13^{35}). He elucidates the moral law; He guides souls; He instructs His disciples; He denounces the hypocrisy of the Pharisees; He rebukes, threatens, predicts the future (Mt 5^{20} 15^{13} $22^{21.29}$, $23^{13f.}$ etc.). As prophet endued with power, 'the power of the Spirit' (Lk 4^{14}; cf. Mt 12^{28}), He works miracles which are themselves emblems or symbols of the diverse operations of grace. And He exhibits the divine will for man, not merely by authoritative teaching and by deeds of power, but by a life of unbroken zeal, devotion, and fidelity to God (cf. He 3^{2}); His example, in short, is one element in the exercise of His prophetic office. In Him, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, man is 'taught of God' (Is 54^{13}; cf. Jn 6^{45}).

(2) As High Priest, Christ offers a propitiatory sacrifice on behalf of man—the sacrifice of Himself. The writer of Hebrews implies that, for the discharge of His priestly function, Christ was prepared by the discipline of earthly life: He vouchsafed to 'learn' obedience, sympathy, compassion, fellow-feeling with sinners; His participation in a common nature fitted Him to be a faithful representative of mankind. He fulfils in Himself two distinct types of priesthood: He is a priest after the order of Melchizedek (He 7), i.e. His priesthood belongs to an order eternal and supra-national, connected with a celestial service and a 'true tabernacle' (8^{2}), based on divine promises, and combining kingly with priestly functions (cf. Zec 3^{8-10} 6^{9-15}). Further, He fulfilled all that had been prefigured by the Levitic ordinances and priesthood, by offering Himself as a spotless victim (He 7^{27} 8^{3} $9^{14.26}$ 10^{10-12}), and by entering within the veil of the true tabernacle, there to present Himself in the presence of God on behalf of His brethren, and to dedicate them in His own Person for the life of acceptable service (4^{14} 6^{20} 7^{25} $8^{1.2.6}$ 9^{12}). As the true Melchizedek, in whom the offices of king and priest are united, He bestows blessing, and feeds His people with eucharistic bread and wine (cf. Gn $14^{18f.}$). As the antitype of the Aaronic priest He cleanses the whole sphere of worship with His own blood ($9^{23f.}$); He purges the individual conscience from the defilement of sin ($9^{13.14}$), and 'ever liveth to make intercession for' mankind (7^{25}).

(3) Finally, as King, Christ is the personal centre of the kingdom of God. The royalty of the Messiah had been predicted by ancient prophecy, and as 'King of the Jews' Christ was proclaimed on the cross (Jn 18^{37} 19^{19}). As King, He assumes an absolute authority over the consciences and hearts of men as their rightful lord. In Him the ancient theocratic idea, that God was the true King of Isr., dwelling among His subjects, and residing in His temple as in a palace, was fulfilled. In Rev St. John to some extent reverts to the OT and later Jewish conception of the Messianic King as a warrior victorious over Israel's foes. The Son of God is crowned with 'many crowns'; He rides forth conquering and to conquer (Rev 6^{2} 12^{5} 14^{14} 19^{11-16}); and the same thought of Messianic Kingship is a leading idea of Mt. As King, Christ proclaims 'with authority' the dawn of His kingdom in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5–7). He explains its nature and conditions in the parables of the kingdom (Mt 13), and after His resurrection He claims 'all authority' in heaven and on earth (Mt 28^{18}). As King, He is the fountainhead of ministerial power, the Master whom His servants honour and obey, the omnipotent source of grace, power, life, and mercy (He 4^{16}). He founds a mediatorial system whereby men attain what they seek for, union with Himself and with the Father. With authority He institutes the sacrament of baptism or incorporation (Mt 28^{19}, Jn $3^{3f.}$), and the Eucharist or sacrament of union (Mt 26^{26} etc., Jn $6^{47f.}$). He bestows the Spirit; He gives 'gifts unto men'; He appoints a ministerial order, which He commissions to act, and to proclaim forgiveness in His name (Eph $4^{11f.}$, Jn $20^{22f.}$) in order that the central purpose of His coming may be accomplished, 'that repentance and remission of sins' should be preached in His name among all nations, beginning at Jerus. (Lk 24^{47}). Finally, He rules the universe, bearing all things onward in their appointed course (He 1^{3}), extending His kingdom through gradual subdual of all hostile elements: 'He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet' (1 Co 15^{25}). He waits expectant 'till his enemies be made his footstool' (He 10^{13}; cf. 1^{13}); and in the last day it is He who will sit as King 'on the throne of his glory' to judge the world (Mt $25^{31f.}$).

* See a note in Sanday-Headlam on Romans, p. 129 f.

Thus the I., properly understood, is a key to the history of the universe. All history, it has been said, is summed up in the three sentences, He is coming, He has come, He will come again (cf. Rev 22^{13}); and certainly this is the fundamental teaching of Scripture. If the OT foresees (Gal 3^{8}) the I., the NT develops its significance as an actual event, and persistently points to the return of the Incarnate as the goal of history. There is no reason for denying a certain advance in the intellectual apprehension and statement of the doctrine of the I. on the part of the apostles, so far as it can be clearly demonstrated. Indeed it is what we should a priori expect. But in this article we have been concerned with positive and definite results, with the ultimate position which the NT assigns to Christ; and it is contended that the divergent and varied testimonies of Holy Scripture can only be satisfactorily adjusted and reconciled by the belief that Jesus of Nazareth was not only the expected Messiah of prophecy, but in a unique and absolute sense divine: God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God.

R. L. OTTLEY.

INCENSE is AV tr^{n} of two Heb. words which at first were quite distinct in meaning, although latterly the second of them came to be practically synonymous with the first. 1. לְבוֹנָה, frankincense (wh. see), is tr^{d} 'incense' by AV in Is 43^{23} 60^{6} 66^{3}, Jer 6^{20} 17^{26} 41^{5}, in all of which passages RV accurately substitutes 'frankincense.' The Gr. equivalent is λίβανος, which appears in NT in Mt 2^{11} and Rev 18^{13}. 2. קְטֹרֶת (in Dt 33^{10} קְטוֹרָה [cf. the prop. name Ḳeturah, קְטוּרָה], in Jer 44^{21} קִטֵּר), generally reproduced in LXX by θυμίαμα or θυμιάματα (cf. for NT usage Lk 1^{10}, Rev 5^{8} $8^{3f.}$ 18^{13}, in the last along with λίβανος). In Ex $30^{35. 37}$ RV substitutes 'incense' (קְטֹרֶת) for 'perfume,' in 2 Ch 2^{6} 'burn incense' (הַקְטִיר) for 'burn sacrifice,' and in Rev 5^{8} 18^{13} 'incense' (θυμιάματα) for 'odours' of AV (cf. Rev 8^{3}).

Frankincense was an ingredient of the holy incense, Ex 30^{24}; it was used as incense, Jer 6^{20}; it was put on the meal offering (Lv $2^{1. 2. 15. 16}$ 6^{8}, cf. 5^{11}, Nu 5^{15}); also on the shewbread, Lv 24^{7}; one form of luxury was to burn it as a perfume, Ca 3^{6} $4^{6. 14}$; along with gold it is mentioned as part of the tribute to be brought to Israel, Is 60^{6} (cf. Mt 2^{11} of the gifts of the Magi to the infant Jesus). Both frankincense (λίβανος) and incense (θυμίαμα) are mentioned amongst the merchandise of the apocalyptic Babylon, Rev 18^{13}. On the Arabian traffic in incense see ARABIA, vol. i. p. 134^{b}.

The offering of incense, which bulks so largely in the later ritual, appears to have been unknown in the earlier stages of Israel's history. Wellhausen (who is followed in his conclusions more or less closely by Kuenen, Nowack, Benzinger, and many others) will have it that the first mention of offering incense is in Jer 6^{20}. In the older literature קִטֵּר,* according to him, always refers to the burning of the fat or the meal and making these go up in sweet smoke (cf. Lv 3^{5} [P] etc.) to J″, while the substantive קְטֹרֶת in like manner has the quite general sense of what is burnt upon the altar.* The meaning 'incense' belongs to it for the first time with certainty in Ezekiel (8^{11} 16^{18} 23^{41}); subsequently the word occurs frequently in P, always in this sense; elsewhere only in Pr 27^{9}, where it is used not with a sacred but a secular application (EV 'perfume'). Even in such late passages as 1 S 2^{28}, Ps 66^{15} 141^{2} Wellhausen denies that it means anything more than sweet smoke, which is the sense he attributes to it in the only two certainly pre-exilic passages where it occurs, Is 1^{13} and Dt 33^{10} (otherwise Dillm. and Steuernagel, both of whom find the meaning 'incense' in Dt 33^{10}, although Steuernagel considers that this implies a pretty late date for the passage, which, however, he would make prior to P, because all Levites have according to it the prerogative of burning incense to J″, whereas in P this duty and privilege is assigned only to the seed of Aaron; cf. Nu $16^{6. 10}$ 17^{5} [Eng. 16^{40}]). Again, in Am $4^{4f.}$ $5^{21ff.}$, Is $1^{11ff.}$, Mic $6^{6f.}$, where we have detailed lists of ritual acts, there is no mention of incense, and JE as well as the books of Judges, Samuel, and Kings are equally silent. לְבוֹנָה, 'frankincense,' appears first in Jer 6^{20} 17^{26} 41^{5}, elsewhere only in P (Ex 30^{24}, Lv $2^{1. 2. 15. 16}$ 5^{11} 6^{8} 24^{7}, Nu 5^{15}), Deutero-Isaiah (Is 43^{23} 60^{6} 66^{3}), the Chronicler (1 Ch 9^{29}), and Canticles (3^{6} $4^{6. 14}$).

From all this it may perhaps be inferred that the use of incense was introduced not long before the time of Jeremiah (in 6^{20} it is referred to as rare, costly, unnecessary). It may have been connected with the gradual refinement of the cultus, the extension of commerce, and the contagion of the rites of heathen religions (cf. Jer $11^{12. 17}$ 48^{35}, 2 Ch 34^{25}).

In P incense has a very extensive use, and is regarded as extremely sacred. It was to be used with every meal offering (Lv $2^{1. 2}$ etc.), as well as to be offered alone, in which latter case it safeguarded the high priest on the Day of Atonement when he entered the Holy of Holies (Lv $16^{12f.}$); and it made atonement for the people after the rebellion of Korah (Nu $17^{11f.}$ [Eng. $16^{46f.}$]). The holy incense was to be prepared according to a special recipe (Ex $30^{34f.}$) from stacte, onycha, and galbanum (see sep. arts. on these words), along with pure frankincense—an equal weight of each (see Dillm. ad loc.). Josephus states that there were thirteen ingredients used in his day, and that a great store of these was always kept in the temple (BJ V. v. 5, VI. viii. 3). It was forbidden (Ex $30^{37f.}$) to imitate this preparation for private use; to burn it was the prerogative of the high priest; the presumption of the Korahites in taking it upon them to burn incense was punished with death (Nu 16; cf. the Chronicler's account of Uzziah's leprosy, 2 Ch $26^{16ff.}$); Aaron's own sons died for offering it improperly (Lv $10^{1f.}$).

Nothing shows more clearly the growing importance attached by P to incense than the circumstance that finally an altar of incense (מִזְבַּח הַקְּטֹרֶת) is introduced. Of this there is no trace in Solomon's temple (1 K 7^{48} being part of what is otherwise known to be a late passage), and in the account of the Tabernacle it is generally admitted that the mention of the incense altar comes in awkwardly at the end (Ex $30^{1ff.}$). Hence the majority of modern critics are disposed to assign the mention of this altar to a late stratum of P. It is pointed out, for instance, that even in the ritual of the Day of Atonement (Lv 16 [P]) it is not upon an altar but with censers (wh. see) that incense is offered (v.^{12}). Even Pseudo-Hecatæus (ap. Jos. c. Ap. i. 22) mentions nothing as being in the interior of the temple but the candlestick and a golden βωμός, which probably refers to the table of the shewbread (cf. Ezk 41^{22} 44^{16}, with Davidson's and Bertholet's notes). Dillmann, who does not share Wellhausen's scepticism as to the existence of an altar of incense, admits that at least Ex 30^{10} is an addition to the original law, designed for the purpose of supplementing Lv 16^{16b}. On this question, as well as on the position of the altar, and the difficulty occasioned by He 9^{4}, see Incense Altar under art. TABERNACLE.

* The Piel of this verb is used by the older writers, the Hiphil by P and the Chronicler, while in the transition period represented by the compiler of Kings the two formations are used promiscuously.

* 'The root ḳatara in Arabic signifies to exhale an odour in roasting' (Driver on Am 5^{5}).

According to Ex 30$^{7f.}$ incense had to be offered on the altar every morning and evening (cf. Joma iii. 5). The Mishnic tract Tamid gives a full account of the ritual of the morning service, which may possibly be fairly correct for NT times, although it is of little value for our knowledge of the ritual some centuries earlier. We are told, inter alia, that it was the custom to decide by lot which of the priests were to perform the various functions (cf. Joma ii. 4), amongst which the offering of incense was counted specially solemn, although it was no longer the exclusive prerogative of the high priest. John Hyrcanus (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 3) and Zacharias (Lk 1$^{9.20}$) are both said to have received a divine revelation while engaged in this act. In offering the incense, fire was taken from the altar of burnt-offering and carried into the temple, where it was laid upon the incense altar, and then the incense was emptied from a golden vessel upon the fire. See a full account in Schürer, HJP II. i. 295.

The use of incense in the temple may have been partly for antiseptic fumigation, but it is largely explained by the partiality of the Oriental to sweet odours. He enjoys these himself, and he offers them to those whom he desires to honour (cf. Dn 2^{46}). In India it was customary to scent the roads when the king went out (Curt. VIII. ix. 23); when Xerxes crossed the Hellespont, incense was burnt on the bridge (Herod. vii. 54); as Alexander the Great marched against Babylon, there were altars erected to him and incense burnt (Curt. V. i. 20). It is easy to see how such customs could be transferred to the cultus, in honour of the object of worship. If this cannot be proved for some other Oriental nations, at least it is certain in the case of such neighbours of Israel as the Phœnicians (2 K 23^{5}, Jer 7^{9} 11^{13} 32^{29} 44$^{17ff.}$, Hos 2^{15}), the Babylonians (Herod. i. 183, possibly Is 65^{3}), and the Egyptians (Plutarch, Isid. 81; Dioscor. i. 24). Cf., further, 1 K 11^{8}, 2 K 22^{17}, Jer 1^{16} 19^{13}, Ezk 6^{13} 23^{41}. In Israel incense was supposed to be specially acceptable to J″ (Dt 33^{10}), and, as we have seen, to have an atoning efficacy (Nu 17$^{11f.}$ [Eng. 16$^{46f.}$]). See the very full and interesting note of Dillmann, Ex-Lv^{3}, p. 359 f., from which the above illustrations are taken. We may add the explanation of the religious value of frankincense suggested by W. R. Smith (RS^{1} 406): 'frankincense was the gum of a very holy species of tree, which was collected with religious precautions . . . it appears to have owed its virtue, like the gum of the samora tree, to the idea that it was the blood of an animate and divine plant.'

On the symbolical meaning of incense and its ingredients much has been written both in ancient and in modern times that is pure baseless phantasy. In Rev 5^{8} incense represents the prayers of the saints (cf. Ps 141^{2}). The reading αἵ (which is the correct text) does not in the least necessitate a reference to φίαλαι instead of θυμιάματα (see Bousset, ad loc.). The point of comparison is probably the ascending to heaven of the smoke of the incense (cf. Dillm. on Lv 1^{9}). In Rev 8^{3} there was given to the angel much incense that he should add it (ἵνα δώσῃ) to the prayers of the saints, and in v.^{4} the smoke of the incense goes up (not 'with' RV, but) 'for (RVm; Bousset 'zu Gunsten') the prayers of the saints,' i.e. giving them an extra claim to acceptance.

INCEST.—See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, vol. i. p. 521^{b}.

INCONTINENCY, INCONTINENT.—Incontinency is the tr^{n} of incontinentia in 2 Es 5^{10}, and of ἀκρασία (Vulg. incontinentia) in 1 Co 7^{5}. In 2 Es the word has probably the general sense of 'absence of self-control,' 'lawlessness,' for so both the Lat. and the Eng. words have sometimes been used. The usual sense, however, has always been 'unchastity,' and that is the meaning in 1 Co.

The Gr. word ἀκρασία occurs also in Mt 23^{25}, where it is tr^{d} 'excess' by both AV and RV (Vulg. immunditia). It describes the character of the ἀκρατής (from κρατεῖν, to control), one who wants self-restraint, its opposite being ἐγκράτεια. This ἀκρασία must be distinguished from ἀκρᾱσία, which comes from κεράννυμι, to mix, is associated with ἀκρατής, 'untempered,' and is used by Theophr. (C.P. III. ii. 5) of a bad (lit. 'badly mixed') climate.

The adj. 'incontinent' occurs only in 2 Ti 3^{3} as tr^{n} of ἀκρατής, which has probably the general meaning of 'unrestrained,' 'uncontrolled' (RV 'without self-control'). It is scarcely possible, however, to find an instance of 'incontinent' in this general sense; and it is probable that Wyc. and Rhem., from whom AV accepted the word, understood the Vulg. incontinentes in the sense of 'unchaste.' Tind. (whom the other versions follow) has 'ryatours.'

J. HASTINGS.

INCREDULITY.—In 2 Es 15^{3} the Lat. incredulitates dicentium is rendered 'the incredulity of them that speak against thee.' The word means no more than 'unbelief' (as RV). The Rhem. NT, which confesses itself a translation of 'the old vulgar Latin text, not the common Greek text,' makes frequent use of the word. Thus Mt 13^{58} 'And he wrought not many miracles there because of their incredulity'; 17^{20} 'Then came the disciples to Jesus secretly, and said, Why could not we cast him out? Jesus said to them, Because of your incredulity'; He 3^{19} 'And we see that they could not enter in, because of incredulitie.' In the same version incredulous occurs no less frequently, as Mk 9^{19} 'O incredulous generation'; Lk 1^{17}; Jn 3^{36} 'he that is incredulous to the Sonne shal not see life'; 20^{27} 'be not incredulous but faithful'; He 11^{31} 'By faith, Rahab the harlot perished not with the incredulous.'

Incredulity is used in the same way in Preface to AV 1611, 'it is a fault of incredulitie to doubt of those things that are evident.' J. HASTINGS.

INDIA (הֹדּוּ, ἡ Ἰνδική).—This name, which in the OT is found only in Est 1^{1} 8^{9} (cf. 1 Es 3^{2}, Ad. Est 13^{1} 16^{1}), represents the Old Persian Hind'u and the Sansk. Sindhu (=sea or great river), and is applied, not to the peninsula of Hindostan, but to the country immediately adjoining the Indus, i.e. the Punjab, and perhaps also Scinde. This is the portion of I. which was first known to the Greeks, and which is described by Herodotus (iii. 94, 98) as forming the most easterly region of the empire of Darius. Elsewhere (vii. 9) he names I. and Ethiopia as being among the most distant parts of the empire; and similarly in Est the dominions of Ahasuerus (Xerxes) are said to extend from I. to Ethiopia, comprising 127 provinces. At a later period we have evidence of intercourse between I. and Syria, in the allusion to the Indian drivers in charge of the war elephants of Antiochus V. (1 Mac 6^{37}). In 1 Mac 8^{8}, indeed, I. is said to have been a part of the dominions of Antiochus the Great, taken from him by the Romans and given to Eumenes, king of Pergamum. But neither Antiochus nor Eumenes can really have had possessions in India. The statement must therefore be due to the inaccuracy of the historian; unless, as has been conjectured, we should correct the text and read 'Ionia and Mysia' instead of 'India and Media.'

But although the name I. occurs only in the later Jewish literature, the products of the country were known to the Hebrews at a much earlier date. Many modern scholars have identified the Pison and the gold-producing Havilah of Gn 2^{11} with the Indus and I. (so Ges. Thes.; but cf. Dillm. and Del. ad loc.). This view is as old as the Targ. Jerushalmi, which in Gn 2^{11} 10^{7} renders Havilah by Hindeki, while in Targ. Jon. of Is 11^{11}, Jer 13^{23}, Hindeki represents Cush. We meet with Indian articles and Indian words in the accounts of the foreign trade of Solomon. The ships from Ophir brought almug trees (1 K 10^{11} אַלְמֻגִּים, 2 Ch 2^{8} [Heb. ^{7}] 9^{10} אַלְגֻּמִּים), perhaps sandalwood; and the navy of Tarshish (1 K 10^{22}) imported ivory (שֶׁנְהַבִּים, ? cf. Sansk. ibhas, elephant), apes (קוֹפִים = Ind. kapi, cf. Halévy, Mél. de crit. 81), and peacocks (תֻּכִּיִּים = Malabar tôgai, cf. Ges. Thes.). See Cheyne and Hommel in Expos. Times, July and August, 1898, pp. 470, 524. It is probable also that Indian wares were included in the merchandise of Tyre, whose extensive caravan trade is described in Ezk 27. According to v.^{15} the men of Dedan brought presents of ivory and ebony, products either of I. or Ethiopia; cassia and calamus (v.^{19}) are spoken of by the ancients as coming from I., and perhaps the 'bright iron' was imported from the same country (see Smend). Real knowledge of I. in more Western countries dates from the time of Alexander's conquests, and of the travels of Megasthenes (c. B.C. 300), whose works were continually quoted by later Gr. writers. But though it appears that a regular trade with I. by way of the Red Sea was carried on in the Græco-Roman period (cf. Periplus Mar. Eryth. 37. 44); and individual Indians, and even Indian embassies, are mentioned as visiting the Rom. Empire (cf. Mon. Anc. v. 50, 51; Suet. Aug. 21; Dio Cass. liv. 9); yet it is probable that at the beginning of our era the knowledge of that country was but slight, and it is a mistake to suppose that Indian thought can have exerted any appreciable influence upon the West by that time (cf. Schürer, HJP II. ii. 215 f.; Lightfoot, Colossians, 389 ff.). In particular, Zeller (Phil. d. Griech. III. ii. 223) denies that any trace of Buddhists is to be found in Gr. literature before the middle of the 2nd cent. A.D. H. A. WHITE.

INDIFFERENT.—'It is a striking testimony,' says Trench (Select Glossary, p. 111), 'of the low general average which we have come to assume common to most things, that a thing which does not differ from others, is thereby qualified as poor; a sentence of depreciation is pronounced upon it when it is declared to be indifferent.' And he points out that the same feeling embodies itself in Greek 'at the other end' when διαφέρειν means præstare and τὰ διαφέροντα præstantiora. But this is a modern fault. About 1611 and earlier, to be called 'indifferent' was to be highly complimented, for it meant to be impartial, not making a difference where none existed. In the Joint Attestation of Several Bishops and Learned Divines of the Church of England, avowing that her Doctrine was confirmed, and her Discipline was not impeached, by the Synod of Dort, we read, 'As for ourselves, in the ingenuity of our conscience, we herein do not decline the judgment of any indifferent dispassionate man; and such we hope this true and plain narration will satisfy' (M. Fuller, Life of Bp. Davenant, p. 107). Tindale, in The Obedience of a Christian Man (Works, i. 236), says of God, 'Neither is there any respect of persons with him; that is, he is indifferent and not partial; as great in his sight is a servant as a master.' The adj. occurs in Sir 42^{5}, where 'merchants' indifferent selling' is praised (B περὶ ἀδιαφόρου πράσεως καὶ ἐμπόρων, AℵC διαφόρου and om. καί, RV 'Of indifferent selling of merchants,' so Cowley-Neubauer after Heb. text). The meaning is clearly 'impartial.' But even Tindale, in a note to Ex 12^{3}, says, 'That I here cal a shepe, is in Ebrue a word indifferent to a shepe and a gotte both.' Then in his 'Godly Letter' (Works, iii. 177) Knox represents 'the haill Counsaile' as saying of Grindall, Lever, and others of the Protestant preachers, 'Thay wald heir no mo of thair sermonis: they wer but indifferent fellowis; (yea, and sum of thame eschameit not to call thame pratting knaves).' And at a later time Thomas Adams (on 2 P 1^{4}) speaks of 'idle indifferents, that do neither good nor harm.'

The adv. indifferently occurs in the Communion Service in the Prayer (1662) for the King and his officers 'that they may truly and indifferently administer justice.' Joy, in his Apology to Tindale (Arber's ed. p. 4), says, 'I desier every indifferent reder to iuge indifferently.' So Tind. in Prologe to Deut. 'god is lorde above all lordes and loveth all his servauntes indifferently, as well the poor and feble and the straunger, as the rich and mightye'; which is a recollection of his tr^{n} of Ja 1^{5} 'Yf eny of you lacke wysdome, let him axe of God which geveth to all men indifferentlie, and casteth no man in the teth.' And on the miracle of the Ten Lepers, Bp. Hall says (Works, ii. 154), 'The miracle indifferently wrought upon all, is differently taken.'

The subst. indifferency is also found in the Pr. Bk. of 1604, in the King's Proclamation for the Uniformity, etc., 'the indifferency and uprightness of our Judgment.' Cf. Knox, Works, iii. 271, 'I knowledge and confesse . . . the lacke of fervencye in reproving synne, the lacke of indifferency in feedyng those that were hongrye, and the lacke of diligence in the execution of mine office.' But Hall uses the word nearly in the mod. sense (Works, ii. 148), 'How many are there that thinke there is no wisdome but in a dull indifferency?'

J. HASTINGS.

INDITE.—To 'indite' a letter is now to write it, and even so the expression is somewhat old-fashioned; but formerly it was to dictate or at least compose, and the 'inditer' is distinguished from the writer. Thus in Pref. to AV 1611, the Translators, describing the Scriptures as 'a fountaine of most pure water springing up unto everlasting life,' add, 'And what marvaile? The originall thereof being from heaven, not from earth; the authour being God, not man; the enditer the holy spirit, not the wit of the Apostles or Prophets; the Pen-men such as were sanctified from the wombe, and endewed with a principall portion of God's spirit.' So in Ps 45^{1} 'My heart is inditing a good matter,' is naturally followed by 'my tongue is the pen of a ready writer.'

The verb in the Heb. (רָחַשׁ) means to bubble up (like a fountain) or boil over (like a pot of water): LXX Ἐξηρεύξατο ἡ καρδία μου λόγον ἀγαθόν; Vulg. 'Eructavit cor meum verbum bonum'; Wyc. 'Myn herte bowide out (1388 'hath teld out') a good woord'; Luth. 'Mein Herz dichtet ein feines Lied'; Cov. 'My hert is dytinge of a good matter'; Great Bible (Pr. Bk.), 'My hert is endyting of a good matter'; Gen. 'Mine heart will utter forthe a good matter'; Dou. 'My hart hath uttered a good word (with note 'I have received by divine inspiration in my hart and cogitation a most high Mysterie'); Bish. 'My heart is inditing of a good matter.' Mod. expositors translate more literally: Del. 'My heart bubbles over with a goodly word'; Per. 'My heart is overflowing with a goodly matter'; Cheyne, 'My heart bubbles with goodly words'; Kay, 'My heart is teeming with a good word'; Kirkp. 'My heart bubbleth over with goodly words'; Kautzsch, 'Mein Herz wallt über von lieblicher Rede'; Wellh.-Furness, 'My heart overflows with a theme that is good'; RV, 'My heart overfloweth with a goodly matter'; Driver, 'My heart is astir with a goodly matter.'

The Eng. word comes from Low Lat. indictare (a frequentative of indicere, to proclaim), and it entered the Eng. lang. at first in the French form endicter, 'indite' being a later spelling in imitation of the Latin, while 'dite' is a vernacular shortening. Knox has the form 'dite' (which he spells 'dyte'), as Hist. 214, 'those Prayers were dyted unto the people by the holy Ghost, before they came to the uttermost of trouble, to assure them, that God, by whose Spirit the Prayer was dyted, would not contemne the same in the midst of their calamities.' Thomas Fuller uses 'endite,' as in Holy State, iv. 5 (p. 261), 'More hold is then to be taken of a few words casually uttered, then of set solemn speeches, which rather shew men's arts then their natures, as endited rather from their brains then hearts.'

The same verb meant also to accuse (after the Lat.); but now a distinction is made, the verb to accuse, though pronounced the same, being spelt 'indict.' Golding, in Calvin's Job (on 32^{1-3}), has 'so then, what remayneth, but too learne first and formoste too condemne our selves, and too bring our inditement alwayes readie made, when we come before God, and too say, that we be wretched sinners.' On the other hand, Elyot (The Governour, ii. 343) has 'Plato (or rather Socrates, Plato indictynge).' But Fuller, Holy Warre, iii. 16, p. 134, spells the word in the mod. way, 'indicted by his conscience for his cruelty.' RV has used the subst. 'indictment' in Job 31^{35} 'O that I had one to hear me! . . . and that I had the indictment which mine adversary hath written' for AV 'and that mine adversary had written a book.' J. HASTINGS.

INFIDEL, INFIDELITY.—An 'infidel' in our modern speech is one who deliberately rejects the Faith; but at one time a person might be called an 'infidel' who had never heard it. Infidelis in eccles. Latin simply meant 'unbelieving,' and 'infidel' carried the same purely negative meaning. Thus Tindale, in his general Prologe to the Pent., says, 'Behold how soberly and how circumspectly both Abraham and also Isaac behave them selves amonge the infideles'; and in Rhem. NT the tr^{n} of Ro 15^{31} is 'Helpe me in your praiers for me to God, that I may be delivered from the infidels that are in Jewrie'; while Hooker (Eccles. Polity, III. viii. 6) speaks of 'Festus, a mere natural man, an infidel, a Roman, one whose ears were unacquainted with such matters.' Hence RV changes 'infidel' of 2 Co 6^{15}, 1 Ti 5^{8} into 'unbeliever,' which is all that the Gr. word (ἄπιστος) means.

So 'infidelity' was once no more than 'unbelief,' as the marg. note to Lv 7^{5} in Matthew's Bible, 'Trespace after the order of the scrypture signifyeth somtyme all the lyffe past which we have lyved in infidelyte, being ignoraunt of the veritie, not only in doyng open synnes, but also when we have walked in oure awne rightwesnes'; and still more clearly in Fuller, Holy State, iv. 18, p. 335, 'After his [Gustavus Adolphus'] death, how did men struggle to keep him alive in their reports! partly out of good will, which made them kindle new hopes of his life at every spark of probability, partly out of infidelity that his death could be true.' This is all that 'infidelity' means in 2 Es 7^{44} ('incredulitas'). J. HASTINGS.

INGATHERING, FEAST OF.—See TABERNACLES (FEAST OF).

INHABIT.—We do not now use 'inhabit' intransitively. Hence RV changes 1 Ch 5^{9} 'And eastward he inhabited unto the entering in of the wilderness' into 'he dwelt.' Cf. Pr. Bk. 1552, Act of Uniformity (Keeling, p. vii), 'all and every person, and persons, inhabiting within this realm'; and Defoe, Crusoe, p. 510, 'There are many Travellers, who have wrote the History of their Voyages and Travels this way, that it would be very little Diversion to any Body, to give a long Account of the Places we went to, and the People who inhabit there.' Nor do we now speak of a single person inhabiting a place, as Jer 48^{18} 'Thou daughter that dost inhabit Dibon,' though the construction may be defended on the ground that 'daughter' stands for the whole people (RV 'O thou daughter that dwellest in Dibon').

Figurative examples of the word are: (1) Ps 22^{3} 'O thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel' (יוֹשֵׁב תְּהִלּוֹת, RVm 'art enthroned upon'), a bold adaptation, says Kirkpatrick, of the phrase 'that sittest enthroned upon the cherubim' (2 S 6^{2}, 2 K 19^{15}, Ps 80^{1} 99^{1}), the praise-songs of Israel being regarded as clouds of incense which form J‴'s throne. Cheyne (in loc.) sees in the phrase a poetic glorifying of the 'old mythic phrase.' The cherubim were the forces of nature; but J″ is not merely a God of force, He is a God of praise-producing loving-kindness. See also Cheyne in Expos. 3rd ser. vii. 20 ff. (2) Is 57^{15} 'the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy' (שֹׁכֵן עַד). This tr^{n} is after LXX κατοικῶν τὸν αἰῶνα and Vulg. habitans æternitatem, and is first used in Geneva Bible 'that inhabiteth the eternitie' (Wyc. 'wonende the everelastingte,' 1388 'that dwellith in everlastyngnesse'). Modern expositors translate more directly, as Del. 'the eternally-dwelling One'; Cheyne and Orelli, 'who dwelleth for ever'; Skinner, 'that sitteth (enthroned) for ever.'

The old and rare form inhabitance is found in Wis $12^{7\mathrm{m}}$. 'new inhabitance' for text 'a worthy colony' (ἀξία ἀποικία). So Beaumont and Fletcher, Sea Voyage, iv. 1—

> 'Here's nothing, sir, but poverty and hunger;
> No promise of inhabitance; neither track of beast.'

Inhabiter is used for 'inhabitant' in Rev 8^{13} 12^{12}. It occurs in Coverdale, as Is 26^{9} 'For . . . the inhabitours of the earth lerne rightuousnesse'; and 40^{22} 'all the inhabitours of the worlde are in comparison of him but as greshoppers'; cf. Pr. Bk. Ps 75^{4} 'The earth is weak and all the inhabiters thereof.' The fem. form inhabitress occurs in Jer $10^{17\mathrm{m}}$, an attempt to show the gender of the Heb. word used in the passage. Cf. Chapman, Hymne to Venus—

> 'An inhabitresse
> On this thy wood-crowned hill.'

J. HASTINGS.

INHERITANCE.—The English word 'inheritance' represents, in the OT, the terms חֵלֶק, יְרֻשָּׁה, מוֹרָשָׁה, and נַחֲלָה. Of these, however, the first is more frequently (and properly) rendered 'portion' (LXX μερίς), and the second and third are rare. The last mentioned occurs nearly two hundred times. Although the common term for the expression of the idea of 'inheritance' proper, or estate which descends to the heir of the last holder, נַחֲלָה need not imply this, and, in ordinary biblical usage, signifies possession generally. The same remark applies to the NT (and LXX) term κληρονομία (cf. the use of 'inherit' and derivatives, e.g. in Shaks. . . . 'the great globe itself, yea, all which it inherit'—Tempest, iv. 1, also Hamlet, i. 1, etc.). At the same time this idea remains, though latent, in both terms, and may in certain connexions of thought become explicit.

i. Old Testament.—For the Hebrew law and practice regulating succession see art. HEIR. From these it is evident how true is the remark of Keil, that Israel was 'essentially a land-holding people.' In her case, however, social institutions and usages appear as charged throughout with a religious significance, arising in this instance from the fact that the possession of a national territory, on which the theocracy should be maintained, was among the most elementary and indispensable conditions for the fulfilment of her destiny. The 'land of promise' (He 11^{9}), accordingly, holds a prominent place among the blessings represented as assured to her from the first. It is the burden of the patriarchal covenants (Gn 15^{18-21} 26^{3} 28^{13}); a renewed pledge of its acquisition lies behind the exodus from Egypt (Ex 6^{8}); the entrance of the people upon possession, although not effected without fierce and protracted warfare, is due rather to the interposition of their God on their behalf (Jos 21^{43-45}, Ps 44^{1-3}); and the subsequent division of the land among the several tribes, clans, and families is provided for by detailed regulations bearing divine sanction (Nu 32. 34, Jos 18^{4-9}), and is finally accomplished by lot (Jos 14^{2}), the 'whole disposing' whereof is 'of the Lord.' Obtained thus by divine infeftment, the land is regarded as held thereafter conditionally upon fidelity on the part of the people to the covenant under which it has accrued to them, and as bound up in the closest way with their moral history. It is 'defiled' by their crimes and impieties (Lv 18^{25}, Jer 16^{18}); may even, by a quasi-personification, be said to 'sin' with its sinful inhabitants (Dt 24^{4}); and divine punishment takes the form, now of blight and famine overtaking the devoted land for the people's sake (Dt $11^{8ff.}$), now of their forfeiture of it outright (Dt $4^{26ff.}$). On the other hand, reinstatement in the divine favour is signified by restoration to the land and to its peaceful enjoyment. Also, inasmuch as the election of God is 'without repentance,' it appears as His purpose that His people should hold it 'for ever' (Gn 13^{15} etc.). The portion allotted to each several tribe even is to be that tribe's inalienable possession (Nu 36^{1-12})—an idea which underlies the remarkable provisions connected with the Jubilee Year, and which may have dictated the severe condemnation pronounced (Dt 19^{14}, Hos 5^{10}) upon the removing of a neighbour's landmark (cf. Driver, Deut. in loc., however, and Knobel quoted there). Yet withal J″ remains ultimate owner or inheritor here. The land is 'the inheritance of J″' (Ex 15^{17}, 1 S 26^{19}). 'The inheritance is mine, and ye are strangers and sojourners with me' (Lv 25^{23}).

Thus far the land as such, and as the scene of God's fellowship with His people, constitutes the 'inheritance,' which may be regarded as pertaining either, ultimately and absolutely, to Him, or, derivatively and conditionally, to them. So concrete an idea, however, determined thus religiously, could scarcely fail in course of time to be still further spiritualized, as indeed appears in two directions. This is not the place to inquire how far the conception even as already defined may represent the reflection of subsequent modes of thought upon the conditions of an earlier time; but in any case in certain later writings it undergoes a further development. On the one hand, OT faith learns to claim not the land but J″ Himself, fellowship with whom within its borders lends it its significance and value, as the true and proper 'inheritance.' Probably we are to find the immediate suggestion of this way of thinking in the provision by which the priests (Nu 18^{20}) and the Levites generally (Dt 18^{2}) were to have no territorial inheritance allotted to them: J″ was to be their inheritance. That is to say, their portion was to consist of the altar-dues and first-fruits (Dt 18^{1-5}) offered by the Israelites to J″, 'the service of the god of the land' being 'a burden on the land' (W. R. Smith, RS p. 229). From this the step was a short one to the employment of the term to signify that enjoyment of God which is the object of religious faith and hope always (cf. Ps 16^{5}). In any case by the time of Jeremiah the conception of J″ as the 'portion' of His people was a common one (Jer 10^{16} 51^{19}), while in certain of the Psalms even individual faith claims Him thus (73^{26} 119^{57} 142^{5}). From the other side, again, the original signification of the term gives way similarly. J″'s 'inheritance' ceases to be the land His people occupy, and becomes rather the people itself. Israel is, in a special sense, His own, brought out of Egypt 'to be unto Him a people of inheritance' (Dt 4^{20}), 'chosen to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all peoples that are upon the face of the earth' (Dt 7^{6})—'J″'s portion is His people; Jacob is the lot of His inheritance' (Dt 32^{9})—a conception which broadens out under the influence of the later universalism until it includes the Gentiles also (Is 19^{25} 47^{6} 63^{17}, Ps 2^{8}). Here the idea has parted with its original associations altogether. In place of attaching to what is at most only a fundamental condition of the realization of the covenant, it now expresses that mutual appropriation and enjoyment of each other on the part of God and His people which is the essence of the covenant itself. Still, this by no means represents the ordinary usage of the term anywhere in the OT. Even when it becomes most highly volatilized, so to say, OT thinking remains charged with elements which belong to the outward conditions amid which it has arisen. The fellowship of God and His people, even in its perfect form, is always represented as to be maintained in the territory originally assured to them; and to the last it is an essential feature in the picture of the Messianic time that the people shall then at length enter upon sure and peaceful possession of their own land (Is 60^{21}, Jer 23^{8}, Ps 37^{9} etc., To 4^{12}), where they shall enjoy the immediate presence of their God and serve Him in righteousness (Ezk 37^{21-28} etc.).

ii. New Testament.—In the NT use of the term these limitations naturally disappear. Here also hope grounded on divine promises retains the central place in the religious life (Ro 8^{24}, cf. He 11), and its content as a fellowship with Himself into which God graciously introduces men is the same always; but the external conditions amid which in the OT this is realized remain in the NT merely as a metaphorical colouring in the language expressive of the final spiritual good made available through Jesus Christ. Thus our Lord's saying, 'Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth' (Mt 5^{5}), may be regarded merely as a figurative mode of signifying the fulness of life and blessedness to which faith ultimately brings men (so Meyer and others; for a more literal interpretation see Expositor's Greek Testament, in loc.). Elsewhere Jesus speaks of the faithful inheriting 'the kingdom' (Mt 25^{34}), which, in accordance with His general teaching, is not merely already come, but also, and even more, awaits realization in the future. And again, He represents this as synonymous with entering upon 'life eternal' (Mt 25^{46}, cf. Mk 10^{17}), but neither term does He define more fully. In the earlier apostolic writings a similar indeterminateness of usage prevails. In Ja, for example, that which faith inherits is 'the kingdom which God hath promised to them that love Him' (2^{5}), or again, 'the crown of life' which has been similarly promised (1^{12}), both expressions being employed to denote generally the ultimate full possession of salvation. In 1 P the connexion of ideas is only slightly more elaborate. Here singular stress is laid upon the hope which lies at the heart of faith always. Possession of it is the distinctive note of the Christian life (1^{3} 3^{15}); it looks towards the Parousia and the 'grace' which shall be 'manifested' then ($1^{7.\,8.\,13}$ $5^{1.\,4}$); and just as it appears to the writer that the 'people of God' has now first, through Christ's death and resurrection, been truly constituted (2^{4-10}), so also he represents their 'inheritance' as now at length fully discovered and secured (1^{3-5}). It has been suggested (by Weiss, NT Theologie, § 50 (c) Anm. 4) that the characterization of the 'inheritance' as 'incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away,' contains a covert allusion to various OT phrases applied to the land of Israel (Is 24^4, Jer 2^7, Is $40^{6ff.}$); and this is possible. But no closer definition of it is given. As synonyms the expressions 'life' (3^7, cf. 4^6) and 'glory' or 'crown of glory' ($5^{1.4.10}$) are employed, but without being explained further

In the hands of two of the NT writers, however, the idea in question receives much fuller treatment. From his peculiar point of view, the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews is naturally led to make not a little of a conception which had played so large a part in the world of OT faith (see note on κληρονομία in Westcott's Hebrews, p. 167 f.). That which constitutes the 'inheritance' of the believer is described variously as 'the blessing,' i.e. of the covenant (12^{17}), 'salvation' (negatively, from death and every evil, $2^{14.15}$ 5^7; positively, as the securing of man in his eternal destiny, 2^3 5^9 9^{28}), 'the promises' (6^{12}), and otherwise. But, in order to apprehend the idea as it presents itself to this writer's mind, it must be subsumed under and interpreted in harmony with the general conceptions and argument of the Epistle. Religion with him is regarded in the light of a covenant into which God has graciously entered with men. Essentially this has been one and the same from the beginning, but historically it has embodied itself in two forms, the Sinaitic and that made through Christ, so diverse in various respects that they may be distinguished as the 'first' and 'second' covenants (8^7), of which the earlier proved ineffective and only the later has truly realized the purposes which such an arrangement had in view. In one sense the covenant may be considered as its own end. As signifying a state of relatedness in which God becomes to men their God and they become His people, it stands for that which in itself makes great part of their blessedness, and which is only secured in the 'new covenant' (8^{13}), under the provisions of which the conscience is cleansed from dead works and the worshipper has boldness to enter into the holiest ($9^{14.19}$ etc., compared with $7^{11.18}$ etc.). But chiefly it is regarded as contemplating that which lies beyond itself. In its later form especially, as sealed by a 'better sacrifice' than before (9^{23}), it rests also upon 'better promises' ($8^{6.10-12}$), the fulfilment of which introduces the people once for all into a sphere in which all their hopes and needs are satisfied. Through this 'eternal covenant' (13^{20}) administered by Jesus (9^{15}, where the author, through playing on the double sense of διαθήκη as meaning both 'covenant' and 'testament,' brings the idea of succession, namely on the death of 'the testator,' into view for the moment) believers receive the promise of the eternal inheritance (9^{15}); a consummation otherwise described as reaching the heavenly city (11^{16}) or the city that hath the foundations (11^{10}), or receiving the kingdom that cannot be shaken (12^{28}), or having the world to come subjected to them (2^5 etc.), or entering upon the rest of God. In such expressions the influence of OT modes of thought is obvious, and the last especially forms the subject of a remarkable passage (3. 4) in which the writer betrays almost more fully than anywhere his sense alike of the continuity of salvation under the old covenant and the new, and of the final completeness with which the latter realizes it. When Israel originally entered upon their inheritance and 'possessed the land and dwelt therein,' J″, says the historian, 'gave them rest round about according to all that He sware unto their fathers' (Jos $21^{43.44}$). But, as the author of the Epistle recognizes, it proved a delusive rest (4^8). Enemies still infesting the land, war waged from without, civil strife and manifold evils in every age disturbed the condition of peace and blessedness assured to them, and which is here (4^{3-5}) represented as a participation in the deep tranquil satisfaction with which God Himself rests in the enjoyment of the works of His hands. Nevertheless, the divine purpose cannot be defeated (4^6); it can only at most be temporarily suspended, and that which Israel through unbelief ($3^{10.16.17}$ 4^{11}) came short of 'we who believe' (i.e. in the 'good tidings preached unto us,' 4^2) attain to (4^3). To put it otherwise, we 'inherit the promises' (6^{12}) in their full and final expression. As has been said (Davidson, Hebrews, p. 99), 'the mere land of Canaan was never in itself all that was understood either by those to whom it was promised or by God who promised it, when it was named as Israel's heritage. The patriarchs and people certainly looked to the possession of the land, but the idea they attached to it, or the light in which they regarded it, was that of a settled place of abode with God, where He would be fully present, and where they would find repose in His fellowship. All those religious ideas, dimly perhaps, yet in longing and imagination, clustered about it which we now attach to the heavenly world.' And all this it is, hardly to be defined more narrowly, which faith is heir to.

In the usage of St. Paul, again, the 'inheritance' often signifies the object of believing hope generally (Ac 20^{32} 26^{18}, Eph $1^{11.14}$, Col 1^{12} 3^{24}). Also, believers are said to be heirs of 'eternal life' (Tit 3^7), or, more frequently, of 'the kingdom' (1 Co $6^{9.10}$ 15^{50}, Eph 5^5), both expressions being employed in the indeterminate manner common in the Gospels and elsewhere. When he treats of the idea more at large it is in connexion with one or other of two lines of thought. The first of these concerns his anti-Judaic polemic. Quite in the manner of the author of the Ep. to the Hebrews he insists upon the divine 'promises' as lying at the basis of all true faith and hope toward God. The possession of these differentiates the Jew from the Gentile (Ro $3^{2.3}$); the covenants are essentially 'covenants of promise' (Eph 2^{12}); while the entrance of the law itself in the course of their historical fulfilment is to be regarded as a mere episode, by no means designed to supersede the promises, but rather to make more manifest the grace they contain and which bestows the inheritance (Ro 4). The import of the promise, however, is stated as being that Abraham should be 'heir of the world' (v.^{13}), an interpretation of the original covenant expressing in a remarkable way the universal purpose which lay within it. But in this sense the covenant is fulfilled only in Christ (Gal 3^{16}), with whom again, in St. Paul's thinking, believers are indissolubly bound up (Gal 3^9, Ro 4^{16} 8^{17}); and perhaps, although it must be confessed he does not do this explicitly, it is under this point of view that we ought to bring his references to the inheriting of 'the kingdom.' It is Christ who, as Abraham's seed, has in the first instance assumed the rule of the Messianic kingdom (Gal 3^{16}), and believers, as reckoned within that seed (Gal 3^{29}) and called to His fellowship (1 Co 1^9), may be said to share in His rule (1 Co 4^8, Ro 5^{17}), in which, in accordance with Eastern modes of thought, the prerogative of judging is included (1 Co $6^{2.3}$; cf. Mt 19^{28}).

More distinctive of this apostle still, however, is his attaching of the idea in question to that of the sonship of believers. For his doctrine under this head see art. ADOPTION. What is of importance here to note is, that in his view sonship carries with it an indefeasible right to the inheritance—'if sons, then heirs' (Gal 4^{7}). As Weiss expresses it, 'as justification is the security for life, so its result, adoption, is the security for participation in the divine δόξα as the second chief part of Christian hope in which the whole blessedness and glory of the future eternal life is comprehended in one great view' (Op. cit. § 97 (e)). As Son, Christ is destined to glory, and first through His resurrection attains to it (Ro 1^{4}); and so also believers, who bear 'the image of the heavenly,' are in the resurrection conformed to the 'likeness of the Son of God,' so that he becomes 'the firstborn among many brethren' (1 Co 15^{49}, Ro 8^{29}). The transformation of the 'body of our humiliation,' accordingly, holds an emphatic place in the inheritance which St. Paul teaches (Ph 3^{21}); while along with this goes a perfect inward assimilation to the mind of the Lord, and beyond it lies that which the apostle describes as 'glory' (see art. under that title), a spiritual condition to which God's children are destined (Ro 8^{30} 9^{23}), in which the mystery of their adoption is finally disclosed (Ro 8^{19}, Col 3^{4}), in the freedom and blessedness of which creation generally will share (Ro $8^{19ff.}$), and which constitutes the ultimate aim of the divine counsel (1 Co 2^{7}). Of the inheritance thus conceived, the Spirit, who attests our adoption (Ro 8^{16}), is meanwhile the seal and earnest (Eph 1^{14} 4^{30}).

Finally, in the Apoc. the faithful are said to 'inherit all (or 'these') things' (21^{7}). What these 'things' consist of is to be gathered from the book generally. Chiefly they appear to embrace 'life'—that life 'which is life indeed' (cf. the recurring representation of the idea in such figures as the 'tree of life' 22^{2}, the 'water of life' 22^{1}, the 'crown of life' which the conquerors carry off 2^{10} 3^{11}, the 'book of life' in which their names are written 21^{27} etc.); perfect holiness (2^{17} $3^{4.5}$ 4^{4} 6^{11} 7^{9} 19^{8}); immediate fellowship with God (7^{15} $21^{3.22}$ 22^{3}), and the vision of His face (22^{4}). A royal dignity (22^{5}) and glory (2^{28}) also pertain to that which awaits the believer, along with deliverance from all pain and want and death (7^{16} 21^{4}). It is a blessedness (14^{13} 19^{9} 22^{14}) which is complete and eternal. ALEX. MARTIN.

INIQUITY.—See SIN.

INJURIOUS.—Like the Fr. injurieux, 'injurious' formerly had the meaning of 'insulting,' as well as its mod. meaning of 'hurtful.' Hence in Sir 8^{11} and 1 Ti 1^{13} the adj. ὑβριστής which means 'insolent' is tr^{d} in AV 'injurious.' The same adj. occurs in Ro 1^{30}, where AV has 'despiteful,' RV 'insolent.' RV gives 'insolent' in Sir, but retains 'injurious' in 1 Ti. The meaning of the Eng. word may be illustrated from Shaks. II Henry VI. I. iv. 51—

> 'Injurious duke, that threatest where's no cause and Pope, Iliad, ii. 274—

> 'Thus with injurious taunts attacked the throne.

The adv. was used in the same sense, as Hall, Works, iii. 966, 'Humane reason is apt to be injuriously saucy, in ascribing those things to an ordinary course of natural causes, which the God of nature doth by supernatural Agents.' And the subst. 'injury,' as Bacon, 'He fell to bitter invectives against the French king, and spake all the injuries he could devise of Charles.'

J. HASTINGS.

INK is mentioned once in OT (Jer 36^{18}), where Baruch says that he wrote Jeremiah's prophecies 'with ink (דְּיוֹ, perhaps from a root signifying slowly flowing) in the book.' W. R. Smith (OTJC^{2} 71 n.) refers to Ex 32^{33} and Nu 5^{23} for evidence that the old Hebrew ink (derived from lamp-black [?]) could be washed off, and as the foundation of the Rabbinical prejudice against the use of a mordant in ink. From the bright colours that still survive in some papyri, it is evident that the ink used by the Egyptians must have been of a superior kind. The NT term for 'ink,' occurring three times (2 Co 3^{3}, 2 Jn ^{12}, 3 Jn ^{13}), is μέλαν (lit. 'black,' Lat. atramentum), which is also a classical term (Plato, Phædr. 276 C; Demos. de Coron. 313. 11; Plut. Mor. 841). See, further, under WRITING.

INKHORN.—In one of Ezekiel's visions (Ezk $9^{2.3.11}$) a man appears with a scribe's inkhorn (קֶסֶת הַסֹּפֵר) by his side (lit. 'upon his loins,' בְּמָתְנָיו). The 'inkhorn' consisted of a case for the reed pens, with a cup or bulb for holding the ink, near the upper end of the case. It was carried in the girdle (hence the above expression). See illustration under art. DRESS, vol. i. p. 626^{b}; and cf. Benzinger, Heb. Archäol. 290. J. A. SELBIE.

INN.—Owing to the prevalence of hospitality in the East, down to our own times, the growth of places of public entertainment has been slow; and to this day, save in parts frequented by tourists, anything corresponding to our inn or hotel is entirely unknown (see HOSPITALITY).

The word 'inn' first occurs in our English Bible (AV) in Gn 42^{27} as the equivalent of מָלוֹן, and is similarly employed in Gn 43^{21}, Ex 4^{24} (LXX κατάλυμα). In other passages (Jos $4^{3.8}$, 2 K 19^{23}, Is 10^{29}, Jer 9^{2}) מָלוֹן is rendered 'lodging-place'; and the Revisers have adopted this translation uniformly throughout. This does not imply a building of any kind, but only the place where travellers, or carriers of merchandise, were wont, with their caravans, to pass the night. לוּן or לִין appears to have been used in a sense equivalent to that of the Arab bât, and the corresponding participial, mabît, is a night-lodging. The Arabs also use the word manzil in a similar sense. It is 'the place of alighting,' and is now mainly employed for the house where the traveller spends the night; but it still retains its application to the spot where a company of wayfarers may have spent the hours of darkness. Occasionally one may encounter in the East a scene which probably reproduces the chief features of that mentioned in Gn 42^{27}. Near by a well or fountain, or on the bank of a stream, as the day is closing, the caravan will halt. The bales of goods are lifted from the beasts of burden, and placed so as to shelter the men from the night air. The animals, having been watered, are tethered around, and supplied with fodder which they have carried. The men draw close around a fire, where, having partaken of simple fare from their provender bags, they pass an hour in conversation or in hearing or telling tales, and then lie down under their wraps to sleep till daybreak. The place thus occupied is called el-manzil; the Hebrew would have called it mālōn.

But the development of commerce would necessitate at a very early time some better means of protecting the goods and the lives of the merchants, especially in the more remote and desolate parts, where it might be needful to rest the caravan over night. That buildings were soon erected for this purpose, we have no direct proof; but it is possible that the 'lodging-place of wayfaring men' in the wilderness, referred to in Jer 9^{2}, may have been such an establishment. Chimham, the son of Barzillai, who returned to Jerusalem with David (2 S 19^{37-40}), is supposed by some to have reared some structure near to Bethlehem, which in Jeremiah's time was known as גֵּרוּת כִּמְהָם Gērūth chimham. AV renders this 'habitation of Chimham'; RV 'Geruth-chimham,' but in margin 'lodging-place.'

Stanley (S. and P. p. 329) and others translate 'inn' or 'hostel.' It may have been such a building as offered shelter to belated merchants or travellers.*

Rahab, described in Jos 2^1 as אִשָּׁה זוֹנָה, is said (but see Dillm. ad loc.) by the Chaldee paraphrase to have been an 'innkeeper.' (See also Jos. Ant. v. i. 2). The instance given in Jebamoth xvi. 7, where the innkeeper's word is not relied on without material corroboration, cannot be quoted as showing that she was regarded with special suspicion (Smith, DB, art. INN), since her evidence is placed on the same level as that of the daughter of a priestly house; but it is significant that Jewish writers seem to have used פונדקית or פונדקיתא, formed from the Greek πανδοκεύτρια, as the equivalent of either 'hostess' or זוֹנָה (David Kimchi on Jos 2^1). The idea of an 'inn' was therefore familiar to them. From Aboda Zara ii. 1 we gather that the פונדק, from the Gr. πανδοχεῖον, was a place where cattle might be sheltered as well as men; it seems to have corresponded in character with the modern khân or caravanserai. Of this order certainly was the 'inn' (πανδοχεῖον, Lk 10^{34}) to which the Good Samaritan carried the victim of outrage, and which by tradition is located at Khan Hadrûr, on the way to Jericho. The modern building is probably only the last of a succession erected on the same spot, as in that wild district the need of some such place of retreat would always be felt. Along the great trade and pilgrimage routes in the course of time these khâns or caravanserais were raised, to which the chains of mouldering ruins that stud the sides of the main highways stand to bear testimony. Many of these buildings stood apart, and were of considerable strength, to guard against marauders. Occasionally, as at Khân et-Tujjâr, under the brow of Tabor, a fortress overlooked and defended the place of rest. From the days when the sea was so infested with pirates as to render navigation perilous, probably date the ruinous buildings on the caravan routes from Aleppo, Baghdâd, Damascus, and Haurân, which met on the southern border of Esdraelon, followed the common path by Antipatris to Gaza, and passed thence to Egypt. When these pests were cleared away, and transport by ship became both safe and cheap, the deserted roads were soon grass-grown, and the khâns were left to crumble (Thomson, Land and Book, i. 106). Those built of old by the Persian magnates on the pilgrimage roads from Baghdâd (Layard, Nineveh and Babylon, p. 478) probably resembled in some ways the 'castles' that mark the desert route of the Syrian haj. One great object of the latter is to preserve for the use of the pilgrims the water collected during the rainy season. Provision for pilgrims has long been made on a liberal scale by the Greek and Roman Churches; hospices for their entertainment are found near to most of the holy places the faithful are accustomed to visit. In khân and hospice alike the sojourner furnishes his own food; and he is wise to have also, if possible, his own bedding. The person in charge—the Khânjy (cf. πανδοχεύς of Lk 10^{35})—will supply water to man and horse: nothing more is expected. For this and shelter the natives pay a trifling sum, known as hak el-khân, 'the price of the khân.'

In every town of any size in Syria more than one khân will be found, commonly resorted to by muleteers, in which the traveller's horses and native attendants are accommodated at merely nominal charges. These are often very miserable places, quite unlike the imposing buildings that once fringed the highways. There are, however, several famous khâns which represent them at their best; e.g. that of Antûn Beg in Beyrout, and that of As'ad Pasha in Damascus. The latter is 'one of the finest specimens of Arabian architecture in the country . . . the stone carving above the gateway and around the stalactite vaults is of the most elaborate character.' The khân is constructed of black basalt and white limestone in alternate layers, and is about two hundred feet square. The interior court is about half that size, with a large round fountain in the centre, above which is a lofty dome, resting upon four arches, each supported by four clustered pillars. These are connected with the walls by a series of similar arches and domes — eight in all. Those domes have each sixteen large windows through which light, air, and sunshine penetrate to the rooms and the court below. Around the sides are vaulted magazines of various sizes, for the disposal of merchandise of every description at wholesale.

'On either side of the main entrance a staircase leads up to an arched corridor, which extends quite around the building and communicates with the small retail shops and offices of the merchants. It forms a fine promenade, from where one can look down on the strange and truly Oriental scene in the court below, free from the noise and confusion which there characterize each commercial transaction, large or small. To Khân As'ad Pasha come caravans from Baghdâd, Mosul, Aleppo, Beyrout, and elsewhere. On entering, the muleteers and camel-drivers, with mighty din and uproar, throw down their loads of merchandise in this court, and here they must remain until the owners settle with the custom-house officials' (Thomson, Land and Book, iii. 373, 374). With this corresponds Lane's description of the Wakálehs in Cairo (Mod. Egyp. ed. 1895, p. 325).

The ordinary khân was, however, a hollow square, open above, with arches round one or more of the sides within, and over these a series of rooms, approached by a stone stair. The rooms are for travellers; muleteers, animals, and baggage share the space and arches below. In the opinion of the present writer, this must be distinguished from the κατάλυμα or guest chamber,* in which the parents of Jesus sought shelter when they reached Bethlehem (Lk 2^7). The meaning of this word in the NT may be gathered from a reference to Mk 14^{14}, Lk 22^{11}, taken in the light of a prevailing Jewish custom. These two passages concern a room in a private house, which the owner readily places at the disposal of Jesus and His disciples for the celebration of the Passover. This was in accordance with the ordinary practice. At the festivals of Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles the people were commanded to repair to Jerusalem; and it was a boast of the Rabbis, that, notwithstanding the enormous crowds, no man could truthfully say to his fellow, 'I have not found a fire where to roast my paschal lamb in Jerusalem,' or 'I have not found a bed in Jerusalem to lie in,' or 'My lodging is too strait in Jerusalem' (Aboth R. Nathan, cap. 34, quoted by Lightfoot, Works, ed. 1825, ix. p. 128). The vast numbers who came for the Passover from all parts were made free of the needed apartments, as far as the capacity of the houses permitted; and for this no payment was taken. It was, however, customary for the guests on departing to leave the skins of the paschal lambs, and the vessels which had been employed in the ceremonies, in token of gratitude for their hospitable entertainment (Talm. Bab. Joma, fol. 12. 1, quoted by Lightfoot, Works, xi. p. 325; compare also use of verb καταλύω in Lk 9^{12} 19^7). We may reasonably suppose that on such an occasion as the great enrolment, when natives of a town came from afar, the 'guest chambers' of their friends would be thrown open to receive them. Joseph, arriving late, found that in which he had purposed to stay already occupied; and no room elsewhere being available, he betook himself with his charge to the khân. Even this apparently was full; possibly some of the animals were moved to afford them space; and here Jesus was born.

* Instead of גֵּרוּת, however, there are weighty reasons for reading גִּדְרוֹת 'pens or folds.' So Josephus and Aquila, followed by Hitzig and others.

* Κατάλυμα is used, however, in Ex 4^{24} to translate מָלוֹן.

Well-organized and equipped hotels are now to be found at the principal seaports of Egypt and Syria, and also in the chief inland towns. Along the more frequented roads the natives have learned that something may be gained by accommodating travellers; but remote from the main routes the ancient conditions prevail.

INNER MAN or INWARD MAN.—An expression, the exact force of which depends on the contrast intended where it occurs. In 2 Co 4^{16} the contrast is between the 'outward man' (ὁ ἔξω ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος) as mortal and perishable, and the 'inward' as spiritual and immortal; where note, that the Revisers' Greek, with WH and others, reads ὁ ἔσω ἡμῶν (instead of ὁ ἔσωθεν, TR), which exactly corresponds with the former member of the antithesis. Not very remote from this is the contrast in 1 P $3^{3.\,4}$ between the 'outward adorning' (ὁ ἔξωθεν κόσμος) and 'the hidden man of the heart.'

But the two peculiarly Pauline passages are Ro 7^{22} and Eph 3^{16}, where κατὰ τὸν ἔσω ἄνθρωπον and εἰς τὸν ἔσω ἄνθρωπον are used of something very closely akin to the 'new nature' or the 'renewed man.' The contrast in Ro 7^{22} is of the 'inward man' or of the 'mind' (νοῦς, v.^{23}), with 'the flesh' or 'the law of sin in the members.' In Eph 3^{16} there is no direct antithesis, but a single and positive reference to the new nature, or, at least, to the seat of the Spirit's indwelling and working, to which the corresponding expression in v.^{17} is 'that Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith.' It is possible in both passages to distinguish between the 'inward man' and the new or regenerate nature, but only in the sense that the former is the inner or higher self in man as acted on by divine grace, enlightened by God's law, and under preparation and discipline for salvation. Cremer holds that what is really meant by these expressions is not the mere contrast between the inward and the outward in man, between the invisible and the visible, the reality and the appearance, but the inner, spiritual, divine nature in antagonism to the flesh. 'Inward man,' upon this construction, would answer very nearly to πνεῦμα when that word is used in the special sense of (e.g.) Ro 8^{10}, for the 'new nature,' i.e. the spirit of man renewed and sustained by the Spirit of God. Thus the phrase must be reckoned as belonging to an entirely NT cycle of ideas—indeed to one almost exclusively Pauline.

INORDINATE.—'Inordinate love' is the clumsy trⁿ in Ezk 23^{11} of עֲגָבָה, a word which occurs only there, and means 'lust' (RV 'doting'); and 'inordinate affection' in Col 3^{5} of πάθος (RV 'passion'). The former trⁿ comes from Cov. (Wyc. 'lecherie') and the latter from the Bishops' Bible (Wyc. 'leccherie,' Tind. 'unnatural lust,' Gen. 'wantounes,' Rhem. 'lust'). Inordinate is ill-regulated, ungoverned, as Bacon, Essays, 'Of Love' (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 36), 'the former was indeed a voluptuous Man and Inordinate, but the latter was an Austere and wise man'; and Shaks. Othello, II. iii. 311—'Every inordinate cup is unblessed, and the ingredient is a devil.' Wyc. uses the adv. in 2 Th 3^{6} 'withdrawe you fro ech brother wandrynge unordynatly'; and Latimer, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 99), 'I heare saye ye walke inordinatelye, ye talke unsemelye other wayes then it becommeth Christian subjectes.' J. HASTINGS.

INQUISITION.—To make inquisition is to make investigation, to search, Dt 19^{18}, Est 2^{23}, Ps 9^{12}, 2 Es 6^{19}, Wis 1^{9} 6^{3} (RV), Sir 23^{24}. In Sir 41^{4} the phrase is 'There is no inquisition in the grave' (οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν ᾅδου ἐλεγμὸς ζωῆς, RV 'There is no inquisition of life in the grave,' RVm 'in Hades'), that is, no inquiry is made there how long or short a man's life has been. Coverdale uses the word in Job 10^{6} 'Are thy dayes as the dayes of man, and thy yeares as mans yeares? that thou makest soch inquisicion for my wickednesse, and searchest out my synne?' and 35^{15} 'Then useth he no violence in his wrath nether hath he pleasure in curious and depe inquisicions.' And Fuller (Holy Warre, iii. 23, p. 150), in memory of Ps 9^{12}, says, 'But no doubt God, when he maketh inquisition for bloud, will one day remember this bloudy Inquisition.'

INSECTS.—See NATURAL HISTORY.

INSPIRE, INSPIRATION.—To 'inspire' is literally to 'breathe into,'* and that is the meaning of the word in its single occurrence in AV, Wis 15^{11} 'Forasmuch as he knew not his Maker, and him that inspired into him an active soul, and breathed in a living spirit' (τὸν ἐμπνεύσαντα αὐτῷ ψυχὴν ἐνεργοῦσαν, καὶ ἐμφυσήσαντα πνεῦμα ζωτικόν); Vulg. 'qui inspiravit illi animam quæ operatur, et qui insufflavit ei spiritum vitalem.' Wyc. has 'enspirede' here, but in other places he uses the simple 'spire' = breathe, as Gn 2^{7} 'The Lord God thanne fourmede man of the slyme of the erthe, and spiride in to the face of hym an entre [=entrance] of breth of lijf' (1388 'brethide'). All the other versions have in the passage just quoted from Wyc. 'breathed the breath,' and it is probably in memory of the Vulg. 'inspiravit in faciem ejus spiraculum vitæ' that Bacon (Essays, 'Of Truth,' p. 3) has 'First he breathed Light upon the Face of the Matter or Chaos; then he breathed Light into the Face of Man; and still he breatheth and inspireth Light into the Face of his Chosen'; and Milton, PL x. 785—

> 'Yet one doubt
> Pursues me still, lest all I cannot die;
> Lest that pure breath of life, the spirit of Man
> Which God inspired, cannot together perish
> With this corporeal clod.'

Cf. also Judgement of the Synode at Dort, p. 40, 'So then faith is the gift of God; not in that it is profered by God unto man's free-will, but because it is really bestowed, inspired, and infused into man.' Then the word passes into the meaning of 'fill with the spirit,' which we see in Knox, Works, iii. 99, 'Happie is the man whome thow sall inspyre, O Lord'; and in Tindale's trⁿ of Mk 12^{36} 'for David him selfe inspyred with the holy goost, sayde.'

Inspiration occurs twice in AV: (1) Job 32^{8} 'But there is a spirit in man: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding'; Heb. נִשְׁמַת שַׁדַּי; Vulg. 'Inspiratio Omnipotentis'; Wyc. 1382 'the inbrething of the Almyghti,' 1388 'the enspiryng ether revelacioun of Almyghti God'; so Cov. has 'inspiration,' and is followed by all the versions except RV 'the breath of the Almighty,' which agrees with LXX πνοή, and with AV in 33^{4} for the same Heb. 'The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life.' The reference is to Gn 2^{7}. (2) 2 Ti 3^{16} 'All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine'; Gr. πᾶσα γραφὴ θεόπνευστος καὶ ὠφέλιμος; RV 'Every Scripture inspired of God is also profitable.' For the doctrine of the Inspiration of the Bible see under art. BIBLE, vol. i. p. 296. For this passage, reference may be made (besides the commentaries) to Perowne in Expos. Times, ii. 54; Warfield in Pres. Quarterly, July, 1889, pp. 389-406 (with Old and New Test. Student, Oct. 1889, ix. 245); Row, BL 454; Drummond, Hib. Lect. 77 f.; and Cremer, s.v. θεόπνευστος. The construction of the sentence in RV is the oldest Eng. construction: thus Wyc. 'al scripture onspired of god, is profitable,' Tind. 'al scripture geven by inspiracion of god, is profittable,' so Coverdale and the Great Bible. The Gen. Bible is the first to offer 'the whole Scripture is geven by spiration of God, and is profitable.' Tindale elsewhere uses the word in the same sense of a person, as Lk 2^{27} 'And he [Simeon] came by inspiracion in to the temple.' J. HASTINGS.

---

* The literal meaning is well seen in Spenser, FQ II. iii. 30—

> 'Her yellowe lockes, crisped like golden wyre,
> About her shoulders weren loosely shed,
> And, when the winde emongst them did inspyre,
> They waved like a penon wyde dispred,
> And low behinde her backe were scattered.'

INSTANT.—Instant (in-stare, stand upon, press upon) is used in AV in the sense of the present immediate time, as Is 29^{5} 'it shall be at an instant suddenly'; and as an adj. in the sense of 'pressing,' 'urgent': so Lk 23^{23} 'And they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified' (ἐπέκειντο; Vulg. instabant, which gave Rhem. 'were instant,' whence AV; Amer. RV 'were urgent'); Ro 12^{12} 'continuing instant in prayer' (again from Rhem., Vulg. instantes, Gr. προσκαρτεροῦντες, RV 'continuing stedfastly'); and 2 Ti 4^{2} 'be instant in season, out of season' (ἐπίστηθι, Vulg. insta, Bishops 'be instant,' Rhem. 'urge'). Cf. Knox, Hist. 36, 'At their instant suit, more than of his own motion, was Thomas Gwilliame, a black Frier, called to bee Preacher'; and Ac 6^{4} Rhem. 'But we wil be instant in praier and the ministerie of the word.'

Instantly in AV means 'urgently,' Lk 7^{4} 'they besought him instantly' (σπουδαίως; Vulg, sollicite; 'instantly' is Tindale's word here; RV 'earnestly'); and Ac 26^{7} 'Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come' (ἐν ἐκτενείᾳ, AV again from Tind., RV 'earnestly'). Cf. Tind. Prol. to Pent. 'It is not ynough therfore to read and talke of it only, but we must also desyre god daye and night instantly to open oure eyes, and to make us understond and feale wherfore the scripture was geven'; and his tr^{n} of Mk 5^{10} 'And he prayd him instantly, that he wolde not sende them awaye out of the countre,' where AV follows Rhem. 'he besought him much.' So Cranmer has 'very instantly' in Works, i. 77, 'which prior and his brethren . . . have desired me very instantly to be a mediator for them to your Most Noble Majesty'; and Melvill, Diary, 171, 'In the mean tyme, the Erles of Angus and Mar, lyand at Newcastell, wryttes for me ans, and the second tyme verie instantlie, to com and pretche the Word unto tham for ther comfort.' The Rhem. NT uses 'instance' in the same sense in Eph 6^{18} 'watching in al instance and supplication.' Shakespeare has both adj. and adv. frequently, but always with reference to time.

J. HASTINGS.

INSTRUMENT.—In the current sense of the means of accomplishing anything 'instrument' frequently occurs in OT, chiefly as tr. of kělî. In NT it is found but twice, both in Ro 6^{13} and in the same sense, 'Neither yield ye your members as instruments of unrighteousness unto sin: but yield yourselves unto God, as those that are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments of righteousness unto God.' The Gr. is ὅπλα, the ordinary word for 'weapons' (as AVm and RVm), and it is very doubtful if in NT it ever means 'instruments.' Besides, the military metaphor was more natural to St. Paul, and it reappears in v.^{23} 'the wages ('your pay as soldiers' —Sanday) of sin is death.' Then the meaning is as Lightfoot expresses it (Notes on Epistles of St. Paul), 'Sin is regarded as a sovereign who demands the military service of subjects, levies their quota of arms, and gives them their soldiers' pay of death.' Moule hits happily on 'implements,' which is capable of either interpretation, but he also regards the metaphor as a military one.

In To 7^{14} and 1 Mac 13^{42} 'instrument' has the legal sense of a 'deed.' The Gr. is general, συγγραφή, a document.

For Instruments of Music see MUSIC.

J. HASTINGS.

INTELLIGENCE.—Dn 11^{30} 'He shall even return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant.' The meaning is more than mutual understanding, it is 'communication,' 'intercourse.' So Knox, Hist. 186, 'The Queene did grievously complaine, that we had intelligence with England'; and Drayton, Pierce Gaveston—

> 'From whence I found a secret means, to have > Intelligence with my kind lord the king.'

The Heb., however (וְיָבֵן עַל), means simply 'give heed to'; RV 'have regard unto.' The Eng. word occurs also in 2 Mac 3^{9} in the ordinary sense of 'information,' which is the word preferred by RV. J. HASTINGS.

INTEMPERANCE.—See DRUNKENNESS.

INTEND, INTENT.—To intend is used by Spenser in the lit. sense of the Lat. intendere, to stretch out: FQ I. xi. 38—

> 'The same advancing high above his head,
> With sharpe intended sting so rude him smot,
> That to the earth him drove, as stricken dead.'

But in AV it is used only in the sense of directing the will to an object. This is sometimes no more than the formation of a design, as in modern use. So Ac 5^{35} 20^{13} (μέλλω). But sometimes it is the determination of the will, a fixed resolve, as Ac 5^{28} 12^{4} (βούλομαι), Lk 14^{28} (θέλω). Cf. Gal 1^{7} Tind. 'ther be some which trouble you, and intende to pervert the gospell of Christ' (θέλοντες μεταστρέψαι). The word is even used in the sense of pursuing a resolution (as distinguished from merely forming it). Thus in Jos 22^{33} it is said that after an explanation from the eastern tribes 'the children of Israel blessed God, and did not intend to go up against them in battle,' where the meaning of AV is no doubt as explained by Davies (Bible English, 194), that they had intended in our sense of the word but no longer prosecuted the design. Cf. Latimer, Sermons, i. 342, 'The devil sleepeth not; he ever intendeth to withdraw us from prayer'; Knox, Works, iii. 297, 'Howe these my wordes at that tyme pleased men, the crymes and action intended agaynste me dyd declare'; and Chapman, Homer's Iliads, viii. 80—

> 'Stay, let us both intend
> To drive this cruel enemy from our dear aged friend.'

This verb is now rarely used with a direct object. In AV we find Ps 21^{11} 'For they intended evil against thee' (נָטוּ 'they stretched'; Perowne, either 'they have spread against thee evil,' like a net, Lat. tendere insidias; or 'they have bent against thee,' etc., like a bow, Lat. tendere arcum; Del. 'cause evil to impend over thee,' so Cheyne; Wellh.-Furness, 'When they revolve evil against thee'; King, 'Though they plotted evil against thee'); Ad. Est 13^{4} (κατευθύνω); 2 Mac 14^{5} 'being . . . asked how the Jews stood affected and what they intended' (ἐν τίνι διαθέσει καὶ βουλῇ καθέστηκαν, RV 'what they purposed'); and 14^{8} 'even for that I intend the good of mine own countrymen' (καὶ τῶν ἰδίων πολιτῶν στοχασάμενος, RV 'I have regard also to mine own fellow-citizens'). So Knox, Hist. 25, 'And thus did those cruell beasts intend nothing but murther in all the quarters of this Realme.'

Intent is always purpose, intention, as in Tindale, Expositions, p. 96 (on Mt 6$^{14-18}$), 'But and if thou think that God delighteth in the work for the work itself, the true intent away, and in thy pain for thy pain itself, thou art as far out of the way as from heaven to the earth'; and p. 147 (on 1 Jn 1^{3}), 'To bring unto the fellowship of God and Christ, is the final intent of all the scripture.' So Jer 44^{25} Cov. 'Purposely have ye set up youre owne good meanynges, and hastely have ye fulfilled youre owne intente'; and Knox, Hist. 149, 'They were minded to keep no point of the promise longer than they had obtained their intent.' The phrase in AV is usually 'to the intent that,' but the plural occurs Jer 30^{24} 'until he have performed the intents of his heart' (מְזִמּוֹת לִבּוֹ); He 4^{12} 'a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart' (κριτικὸς . . . ἐννοιῶν καρδίας). Fuller says of the Crusaders (Holy Warre, I. xii. p. 18), 'We must in charitie allow that many of them were truly zealous, and went with pious intents'; and on p. 243 (v. 9), 'Farre be it from us to condemn all their works to be drosse, because debased and alloyed with superstitious intents.'

INTERCESSION.—See PRAYER.

INTERMEDDLE (from Old Fr. entre among and medler to mix) meant formerly either literally to mix, as Malory, Morte Darthur, xvii. 15, 'Right so entered he into the chamber, and came toward the table of silver; and when he came nigh he felt a breath that him thought it was intermeddled with fire'; and Hakluyt, Voyages, i. 572, 'He hath intermedled in his historie certaine things contrary to the trueth'; or else figuratively to have to do with, take an interest in, which is the meaning in AV. It occurs twice, Pr 14^{10} 'The heart knoweth his own bitterness; and a stranger doth not intermeddle with his joy' (יִתְעָרַב, takes part in, shares, not necessarily interferes in; LXX ἐπιμίγνυται; Vulg. 'miscebitur'); and 18^{1} 'Through desire a man, having separated himself, seeketh and intermeddleth with all wisdom' (בְּכָל־תּוּשִׁיָּה יִתְגַּלָּע, RV 'rageth against all sound wisdom,' RVm 'quarrelleth with'; Del. 'Against all that is beneficial he showeth his teeth'; Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'bursts out in strife against.' AV misunderstands the meaning, and takes the verb in a good sense, 'have to do with,' 'take an interest in,' after the tr. of the Gen. Bible, 'For the desire thereof he wil separate him self to seke it, and occupie him self in all wisdome,' with its margin, 'He that loveth wisdome, wil separate him self from all impediments, and give him self wholly to seke it').

INTERMEDIATE STATE.—See ESCHATOLOGY.

INTERPRETATION.—This subst. and its verb are used in Scripture in a variety of senses.

1. Of dreams (פָּתַר 'interpret,' פִּתְרוֹן 'interpretation'); the dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker, Gn 40$^{5. 8. 12. 16. 18. 22}$ 41$^{11. 12. 13}$; Pharaoh's dream, 41$^{8. 15}$; Gideon's dream, Jg 7^{15} (where the word for 'interpretation' is the ἅπ. λεγ. שֶׁבֶר, lit. 'breaking up,' i.e. 'solution'). In Dn occur the Aramaic forms פְּשַׁר (verb) 'interpret' (Qal in Dn 5^{16}, Pael ptcp. מְפַשַּׁר 5^{12}), and פְּשַׁר (noun) 'interpretation'; used of the dreams of Nebuchadnezzar (Dn 2$^{4ff.}$ 4^{6}), of Daniel himself (7^{16}); cf. the use of the same word for the interpretation to Belshazzar of the writing on the wall (5$^{7ff.}$), and the similar use of פֵּשֶׁר in Ec 8^{1} (only).

Dreams being regarded as vehicles of divine communication and frequently as portending future events, it became a matter of great importance to discover their interpretation. This function was discharged at the court of Egypt by the חַרְטֻמִּים 'sacred scribes' (Gn 41^{8}; cf. the complaint of the butler and the baker, while in prison, 'We have dreamed a dream, and there is none that can interpret it,' 40^{8}). With the reply of Joseph (ib.), 'Do not interpretations belong to God?' compare the statement of Herodotus (ii. 83) regarding the Egyptian opinion, Ἀνθρώπων μὲν οὐδενὶ προσκέεται ἡ τέχνη, τῶν δὲ θεῶν μετεξετέροισι. The 'wise men' and 'Chaldæans' (the latter by a late conception) have similar functions attributed to them, in the Book of Daniel, at the court of Babylon.

2. Of interpreting a foreign language. Egyptian being, of course, the language of the court, the conversation between Joseph and his brethren was carried on by the medium of an interpreter, who was probably always expected to be in attendance at court (Gn 42^{23} הַמֵּלִיץ with art. 'the interpreter'). The interpreter being between (בֵּינֹתָם ib.) the two parties, מֵלִיץ can be used as = 'ambassador' (2 Ch 32^{31}) or 'mediator' (Is 43^{27}, of prophets standing between J″ and Israel; Job 33^{23}, of an angel as interpreting to man God's providential treatment of him and what is right for him to do [Davidson], probably also as interceding for man to God [Dillmann, Siegfried-Stade]). הֵלִיץ and its derivatives (cf. מְלִיצָה in Hab 2^{6}, 'taunt-song') have always the sense of deriding or taunting except in the four above-cited passages, Gn 42^{23}, 2 Ch 32^{31}, Is 43^{27}, Job 33^{23} (contrast 16^{20}), and in Pr 1^{6} where מְלִיצָה (LXX σκοτεινὸς λόγος) probably means 'a dark saying' (RV 'a figure') rather than 'interpretation' (AV, RVm).

In Ezr 4^{7} the passive ptcp. מְתֻרְגָּם is used of a translation from Persian into Aramaic. From this root comes the well-known word Targum ('paraphrase') as well as the designation meturgeman applied to the official in the synagogue, who was required to translate the Hebrew (which was read to, but no longer understood by, the people) into the Aramaic vernacular. Latterly, in addition to translating the sacred text, the meturgeman was wont to add all manner of Haggāda to it (W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 36, 64 n., 154).

In NT we have the familiar phrase 'which is, being interpreted,' etc. (μεθερμηνευόμενος, ὃ ἑρμηνεύεται, διερμηνευόμενος, ὃ μεθερμηνεύεται), where a Heb. or Aram. expression is rendered into Greek (Mt 1^{23}, Mk 5^{41} 15$^{22. 34}$, Jn 1$^{38. 41}$ etc. Ac 9^{36} 13^{8}), a symbolical force being also sometimes discovered in it (Jn 1^{42} 9^{7}, Ac 4^{36}, He 7^{2}).

Although it scarcely falls within the scope of the present article, the reference of Papias (ap. Eusebius, HE iii. 39) to St. Mark as the 'interpreter' (ἑρμηνευτής) of St. Peter may be mentioned (see MARK). Link (SK, 1896, Heft iii. p. 405 ff.; cf. Expos. Times, Aug. 1896, p. 496) contends strongly that 'interpreter' here is to be understood in its strictly literal sense, implying that the Apostle Peter, in his missionary journeys among the Jews of the Diaspora, availed himself of St. Mark's services to render Aramaic into Greek.

3. Of interpreting the utterances of those who spoke with tongues. This was a 'gift' (χάρισμα) which might or might not belong to the speaker with tongues himself (1 Co 12$^{10. 30}$ 14$^{5. 13. 26. 27. 28}$). See CHURCH, vol. i. p. 428^{b}, and TONGUES (GIFT OF).

4. Considerable uncertainty attaches to the meaning of the word 'interpretation' in 2 P 1^{20} (γινώσκοντες ὅτι πᾶσα προφητεία γραφῆς ἰδίας ἐπι- λύσεως οὐ γίνεται, 'knowing that no prophecy of Scripture is of private interpretation'; cf. the use of ἐπιλύειν in Mk 4^{34} and Ac 19^{39}). All the varieties of explanation may be grouped under two heads, according as the 'interpretation' is (a) ours or (b) the prophet's own. Both the context and the very similar language of Philo (Quis rer. div. hær. p. 52) plead in favour of the second explanation. Grimm, indeed (Clavis, s. γίγνομαι), supports the first, taking the meaning to be that no one can by his own mental powers explain the prophecies of the OT, but that he requires the aid of the same spirit which originally called forth their utterance. But this true conception seems hardly in place here. See further Alford, ad loc., and Farrar (Early Days of Christianity, 119 n.), who takes the meaning to be that 'the prophets did not speak by spontaneous knowledge and spoke more than they could themselves interpret . . . If this utterance is not his own, his interpretation may also well be inadequate (cf. 1 P 1^{10-12}).'

For interpretation of prophecy see PROPHECY.

The history of the various schemes, Jewish and Christian, for interpreting Scripture, the supposed double sense, the allegorizing method once so much in vogue, etc., lie outside the scope of this article. For details, the reader must refer to works on Rabbinical Theology and on Hermeneutics.

J. A. SELBIE.

INTREAT, ENTREAT.—In the edd. of AV since 1760 'entreat' has the meaning of 'deal with,' 'handle' (mod. 'treat'), and 'intreat' of 'beg,' 'pray.' But they are different spellings of the same verb (fr. Lat. in-tractare, through Fr. entraiter), and in 1611 the spelling was indifferently 'entreat' or 'intreat.'

In the sense of treat, 'entreat' occurs in AV 1611 eleven times, 'intreat' twelve times; in the sense of pray, 'entreat' occurs eleven times, 'intreat' twenty-eight times. In Job 19^{16} we find 'I intreated him with my mouth,' but in the next verse 'I entreated for the children's sake.' Again in Jer 15^{11} we read, 'I will cause the enemie to intreat thee well in the time of evill,' while the marg. has 'Or, I will entreat the enemie for thee.' The subst. is found once 'intreaty' (Pr 18^{23}), once 'entreaty' (2 Co 8^{4}), both meaning 'petition.'

1. To entreat is simply to 'deal with,' 'handle,' any person or thing, as Hos 6^{4} Cov., 'O Ephraim, what shal I do unto the? O Iuda, how shall I intreate the?' More, Utopia (Lumby's ed. p. 69), 'Ther com yearly to Amaurote out of every cytie iii. old men wyse and well experienced, there to entreate and debate, of the common matters of the land.' But in AV the word is used in this sense only with an adv., 'well,' 'evil,' 'spitefully,' 'shamefully,' and once in a good sense, 'courteously,' Ac 27^{3}.

2. To intreat is to 'beseech'; but in older Eng. the word had also the meaning of 'beseech successfully,' 'persuade.' Thus Shaks. As You Like It, I. ii. 135, 'since the youth will not be entreated, his own peril on his forwardness.' In this sense 'intreat' is evidently used in AV, as Gn 25^{21} 'And Isaac intreated the LORD for his wife . . . and the LORD was intreated of him.' So 2 S 21^{14} 24^{25}, 1 Ch 5^{20}, 2 Ch $33^{13.19}$, Ezr 8^{23}, Is 19^{22}. The Heb. is always the reflex. (Niph.) of עָתַר, 'âthar (as Gn 25^{21} וַיֵּעָתֶר לוֹ), which in Arabic is 'to slaughter or sacrifice' (Lane, see also Buhl s.v., and esp. We.), but in Heb. is used with the more general sense of 'supplicate' in the reflex. 'to let oneself be supplicated,' 'be persuaded,' so that 'be intreated' was an exceedingly happy rendering. In Ja 3^{17}, 'easy to be intreated' (εὐπειθής, not elsewhere in NT), the meaning is the same. The tr. is Tindale's; Wyc. has 'able to be counceilid,' Rhem. 'suasible.'

INWARD, INWARDS.—Inward means: 1. Towards the inside, as 2 S 5^{9} 'And David built round about from Millo and inward' (בָּיְתָה); 2 Ch 3^{13} 'The wings of these cherubims spread themselves forth twenty cubits: and they stood on their feet, and their faces were inward' (לַבָּיִת; RV [as AVm] 'toward the house,' RVm 'inward'); Ezk 40^{9} 'the porch of the gate was inward' (מֵהַבָּיִת, RV 'toward the house'). 2. As an adj. inward has two meanings: (1) Interior, as in Bacon, Essays, 'Of Building,' p. 184, 'Beyond this Court let there be an Inward Court, of the same Square and Height'; Bunyan, Holy War, p. 133, 'The Gaoler, therefore, having received such a charge, put them all in the inward prison'; and Shaks. Cymb. III. iv. 6—

> 'Wherefore breaks that sigh
> From the inward of thee?'

The Heb. ḳerebh, a subst. of frequent occurrence and variously translated (but of which the general meaning is well seen in Ps 103^{1} כָּל־קְרָבַי 'all that is within me'), is rendered by 'inward part' or 'parts' in Ps 5^{9}, Is 16^{11}, Jer 31^{33} (see also Gn 41^{21} AVm); and by 'inward thought' in Ps 49^{11} 64^{6}, where the meaning is almost 'secret,' as in Bacon, Advancement of Learn. II. xxiii. 48, 'The government of the soul in moving the body is inward and profound.' 'Inward parts' is the tr^{n} also of ṭûḥôth (parts covered) in Job 38^{36} (but see Davidson and RVm), Ps 51^{6}; and of ḥădârîm (chambers) in Pr $20^{27.30}$, RV 'innermost parts.' Inward has the same meaning of 'interior' in 2 Mac 3^{16} 'the changing of his colour declared the inward agony of his mind' (Gr. simply ἀγωνία, RV 'distress'). And in NT there occurs 'the inward man,' Ro 7^{22}, 2 Co 4^{16} (ὁ ἔσω ἄνθρωπος), i.e. the conscience or reason, as opposed to the body (ὁ ἔξω ἄνθρωπος, 2 Co 4^{16}; see INNER MAN), a phrase used also by Shaks. in Hamlet, II. ii. 6—

> 'Something have you heard
> Of Hamlet's transformation; so I call it,
> Since not the exterior nor the inward man
> Resembles that it was.'

And Pericles, II. ii. 57—

> 'Opinion's but a fool, that makes us scan
> The outward habit by the inward man.'

We also find in 2 Co 7^{15} the phrase 'inward affection' as the tr^{n} of σπλάγχνα, a tr^{n} which comes from Tindale, and is accepted by all the Eng. VSS except Rhem. 'bowels.' Wyc. 1380 has 'entraylis,' 1388 'inwardnesse.' (2) But the adj. 'inward' means intimate in Job 19^{19} 'All my inward friends abhorred me' (כָּל־מְתֵי סוֹדִי, lit. as RVm 'all the men of my council'). Davidson calls the AV tr^{n} 'a fine expression,' and adds, 'the reference is to such as his three friends, men whose high converse and fellowship seemed to Job, as a thoughtful godly man, something almost better than relationship, Ps 55^{14}.' Fuller uses the word in the same sense in Holy Warre, ii. 37 (p. 92), 'the Caliph himself . . . having few of his most inward eunuchs about him'; and Evelyn, Diary, July 22, 1674, 'He was . . . so inward with my Lord Obrien that, after a few moneths of that gentleman's death, he married his widow'; and Shaks. has it not only as an adj. Rich. III. III. iv. 8, 'Who is most inward with the noble duke?' but also as a subst., Meas. for Meas. III. ii. 138, 'I was an inward of his.'

Inwards never occurs in AV or RV as an adv., but always as a subst., and the tr^{n} of ḳerebh, bowels. See next article and SACRIFICE. In Shaks. II Henry IV. IV. iii. 115, it is used generally of the inner parts of the body, 'The second property of your excellent sherris is, the warming of the blood; which, before cold and settled, left the liver white and pale, which is the badge of pusillanimity and cowardice; but the sherris warms it, and makes it course from the inwards to the parts extreme'; but more particularly of the bowels, in Othello, II. i. 306—

> 'The thought whereof
> Doth like a poisonous mineral gnaw my inwards.'

J. HASTINGS.

INWARDS, INWARD PARTS.—'Inwards,' representing קֶרֶב, is repeatedly used in AV of Ex and Lv as equivalent to 'entrails.' 'Inward parts' is used in a much wider application throughout the OT, and represents not only קֶרֶב of the original, but several other words, as מֵעִים, טֻחוֹת, חַדְרֵי־בֶטֶן, and לֵב. The phrase is used in two broadly distinct applications—(1) in the literal or corporeal, (2) in the tropical or psychical.

1. Examples of the literal sense are Gn 41^{21}, where 'eaten them up' is rendered in AVm 'come to the inward parts' (אֶל־קִרְבֶּנָה); 1 K 17^{21}, where 'let the child's soul come to him again' is on the margin 'into his inward parts' (עַל־קִרְבּוֹ).

2. Examples of the tropical application for the 'inward' or 'hidden' in character contrasted with the 'outward' or 'manifest' are Ps 5^9 62^4 (Heb. ^{5}), mouth or outward expression (פֶּה) contrasted with thoughts (קֶרֶב); Ps 64^6 (Heb. ^{7}), where קֶרֶב and לֵב are put for the concealed elements of character. In Is 16^{11} both מֵעִים and קֶרֶב are used metaphorically of the divine compassions. In Jer 31^{33} קֶרֶב and לֵב are used of the inward nature of man as the seat of a divine renewal.

Several familiar examples of the phrase for the 'secrets of the human soul' threaten to disappear from our Bibles under the effect of modern alterations in reading and rendering, e.g. Ps 49^{11} 'Their inward thought is that their houses,' etc., by the transposition of two letters (קִבְרָם for קִרְבָּם), becomes 'Their graves are their houses,' a reading supported by Sept. Pesh. Targ. and adopted by most modern scholars (RVm); Job 38^{36}, where טחות 'inward parts' can be rendered 'dark clouds,' and the parallel word for 'mind,' 'meteors' (see RVm); Ps 51^6 (Heb. ^{8}), where Wellhausen (following Hitzig) holds that the consonants בטחות represent, not the noun טֻחוֹת and preposition בְּ, but a derivative of the verb בטח, and accordingly renders 'Faith and trust, it is these Thou lovest ('Psalms' in Polychrome Bible, Lond. 1898). See, further, Cheyne in Expositor, Aug. 1898, p. 83 ff.

In the NT the phrase, represented by τὸ ἔσωθεν, is used only in Mt 7^{15} and Lk 11^{39} in the unfavourable sense for inward wickedness. The other use of inner or inward man in relation to the renewed nature is almost wholly Pauline. See INNER MAN.

IOB (יוֹב, AV Job).—The third son of Issachar, Gn 46^{13}. Job (יוֹב) appears to be a textual error for Jashub (יָשׁוּב) of the parallel passages Nu 26^{24}, 1 Ch 7^1, which is read by Sam. Pent. and Pesh. even in Gn, and is supported by LXX Ἰασούφ, Luc. Ἰασούβ. So Dillmann, Oxf. Heb. Lex., etc.

J. A. SELBIE.

IPHDEIAH (יִפְדְיָה 'J″ redeems').—A Benjamite chief, 1 Ch 8^{25}. See GENEALOGY.

IPHTAH (יִפְתָּח, AV Jiphtah).—A town in the Shephelah of Judah, Jos 15^{43}. The name has not been recovered.

IPHTAH-EL (יִפְתַּח־אֵל, AV Jiphtah-el).—A ravine (גֵּיא) N.W. of Hannathon, on the north border of Zebulun, Jos $19^{14.\ 27}$. The situation of DABBESHETH (v.^{11}) seems to show that the great ravine, called Wady el-Kurn, 'valley of the horn,' west of Kefr 'Anân, is intended. The word has nothing to do with the name Jefât (i.e. Jotapata of Jos. Wars, iii. 7), with which it has been wrongly compared (e.g. by Robinson, BRP iii. p. 107).

C. R. CONDER.

IR (עִיר, A Ὠρά, B Ῥαώμ), 1 Ch 7^{12}.—Shuppim and Huppim are mentioned as the sons of Ir (called in v.^{7} Iri) in a list of the sons of Benjamin.

IRA (עִירָא, Εἴρας, Ira).—1. A Jairite, i.e. of Jair, a family of Gilead (Nu 32^{41} etc.). He is described as 'priest unto David' (cf. 2 S 8^{18}, where David's sons are also called 'priests'; Driver, Sam. pp. 219 and 293 f.), and associated with Zadok and Abiathar (2 S 20^{26}). It may be noted in this connexion (a) that in the list of court officials given in 2 S $8^{15\text{ff.}}$ (from which this notice [2 S 20^{26}] appears to be repeated, cf. Budde, Richter u. Samuel, p. 254) no mention is made of Ira, (b) that his name is also absent from the list in 1 Ch 18^{14-17} (which, however, is simply transcribed from 2 S 8); in both these passages a statement as to the office of David's sons is substituted (?), and (c) that the difficulty attaching to the word 'priest' in this passage, whether it be applied to Ira or to the sons of David (in 1 Ch 18 'priests' is changed to 'chiefs about the king,' הָרִאשֹׁנִים לְיַד הַמֶּלֶךְ), admits of solution if the passage is assigned to a late date (although, of course, it may be plausibly urged on the other hand that the freer use of the word 'priests' is an evidence of antiquity). Additional confirmation is thus given to Budde's theory that 2 S 20^{23-26} were repeated (with variations) from 2 S $8^{15\text{f.}}$ by a later redactor, who wished to include the genuinely old section 2 S 9^1–20^{22} and took this means of connecting the chapters added with what preceded (see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF). Nothing further is known of this Ira, unless, following the reading of the Peshiṭta (ܕܡܢ ܝܬܝܪ = 'of Jattir,' i.e. הַיִּתִּרִי for הַיָּאִרִי the Jairites, Luc. ὁ Ἰεθέρ), we adopt the somewhat hazardous conjecture (Then. Klost.) that he is identical with 2. Ira the Ithrite (הַיִּתְרִי), one of David's heroes (2 S 23^{38} = 1 Ch 11^{40}). Most probably Then. and Klost. are right in pointing the text differently (הַיִּתִּרִי for הַיִּתְרִי, see ITHRITE, THE), and treating Ira as a native of Jattir in the hill-country of Judah (cf. 1 S 30^{27}). 3. (2 S 23^{26}, B Εἴρας, A Ἶρας; 1 Ch 11^{28} Ὠραί; 1 Ch 27^9, B Ὀδουίας, A Εἰρά, Hira) Another of David's heroes, son of Ikkesh the Tekoite. According to 1 Ch 27^9 he was captain of the temple guard for the sixth monthly course.

J. F. STENNING.

IRAD (עִירָד, LXX Γαιδάδ).—Son of Enoch and grandson of Cain (Gn 4^{18}). The name perhaps means 'fugitive' (Budde, 'strong,' 'increasing,' following the Arabic 'arada, which, used of plants, = 'come forth and become tall' or 'come forth hard and erect' [Lane, 1997 f.]), and may be a transformation of ירד (Gn $5^{15\text{f.}}$ = 1 Ch 1^2). See Dillmann and Spurrell on Gn 4^{18}, and Budde, Urgeschichte, 123 ff.

IRAM (עִירָם).—A 'duke' (אַלּוּף) of Edom, Gn 36^{43} = 1 Ch 1^{54}. The precise connotation of the name in this 'geographico-statistical list' (Dillm.) is unknown. The LXX has in Gn A Ζαφωεί, DE Ζαφωείν, in 1 Ch B Ζαφωείν, A Ἠράμ.

IR-HA-HERES (עִיר הַהֶרֶס).—In Is 19^{18} the name to be given to one of the 'five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jehovah of hosts'; in AV, RV, 'one shall be called The city of destruction.' The passage is difficult; and many different views have been held about it, especially in modern times.

(1) The Massoretic reading of the passage (which is supported by Aq. Theod. Pesh.) is that given above: and of this the usually accepted interpretation is that expressed in AV, RV, and adopted by Delitzsch; the name 'city of destroying'—or, more exactly, 'of tearing down,' the verb הָרַס being used properly of tearing or pulling down buildings, cities, altars, etc. (Ex 23^{24}, 1 K 18^{30}, 1 S 14^{17}, Ezk 13^{14} etc.)—is supposed to be chosen for the sake of a punning allusion to ḥereṣ (חֶרֶס Job 9^{7}*) 'sun,' the 'city of the sun' being a designation which might have been given in Hebrew to On, the Heliopolis of the Greeks, a city a few miles to the N.E. of the modern Cairo, in ancient times the chief centre of the sun-worship in Egypt, and full of obelisks dedicated to the sun-god, Ra. The meaning of the passage, then, is that the place which has hitherto been a 'city of the sun' will in the future be called the 'city of destroying,' i.e. a city which has devoted itself to destroying the temples and emblems of the sun; cf. the prophecy of Jeremiah (43^{13}), where it is said of Nebuchadnezzar that 'he will break in pieces the pillars (i.e. obelisks) of Beth-shemesh (the 'house, or temple, of the sun'), that is in the land of Egypt.' The objections which have been urged against this view, that it requires too much to be supplied, that הֶרֶס does not occur elsewhere, and that the expression ought rather to mean 'the destroyed city,' are not cogent: the name is, of course, meant allusively, not as a complete definition; there are many other words which occur but once in the Hebrew Bible;† and the sense in which the 'destroying' was meant would be determined by the context.

(2) Symm. (πόλις ἡλίου), Vulg. (civitas Solis), the Talm. (Menāḥōth, 110^{a}), and Saadyah (10th cent.), read חֶרֶס ('sun') for הֶרֶס ('destruction'), a reading found also in 16 Heb. MSS.‡ This reading, in spite of the preference expressed for it by Ges. (Thes.) and Riehm (Einl. ii. 552 f.), cannot be deemed probable,—at least, if the words be accepted as Isaiah's: if it be adopted, be it observed, the expression used by the prophet would be, not 'one shall be the city of the sun' (in which case, no doubt, his words could be understood as a promise of the conversion of Heliopolis to the worship of Jehovah), but 'one shall be called the city of the sun,' an idiom which, according to usage (cf. 1^{26} 4^{3} 9^{5} $61^{3b.\,6}$ 62^{4}, Jer 19^{6}, Hos 1^{10}), always implies that the words following denote the character of the place or person mentioned; and it would be very pointless to say that one of the converted cities would bear the character of a sun-city.

Ges. (Comm.), Ew., Knob., who adopt the same reading, explain it from the Arab. ḥarasa, 'the guarded or protected city'; but this is to introduce a very questionable Arabism into the text of the OT.

(3) The LXX has πόλις ασεδεκ, i.e. עִיר הַצֶּדֶק 'city of righteousness' (cf. 1^{26} 61^{3b}). This would yield a fair, though not a specially pertinent sense: it is open to the suspicion of being an alteration based on 1^{26} (where the 'righteousness' is in pointed contrast to the unrighteousness denounced in vv.$^{21-23}$ etc.). On the other hand, that in Egypt the text of Is 19 was treated freely, and accommodated to the circumstances of a later age, is evident from the LXX rendering of v.^{25}, where, for 'Blessed be Egypt my people,' they substitute 'Blessed be my people that is in Egypt,' with manifest reference to the Jews settled there in the time of the Ptolemies. See further (5).

A decision on the passage is complicated by historical considerations. The high priest Onias III., after his deposition by Antiochus Epiphanes,—or, according to other statements, his son, Onias IV.,*—despairing of better times in Judah, sought refuge in Egypt (c. B.C. 170–160) with Ptolemy Philometor; and conceived the idea of building there a temple, dedicated to Jehovah, in which the ancient rites of his people might be carried on without molestation, and which might form a religious centre at least for the Jews settled in Egypt. Upon his application to Ptolemy, the king granted the disused site of a sanctuary of Bubastis at Leontopolis, in the 'nome,' or district, of Heliopolis, and there Onias erected his temple.† In support of his plan he had pointed to Is 19^{19} and its context,‡ as a prediction that a temple to Jehovah was to be built in Egypt.§ These facts have been supposed to have a bearing upon both the reading and the exegesis of the passage under consideration. Certainly, if the passage be Isaiah's, they will not affect either; in that case, the first view given above is the only one which can be regarded as probable. But there are scholars whom that view fails to satisfy; and, without going so far as to deny Isaiah's authorship of the whole of $19^{16\,(18)-25}$, it must be granted that the clause in v.^{18} 'one shall be called,' etc., might well be a later addition to the original text of the prophecy: the verse would not read incompletely without it, nor does it add anything material to the main thought of the verse. Those who hold, then, that this clause (with or without the context) is not Isaiah's, adopt the following views about it.

(4) Duhm boldly translates 'shall be called Leontopolis,' explaining hereṣ from the Arab. hariṣ, properly the bruiser, crusher, a poet. name for a lion. But that a very special and fig. application of an Arab. root, not occurring in Heb. even in its usual Arabic sense, should be found in Heb., is most improbable.

Dillmann's suggestions are better worthy of consideration. First (5), adhering to Isaiah's authorship, but deeming (1) and (2) above both unsuitable, he thinks it possible (agreeing in this with Bredenkamp) that 'city of righteousness' was the original reading,‖ supposing that ḥereṣ, 'sun,' and hereṣ, 'destruction,' were alterations made intentionally after B.C. 170, for the purpose of introducing a more definite allusion to the temple of Leontopolis (which was situated, as said above, in the nome of Heliopolis), the former by those who viewed this temple with approval, the latter by those who judged it schismatic. But he goes on (6) to throw out the suggestion that, after all, the whole clause may have been added at this later date, ḥereṣ, 'sun,' being the original reading, which was altered afterwards by the Jews of Palestine into hereṣ, 'destruction,' in order to obtain a condemnation of the Egyptian temple,¶ and by the Jews of Egypt into ẓedeḳ, 'righteousness,' in order to make the prophecy more distinctly favourable to it.

(7) Cheyne (Introd. to Is. pp. 102–110), followed by Skinner, rejecting the view that the passage was written in the interests of the temple of Leon-

† The form of the word is perfectly regular and normal: cf. אֶרֶב a lying-in-wait (Job 38^{40}), קֶשֶׁב an attending (Is 21^{7}), קֶטֶל a slaying (Ob 9), שֶׁבֶר a breaking, הֶרֶג a killing, חֶבֶל a destruction (Mic 2^{10}), לֶכֶד a catch (Pr 3^{26}), etc.

¶ Dillm. is thus far following Hitzig, Jesaja (1833), pp. 219, 233 (who indeed assigns the whole of 19^{16-25} to the same age, and even suggests Onias himself as its author).

topolis, and interpreting the words in v.^{18} ('five cities speaking the language of Canaan' [Hebrew], etc.), not as a symbolical expression for the conversion of Egyptian cities to the worship of J″, but as referring to Jewish colonies in Egypt maintaining their national language and religion, supposes vv.$^{16-25}$ to have been written in the latter years of Ptolemy Lagi (c. B.C. 290), when there were unquestionably many Jewish settlements in Egypt: the original reading was 'city of the sun,' the meaning being that one of these Jewish colonies, preserving loyally the faith of their fathers, should flourish even in Heliopolis, the city of the sun-god, the Heb. name of which should be Ir-ha-ḥereṣ; the reading was altered afterwards, when the Jews of Pal. began to show hostility towards the Egyptian temple, by the Jews of Egypt into 'city of righteousness,' and then further by the Jews of Palestine, as a counter-blow, into 'city of destruction.'

(8) König (Einl. p. 86) treats the clause as a late Palestinian gloss, written originally on the margin, in condemnation of the temple at Leontopolis ('city of destruction,' with allusion to ḥereṣ 'of the sun').

It is evident that most of these views are merely hypotheses. At the same time, the diversity of reading makes it clear that arbitrary alterations, upon one side or the other, were introduced into the text; and as positive information upon the matter fails us, it becomes necessary to resort to hypotheses in order to explain the facts. The only question is, what hypothesis explains them best? If the words are Isaiah's, the objections to 'city of the sun' being the original reading have been already stated: if the words were written after the foundation of the temple at Leontopolis, the objections to the same being the original reading are, 1. that the temple was not at Heliopolis, and 2. (as remarked by Cheyne) that a passage interpolated by an Egyptian Jew in the interests of that temple should have made its way into the Palestinian text of Isaiah. If 'city of the sun' were the original reading, the most reasonable explanation of it is Cheyne's (7), though that implies that the passage is not Isaiah's, and also involves an interpretation of vv.$^{18-20}$, which is, at least, not the obvious one. The present writer must own that the view which seems to him to be the least open to objection is (1): the difficulties which have been found in this do not (as indicated above) seem to him as serious as has been sometimes maintained; and ḥereṣ, 'sun,'—whether an intentional or accidental alteration of hereṣ, 'destruction,'—though unsuitable, if used in the first instance with reference to Leontopolis, could readily enough be applied to it, if found, as upon this view of the case it would be found, in the text of an ancient prophecy.*

S. R. DRIVER.

IRI.—See IR.

IRIJAH (יִרְאִיָּיה 'J″ seeth').—A captain who, during the siege of Jerus., arrested Jeremiah on the charge of intending to desert to the Chaldæans (Jer $37^{13.\,14}$).

IR-NAHASH (עִיר נָחָשׁ).—A city of Judah, 1 Ch 4^{12}. The site is uncertain.

IRON (יִרְאוֹן, Yir'ōn).—A city of Naphtali, in the mountains, Jos 19^{38}. It is probably the modern Yârûn. See SWP vol. i. sheet iv., and Baedeker-Socin, Pal.^{3} p. 261.

IRON in the English Bible almost always stands for בַּרְזֶל (in Dn Aram. פַּרְזֶל) in OT, and for σίδηρος or the adj. σιδηροῦς in Apocr. and NT [Exceptions:—In Job 41^7 'barbed irons' is the rendering of שֻׂכּוֹת, and in 1 Ti 4^2 'seared (as) with a hot iron' is a paraphrase of κεκαυστηριασμένος]. Conversely, בַּרְזֶל and its Gr. equivalents are usually translated by 'iron' [Exceptions:—In Dt 19^5, 2 K 6^5 בַּרְזֶל is rendered '(ax-) head,' and in Is 44^{12} חָרַשׁ בַּרְזֶל is simply 'smith'; σίδηρος is tr^d 'sword' in Jth 6^6 9^8, 4 Mac 14^{19}].

LXX is less consistent. It has σίδηρος for חֶרֶב (sword), Job 5^{20} 15^{22} 39^{22}, for גַּרְזֶן (axe), Dt 20^{19}, for מוֹרָה (razor), Jg 13^5 16^7, 1 K 1^{11}, and τέκτων σιδήρου for חָרָשׁ (smith), 1 S 13^{19}. On the other hand, it renders בַּרְזֶל by μάχαιρα, Is 10^{34}, by σιδήριον, Dt 19^5, 2 K $6^{5.\,6}$, Ec 10^{10}, and elsewhere by σίδηρος or σιδηροῦς. Evidently both in Heb. and Gr. 'iron' was a term used somewhat generally to describe both the metal and instruments of various kinds made from it.

This well-known metal is one of the so-called elementary substances. From its abundance, the ease with which it can be separated from its ores, and its many useful properties, it is the most important of all the metals. Ordinary iron is not a pure element, but always contains a small amount of carbon, the proportion of which greatly affects its qualities. When the quantity of carbon is small (from 0·15 to 0·5 per cent.) we have wrought iron, which is extremely difficult to melt, but is tough, and can be welded at white heat. When the percentage of carbon is from 3 to 6 we have cast iron, which is brittle, and cannot be welded, but which can be melted and cast in mould. The intermediate variety, containing from 0·6 to 2 per cent. of carbon, is steel, which can be both cast and welded, and can also be tempered to various degrees of elasticity and hardness. In modern processes iron is separated from its ores in the form of cast iron, from which the other forms are obtained by removing some of the carbon. The high temperature required to melt cast iron has been urged as a difficulty in the way of understanding the use of the metal in early times. But iron can be separated from its ores without being melted. In many countries primitive processes of iron manufacture survive, and are carried on at the present day. These doubtless represent the ancient methods, and their crude product is not cast iron, but a 'bloom' or spongy mass of wrought iron or steel.

Native iron is almost unknown except in meteorites. Meteoric iron, however, contains impurities which make it brittle and exceedingly difficult to forge. For primitive methods of iron manufacture see Napier, Ancient Workers and Artificers in Metal; Day, The Prehistoric Use of Iron and Steel; Swank, Iron in all Ages (OT references in the last-named are uncritical).

In the Scripture records iron appears side by side with brass (which see) or bronze from the very earliest times, and the two metals are often mentioned together. Tubal-cain is described as an artificer in both (Gn 4^{22}), and similar workers are referred to in the reigns of David (2 Ch $2^{7.\,14}$) and Joash (2 Ch 24^{12}). In Dt 8^9 both are named among the minerals of Palestine, and in Jos 22^8 they are among the spoils carried home by the tribe of Manasseh after the conquest of Canaan. They are mentioned in Nu 31^{22} in a list of incombustible materials, and in Jer 6^{28}, Ezk 22^{18}, among the impurities of silver.

Iron is classed among the necessaries of life (Sir 39^{26}); and the Scripture allusions testify to its extensive and varied applications. Is 60^{17} shows that its relative value in ancient times was much the same as at present, being less than that of gold and silver, and greater than that of stone. Iron was used for weapons of offence (Nu 35^{16}, Job 20^{24}, Jth 6^{6} 9^{8}, 4 Mac 14^{19}), for war chariots (Jos $17^{16.18}$, Jg 1^{19} $4^{3.13}$), and for defensive armour (2 S 23^{7}, Rev 9^{9}). Saws, harrows, and axes of iron were used by David in dealing (?; see Driver, Sam. p. 288, and cf. art. HARROW) with his Ammonite prisoners (2 S 12^{31}, 1 Ch 20^{3}). Hands of iron are mentioned as instruments of torture in 4 Mac 8^{12} $9^{26.28}$. There are allusions to iron gates (Ac 12^{10}), fetters (Ps 105^{18} 149^{8}, 3 Mac 3^{25}, 4 Mac 11^{10}), prison bars (Ps $107^{10.16}$, Is 45^{2}), yokes (Dt 28^{48}, Jer $28^{13.14}$, Sir 28^{20}), and horns (as prophetic symbols, 1 K 22^{11}, 2 Ch 18^{10}). Axes for felling trees were made of iron (Dt 19^{5}, 1 K $6^{5.6}$, Is 10^{34}), and also tools for stone-quarrying (Sir 48^{17}) and stone-hewing (Dt 27^{5}, Jos 8^{31}, 1 K 6^{7}). There were iron* threshing instruments (Am 1^{3}), images (Dn 5^{23}), vessels (Jos $6^{19.24}$), pans (Ezk 4^{3}), nails or bolts (1 Ch 22^{3}, Wis 13^{15}), pens or graving tools (Jer 17^{1}, Job 19^{24}). Iron was among the materials gathered by David for the building of the temple (1 Ch $22^{14.16}$ $29^{2.7}$), among the merchandise of Tyre (Ezk $27^{12.19}$), and of the apocalyptic Babylon (Rev 18^{12}). The whetting of iron tools is referred to in Pr 27^{17}, Ec 10^{10}. The heaviness of iron is noted in Sir 22^{15}. Its weight was reckoned by shekels (1 S 17^{7}), or by talents (1 Ch 29^{7}).

* In connexion with the views which see in the passage an allusion to the temple at Leontopolis, it is at least remarkable that, as M. Naville observes (pp. 12, 20, 21), in the Great Harris Papyrus, which describes at length the buildings of Ramses III. (c. 1200 B.C.), mention is made of 'the abode of Ramses III., in the house of Ra (the sun-god) on the north of On,'—a name which would fairly correspond to 'city of the sun,' and which M. Naville is strongly disposed to consider was the sacred name of the city buried now under Tell el-Yahudîyeh: the close connexion of this place with On is also implied by the further statement in the Papyrus that 'all that belonged to the abode of Ramses in the house of Ra, north of On, the buildings as well as the cattle, was under the authority of the priests of On for their yearly tribute.'

As to the manufacture of iron, the ore is alluded to in Job 28^{2}. The references to the 'iron furnace' (Dt 4^{20}, 1 K 8^{51}, Jer 11^{4}) may be either to the smelting furnace, in which the iron was separated from its ore, or to the blacksmith's forge, which is vividly described in Is 44^{12}, Sir 38^{28}.

In many of the above passages, and in a number of others, 'iron' is used metaphorically. The description of the heavens and the earth as brass and iron (Lv 26^{19}, Dt 28^{23}) is a picture of drought. The iron furnace is a striking figure for the severest suffering. Iron is a symbol of strength, and as such is employed of Asher (Dt 33^{25}), of Israel (Mic 4^{13}), of the fourth kingdom in Nebuchadnezzar's vision (Dn $2^{33\text{-}45\,passim}$), and of behemoth (Job 40^{18} 41^{27}). Prophetic boldness is typified in Jer 1^{18} by an iron pillar. On the other hand, iron is an emblem of Israel's obstinacy (Is 48^{4}) and corruption (Jer 6^{28}, Ezk 22^{18}, iron being an impurity in silver). The rod of iron (Ps 2^{9}, Rev 2^{27} 12^{5} 19^{15}) symbolizes a rule of irresistible might.

One or two passages referring to iron have been reserved for special comment.

The 'bedstead of iron,' belonging to king Og of Bashan (Dt 3^{11}), was probably a sarcophagus of basalt, the black iron-like stone of the region. This stone, and not literal iron, may possibly be intended also in Dt 8^{9}. See Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxvi. 11; and Driver, Deuteronomy, in loc.

In Jer 15^{12} occurs the phrase בַּרְזֶל מִצָּפוֹן 'northern iron' (AV), 'iron from the north' (RV), of which there are two different interpretations. On the one hand, it has been supposed to refer to the iron manufactured by the Chalybians, which was reputed to be of special excellence; while, on the other hand, it has been understood simply as a figurative description of the northern invasion which Jeremiah elsewhere predicts as impending (1^{14} 4^{6} 6^{1} 13^{20}).

In Ezk 27^{19} we have בַּרְזֶל עָשׁוֹת, which is rendered 'bright iron' in AV and RV, but 'wrought iron' in RVm. LXX connects the phrase with the preceding clause, and translates ἐξ Ἀσὴλ σίδηρος εἰργασμένος. The meaning is generally understood to be 'iron wares of rare workmanship' (kunstreich verarbeitetes Eisen—Siegfried in Kautzsch's AT). The Rabbis took the locality described to be in South Arabia, like Dedan, and the iron articles to be Indian swords, which were famous in that region. See Cornill and Smend, in loc.

The word 'iron' in Scripture is applied to articles which may have been made of wrought iron, and to others which probably were made of steel. The apparent special allusions to steel in AV are misleading (see STEEL). See also following article.

JAMES PATRICK.

IRON (barzel).—The use of iron was comparatively late. In the whole of the plunder of Syria about B.C. 1480 iron is never mentioned; nor is it in the cuneiform letters from Syria about B.C. 1360. No clearly dated example of it is known in Egypt before about B.C. 700. Probably it began to come into use in Syria about B.C. 900 or 1000. Beyond the generalities of iron being named among metals (Gn 4^{22}, Nu 31^{22} 35^{16}), and the phrases 'chariots of iron' (Jos $17^{16.18}$, Jg 1^{19} $4^{3.13}$) and 'bed of iron' (Dt 3^{11} [?]), the 'tool of iron' is definitely named under Solomon (1 K 6^{7}), and as an axe about B.C. 850 (2 K 6^{5}). Iron is mentioned under Tiglath-pileser I. (c. 1100). See KIB i. 39. Well-developed tools of iron (chisels, rasps, files, centre-bits, etc.) were made by Assyrians in B.C. 670, implying that such had probably been in progress for a century or two at least. It appears, then, that iron began to spread about B.C. 1000, most likely from the Chalybes in the Assyr. highlands, who still work it, and were celebrated for it anciently. This is probably quite as early as, or earlier than, it appears for any purpose in Europe. See MINES, MINING. W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE.

IRPEEL (יִרְפְּאֵל 'El heals').—A city of Benjamin, noticed with Chephirah, Mozah, and others, Jos 18^{27}. The most probable site is the ruin Rafât, N. of el-Jib (Gibeon). See SWP vol. i. sheet xvii.

IRRIGATION.—In Babylonia and Egypt, on account of the lack of rain, water was supplied to the fields and gardens by an elaborate system of irrigation. The waters of the Nile, Euphrates, and Tigris were conveyed to a distance by a network of larger and smaller canals. The water from these, or from reservoirs supplied by them, is raised by various machines, the most common of which is the shadoof, the essential part of which is a lever, with a weight at one end, serving to raise the full bucket at the other. Other machines are somewhat like a turbine. The water thus raised is distributed along narrow gutters. The Nile Valley is naturally fertilized by the inundations caused by the rise of the Nile; and the control and distribution of these floods was an important feature in the irrigation of Egypt. To this purpose Lake Mœris was adapted by the great engineering works of Amenemhat III. (see Herodot. i. 193; Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, 67 ff., 445 ff., 763 ff.; Lane, Modern Egyptians^{5}, ii. 26 f.; Petrie, History of Egypt, i. 193; arts. ASSYRIA, 178^{a}; EGYPT, ii.).

Palestine, however, is by no means a waterless country; the eastern table-lands especially are well provided with springs. In parts, however, e.g. on the Judæan plateau, springs are rare, moreover the rain drains away quickly; nevertheless, the earlier and the later rains suffice for the crops generally. As to need for irrigation, Palestine is expressly contrasted with Egypt in Dt $11^{10.11}$ 'For the land, whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst thy seed and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs; but the land, whither ye go over to possess it, is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven.' This passage does not imply that irrigation was unknown in Palestine, but that it was only used on a small scale, for gardens, etc. Thus we read in Is 58^{11} of a 'watered garden,' gan rāweh; in Ec $2^{5.6}$ Solomon is made to say, 'I made me gardens and parks, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruit: I made me pools of water, to water therefrom the forest where trees were reared.' Cf. also Sir 24$^{30.31}$ 'I also came out as a brook from a river, and as a conduit into a garden. I said I will water my best garden, and will abundantly water my garden bed.' So G. A. Smith, HGHL 83, 'Vegetables thrive where summer irrigation is used.' Driver on Dt 11^{10} (cf. 2nd ed. p. xxi) quotes Conder, Tent-Work, p. 328, as stating that he had seen gardens irrigated 'by means of small ditches trodden by the foot.' Steuernagel, however, explains 'watered with the foot' in the same passage as referring to a wheel worked with the foot.

* Possibly the word in Am 1^{3} means hard black basalt, as in Dt 3^{11}. See Driver, Joel and Amos, pp. 130, 227.

There are numerous references to peleg or palgê mayîm (Ps 1^{3} etc.), i.e. the trenches used for irrigation; but we cannot therefore deduce a wide use of irrigation in Palestine; some of the passages may have been written in Babylonia, or by authors familiar with the irrigation trenches of Egypt or Chaldæa; nor is it certain that peleg may not sometimes mean a natural tributary.

IR-SHEMESH (עִיר שֶׁמֶשׁ 'city of the sun,' Jos 19^{41}).—See BETHSHEMESH 1, and HERES 1.

IRU (עִירוּ).—The eldest son of Caleb, 1 Ch 4^{15}. The correct name is probably IR, the -u being simply the conjunction 'and' (וּ) coupling it with the following name Elah. (See Kittel, ad loc.).

ISAAC (יִצְחָק; in Am 7$^{9.16}$ [where it is a poet. synonym for Israel], Jer 33^{26}, Ps 105^{9} יִשְׂחָק; LXX and NT Ἰσαάκ).

1. The story of Isaac is that of the least conspicuous of the three Hebrew patriarchs. The following brief description gives all that is preserved in the Book of Genesis respecting him.

Isaac was the long promised son of Abraham and Sarah. He was born when Abraham was 100 and Sarah 91 years old (cf. Gn 17$^{17.24}$ 21^{5}). He was circumcised on the eighth day (Gn 21^{4}). He was called Isaac ('laughter') by divine command (Gn 17^{19}), because Abraham had laughed at the thought of a child being 'born unto him that is an hundred years old' (Gn 17^{17}). The jealousy of Sarah being aroused at the sight of Ishmael, Hagar's son, playing (מְצַחֵק) with Isaac, led to the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael from the tent of Abraham (Gn 21$^{8-21}$). See HAGAR. It would appear from this narrative (Gn 21^{14}) that Isaac's earliest days were spent in the neighbourhood of Beersheba.

The next recorded event in the life of Isaac was the sacrifice 'in the land of Moriah,' when Abraham was bidden of God to offer his 'only son . . . Isaac' for a burnt-offering upon one of the mountains (Gn 22^{2}). For remarks upon this trial of Abraham's faith see the article ABRAHAM. The beauty of the story is enhanced by the simple colloquy between Abraham and his son, as they went 'both of them together' to the appointed place, Isaac bearing 'the wood of the burnt-offering' (Gn 22$^{6-8}$). The submission and obedience of Isaac are virtues as evidently intended to be emphasized in the narrative as the faith of Abraham. The life of Isaac was spared through the interposition of 'the angel of the Lord'; and 'a ram caught in the thicket by the horns' was offered up by Abraham 'for a burnt-offering in the stead of his son' (Gn 22^{13}). Abraham and Isaac returned to Beersheba (Gn 22^{19}).

The death of Sarah occurred at Hebron when Isaac was 36 years old (Gn 23^{1}); but Isaac is not mentioned in connexion with the purchase of the field of Machpelah and the burial of Sarah (Gn 23). Abraham is not stated to have consulted Isaac when he despatched 'his servant, the elder of his house' (Gn 24^{2}), to take a wife for his son from his country and kindred in Mesopotamia. Rebekah, the daughter of 'Bethuel, the son of Milcah, the wife of Nahor, Abraham's brother' (Gn 24^{15}), is brought from Mesopotamia by Abraham's servant. Isaac, we are told (Gn 24^{62}), dwelt at that time 'in the land of the South,' near Beer-lahai-roi. Rebekah became his wife; and Isaac 'was comforted after his mother's (or 'his father's,' reading אָבִיו for אִמּוֹ, as his mother's name has not been mentioned in the section) death.' Isaac joined with Ishmael in committing the body of Abraham to burial in the cave of Machpelah (Gn 25^{9}).

The remaining records of Isaac's life ('the generations of Isaac,' Gn 25^{12}) are very meagre. Twin children are born to Rebekah after Isaac's entreaty of J″ (Gn 25^{21}). In Gn 26$^{1-6}$ we are told that, in consequence of a famine, Isaac journeyed to Gerar, but was warned by God not to go down into Egypt. On the occasion of this theophany, Isaac is told of the blessing upon himself and his seed because of the obedience of his father Abraham (Gn 26^{6}). In Gn 26$^{7-11}$ Isaac is guilty of the same cowardice and deceit in the land of the Philistines, as Abraham among the Egyptians. In order, as he thought, to save his own life, he gave out that Rebekah was his sister. Abimelech, the Philistine king, saw from a window 'Isaac . . . sporting (מְצַחֵק) with Rebekah' (Gn 26^{8}), and perceived at once that she was his wife and not his sister. Abimelech justly rebuked Isaac; and gave his people charge not to molest either him or his wife. Isaac during his sojourn in Gerar became so prosperous as a wheat-grower and herdsman as to incur the envy of the Philistines. They commenced a petty persecution of Isaac, stopping up the wells which his father Abraham had dug, and which Isaac's servants had opened again. Abimelech even counselled Isaac to withdraw from the country in the interests of peace (Gn 26^{16}). We are then told of two wells dug by Isaac's men, and violently claimed by the Philistines; these he called 'Esek ('strife') and Sitnah ('enmity'). Moving his encampment still farther away, he dug another well, which the Philistines did not dispute, and which Isaac therefore called Rehoboth ('broad places'), generally identified with the modern Ruhaibe, a well some 25 miles S. of Beersheba.

Isaac subsequently journeyed to Beersheba (Gn 26^{23}), where J″ appeared to him by night and blessed him. He built an altar there to J″, and his servants digged a well. And while encamped in this spot, he received overtures for an alliance with the Philistines. Abimelech the king, Ahuzzath 'his friend,' and Phicol the captain of the host, came over from Gerar; and Isaac made a covenant with them, and gave them a banquet. They plighted their faith to him by an oath (שְׁבֻעָה); and on the day of their departure Isaac heard that his servants had come upon water in the well they were digging. Accordingly he gave the well the name of Shibah, as if equivalent to Shebuah; and thus the name Beersheba, according to one tradition (cf. for another Gn 21^{31}), took its rise.

In the remaining passages in which Isaac is referred to, he is an old and feeble man. In Gn 27 he appears as a man upon his deathbed, practically blind, and desirous to bestow his last blessing upon his elder son, Esau, whom 'he loved . . . because he did eat of his venison' (Gn 25^{28}). Through Rebekah's cunning, Jacob the younger son supplants his brother. Isaac, too blind to distinguish between them by sight, is suspicious of the voice, but is reassured by Jacob's hairy garments, by their feel and smell. He pronounces upon Jacob the blessing of the birthright, in words of a high poetical strain (Gn 27$^{27-29}$). Shortly afterwards Esau returns; and Isaac is greatly agitated when he realizes the deception practised by his younger son. But he cannot go back. He pronounces a blessing—or rather a prediction of a wild and independent destiny—upon his elder son.

Isaac's days were nearly numbered (Gn 27^{41}). And Rebekah, to save Jacob from Esau's fury and revenge, induces Isaac to send Jacob away to Mesopotamia, there to obtain a wife from his own kindred, and not to imitate Esau by marriage with Canaanite women. Isaac invokes another blessing upon the head of Jacob, and sends him away to Paddan-aram unto Laban, Rebekah's brother (Gn 27^{46}–28^{5}).

Once more only do we hear of Isaac; and that is when we read of his death, after the return of Jacob from his 21 years' sojourn in Mesopotamia. The mention of it occurs just after the enumeration of Jacob's twelve sons; and we then read that 'Jacob came unto Isaac his father to Mamre to Kiriath-arba (the same is Hebron), where Abraham and Isaac sojourned.' Here Isaac died, being 180 years old, and his two sons Esau and Jacob buried him (Gn 35$^{27-29}$).

2. These somewhat disjointed notices of Isaac's life were drawn from the three main sources of tradition preserved in the Book of Genesis.

J records the promise of a son to Abraham and Sarah (Gn 18$^{9-15}$), and the fulfilment of the promise, in Gn 21$^{1-7}$. From the same source (Gn 21^{33}) we gather that Isaac's early years were spent at Beersheba. J records the narrative of the servant's journey to Mesopotamia; and the marriage of Isaac and Rebekah (Gn 24). It mentions Isaac's inheritance from Abraham and the sojourn at Beer-lahai-roi (Gn 25$^{1-6. 11}$). J had also the account of Isaac's dealings with the Philistines (Gn 26), and of the deception practised by Jacob upon his father (Gn 27).

E recorded the birth of Isaac and the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael (Gn 21$^{6a. 8-21}$); and from E we have the narrative of the sacrifice of Isaac (Gn 22$^{1-13}$). Portions also of Gn 27 are ascribed to E, showing that this source contained the narrative of Isaac's commission to Esau to bring him the venison that he loved, and of Jacob's deception.

The Isaac narrative in P was evidently very brief. It mentions that Isaac at 40 years of age married Rebekah, the daughter of Bethuel the Syrian (Aramæan), in Paddan-aram; that his two sons were born when he was 60 years of age (Gn 25$^{19. 20. 26}$); that Esau grieved his father and mother 40 years later by marrying two Hittite wives (Gn 26$^{34. 35}$); that Isaac, to prevent Jacob marrying a Canaanite wife, sent him to Laban in Paddan-aram to obtain a wife from his kindred, and blessed him as he set forth (Gn 27^{46}–28^{9}); and that, after Jacob's return, Isaac died at Hebron 180 years old, and was buried by his sons (Gn 35$^{28. 29}$).

3. The recognition of these different strata of tradition will enable the student to understand the cause of certain apparently contradictory statements in the narrative. Thus attention has often been called to the fact that in Gn 27 Isaac is represented as old, blind, and on his deathbed, while his death is recorded as occurring possibly 80 years later (cf. Gn 26^{34} with Gn 27$^{1-41}$ and Gn 35^{27}). But the narrative in Gn 27 is from the Prophetic, that in Gn 26^{34} 35^{27} is from the Priestly tradition. Similarly, whereas in Gn 27$^{41-45}$ Jacob is sent away to escape Esau's vengeance, which will take a murderous form as soon as Isaac dies, we find in Gn 27^{46}–28$^{1-6}$ that Isaac sends Jacob away to take a wife from Paddan-aram, and blesses him, without any reference being made to the blessing obtained by guile, which has been described in the previous chapter. But the difficulty disappears when we find that Gn 27$^{1-45}$ is from the Prophetic, and Gn 27^{46}–28^{6} is from the Priestly source, and that the two traditions are combined, though not harmonized.

The great similarity between the story—though not harmonized—of the repudiation of Rebekah by Isaac at the court of Abimelech at Gerar, and the story of the repudiation of Sarah by Abraham, likewise at the court of Abimelech king of Gerar, will have occurred to all readers. The Abraham narrative (Gn 20) is from E; the Isaac narrative (Gn 26$^{8-11}$) is from J. It can hardly be doubted that the two traditions are different versions of the same event.

According to the figures given in Gn 25^{26}, where it is stated that Isaac was 60 years old when Jacob and Esau were born, and those given in Gn 35^{28}, where it is stated that Isaac died at the age of 180, we should infer that Isaac's death occurred only 10 years before Jacob's descent into Egypt (Gn 47^{10}). Moreover, by a comparison of the data of Joseph's age (Gn 41^{46} 45^{6}) with those of Jacob's age (Gn 47^{9}), it would appear that Isaac was 137 years old when Jacob went to Haran.

4. The position of Isaac in the narrative is not so conspicuous or so attractive as that of Abraham or of Jacob. He impersonates, as it were, the peaceful, obedient, and submissive qualities of an equable trust in God, distinct alike from the transcendent faith of Abraham, and from that lower type which in Jacob was learned through discipline and purged from self-will. There are but a few items upon the strength of which a picture of Isaac's character can be constructed. But the submission shown at the crisis of sacrifice (Gn 22), the lonely meditation at eventide (Gn 24^{63}), the intercession on his wife's behalf (Gn 25^{21}), Jacob's allusion to the object of his father's fear (Gn 31^{42}), are details which supply features of greater dignity and grace than are suggested by the mention of his fondness for good food in Gn 25^{28} 27^{4}. He is, however, a subordinate figure as compared with Abraham and Jacob; and the lower level at which he seems to stand is implied in Gn 26^{5}, where the covenant of blessing is granted to Isaac and his seed, not for their own sake, but for their father Abraham's sake.

It was not without significance for the Israelites that the prehistoric founders of their race were not all of heroic mould. The ordinary materials of Hebrew life, as represented in Isaac and Jacob, were selected to be the channels of special revelation no less than the more splendid and striking personality of their father Abraham. Isaac was similar to the majority in every community, yielding, easy-going, stationary, content to receive the promise without realizing the extent or nature of the privilege. The events of his life are associated with a few localities, all (except Mamre, Gn 35$^{27-29}$) within a restricted area in S. Palestine. His encampments at Beer-lahai-roi, Gerar, and Beersheba form a sharp contrast to the varied scenes in the lives of Abraham and Jacob. The typical service of one of the patriarchs was rendered in quietness and sitting still.

5. References in the New Testament. — The sacrifice of Isaac is twice referred to in the NT. (1) He 11$^{17. 18}$, where the writer brings out the triumph of Abraham's faith in the conflict between the affection of a father and the duty of obedience; (2) Ja 2^{21}, where the apostle appeals to the great deed of sacrifice as against the perversion of the doctrine of justification by faith. In each case the submission of Isaac plays its part, but only a secondary part, in the argument of the writer.

6. The great importance attached by the Jews of the Middle Ages to the sacrifice of Isaac is worthy of attention. 'The Jews implore the mercy of God by the sacrifice of Isaac, as Christians by the sacrifice of Christ' (Mayor, Ep. James, p. 97). In the submission of Isaac was seen the submission of the whole race. Cf. Targ. on Mic 7[20] 'Remember for us the binding of Isaac.' Pesikta R. Kahana, 'For the merit of Isaac who offered himself upon the altar, the Holy One, blessed be He, will hereafter raise the dead' (Buber).

Amongst many strange Jewish traditions respecting Isaac may be mentioned that of Targ. Jerus. on Gn 27[1], where Isaac's blindness is accounted for 'because when his father was binding him, he had seen the throne of glory, and from that time his eyes had begun to darken.' Even more strange is the altercation between Isaac and Ishmael, which, according to the Targum of Palestine, led to the sacrifice of Isaac: 'And it was after these things that Isaac and Ishmael contended; and Ishmael said, It is right that I should inherit what is the father's, because I am his firstborn son. And Isaac said, It is right that I should inherit what is the father's, because I am the son of Sarah his wife, and thou art the son of Hagar the handmaid of my mother. Ishmael answered and said, I am more righteous than thou, because I was circumcised at thirteen years; and if it had been my will to hinder, they should not have delivered me to be circumcised; but thou wast circumcised a child of eight days; if thou hadst had knowledge, perhaps they could not have delivered thee to be circumcised. Isaac answered and said, Behold now, to-day I am thirty and six years old; and if the Holy One, blessed be He, were to require all my members, I would not hesitate. These words were heard before the Lord of the World, and the Word (Memra) of the Lord at once tried Abraham' (Etheridge's translation).

7. Though not employed for that purpose in the writings of the NT (yet cf. Ro 8[32]), the sacrifice of Isaac was largely made use of by the Fathers as typical of the sacrifice on the cross. The earliest use of it in this connexion appears to be Ep. Barn. ch. 7, 'Because He was in His own person about to offer the vessel of His Spirit a sacrifice for our sins, that the type also which was given in Isaac, who was offered upon the altar, should be fulfilled' (Lightfoot's Apostolic Fathers, p. 251). Irenæus speaks of Abraham having yielded up his son as a sacrifice in order that God might also be pleased to give His only Son as a sacrifice for our redemption (προθύμως τὸν ἴδιον μονογενῆ καὶ ἀγαπητὸν παραχωρήσας θυσίαν τῷ θεῷ, ἵνα καὶ ὁ θεὸς εὐδοκήσῃ ὑπὲρ τοῦ σπέρματος αὐτοῦ πάντως τὸν ἴδιον μονογενῆ καὶ ἀγαπητὸν υἱὸν θυσίαν παρασχεῖν εἰς λύτρωσιν ἡμετέραν, ed. Stieren, i. 572). Cf. August. De Civ. Dei, xvi. 32.

8. The name 'Isaac.' It would appear that the name Isaac, derived from the root צחק, and meaning 'laugh,' was connected in popular Israelite tradition with incidents preceding or attending the birth of the patriarch. It is impossible to resist the conclusion that the form of these traditions was occasioned by the stories based upon, or suggested by, the popular etymology of the name. At least three different explanations seem to have been given, in order to account for the name; the compiler of Genesis has faithfully reproduced them all. (1) In Gn 17[17] (P) 'Abram laughed' at the idea of a son being born to him in his old age; (2) in Gn 18[12] we are told that 'Sarah laughed within herself' at the prediction that she should bear a son; (3) in Gn 21[6] Sarah, after the birth of the child, is represented as saying, 'God hath prepared laughter (צְחֹק) for me.' The continuation of the same verse, however, suggests that there was yet another version of the same tradition, according to which the laughter was neither that of incredulity on the part of Abraham and Sarah, nor that of joy on the part of Sarah, but that of derision on the part of those who heard the news, and who would laugh at one so old becoming a mother: 'every one will laugh at me.' It should also be noticed that the same root occurs in the sense of 'playing' in the story of Ishmael and Isaac (Gn 21[9]), and also in that of Isaac and Rebekah (Gn 26[8]).

A fanciful Rabbinic derivation for the name explained it to be a compound of two words צא־חוק 'the out-going of statute,' as if in Isaac was to be discerned a development of the religious faith of Abraham (Hamburger, RE, s.v.).

It has been suggested that 'Isaac' may possibly be a truncated form for 'Isaac-el,' on the analogy of 'Isra-el,' 'Ishma-el,' and possibly 'Joseph-el' and 'Jacob-el' (cf. Gray's Studies in Hebrew Proper Names, p. 214).

Literature.

Although anticipated by Amos and Hosea in many of his leading doctrines, and excelled both by Jeremiah and the great Prophet of the Exile in depth of personal experience and width of religious outlook, Isaiah was nevertheless the greatest of the Hebrew prophets—by the strength of his personality, the wisdom of his statesmanship, the length and unbroken assurance of his ministry, the almost unaided service which he rendered to Judah at the greatest crisis of her history, the purity and grandeur of his style, and the influence he exerted on subsequent prophecy.

I. NAME.—The English name Isaiah is an approximate transliteration of the abbreviated form Yĕsha'yāh יְשַׁעְיָה, which appears as the title of the prophet's book in the Hebrew Canon, and occurs besides as the name of several individuals in post-exilic writings (Ezr 8[7. 19], Neh 11[7], 1 Ch 3[21]). The full and older form is Yĕsha'yāhû יְשַׁעְיָהוּ (Gr. Ἡσαΐας, Lat. Esaias and Isaias), by which the prophet himself is always called in the text of his book (cf. 1[1] etc.) and in the historical writings of the OT (2 K 19[2ff.], 2 Ch 26[22] 32[20. 32]); also of other Jews, 1 Ch 25[3. 15] 26[25]. It means 'J" is salvation,' and is therefore synonymous with the frequent Joshua or Jeshua (Jesus) יְהוֹשֻׁעַ or יֵשׁוּעַ, and Hosea הוֹשֵׁעַ, cf. the Heb. Elisha אֱלִישָׁע 'God is, or God of, Salvation'; Elishua אֱלִישׁוּעַ, Ishi יִשְׁעִי, etc., the Sabæan or Himyaritic forms יתעאל and אליתע, and the Phœn. ישע.

II. PERSONAL HISTORY.—The exact limits which we are led to assign to Isaiah's career depend on the conclusions we have still to reach with regard to several disputed portions of his book. Generally speaking, however, we may say that he prophesied from the year in which king Uzziah died (B.C. 740 or 736) to the year of the sudden deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib, 701, and possibly some years after this. Isaiah was therefore born about 760 (seven years before the reputed foundation of Rome), was a child when Amos appeared at Bethel (c. 755 or 750), and a youth when Hosea began to prophesy in N. Israel. Micah was his younger contemporary. Isaiah prophesied under Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah. The chief political events of his life were the ascent of the great soldier Tiglath-pileser III. to the throne of Assyria in 745, with a new policy of conquest; the league of Aram and N. Israel in 735, and their invasion of Judah, which moved Ahaz to call Assyria to his help; Tiglath-pileser's capture of Damascus, and the captivity of Gilead and Galilee in 734; the invasion of N. Palestine by Salmanassar IV. in 725, with the long siege of Samaria which fell to his successor Sargon in or about 721; Sargon's defeat of Egypt on her border at Raphia in 719; Sargon's invasion of Palestine in 711 with the reduction of Ashdod, and his defeat of Merodach-baladan and capture of Babylon in 709; Sennacherib's succession in 705, and invasion of Palestine in 701; his encounter with Egypt at Eltekeh on the borders of Philistia and Judah; his capture of Ekron and siege of Jerusalem, with the pestilence that overtook him between Palestine and Egypt; and his retreat from Palestine, with the consequent relief of Jerusalem—all in 701. About 695 (some say about 690 or even 685) Hezekiah was succeeded by Manasseh. Whether Isaiah lived into the reign of the latter is very doubtful. We have no prophecies from him later than Hezekiah's reign, perhaps none after 701.* The Mishna (Jebamoth 49*b*; cf. Sanhedr. 103*b*) says that he was slain by Manasseh. The apocryphal work, The Ascension of Isaiah, which was written in the beginning of the 2nd Christian cent. (only an Ethiopic version is extant; see Dillmann's ed. with a Latin translation, Leipzig, 1877), affirms that Isaiah's martyrdom consisted in being sawn asunder, which Justin Martyr repeats (Dial. c. Tryph. ch. 120, c. A.D. 150). Whether this be true, and whether it is alluded to in He 11^{37}, we cannot tell. See next article.

Isaiah is called the son of Amoẓ (אָמוֹץ 1^1 2^1 etc.), who must not be confounded, as he has been by various Christian Fathers, with the prophet Amos (עָמוֹס). A Jewish tradition (Megilla 10*b*) makes Isaiah nephew of king Amaziah; and his royal descent has been inferred from his familiarity with successive monarchs of Judah, and his general political influence. A stronger reason than these might be drawn from the presence in his name of J″, which appears to have been confined at the earlier periods of Israel's history to proper names of the royal houses. But even this is not conclusive, and one really knows nothing of either Isaiah's forefathers or his upbringing. He was married, his wife is called 'the prophetess' (8^3), and he had two sons to whom he gave names symbolic of those aspects of the nation's history which he enforced in his prophecies: She'ar-yashub, 'a remnant shall return,' who was old enough in 736–735 to be taken by his father when he went to face king Ahaz (7^3), and Maher-shalal-ḥash-baz 'spoil-speeds-booty-hastes,' who was born about a year later (8^{1-4}). The legend that Isaiah was twice married has been deduced from the false inference that the 'young woman of marriageable age,' הָעַלְמָה of 7^{14}, was his wife. By this expression the prophet probably did not mean a definite individual.

The most certain and significant fact about Isaiah is that he was a citizen, if not a native, of Jerusalem,† and had constant access to the court and presence of the king. Jerusalem is Isaiah's 'immediate and ultimate regard, the centre and return of all his thoughts, the hinge of the history of his time, the summit of those brilliant hopes with which he fills the future. He has traced for us the main features of her position and some of the lines of her construction, many of the great figures of her streets, the fashions of her women, the arrival of embassies, the effect of rumours. He has painted her aspect in triumph, in siege, in famine, and in earthquake: war filling her valleys with chariots, and again nature rolling tides of fruitfulness up to her very gates; her moods of worship, panic, and profligacy. If he takes wider observation of mankind, Jerusalem is his watchtower. It is for her defence he battles through fifty years of statesmanship, and all his prophecy may be said to travail in anguish for her new birth.'

III. STRUCTURE AND CONTENTS OF THE BOOK OF ISAIAH.—The book which bears Isaiah's name consists of 66 chapters, which fall into two very distinct collections of prophetic discourses: chs. 1–35 and chs. 40–66, which are separated by a stretch of narrative or history, chs. 36–39.

A. Chs. 1–35 are further divisible into at least five sections—(1) 1–12 a series of orations upon the religious and political state both of Judah in face of invasions by Assyria and by the confederates Syria and N. Israel, and of N. Israel in face of an invasion by Assyria; as well as upon the Messianic future of Israel. There is also a series of narratives recounting Isaiah's call (6), his interview with king Ahaz (7), and other measures that he took (8); as well as a song of praise (12). This section seems composed of independent groups of oracles. Ch. 1 appears to stand by itself, and carries a title which more than covers the contents of the whole section, 'the reigns which it enumerates exhaust the range of Isaiah's career.' At the head of ch. 2 there is another title which appears to cover 2–4, which form a unity by themselves. Ch. 5 stands apart from them, and is itself composed of independent pieces. Then we have the pieces of narrative: 6 by itself on the prophet's vision in the year Uzziah died, and 7–8^4 containing more oracles and running out into others 8^5–9^7, all of them apparently from the reign of Ahaz. 9^8–10^4, along with 5^{25-30}, which obviously belongs to them, from an oracle against N. Israel. 10^{5-34} is an oracle against Assyria, and ch. 11 consists of two prophecies, one of the Messiah (vv.$^{1-9}$), the other of the restoration of all Israel (vv.$^{10-16}$). Ch. 12 is the lyric already alluded to. (2) Chs. 13–23 contain a series of oracles upon heathen nations, with a few upon Judah, but none upon N. Israel. 13–14^{23} treats of the fall of Babylon; 14^{24-27} is on Assyria, and vv.$^{28-32}$ against the Philistines, assigned by its title to the year of Ahaz' death; 15. 16 on Moab; 17^{1-11} on the fall of Damascus and N. Israel; vv.$^{12-14}$, the repulse of Assyria; 18, the same in the form of an address to Ethiopia; 19 on Egypt—vv.$^{16-25}$ appear to be separate from vv.$^{1-15}$; 20 on Egypt, with a bit of narrative that points to Sargon's march against her about 711; 21^{1-10} on Babylon, 'oracle of the wilderness of the sea,' vv.$^{11.\ 12}$ on Edom, vv.$^{13-17}$ on Arabia; 22^{1-14} against Jerusalem during a siege, and vv.$^{15-25}$ against Shebna, a statesman of Judah; 23^{1-14} on Tyre, with an appendix vv.$^{15-18}$. (3) 24–27, an apocalyptic prophecy, describing the judgment of the whole world by supernatural convulsions, the blessedness of Israel who shall be rescued, and the resurrection of their dead. (4) 28–33, a series of oracles reflecting, apparently, the historical circumstances of Isaiah's day; 28^{1-6} predictive of the fall of Samaria, vv.$^{7-22}$ a controversy with the dissolute politicians of Jerusalem; 29^{1-8} the abasement and subsequent deliverance of Jerusalem, vv.$^{9-14}$ the spiritual stupidity of Jerusalem, vv.$^{15-24}$ exposure of a conspiracy of the court with Egypt, suddenly changing to a prediction of the future deliverance; 30^{1-17} a return to the Egyptian alliance with denunciations, vv.$^{18-26}$ a picture of the Messianic age, vv.$^{27-33}$ apocalyptic judgment on Assyria; 31 the Egyptian alliance, with a promise for Israel and doom on Assyria; 32^{1-8} a picture of the Messianic age, vv.$^{9-14}$ against the women of Jerusalem, vv.$^{15-20}$ another picture of the future; 33 denunciation of an invader of Judah, and affirmation of her deliverance. (5) Chs. 34. 35, Israel's triumph over Edom, return from exile, and blessedness.

* Eichhorn and Möller, quoted by Vatke, Einl. 620, assigned chs. 40–66 to reign of Manasseh. None of the titles in the Bk. of Isaiah affirm that he prophesied under Manasseh.

† Some deduce from 2 K 20^4 that he lived in 'the middle' or 'lower city' (Cheyne, Encyl. Brit.^{9} xiii. 378).

B. Then follows the historical section 36–39, of which 36 f. narrates Sennacherib's demand for the surrender of Jerusalem; 38, Hezekiah's sickness and cure, with his hymn; and 39, Merodach-baladan's embassy to Hezekiah.

C. Chs. 40–66, the real or assumed standpoint of the bulk of which is the end of the Babylonian exile, though there are some chapters which appear to have been written in Palestine. (See below.)

IV. CRITICISM OF THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE BOOK.—The preceding analysis reveals not only that the Bk. of Isaiah is the combination of several earlier collections of oracles (ch. 1 a general preface, (a) 2–12 consisting of minor collections, (b) 13–27, (c) 28–35, (d) 36–39 (?), (e) 40–66), but also that, while many of these have obviously risen from the circumstances of Isaiah's own day, others reflect other periods, especially the Babylonian exile, and some, e.g. the apocalyptic passages, betray a style and temper very different from the oracles that belong to Isaiah's lifetime. Moreover, while some of the collections are entitled Isaiah's, others make no claim to be from his hand. Nevertheless, though Ibn Ezra hinted a few doubts and Calvin wrote as if he felt that ch. 55 at least was 'uttered during the captivity in Babylon' (on 55^3), up to the end of last century the book was universally understood to be covered by the title in its first verse, and therefore as Isaiah's throughout. About 1780, J. B. Koppe in the Germ. ed. of Lowth's Commentary was the first to undermine this position. He was followed by Eichhorn (Introd. iii. 76), and by Döderlein (Esaias, 1789, Præf. xii), who takes it as obvious that 40 ff. are by an anonymous prophet about the end of the Exile. (Vatke refers to a more detailed proof of this by J. E. Justi). Not without opposition from the conservative school (e.g. J. V. Möller, De authentia oracc. Es. cc. 40–66), this view was developed by the great critics of the beginning of this century; and it was further perceived that if 40–66 be exilic, parts of 1–39 must also fall to the same date. In 13^1–14^{23} 21^{1-10} 34. 35 Assyria is no longer as in Isaiah's day the dominant world power, nor do these oracles emphasize Jerusalem as the inviolate fortress of God. Babylon takes Assyria's place, her fall is imminent, Israel is in exile but about to be restored. To these non-Isaian chapters the critics added 24–27, which, although they appear to have some reflections of the age before the Exile, and do not allude to Babylon, yet contain phrases descriptive of the Exile as actual, with promises of Israel's deliverance therefrom, and hopes of the establishment of Zion, and the repopulation of the Holy Land. To this list of exilic and post-exilic oracles some added ch. 12, and it was agreed that 15–16^{12} was an oracle older than Isaiah's time, to which Isaiah himself added $16^{13.\,14}$. All the rest of the discourses in 1–39, save for some glosses, were still regarded as Isaiah's own.

Such was virtually the position of criticism down to 1890. It had been established by Gesenius, Ewald, Knobel, and Reuss, and was supported by Kuenen (in 1863), Cheyne (Is. chronol. arranged, 1870, Prophecies of Is. 1880–81, though there is little introduction in this vol., and Enc. Brit. art. 'Isaiah,' 1881; see below on 40–66), Delitzsch (who had previously argued for the unity of the book, but in 1879–80 interpreted 40–66 as from the close of the Exile; see more fully his Comm.^{4} 1889, Eng. ed. 1890), W. R. Smith (Proph. of Isr. 1882), Driver (Isaiah, Life and Times, 1888), G. A. Smith (The Expositor's Bible, 1888), Dillmann (1890). Some of these carried their doubts further than the passages described above. To the non-Isaian oracles some added 23^{15-18}, some the whole of 23, some 19 in whole or part, and some even 33. Others (see below) denied the unity of 40–66. Even conservative critics like Oehler, von Orelli, and Bredenkamp accepted 40–66 as from another than Isaiah, but the latter two argued for the authenticity of several of the disputed passages in 1–39, Bredenkamp and Klostermann for some in 40–66.

During the last ten years the Bk. of Isaiah, in common with all the prophetic writings, has been subjected to a still more rigorous analysis and criticism, with the result that while Kirkpatrick (Doct. of the Prophets, 1892), Driver (Introd.^{6}), and Skinner (Cambridge Bible for Schools, 1896) adhere in the main to the position of the majority of critics before 1890, Duhm (in Nowack's Handkommentar, 1892), Hackmann (Die Zukunftserwartung des Jes. 1893), Cheyne (Introd. to the Bk. of Is. 1895, cf. his edition of the text and translation in Haupt's SBOT, 1898), have cast doubt upon the authenticity of many more portions of 1–39. There can be no question that the thorough analysis to which those critics have subjected the text of 1–39 has been successful in discovering a number of late glosses and other insertions in the genuine prophecies of Isaiah. In all the prophetic books the presence of such is now generally recognized. But Duhm, Hackmann, and Cheyne have cut more deeply than this, and subtracted from Isaiah long passages which were previously regarded as genuine. Their reasons are sometimes mainly subjective; they base their conclusions upon the precarious distinction between the real Isaian style and what they consider to be imitations of it, or infer them from a change of rhythm. The feature of Duhm's able essay is the relegation of a considerable number of passages to the 2nd and even to the 1st cent. before Christ. He founds this upon their apocalyptic character, but he reserves for Isaiah not a few oracles and phrases quite as apocalyptic as those he transfers to the late date. In the latter, too, there are historical allusions which are suitable to the Assyrian period; Duhm either alters the reading of these, or strains their meaning to suit the Greek period. And, finally, there is the almost indubitable fact which he fails to discredit, that the prophetic Canon was so fixed by B.C. 200 as to render impossible the inclusion within it of the prophetic Book of Daniel. Duhm, indeed, argues that the latter was excluded because of its apocalyptic character; but if he is right, the same reason should have excluded from the Bk. of Isaiah the passages which, because of their apocalyptic character, Duhm assigns to the 2nd cent. This argument therefore, for the presence in Isaiah of features of so late a date, may be said to have failed (for details see Expositor, July to Dec. 1892, and Crit. Review, 1893). Hackmann (op. cit. p. 143 ff.) denies to Isaiah the two pictures of the Messiah 9^{1-6} and 11^{1-9}—the former on the grounds that it starts from the ruin of the Jewish state which was not actual in Isaiah's time, and implies a rejection of the reigning king, Ahaz or Hezekiah, and a confidence in an unborn One, which it is inconceivable to associate with Isaiah. It suits better a time when there was no king in Israel and the people had not independent existence. The destruction of David's dynasty is also implied, he thinks, by 11^{1-9}, the picture of universal peace in which and the 'supernatural' elements are further symptoms of a late date. These reasons are anything but conclusive. Few will doubt that the delinquencies of Ahaz furnished sufficient occasion to Isaiah for his hope of the appearance of a real champion and righteous ruler of Israel. It is equally hard to believe the great prophet incapable, at that age in Israel, of a dream of universal peace; one might as well argue that such a dream was impossible in the post-exilic period (to which Hackmann relegates it) because many of the writings of the latter, like Jl 4 and 'Zec' 10, exhibit a rude delight in war. The truth is that among all nations and in all periods of their history the hope of peace has existed along with a belief in the necessity of war, and even with a delight in it. Hackmann finds a more plausible reason (147 f.) for a late date for these passages in their language, which bears a few post-exilic features. He also denies to Isaiah the well-known passage 2^{2-5}, repeated in Mic 4^{1-5}, on the ground that its ideals of the sovereignty of J" over foreign nations, their adoption of His law, the supremacy of the temple, and universal peace, agree better with a post-exilic than with a pre-exilic date (so, too, Mitchell, Isaiah, a Study of Chaps. i.–xii., New York, 1897, 108 ff.). On the last point an answer has been given above; nor on any of the others is there anything incompatible with a date in the 8th century. (So even Duhm: on the details see the present writer's Twelve Proph. i. 365 f.). Cheyne, who had previously (see above) agreed with the majority of critics as to what were Isaiah's authentic prophecies, stated modifications of his views in the JQR for 1891 f., and in 1895 published his very able and thorough Introd. to the Bk. of Isaiah, in which, while accepting some of Duhm's and Hackmann's results, he went still further and withdrew nearly a third of 1–12 from Isaiah, and from the oracles hitherto regarded as genuine in 13–35 nearly a half. It is impossible to examine his argument in details. His general principle must be regarded as sound by all who have worked at the text of the prophets, viz. that to the oracles of even the greatest of the prophets later generations of Israel added supplements, in order to mitigate unqualified messages of doom, or for other purposes of edification. This is a principle, however, in the application of which there must naturally be very great difference of opinion. The conclusions do largely depend on the subjectivity of the critic; and, speaking generally (which is all that the space of this article permits), it must be said that Cheyne's reasons for withdrawing passages from Isaiah are sometimes very hypothetical, and that, to say the least, there often exist in the periods to which he assigns these passages as many difficulties as in the age of Isaiah. There is not a little arbitrariness, as, for instance, when he says that the post-exilic origin of 2^{2-5} is 'beyond reasonable doubt'; or in reference to 15. 16 (which he takes to be not pre- but post-Isaian) 'was Isaiah the man to use another prophet's material?' There is sometimes an undue depreciation of the literary (cf. p. 88) and spiritual abilities of the pre-exilic period in Israel, especially if one keeps in mind the wonderful composition of the constituents of JE. And one may reasonably ask whether hope and comfort were not as much required by Israel, and not as likely to be contributed by her greatest prophet, in the 8th cent. as after the Exile. These considerations detract from the conclusiveness of Cheyne's powerful and candid arguments. Some further details may be noticed. In ch. 1, vv.$^{2-4}$ and $^{27.\ 28}$ are taken from Isaiah, hardly with sufficient reason; 4^{2-6} is placed after the Exile, probably correctly; on 9^{1-6} 'Hackmann is probably right,' and better though still not conclusive reasons are offered for a date later than Isaiah; so with 11^{1-8}. In 13–23, 19 is all post-exilic (Skinner agrees that vv.$^{16-25}$ are probably so). 23^{15-18} is (in agreement with previous critics) a later addition. It is in 29–33 that Cheyne withdraws most from Isaiah: he gives strong reasons for the post-exilic date of 29^{16-24}, less strong for that of 30^{18-26}; 32 is also assigned to after the Exile, but hardly with sufficient reason, though strong objections to Isaiah's authorship are not unduly stated. 33 has been suspected as not authentic since Ewald's time. Kuenen placed it under Josiah or later, Stade after the Exile, and to the latter Cheyne inclines. There are indeed several difficulties both of style and substance in assigning the ch. to Isaiah (cf. Skinner; Driver leaves it with Isaiah).

V. THE PROPHECIES OF THE MESSIAH IN ISAIAH 1–39.—In addition to the examination of the different passages given above, the Messianic element in Is 1–39 requires a more general discussion, not only because of its intrinsic importance, but on account of the tendency of recent criticism to deny that the Messiah appeared at all in the prophecy of Israel before the Exile. This thesis, stated by Marti (Gesch. der Isr. Rel. 190), has been elaborated by Paul Volz (Die vorexil. Jahweprophetie u. der Messias, Göttingen, 1897, cf. Brückner, Komp. des B. Jes.). Besides the evidence stated above from the language and historical allusions of the separate Messianic passages, the following are the chief reasons offered. The functions assigned to the Messiah by the disputed passages are not religious but political: to rescue Israel from her heathen tyrants and to govern her in righteousness, but neither to teach the people of God, whether as prophet or as priest, nor to convert the heathen. The rôle is national, not universal. How, it is asked, can these features be harmonized either with this fact that before the Exile the temper of prophecy is mainly threatening and judicial, or with that other, that when the pre-exilic prophets do open up the future they lay down the lines of a universal ethic? Besides, where is there room for so glorious a representative of J" in a future which is to be filled with the manifest and all-sufficient presence of J" Himself?

To the present writer these arguments not only appear inconclusive for a late date of the Messianic passages, but in some respects appear to support the tradition of an early date. For, that the functions of the Messiah are described in the passages as national surely suits an early, rather than the later, stages of Israel's religious development; no detailed picture of the Messiah which was later than the second Isaiah could have omitted the duties and hopes on which the latter so brilliantly insists, of converting the heathen to the knowledge and discipline of J". Nor is the temper of pre-exilic prophecy so exclusively judicial as is now frequently alleged. The prophets insist that a remnant of Israel shall survive the judgment. Isaiah himself not only predicted, but, during the most influential period of his career, strenuously laboured for, the continuation of the Jewish State. It is not a different dispensation which, like the later apocalyptic prophecy, he anticipates, but a continuance of the present political conditions, purified and exalted. Now among these political conditions in Judah, was the dynasty of David. In contrast with the frequent usurpations of the throne of N. Israel, David's house persisted in Judah practically unchallenged. Since David's own day the religion of J" was closely wedded with the dynasty, and, besides, David had been successful in achieving the ideal of the unity of all Israel. By Isaiah's time, therefore, the political presuppositions of the Messianic oracles in Is 1–39 were all present. We may even affirm that it would have been passing strange if his anticipations of the religious and political future of Judah had been dissociated from the Davidic monarchy. Moreover, it ought not to be forgotten that none of these disputed passages attribute to the Messiah any of the measures for achieving the establishment of Israel which were required by the exilic or immediately post-exilic ages of the nation's history. There is no word in them of bringing back the exiles or portions of God's people scattered over the world; and no word of the post-exilic dream of a world-empire. On the contrary, in the tasks which these passages assign to the Messiah, we see exactly the two main ends upon which Isaiah's prophetic activity was bent: the deliverance of Judah from the Assyrian invasion which overthrew the kingdom of N. Israel, and the establishment of justice and a pure civic life among the people of J″.

Such considerations amply disprove Volz's contention that the conception of the Messiah was one foreign to the spirit of prophecy, and only dragged into the service of their doctrine by the later prophets, out of the popular religion of Israel. It is true that the hope of the Messiah may have been an article of the popular creed, just as, according to Amos, was the hope of the victorious day of J″. But if the prophets, and, in particular, Isaiah, did not actually create the ideal of a victorious and righteous monarch for Israel, Isaiah certainly re-created it: gave it those moral elements with which we may be sure the popular religion was incapable of investing it.

VI. THE THEOLOGY OF ISAIAH.—We are now in a position to discern the authentic doctrine of Isaiah upon God, religion, Israel, and the world. Like all the earlier prophets, Isaiah reveals his doctrine in no abstract or systematic form, but point by point in connexion with some event of contemporary history or some emergent phase of the character of his generation. Now two great facts were before him, and may be said to have formed from first to last the starting-point, if not the full premise, of his teaching. One was the moral badness of Israel's life, taken along with their stupid misunderstanding of what their God required of them. Isaiah's generation were not as a whole consciously apostate from J″; they were assiduous in His worship, lavish of sacrifice to Him, and careful to observe at all points the ritual which they believed to be His will. But they were shamelessly immoral. Luxury and the vices which spring from it sapped the national life. The administration of justice was corrupt. The rich oppressed the poor, civic duties were neglected. All this evil state of the people was contrary to the will of J″, and due to their misunderstanding of the character and demands of their God. He was a God of righteousness, and He had already made known to Israel His torah, as a demand for the very virtues they neglected. He loathed the assiduous worship which they combined with a life so immoral. He regarded the evil features of the latter as sin and rebellion, which required a very thorough punishment, one severe enough to destroy the bulk of the nation.*

Coincident with this state of sinfulness, in which the people were plunged, was the second fact from which Isaiah's prophecies started. The power of Assyria rose on the political horizon, threatening the destruction of all the principalities of Palestine. There had been Assyrian campaigns in N. Syria since 870. Damascus had fallen before one of them in 803, and her forces had suffered another defeat in 773. Then came a pause of nearly thirty years. But in 745, or at least five years before Isaiah's call to prophesy, Tiglath-pileser III., a soldier of great energy, usurped the Assyrian throne, and set in motion a more vigorous policy towards Palestine. The siege of Arpad and the subjugation of Babylon detained him for nine years, but in 734–733 he overthrew Damascus and swept into captivity, besides its people, the Israelite populations of Gilead and Galilee. Isaiah had perhaps at first been uncertain whether the required punishment of Israel would proceed from Assyria or from Egypt, the only other power at that time which was capable of contesting with Syria the lordship of Palestine (cf. 7^{18}). But those proofs of Assyrian power, and the novel Assyrian policy of sweeping into distant captivity the bulk of the subjugated peoples,—those proofs which came with the years 734, 733,—settled the question once for all. Assyria was the destined rod of J″'s anger, and this should accomplish itself not only in the overthrow of N. Israel, to which Isaiah holds out no hope, but in the thorough invasion of Judah. It is an interesting problem, in what proportion the moral conviction of Israel's guilt needing punishment on the one hand, and the political certainty of Assyria's advance on the other, contributed to the assurance of Isaiah's predictions. Of this we may be sure, however, that without their native convictions of J″'s righteousness and power of judgment upon Israel, the prophets could only have viewed the Assyrian advance as a perplexing, if not a paralyzing, problem. But instead of so feeling it, Isaiah is ready for Assyria, predicts the certainty of invasion while the bulk of his people still doubt the latter, and is very clear as to its meaning. That which enabled him and other prophets to see in the advance of Assyria a moral intention, which was to exhaust itself in the destruction of all the Syrian States, but stop short of the utter overthrow of Judah, was the character of Judah's God, His might above all the gods of the heathen, and His purpose of grace not to let His people be abolished. The advance of Assyria was, therefore, a secondary and subordinate factor in the inspiration of Isaiah. At the same time the appearance of the greatest empire of the age, as obviously the instrument of Israel's God, must have lent to the prophets' ideas of His government a largeness to which the religious imagination of Israel had not previously attained (see Ch. IV. of Bk. of the Twelve Proph. in the 'Expositor's Bible'). And so we find in Isaiah a conception of the divine providence of the world more wide and majestic than anything that had yet appeared in Israel, although several of its features had already been expressed by Amos and are implied in parts of the JE documents of the Pentateuch. All the forces of the world are subject to J″. The great empires unconsciously fulfil His will upon Israel: the heathen peoples, however they rage, break upon the limits He sets to their advance, as the sea breaks upon its shore. These limits are drawn at the utter destruction of His people. An Israel, however shortened and cut down, must survive. To this end Isaiah (though he sometimes appears to abandon the impenitent people to the destruction they court by their foolishness) insists for the most part on the inviolableness of Jerusalem. Judah may be overrun by the invader: Jerusalem cannot fall. Her security is an essential part of the providence of God.

The constant emphasis which Isaiah lays upon the inviolableness of this one spot of earth, this obscure highland fortress, not only as a settled fact of the future (10^{24-34}) but as an essential article of religious faith (28^{16} etc.), has been criticized as derogating from the spirituality of the religion he taught. But it must be kept in mind that Jerusalem was the one spot on earth where J″ was worshipped. His shrine was there. There lived the only community which preserved for mankind the true knowledge of Him and His purposes—the little band of disciples to whom Isaiah committed His testimony and revelation. The continued existence in the world of this spiritual Israel (it is the first conception in history of the Church within the Church) is what Isaiah believes in and proclaims with such unwearied assurance against both the fears of their rulers and the arrogance of the heathen who sought their overthrow. But for their continuance the inviolableness of at least Jerusalem was necessary; otherwise they had been blotted out of history like N. Israel itself. The Assyrian policy, to judge from the case of N. Israel, did not leave room for the survival of a people of J″ among its captives, as the Babylonian did more than a century later. To interpret, therefore, Isaiah's insistence on the inviolableness of Zion as if it were derogatory to the ethical and spiritual character of his teaching, is as unjust as it would be to bring the charge of unspirituality against any of the great leaders of Christianity who have insisted in a time of persecution that the Church shall not perish, but in spite of its present tyrants survive in freedom and peace. There was no other way for a spiritual community to exist in Isaiah's day except through the security of Jerusalem. And, as we have seen above, it is also in connexion with the survival of a people of J″ that the promise of a victorious and righteous ruler comes so naturally, if not inevitably, into Isaiah's predictions.

* That Judah was equally sinful with N. Israel, in Isaiah's regard, appears not only from ch. 1, from whatever date this proceeds, but in the inaugural vision 'people of unclean lips' (6^5), and 2^{11-17} where in v.^{16} at least Judah is meant.

The charge of unspirituality which is brought against the emphasis on Zion's security as a fortress might have had some justice in it if Isaiah had anywhere attempted to provide for that security by merely political means. But, on the contrary, his conviction of God's purpose to preserve Jerusalem is so profoundly spiritual that it leads him to condemn Israel's own restless attempts to save their State; and he does so with as much fierceness as he has condemned their immorality. They will not trust their God any more than they will obey His law; but, on the contrary, distrustful of His purpose and His power, they seek to effect Zion's safety by intrigues and alliances with the heathen. These, says Isaiah, will only draw them into the confusion of the world's politics, from which trust in J″ would assuredly keep them free. So, first, we find him seeking to restrain Ahaz from appealing for help to Assyria when Judah is threatened by Pekah of N. Israel and Rezin of Damascus (7): let them do their worst, they cannot harm Judah; but if Ahaz persists in calling on Assyria, J″ will punish his unbelief by summoning the heathen, either Egypt or Assyria ($v.^{18}$), to overrun his land. Yet in spite of this, when Ahaz has thrown himself upon Assyria, and Judah settled down in quietness for thirty years as an Assyrian vassal, thus escaping the fate which destroyed N. Israel, Isaiah accepts the fact; and when, in 704, on the accession of Sennacherib, the nations of Palestine throw off their allegiance to the northern empire, he seeks to prevent Judah from joining them, and uses all his powers of counsel, scorn, and threatening to circumvent the political party at Jerusalem that intrigues for an alliance with Egypt (28–31). This apparent change of Isaiah's attitude to Assyria was not due to political opportunism, or only to the political experience of these thirty years, that Judah was as safe in allegiance to Assyria as in 734 he had believed she would be by abstaining from all intercourse with that heathen empire, but to the unchanging conviction that whatever Judah's political relations might be in the providence of God, He was able to preserve her by Himself, and that her rulers' forgetfulness of this, and their anxiety to take measures of their own, would only, because of the unbelief which was their motive, end in disgrace and ruin. Besides, the intrigue with Egypt was a breach of faith with Assyria, an unhallowed and immoral thing, and this was a second proof to Isaiah that it could not succeed. He found a third in the blindness of the Jewish statesmen to the weakness of Egypt, which promised much, but never did, or could do, aught to help those who trusted in her. This gives him occasion to say that, clever as the politicians deem themselves to be, J″ is more wise. J″'s measures for the security of Jerusalem are not mere arbitrary or supernatural exhibitions of power against her foes, but rational counsel to her statesmen, advice to keep clear of Egypt and to continue faithful to the Assyrian alliance.

The Jewish statesmen did not listen to Isaiah; and when Sennacherib invaded Palestine in 701, he found Hezekiah, like all his neighbour princes, in a state of revolt. Even then, however, Isaiah did not abate his confidence in the deliverance of Jerusalem. Once, indeed, his people seemed so corrupt, so abandoned to distrust of J″, and so incapable of the repentance to which he called them, that he announced the impossibility of their forgiveness, and condemned them to death ($22^{1\text{-}14}$). This, however, was momentary. Something happened to change their disposition. What it was exactly we cannot say. The most probable supposition is that Hezekiah submitted to Sennacherib, and bought the security of his city by a large tribute; but that having accepted this the Assyrian returned with heavier and more insolent demands (36. 37). Hezekiah and his statesmen were in despair (37^1), and the population, it would appear, ready to yield (36^{11}). Isaiah alone stood firm. Judah was sufficiently punished, the Assyrian in his arrogance made it clear that he expected the city to fall, because its God was no better than the gods of the States he had already overthrown. Isaiah affirmed such arrogance must be punished by J″, who would deliver His now penitent people. And the deliverance came. The hosts of Sennacherib appear to have been visited by the plague during their approach to the Egyptian border,—always in antiquity a region liable to such a visitation,—and the Assyrian corps that invested Jerusalem was suddenly withdrawn (cf. Isaiah 1–39 in 'Expositor's Bible'; Driver's Isaiah in 'Men of the Bible'; McCurdy, HPM, 1896, §§ 675–710). But however this may have been, Jerusalem was relieved, and Isaiah's predictions of her siege and ultimate deliverance literally fulfilled, and fulfilled, too, mainly by his own unbroken confidence and energy. It was, indeed, a victory of that faith by which the world is overcome. The people of J″, though sorely punished, were saved, the continuity of Israel's history preserved, and all the subsequent development of their religion made possible.

The above outline of Isaiah's doctrine and statesmanship makes it clear that while his long experience of the world's history, during one of its most critical periods, expanded and illustrated his belief in God, it was the latter which was the origin and root of all his convictions and his efforts on behalf of Israel. This is what Isaiah himself tells us (6). His ministry started from a vision of J″; and as his record of this vision is not placed at the beginning of his book, but after the first collection of his prophecies, and as the impressions he received from it appear (especially from $vv.^{9.\ 10}$) to be stated as if articulated and developed by his subsequent experience, we may see in the chapter not only the origins, but a full record, of his belief about God. J″ is the Lord or King, immeasurably exalted above everything human. His sublimity is the ruling impression on the prophet's mind, and throughout the discourses it appears again and again, in contrast both to the puny pride and ambition, 'everything high,' in Israel themselves (2), and to the overweening arrogance of the Assyrian (10, etc.). This infinite, awful sublimity is in the main what Isaiah expresses by J‴'s holiness—a term whose root-meaning is probably that of separateness. But by the prophet himself this holiness is personally felt most keenly in its contrast to his own and his people's sin. The first conscience excited in Isaiah by the vision of the thrice-holy God is that he is a man of unclean lips, and dwells among a people of unclean lips (6^{5}). Before he can be of use to such a Deity, his uncleanness must be purged away ($6^{6f.}$). And so, before a people can be the people of God, their iniquity must be punished and driven out of them. The awful severity of this judgment (6^{9-12} and in many other passages) is a consequence of J‴'s holiness. Isaiah lived through terrible times; he predicted a fearfully rigorous judgment of God's own people by God Himself. Everywhere he betrays a burning sense of the awful earnestness of life, and the pitilessness of the divine providence in dealing with sin, with folly, and with pride. All these are consequences of the holiness of God, and another consequence is the irresistibleness of the power by which His judgments are carried through.

But though the majestic transcendence of God, and His sovereign independence of everything human and earthly, his exaltation above every entanglement and compromise of the world's life is thus the ruling article of Isaiah's creed; the prophet almost equally emphasizes the divine immanence in the world and the history of man. The correlative of J‴'s holiness is His glory, of which the earth is full (6^{3}). J″ is not only the infinitely High, but the infinitely Near. His moral interest in man's conduct extends to the minutest details. He sees and is touched by every mood and change of His people's character. He marks each fault they have, loathes each sin, feels each wound, and is swift to respond to each turn of their hearts in penitence. His passion for them, His 'zeal' or 'jealousy,' is quick and powerful. Nor is J‴'s interest confined to Israel. The oracles of Isaiah on the foreign nations, and especially those on Egypt and Tyre, not only reveal that J‴'s standards of righteousness are for them also, and that their sins are punished by Him as transgressions against Himself, but that He has pity for their teeming multitudes, and rejoices in their particular civilizations and destinies.

Parallel to this doctrine of the immanence and practical interest of J″ in men's life runs Isaiah's constant teaching as to His reasonableness. He is no arbitrary Deity whom Isaiah reveals, but the father and teacher of His people, who reasons and argues with them, who commends His ways to them, in opposition to their own measures, by pointing out the greater wisdom and effectiveness of the former. J″ is wonderful in counsel, and excellent in that kind of wisdom which carries things through (28^{29}). He asks their trust in His guidance, because of its reasonableness, and not simply because it is His will (29^{34}). In the most harrowing and apparently destructive processes of history He proceeds by method (28^{23-29}). The politicians think themselves clever: He also is wise, and has His own righteous purposes, which He will effect in time: the destruction of evil-doers, and in the end the rescue of His people, however much He needs first to beat and break them down (31). In short, He is a God who works in history as in nature by law—El mishpat is His name (30^{18}); the simplest of His moral principles effect, if violated, their own revenge (28); leave the tendencies of history, too, to Him, and they will issue right. With all this insistence on law moral and natural, is to be noted the absence of miracle and 'supernatural signs'; only once does Isaiah even seem to appeal to the latter ($7^{10ff.}$). The divine government of the world is manifested in natural and historical processes. The unity of these processes, which all over the visible world was conspicuously illustrated by the Assyrian empire, is for Isaiah himself a corollary from his belief in the transcendent sovereignty of J″. Smend says truly (AT Religionsgeschichte, 206) that 'the idea of the Weltgeschichte dates from Isaiah: its oldest meaning is the glorification of the One God.'

Isaiah has received from the Christian Church the title of the Evangelical Prophet. This was given mainly in the belief that chs. 40–66 were also by him. But, even in the prophecies which criticism has left to him, we find the elements of the doctrines of Grace. God forgives sin, the most heinous and defiling (1^{18}). Though He has passed sentence of death upon His people (22^{14}), their penitence procures for them His pardon and deliverance (36. 37). Necessarily severe as His judgment is, cruelly as His providence bears upon sin and folly, His love and pity towards His own never fail (14^{32}). He is their well-beloved, and has constantly cared for them ($5^{1ff.}$). It is His passion for them that works their deliverance (9^{7}). He longs to be gracious, and to have mercy even when His people are most given to their own destructive courses; and He waits eagerly for their prayers to Him ($30^{18f.}$).

Of the future which shall follow Judah's judgment and deliverance Isaiah makes several predictions (cf. ESCHATOLOGY OF OT, vol. i. 736 ff.). First, as was to be expected, he emphasizes its ethical features. The sinners having been destroyed (1^{28}), and Jerusalem purified, the city shall be a city of righteousness ($1^{25ff.}$), under a righteous ruler (9^{7} $11^{4ff.}$). But above all J‴'s own presence and government shall be very manifest, with exceeding joy and glory. As a result, men shall abandon all their idols (2^{20} etc.), the worship of which (as we ought to have noted above) had not wholly disappeared from Israel, in spite of the fact that the national religion was that of J″. With righteousness shall come peace (2^{4}, if this be Isaiah's, 9^{7} 11^{3}), and with peace the renewed fertility, and the free enjoyment of the fruits of the soil (1^{19} 4^{2} 30^{23-26}). In the last of these passages the promise is given in terms of great beauty, and suited to the needs of a people whose fields had been overrun by war for more years than one, and who have been cooped up by siege. Over all a wonderful light shall be shed: it is the symbol of the dispersion of the people's present gloom. Moreover, the nations shall willingly come to Jerusalem to be taught of Israel's God and His torah ($2^{2f.}$; but see above, § IV., where it is pointed out that there are some objections to the authenticity of this passage). On the Messiah see above, §§ IV. V. Isaiah's Messiah is a human king, of the stock of David, and with functions that are political, both military and judicial. He is not the mediator of religious gifts to His people: forgiveness, knowledge of God, and the like. It is only in this, that he saves the people of God from destruction and reigns over them, that he can be regarded as a type of Jesus Christ.

VII. RELIGIOUS REFORMS IN ISAIAH'S TIME.—It would have been strange if a prophet so practical and statesmanlike, and so influential with the rulers of Judah, had not left his mark on legislation and ritual. We cannot believe the author of the oracles against images, the spirit that organized the city's deliverance from Assyria, to have been idle in the long opportunity of reforms afforded by the accession of Hezekiah, and by the years of peace which followed till the death of Sargon, or again during the few years, uncertain in number, of Hezekiah's lifetime after the relief of Jerusalem in 701. It is to the former of these periods that 2 K 18 assigns certain drastic reforms of worship, of which it gives the credit to Hezekiah. The list of them given in v.^{4} contains the removal of the high places, the mazzēbôth or pillars, the 'ashērîm (see ASHERAH), and the brazen serpent called Nehushtan, to which the people burned incense; and in v.^{22} the Rabshakeh is reported to have said to the Jews in 701 that Hezekiah had already removed the high places. The integrity of v.^{4} has been justly doubted: the grammar is of late Hebrew. It has also been maintained (Wellhausen, Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch., and Stade, GVI 1607 f.) that the only reform which we have any just ground for leaving with Hezekiah is the destruction of the brazen serpent and other images, which, because in 705 ff. Isaiah represents it as still future (30^{22}), can only have taken place after 701.

In ascribing to Hezekiah the destruction of the high places, mazzēbôth and 'ashērîm, it is alleged that the hand intruded into v.^{4} and the editor of v.^{22} have wrongly anticipated reforms which were not effected till a century later by Josiah. But while this conclusion is undoubtedly favoured by the language of v.^{4}, it ignores the probabilities on the other side. It is quite true that Isaiah, while condemning images, says nothing against the high places, the mazzēbôth and the 'ashērîm. But to condemn images, and to do away with them, was to destroy the significance of the high places, which depended on their worship, and to concentrate the people's faith on the sanctuary in Zion, where J″ was not worshipped under any form. Besides, the Assyrian invasion, devastating as it did the whole country and yet incapable of violating Zion, worked mightily to the discredit of the high places, and the proof of Zion's unique holiness. We may also say that though Isaiah is not reported to have condemned the high places,* yet his fundamental principle of the oneness and spirituality of J″ must, according to the religious notions then prevalent, have logically involved the abolition of the high places, at which there was not only a half-pagan ritual, but the tendency also to think of the deity worshipped as a local deity different from J″ of Jerusalem. We are justified, then, in believing in the probability of some measures during Hezekiah's reign for the removal of the high places. But, even if we hesitate to affirm this, we may at least state with certainty that Isaiah, both by his doctrine of J″ as the one true God, who could not be worshipped under the form of an image made by man, and in his insistence upon the solitary inviolateness of Zion and in the unaided faith and energy by which he secured this, laid the indispensable foundation for the legislation of Deuteronomy and the reforms of Josiah. We may also assert that the measures in this direction which Hezekiah inaugurated under Isaiah's inspiration must have been pretty severe; otherwise they could scarcely have provoked the terrible reaction which followed under Manasseh. In this state of probability, somewhat short of certainty, we must be content, with our present data, to leave the question.

VIII. THE HISTORICAL CHAPTERS 36–39.—These chapters are found also in 2 K 18^{13}–20^{19}, where their text has been somewhat more fully and accurately preserved (for details see Driver, LOT^{6} 226 f.; Cheyne, Introd. 215) than here (cf. especially 38). The passage 2 K 18^{14-16} is wanting in the Book of Isaiah, and the latter's Psalm of Hezekiah is wanting in Kings. The whole section is very composite. For details we must refer to Dillmann, Duhm, Cheyne, Skinner, and to Stade's analysis in ZATW for 1886. Here it is only possible to give a bare outline. In 36–37 we have two narratives of Sennacherib's endeavour or endeavours to capture Jerusalem: one of them 36–37^{8}, the other 37^{9-38}.* Many have read these as the respective accounts of those successive attempts on Jerusalem which we saw above to be the probable course of the Assyrian campaign. But Stade and others have taken them to be variant records of one and the same assault of Sennacherib on Jerusalem, and have divided them as follows: 36^{1}–37^{9a} + 37–38, and 37^{9b-37a}.† Further, Cheyne believes that in these narratives the following are later insertions, $36^{1.\,7.\,18-20}$ 37^{4}, 'to reproach the living God,' ^{6} 'Wherewith . . . have reviled me,' $^{8bc\ 22-32.\ 34}$. On the question of the chronology in 36^{1} and 2 K $18^{10.\,13}$ see Driver, Isaiah^{2}, 13; Cheyne, Introd. 216 ff.; Skinner, Is. 1–39, lxxvi f., 262 f. The reported message of Isaiah to Hezekiah 37^{22b-35} consists of—(a) a taunt-song in the Kinah measure, vv.$^{22b-29}$, and (b) the giving of a sign to Hezekiah in another rhythm, vv.$^{30-32}$, and (c) a prediction of the relief of Jerusalem, vv.$^{33-35}$. The taunt-song 'appears to be inserted in the narrative from some independent source . . . probably a genuine work of Isaiah'; $^{33-35}$ 'the actual message of the prophet on this occasion' (Skinner); but see Cheyne, Introd. 219. Chs. 38. 39 are probably from the same source as 36. 37: Duhm and Cheyne assign them to the author of the second of the two narratives in 36. 37. The 'writing of Hezekiah,' 38^{9-20}, was assumed even by Kuenen in the 1st ed. of his Onderzoek, ii. 93, and by Dillmann, to be genuine. The present writer expounded it as genuine in the 'Expositor's Bible,' Isai. 1–39, ch. xxv. But he now feels the force of the objections to this, drawn from the language, which has many late features (so Kuenen's later opinion, Duhm, and Cheyne).

IX. PROPHECIES CERTAINLY NOT ISAIAH'S IN CHS. 1–39.—The detailed discussion of these is hardly relevant to an article on Isaiah himself; but a few data may be given concerning the chief of them.

11^{10-16}.—Dillmann argues for Isaian authorship, but most think the passage implies that the Exile has taken place; the Messiah is not, as in Isaiah's own prophecies, the political ruler of Israel, but the restorer of the exiles and the resort of all nations (cf. Giesebrecht, Beiträge, 25 ff.; Driver, Isaiah^{2}, 214 f.). 12 is without doubt from a date after the Exile (besides the Commentaries see Francis Brown, Jour. of Bibl. Literature, 1890, 128 ff.). 13^{1}–14^{23} implies that the Jews are in exile, and in servitude to Babylon, the fall of whose king, however, is imminent; the Medes (13^{17}) are already invading Babylonia. The ideas and language do not suit Isaiah's time, but do suit the exilic age. For details see Cheyne, Introd. 69 ff.: Driver dates it a little before B.C. 549. 15^{1}–16^{12} has usually been attributed, on grounds of difference of style from Isaiah's, and of the suitability of its historical allusions to the time of Jeroboam II., to a prophet of that date (so among others Hitzig, Wellhausen, W. R. Smith, Dillmann, and more doubtfully Driver. Ewald, Kuenen, Baudissin, assign to at least a prophet earlier than Isaiah), Isaiah himself adding 16$^{13.14}$. In 1888 Schwally (ZATW 207 ff.) argued for the post-exilic origin of the whole section; and it forms one of those passages which Duhm would bring down to the Hasmonæan period. Cheyne thinks the most conservative theory which is possible is that a post-exilic author combined a genuine oracle on Moab, 16^{14}, with an anonymous pre-exilic prophecy also on Moab, and filled up illegible passages in an antique style. 21$^{1-10}$ was assigned by some early critics (Ewald and others) to the close of the Exile, on the ground that no siege of Babylon such as the passage describes could have interested Judah before then. Then Kleinert (SK, 1877, 174 ff.; so also George Smith the Assyriologist) argued that the passage referred to the first of these sieges of Babylon by the Assyrians in Isaiah's time: 710, 703, 696. To this view Cheyne and Driver at first adhered; but they have recently returned to Ewald's view (Cheyne, Introd. 121 ff.; Driver, LOT^{6} 216). Skinner agrees. There can be little doubt that they are right. 24–27, one of the most remarkable sections of prophecy in the OT, cannot be Isaiah's, and must be post-exilic, for the general reasons already given (to be found in greater detail in Driver, LOT^{6} 219 ff.; Kirkpatrick, Doct. of the Prophets, 475 ff.; Cheyne, Introd. 145 ff.; and Skinner, Is. 1–39, 204 f.). The exact date is very uncertain. Ewald and Delitzsch both placed it in the late 6th or early 5th cent.; so, too, Dillmann, Kirkpatrick, and Driver 'most plausibly.' Probably the question will ultimately lie between this date and the campaigns of Artaxerxes Ochus, c. 350 (see below on 63^7–64), for which Cheyne has ably argued in detail. For an exposition of this very important prophecy see the Comm. and 'Expositor's Bible,' Is. 1–39. 34. 35 are two visions from the same hand, 34 of a general judgment on the Gentiles ($^{1-4}$) and a special doom upon Edom ($^{5-17}$), 35 of the restoration of Israel from exile. Obviously, they must be later than the beginning of the Exile, and the great crime of Edom when the latter took place. With this their language agrees. We are quite unable to fix an exact date. Dillmann (cf. Driver, Is.^{2} 131, LOT^{6} 226) suggests the end of the Exile. Arguing that the writer quotes late exilic and post-exilic writings, lives in Palestine, feels nothing of the Babylonian oppression, and sees imminent on Edom the same calamity as Mal 1$^{1-5}$ refers to, Cheyne suggests the end of the 5th cent. or even a later period.

* Neither with any certainty is Micah, for the reading of Mic 1^{5} is uncertain.

* Another division of the chapters would assign 36^{1} (only with the addition 2 K 18^{14-16}) to the first invasion of Sennacherib, 36^{2}–37 to the second.

† Winckler (Untersuch. 34–36) has attempted to prove that while the first narrative refers to Sennacherib's campaign of 701, the second describes what happened on an alleged return of Sennacherib to Palestine to meet Tirhakah towards the end of his reign between 690 and 681. (Winckler makes the division between the narratives not at 37^{9a} but at 37^{8a}). But for this there is no conclusive evidence: cf. Cheyne, Introd. 234 f.

X. Structure and Date of Chapters 40–66.—The earliest critics who assigned these chapters to the Exile believed them to be a unity. But in the first place it became obvious that after 52^{12} the style changes as decisively and almost as often as in chs. 1–39, and in the second place critics who continued to support Isaiah's authorship alleged that the references are not all exilic or Babylonian, but that in the later chapters there are reflections of Palestine, and some allusions to the Exile as still to come. These facts gradually led to the perception of the composite character of 40–66. Bleek and Ewald were the first to distinguish this, the latter assigning 40$^{1.2}$ 52^{13}–54^{12} and 56^9–57^{11} to the reign of Manasseh. In 1881 Cheyne (Enc. Brit.^{9}) adhered to the pre-exilic origin of some of these passages, but claimed also that there were others equally separable from the earlier chapters, and these he assigned partly to the early Exile and partly to after the Exile. In 1886 Briggs (Mess. Proph.) sought to prove that the sections on the Servant of the Lord were in a different metre and by a different hand from the rest. In 1889 Kuenen assigned 40–49. 52$^{1-12}$ and perhaps 52^{13}–53^{12} to one author, in the end of the Exile, the rest he considered added by this author himself, or by others, after the Return. In 1890 the present writer argued for the composite character of 40–66. In 1892 Duhm distinguished three authors: the so-called 'second Isaiah' in the Exile,* a post-exilic author of the passages on the Servant, and a 'third Isaiah' the author of the bulk of 56–66. Various articles and monographs appeared, working in the same direction. Then in 1895 Cheyne produced the most finished presentation of the theory: 40–55 from one author who combined in it a cycle of poems on the Servant of Jahweh, and the great prophecy of the restoration;† but 56–66, a collection of ten compositions, all of them from the age of Nehemiah, except 63^7–64^{11}, which is probably to be assigned to the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus, or about 360. Meanwhile Dillmann (1890) and Driver [both in the first and sixth (1897) editions of his LOT] adhered to the authorship of the great bulk of the prophecy by one prophet, mostly before but partly also after the Return. Dillmann (p. 363 ff. of his commentary) assigns 40–48 to about 545, 49–62 between 545 and the Return, and 63–66 to the very eve of the Return; only in 66 he sees insertions from a later hand. Driver, upon the resemblance of 56^9–57^{11a} and 59$^{3-15}$ to passages in Jeremiah and Ezekiel, takes these to be pre-exilic prophecies incorporated by the author of 49–66 (Isaiah^{2}, 187 ff.). Cornill (Einleitung in AT) and Wildeboer (Litteratur des AT) admit in 49–62 many signs of composition in Palestine, which, however, do not force us to deny them to the author of 40–48. In 63–66, on the other hand, they find the marks of another and a later writer.

Chs. 40–66 have no title and make no claim to be by Isaiah. 40–48 plainly set forth the ruin of Jerusalem, and the Exile as having already taken place. Israel is addressed as if the time of their penalty in servitude to Babylon were exhausted, and their deliverance is proclaimed as immediate. Cyrus is named as their saviour, and is pointed out as already upon his career, and blessed with success by J″. Nor is it possible to argue, as some have tried to do, that the prophet is predicting these things as if they had already happened. For, as part of an argument for the unique divinity of the God of Israel, Cyrus, 'alive and irresistible, and already accredited with success, is pointed out as the unmistakable proof that former prophecies of a deliverance for Israel are already coming to pass. Cyrus, in short, is not presented as a prediction, but as a proof that a prediction is being fulfilled. Unless he had already appeared, and was on the point of striking at Babylon, with all the prestige of unbroken victory, a great part of 40–48 would be unintelligible' (Isai. 40–66, 'Expositor's Bible,' 9 ff.; see the argument there in detail). There is thus a very clear date for these chapters; they must have been written between 555, Cyrus' advent, and 538, Babylon's fall. If 41^{25} implies the union of Cyrus with the Medes in 549, the possible years are reduced to eleven. Perhaps they should be confined between 545, when Cyrus took

* To this author Duhm assigns 40, except vv.$^{5.31b}$, 41, both of which chapters he rearranges, 42$^{5-14}$ (except v.^{12})^{25}, 43$^{1-20a.22-28}$, 44$^{1-8.21-28a}$, 45$^{1-25}$ except vv.$^{10.13b}$, 46$^{1-5.9-13}$, 47$^{1-15}$ except vv.$^{3a.14b}$, 48$^{1a.}$ (to 'Jacob')$^{3.5a.6-7a.8a.11-16a.}$ (to 'there am I')$^{20.21}$, 49$^{7-26}$, 50$^{1-3}$, 51 except vv.$^{11.15.16.18}$, 52$^{1.2.7-12}$, 54 except vv.$^{15a.17b}$, 55 except vv.$^{3a.7}$.

† In 40–55 Cheyne finds a number of insertions, for which the reader must be referred to his translation in the Polychrome Bible. The more important are 44$^{9-20}$, 46$^{6-8}$, two passages on the artificial idols; 48$^{1a.2.4.5b.7b.8b-10.17-19.22}$; 49^{13}–50^{3}, 51$^{1-14}$ except $^{4b.5b.15.16}$, 52$^{1.2.7-12}$, 54 except v.^{15}, 55.

Sardis, and 538. With this agree the thoughts, the local colour, and the language of the chapters (on the last see Cheyne, Comm. ii., and Driver, Isaiah^{2}, 192 ff.). Nor is there any need to limit this proof to 40–48, though Babylon and Cyrus are confined to them. From 49 to 55 the circumstances are still of exile; as A. B. Davidson remarks, 49 is parallel to 42, and takes for granted the picture of Israel's restoration in 48. The first real break occurs at 52^{13}, where the prophecy of the sin-bearing Servant is introduced. Not only is this written with considerable difference of style, but, if it be left out, 54^1 follows naturally upon 52^{12}. Yet 52^{13}–53 is an evident development from the previous sections on the Servant scattered throughout 40–52. And the whole question is raised whether these sections formed originally a poem by themselves, and if so, whether they are by a different author from the rest of 40–55. Cheyne thinks there is much which makes it impossible for any of these passages to have originally sprung, each at the place which it now occupies, from the progress of the prophet's thoughts. This is doubtful (for reasons the present writer has expressed on p. 313 ff. of Is. 40–66), and it would be difficult to understand why, if originally an independent poem, these sections were broken up and placed just where they are now. In any case there is nothing in them incompatible with their being from the same hand as the rest of 40–55; and indeed Cheyne assigns them to that hand. (For other opinions see above). 56^{1-8} is assigned by Cheyne and others to Nehemiah's time; but an earlier date is not impossible; v.^{8}, however, appears to imply that some Jews have already returned (see the linguistic analysis in Cheyne, 312 f.). 56^9–57 is the passage which most clearly reflects the scenery of Palestine, and charges the Jews both with political sins they could commit only in their own land, and with superstitions also most natural there. Critics have been divided between a pre-exilic date, such as Manasseh's reign, when idolatry and persecution were in force (so since Ewald), and a post-exilic date (so latterly Cheyne, who, after a literary analysis of the passage, places 56^9–57^{13a} shortly before Ezra's arrival and the rest later; the former position is by no means certain, especially after a study of Zec 1–8 and 'Malachi'; but probably the whole prophecy is post-exilic). 58 by most critics (including the present writer) has been assigned to the Exile; this is possible, but Cheyne gives strong reasons for a post-exilic date. 59 is very difficult to analyze and assign; probably it is the fusion of two prophecies, one of which speaks as if Israel, in their own land, were responsible for civic justice, the other as if the great deliverance from exile were just at hand. Some argue, not very successfully, for a pre-exilic date of at least portions of this chapter, but Cheyne for a date after Ezra. 60 was previously taken by Cheyne in his JQR article to be by the same hand as 40 ff., but in his Introd. he argues for its authorship by a post-exilic imitator of that writer, on the grounds of the ideas of the chapter, its poor style, and that the author speaks as if he were a resident of Jerusalem at a time when the city had again a population, though small, and when the temple had been rebuilt, but needed expansion and ornament. These latter reflections of a historical situation are by no means certain; there is no clear implication that the temple has been rebuilt; on the contrary, the city itself appears to have been uninhabited for a time. It is not possible to fix a date. There is the same indefiniteness of circumstance in the poem 61–62. Cheyne affirms that it implies the land of Judah to be in part repeopled and the temple rebuilt (62^9), but this is not evident; one might as well argue from 62^6 that the walls have already been rebuilt. 61^1 proclaims liberty to the captives; if, as Cheyne holds, this refers to the mass of Israel, the prophecy can hardly be referred, as he suggests, to a date after Cyrus, because, though numbers of Jews remained in exile in spite of that great Liberator's edict, they would not be described as in captivity. Probably, however, the reference is too general for so particular an inference from it. Besides, even after Cyrus, there must have been in various parts of the world enslaved or captive Jews. 61^3 speaks of those who mourn in Zion, a phrase which appears to imply that Jerusalem is inhabited, unless we are to take it metaphorically. The language, in spite of resemblances to that of 40–55, affords a little more evidence of a later date. Nothing can be inferred from the person of the speaker of the first verses of 61 till we can conclude whether he is meant to be the Servant of the Lord, in which case we might take the passage as one of the series of oracles on that great figure, and (as some argue) from the same date as the others, or whether he is merely a representative of prophecy. But this is a question which has divided critics, and is very difficult, if not impossible, to answer (see Isaiah 40–66, 'Expositor's Bible,' 435 f.). On the whole, then, it is impossible to fix the date of 61. 62; most opinions vary between a date before the liberation under Cyrus and authorship by the writer of 40–55, and a later authorship by an imitator of that prophet.

The brilliant passage 63^{1-6} stands by itself. Its description of the loneliness of J″ in achieving the overthrow of Edom (the attempts to eliminate the name of Edom from the passage cannot be said to be justified) forbids a reference to some historical defeat of that bitter people by Israel. The vision is of a purely ideal conquest of Israel's chief enemy. In 42^{13} we have a similar picture of J″ travailing for the deliverance of His people; this, however, is not enough on which to argue for identity of authorship, while the ferocity of the passage is somewhat against it. None of the other dates suggested are sufficiently probable.

The next section is 63^7–64, a prayer of intercession for Israel. Here, again, there is great possibility for diversity of opinion as to the date. The passage cannot well be by the author of 40–45; as to that, Cheyne's analysis of the ideas and language (Introd. 352 ff.) is very convincing. Nor is it so clear as the present writer once thought it was, that because the author appeals (63^{11-15}) only to the delivery from Egypt, and not to that from Babylon, the latter is still future as he writes. For Haggai and Zechariah make no mention of Cyrus' decree, or the return from Babylon, though they wrote very soon after these events. (On the objections to Kosters' theory that their silence is a proof that no return had taken place, see the present writer's Twelve Prophets, vol. ii. ch. 16.). What is clear is that Jerusalem has suffered desolation, that the temple has been defiled and burned by Israel's adversaries (63^{18} $64^{10f.}$ Eng.). To what event does this refer? Some say Nebuchadrezzar's destruction of the temple in 586, and date the passage from the early Babylonian exile. But if that were so it would be difficult to understand the Massoretic reading of 63^{18} 'Thy holy people possessed it but a little while'; though this reading is uncertain. The only other similar calamities are that alleged to have taken place in the invasions of Palestine by Artaxerxes Ochus (B.C. 360 ff.) to which Cheyne refers the passage, and that by Antiochus Epiphanes in 169 to which Grotius referred it. The latter may be ruled out of consideration. Of the invasion by Artaxerxes Ochus we know extremely little (for details see W. R. Smith, OTJC, note D; and Cheyne, Introd.

358 ff.); and that he destroyed the temple is only inferred from his cruel character, from his desecration of other shrines on that campaign, and from an ambiguous tradition in Josephus about the reign of the other Artaxerxes. Nevertheless, W. R. Smith and Cheyne have assigned to the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus Pss 74 and 79, with their references to the destruction of the temple, which others assign to Maccabæan times. And arguing from the parallels between these Pss and Is 63^7–64 Cheyne also assigns the latter to the same date. The reasoning is strong, but not conclusive, and hampered by the uncertainty of a burning of the temple about 350. Besides, Ps 74 distinctly points to the conviction that prophecy has ceased in Israel. Not only does Is 63^7–64 betray no such conviction, which, if it had existed, could hardly have been omitted by a writer of the mood of Is 63^7–64, but the whole prophecy is itself an answer to the idea that the prophetic spirit had faded from the nation. Moreover, if Is 63^7–64 has some parallels with Ps 74. 79 it has also some very striking resemblances, both of thought and phraseology, to the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, and its whole tone suits the years of disillusion and despair which elapsed between the return from exile in 537 and the beginning of the rebuilding of the temple in 520. The unique phrases, 'Thy holy cities' (64^{10}), and 'J″'s spirit in the midst of Israel' (63^{11}), find parallels in Zec 2^{16} [Heb.] and Hag 2^5 respectively. There is the same sense of the people's uncleanness as in Hag 2 and Zec 3; the same sense of J″'s excessive anger as in Zechariah's first vision; the same emphasis on the Spirit of J″, and the same idea of J″'s angel, interchangeable with J″ Himself. The despair of Is 63^7–64 is exactly that which Haggai and Zechariah appear to combat in the people, and the circumstances of the time fully explain, as already remarked, the silence of the whole prayer about the liberation from Babylon. On the whole, then, it must be regarded as more reasonable to date 63^7–64 from about 525 than about 350.

Ch. 65, taken by the majority of critics as the divine answer to the prayer of 63^7–64, has been assigned both to Babylonia and Palestine, both to the years before the end of the Exile and to those after the Return. Some (Dillmann, in loco) argue for the former, on the ground that the idolatrous practices mentioned are all suitable to Babylonia, that Israel's occupation of the Holy Land is represented as future in v.^{9}, and that the phrase 'forget my holy mountain' (without reference to the rebuilt temple) recalls the exilic Ps 137^4. To this view the present writer adhered in 1891, but he does not now feel the conclusiveness of it. For the promise of v.^{9} may be naturally interpreted, not of the first return to Zion and occupation of the surrounding district, but to the full possession of Palestine as a whole, which was still unrealized long after the first return. Besides, the idolatrous customs charged may just as easily have been prevalent in Palestine as in any other country of Western Asia, and Gad and Meni (v.^{11}) were undoubtedly Syrian deities, and worshipped in Palestine from time immemorial. In the doubt in which these allusions of the prophecy leave us as to its exact date, we are not assisted either by the ideas or by the language of the passage (for details see Cheyne, Introd. 320 ff.): these cannot determine between two periods so close to each other as the years just before or the century after the Return. Cheyne, who accepts the Palestinian origin, argues that the Samaritans are the people against whom the chapter is addressed, and fixes the date as that of the troubles of the Jews with the Samaritans, which Nehemiah describes. But that the charge is against superstitious and semi-pagan Jews may also plausibly be argued, and there are really no sufficient data to fix a date. On the whole, a Palestinian * and post-exilic origin is the most probable.

Equally obscure is the question of ch. 66. The chapter is probably not a unity, and the text is unusually corrupt. There are echoes of chs. 40–55, but it is quite impossible to assign the chapter to the great evangelist of the Exile. The temple either has been rebuilt or is being rebuilt (vv.$^{1-4.\ 6.\ 20}$); the restored community has already been formed, but is not complete (v.^{9}). The language points to a post-exilic date. The attacks upon the idolatrous customs reveal a close connexion between the chapter and 65. On the whole, therefore, a date soon after the Return appears probable for the bulk of the chapter; but there are probably later insertions. On this see Dillmann, Duhm, and especially Cheyne.

XI. The Theology of Isaiah 40–66.—(a) Chapters 40–55, as we have seen, are addressed to Israel in circumstances very different from those of the generation to which Isaiah of Jerusalem spoke. Isaiah had before him a nation on their own soil: responsible for justice and social reform, for the defence of a fatherland and the conduct of a foreign policy. He appealed to kings, statesmen, and definite classes of society. But chs. 40–55 are addressed to a people in exile, without native leaders or the opportunity of developing great personalities: with no civic life and few social responsibilities; a people in the passive state, with occasion for the exercise of almost no qualities save those of penitence and faith, of memory and hope. Moreover, with Isaiah, and indeed with all prophets up to the Exile, the burden of prophesying is the people's guilt and their doom of exile. But this doom has now been fulfilled. Jeremiah limited it to 70 years. These are almost exhausted, and there are signs that the Babylonian Empire, the instrument of the doom, is approaching its fall. Cyrus, king of Anshan and Persia, having conquered the Medes (B.C. 545), and perhaps also the Lydians (542), is descending on Babylon. What is of immediate interest to Israel, therefore, is not, as formerly, the immoral state of the people and the imminence of certain events of chastisement, but the dawn of that redemption and restoration which was promised to appear after the fulfilment of God's sentence. In a word, what is now needed is not so much new predictions of the future as proofs that the fulfilment of former predictions is at hand. Consequently, while the problem before the spirit of Israel is still substantially what it was with Isaiah, viz. the survival of a people of J″, both the factors of the problem and the method of its solution are very different. Some recent critics hardly exaggerate when they say that prophecy proper ceased with the Exile. For instead of the characteristic prophet, denouncing his people upon moral grounds and predicting their doom, we have in Is 40 a commission granted to a number † of voices (whose hearers, indeed, so little feel themselves to be official prophets that they remain anonymous) to comfort Israel and proclaim that the ancient promises to her are about to be fulfilled. But the proof of this requires something more than an appeal to present facts, whether in Israel's own conduct or the general history of the world about her: the whole history and destiny of Israel are brought in, with a full and reasoned revelation of her God.

In such a scheme, it is plain, there is no need for that almost exclusive insistence upon the moral attributes of J″, His demands for justice and purity, which we found in Isaiah's own teaching; but the need is rather for emphasis upon God's intention to fulfil His word, and upon His power to bend to this end the forces of history. The change is best illustrated in the altered meaning which chs. 40–55 give to the term 'righteousness.' In the authentic prophecies of Isaiah, delivered to an unjust and immoral generation, righteousness almost exclusively means the purity and justice which God demands from His people. But in chs. 40–55, in face of a generation who are not charged with the immoralities of Isaiah's, but who are in doubt or despair about their God's power and will to fulfil His word and redeem them, righteousness signifies mainly His consistency and faithfulness. In 41^{26} the adjective ẓaddîḳ is applied to one whose prediction turns out to be correct.* In 41^{2} the noun ẓedeḳ appears to be the virtue of carrying out what one has promised; it is associated with J″'s call to Cyrus, who has been called not in vain, but in good faith, and for a purpose which will certainly succeed. So in 41^{10}, taken with its context, J″'s ẓedeḳ is His trueness, the harmony of His present purpose with His ancient promise to redeem Israel—His good faith to the people He has called; but it includes also His power to fulfil His word: 'the right hand of my righteousness' is the phrase He uses. The whole chapter and other parallel passages (especially $43^{9.\,10.\,18\text{f.}}$ $44^{7.\,8}$ $45^{19\text{-}25}$) imply that ẓedeḳ or ẓĕdāḳâh (the forms are used indifferently) is J″'s fidelity to His calling of Israel —the quality by which He can neither forsake His own, nor for want of power fail in His promise to justify them to the world; and so, besides being synonymous with strength, righteousness is applied to its own results, and becomes parallel to salvation—El ẓaddîḳ, the Righteous God, is equivalent to Môshîaʿ, the Saviour (45^{21}).

* On this ground the chapter has been argued to be by Isaiah himself, or his disciples; and one scholar (Bredenkamp) dates it from the reign of Manasseh.

† Note the plural in the opening verse 40^1, 'comfort ye my people.'

The chief claim, therefore, which 40 ff. make for the God of Israel is His power to direct the history of the world in conformity to a long predicted and faithfully followed purpose. This claim starts from the proof that J″ has long before predicted events now happening or about to happen, with Cyrus as their centre. But this is much more than a proof of isolated predictions, though these imply omniscience. It is a declaration of the unity of history sweeping to the high ends which have been already revealed to Israel—an exposition, in short, of the Omnipotence, Consistence, and Faithfulness of the Providence of the one true God. But with almost equal force the chapters insist upon the Creative Power of the same sovereign Deity. Alone, without counsellor or helper, He created and sustains the world, calls all things into being, and bends them to His will.† He has made and measured earth and ocean, mountains and hills ($40^{12\text{ff.}}$). All the magnitudes and processes of nature are His: heaven, the stars, the clouds, the sea, earth, drought and floods, light and darkness, peace and calamity. Before His omnipotence, His own works and men and their works are as nothing. He is infinitely above them all, sublime and incomparable—in short, the Holy One. For holiness in these chapters is attributed to God always either in connexion with His creative power and the incomparableness to which it exalts Him (40^{25} 41^{20} 43^{15} 45^{11}), or more especially in connexion with the manifestation of that incomparable power for the redemption and glorification of His people (41^{14} $43^{3.\,14}$ 47^{4} 48^{17} 49^{7} 54^{5} 55^{5}). He is Jehovah, and there is none else; God, and there is none beside Him ($45^{5\text{f.}}$ etc.).

From this absolute monotheism everything else follows in chs. 40 ff. What invariably kindles the reason and style of the writer is the thought of God. The breadth and force of imagination, the assurance of hope, the daring treatment of the history of the world as a whole, may be traced to the writer's sense of God's sovereignty, and are the signs of how absolutely he was possessed by this as his principal and governing truth. But that he held it not by faith alone or a partial experience, but with the whole force of his reason, is shown, not only in the exposition of J″'s articulate, clear, reasonable and consistent revelation of Himself and His purpose ($15^{10\text{ff.}}$), but also in the powerful scorn with which the author's mind sweeps down upon idolatry. If it is impossible to liken God to anything (41^{25}), then the low thoughts which Israel has of J″, the images in which the heathen figure the Godhead (41^{7} $44^{9\text{ff.}}$), their enchantments and divinations ($47^{9.\,12\text{ff.}}$), and even the chief gods of the conquering empires ($46^{1\text{ff.}}$), are all equally absurd. The ridicule which the writer pours upon these, the delight he has in exposing their futility, and the weary trouble for no end which their religions levy upon the heathen, brilliantly exhibit the intellectual assurance of this most perfect apostle of Israel's monotheism.

But though God is thus sublime He is near to men in sympathy, and full of grace and zeal for His own ($40^{1.\,11.\,27\text{ff.}}$ 43^{2} $49^{14\text{ff.}}$ $51^{3.\,12}$). Israel's maker is Israel's husband (54^{5}). No prophet is more daring in his ascription of passion to the Deity. With all this writer's overpowering sense of the transcendence of J″, he does not hesitate to picture Him as an excited and furious warrior, and as a travailing woman ($42^{13\text{f.}}$)

But as J″ is unique, so is Israel unique. Israel is His special creation, His elect, and His own. The nations are given for Israel's ransom, and the world-powers are employed as contributory to Israel's career (41^{8} $43^{3\text{f.}\,14}$ 45^{14} etc.). Cyrus himself, in whom the power of the world is gathered up, is J″'s servant for Israel's redemption ($41^{2\text{ff.}}$ 44^{28} $45^{1.\,4}$ etc.). Yet the creation and election of Israel are not for their own sake. 'This people I have formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise' (43^{21}). They are to be God's revealers and witnesses to the ends of the earth ($41^{8\text{ff.}}$). They are to carry His mishpaṭ and torah to the farthest coasts ($42^{4.\,6}$). Their election is an election to service—the service of mankind in the highest matters of religion and morality. In a far higher sense than Cyrus they are the servant of J″. The picture of J″'s servant fills a large part of the prophecy. Sometimes this servant is equivalent to all Israel, the seed of Abraham (41^{8} etc.). But as a whole the nation is unworthy of the high office—deaf, blind, and spoiled ($42^{18\text{ff.}}$)—in need of forgiveness (43^{25}) and illumination. And so the conversion of Israel becomes part of the servant's work ($49^{3\text{-}6}$). He appears to be the personification of the pious remnant of the people: the true, effective Israel; and he is therefore obviously distinct from the nation, who are not conscious of the destiny God has for His people, or ready to carry it out. Though Israel as a whole be unready, this loyal Israel is glorious in J″'s eyes, and God is their strength (49^{5}). Speaking in the first person, this Servant describes his experience as the prophet of J″, and carries it to its consequence in martyrdom ($50^{4\text{-}9}$). Many have thought that in this passage the ideal is still more narrowly concentrated, and that we ought to see in the speaker an individual servant of J″. Many more agree that we have an individual presented to us at last in the classical passage 52^{13}–53. The latter opinion the present writer feels to be correct. The nation's functions of service for God are frequently concentrated by other prophets upon an individual. The experience of the individual Jeremiah, who had, in opposition to his whole people, remained faithful to J″, and in his solitary experience suffered for the people's sins, and represented them before J″, surely afforded precedent enough for the vision of a personal sufferer and sin-bearer. Yet, whether we take this view, or with many eminent critics continue to see in 52^{13}-53 as in 49 the personification of the righteous remnant of Israel, the religious results remain the same. The spiritual salvation of Israel is accomplished by the vicarious conscience and sufferings of the Servant. He is not merely the prophet of $49^{2\text{ff.}}$ and $50^{4.\,5}$, nor only the martyr of $50^{6\text{ff.}}$, who shall be ultimately vindicated by J″. His sufferings, so misunderstood by the world, have a very practical end (52^{13-15}). Disregarded or misunderstood by his own people, he naturally, as they come to see, bears their transgressions and iniquity; by his stripes they are healed ($53^{1\text{ff.}}$). He is sinless, and therefore unjustly treated by his tyrants; but he submits in order to offer his life as a guilt-offering; and so wins righteousness for his people, and exerts immense influence on men (53^{7-12}). Whether this figure be of the pious portion of Israel or of one holy sufferer, the Christian Church has been right in finding its fulfilment in Jesus Christ; in His sinless suffering, in His consciousness of His solitary distinction from His people; in His knowledge that His suffering was of God's will, and would effect the forgiveness of His people's sin, their redemption from guilt, and so His own exaltation from misunderstanding and abuse to manifest power and glory.

* As the Arabic ẓādiḳ means one who speaks truly.

† To describe this creative power the author of chs. 40 ff. is the first to use the term בָּרָא = create.

The equipment of Israel, then, for the religious service of mankind is the end towards which the argument and vision of chs. 40–55 are directed. But indispensable to this is the nation's redemption from Babylonian servitude, their return to the Holy Land, and the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple. The deliverance is to be effected by Cyrus, through his conquest of Babylonia and the humiliation of her gods (46 f.). This being certain, J″ calls upon His people to come forth from Babylon (48^{20} $52^{11\text{f.}}$), a call that was necessary in face of the fact that numbers of Jews were unwilling to leave a home into whose life they had deeply settled, for the hard beginnings of life again upon the desolate and comparatively barren soil of Palestine. J″ promises to make easy their way across the desert ($40^{3\text{ff.}}$ $41^{18\text{f.}}$ $43^{19\text{f.}}$ 48^{21}). Cyrus himself shall expedite their progress and arrange for the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the temple (44^{28} 45^{13}). The prostrate and desolate city shall rise from her ruins (40^{2} $51^{17\text{ff.}}$ $52^{1\text{f.}\,9}$) with a full population (44^{26} 49^{17-19} 54^{6}): the cities of Judah shall again be inhabited (40^{9} 44^{26}). But even beyond these limits shall Israel break, and inherit the Gentiles (54^{3}). A glory shall rest upon city and land, conscious of the presence of their God in His wonderful deeds ($40^{9\text{f.}}$ 49^{18} 52^{1} $54^{10\text{ff.}}$). The Gentiles, too, shall acknowledge this, coming to Israel with the words: Surely God is in thee (45^{14} $49^{7.\,22\text{f.}}$).

So lofty and spiritual is the prospect in chs. 40–55; and still so general when it descends to the details of the restoration. There is nothing priestly in the prospect, nothing warlike except in metaphor; no directions are given for the building of the temple, nor for the institution of sacrifice; no emphasis is laid upon the resumption of the latter, and it is not once mentioned as indispensable for the return of J″ to His people, and the renewal of His intercourse with them. To Zion J″ returns along with His people; they are His Temple, He is manifest in them (45^{14}). His gifts to them are spiritual: pity, grace, forgiveness, illumination, peace; their political restoration is but the pledge of all these. His demands upon them, too, are purely ethical and in the spirit of the older prophecy—fulfilment of His torah and mishpaṭ (51^{4}). And the long argument and exhortation concludes in 55 upon the keynote of its opening chapter (40) that J‴'s word is omnipotent and creative. It shall bring all these things to pass. We shall see how different this atmosphere is from that of the chapters which follow (56–66).

(b) CHS. 56–66.—In passing from chs. 40–55 into 56–66 we feel, as we have already shown (see § X.), a great difference of style. Instead of one long argument and reasoned revelation, visible in the prophecy as a whole and in the series of passages on the Servant which are scattered through it, we enter a series of detached and broken oracles, which have sometimes no relation to each other, and all of which further differ from 40–55 in their style, temper, and the religious interests that they emphasize. It is true that some of the predominant notes of 40–55 are repeated, and others are developed. The argument of the sovereignty and holiness of J″ is taken for granted, and these are asserted almost in the same phrases (57^{15} $60^{9.\,14.\,16}$). 'Righteousness' is occasionally used in the same sense of the exhibition of J‴'s faithfulness and burning fervour in the salvation of His people ($61^{10\text{f.}}$ $62^{1\text{ff.}}$). The vision of the zeal and passion of J″ is repeated and elaborated; as before, He is the strenuous and furious warrior ($59^{16\text{ff.}}$ 63^{1-6}). There is one more picture of the Servant ($61^{1.\,3}$) with his mission of comfort and restoration to the people; and about this there is the same ambiguity as to whether it be the picture of the prophetic portion of Israel or of some individual endowed with the Spirit. The rebuilding of Jerusalem is described as more imminent, and the vision of her glory is developed in greater detail but with the same essential features of joy, beauty, fertility, an overflowing population of her returned sons and daughters, enrichment by the gifts of the Gentiles, and their acknowledgment of the God who resides in her (56^{7} 60. $61^{3\text{ff.}}$ 62. $65^{18\text{ff.}}$ $66^{6\text{ff.}}$). But several new features are introduced, some of which contrast unfavourably with the lofty and spiritual tone of chs. 40–55, and some reveal the circumstances and duties of a people already re-established in civic responsibility upon their own soil. From 56 onwards the temple and its building bulk more largely ($56^{5\text{ff.}}$ 60^{13} 63^{18} 64^{11} 66^{1}); the sacrificial system becomes a little more prominent (56^{7} 62^{9} 66^{20}), so do others of the institutions and ceremonies of religion; the Sabbath ($56^{2.\,6}$ $58^{13\text{f.}}$ 66^{23}), the priesthood of the people (61^{6}), and the orders of priests and Levites (66^{21}), the perpetual worship (58^{2} 62^{6} 66^{23}); and we find, too, directions on those matters on which the returned community, effecting its reorganization, had to legislate: e.g. the place of eunuchs in the congregation ($56^{2\text{ff.}}$) and the question of fasts ($58^{2.\,3}$). And there is an insistence upon civic duties and the social virtues ($58^{6\text{ff.}}$ 59^{4}); the sins of perverting justice and equity, uttering falsehood, and committing robbery are charged upon the people in the fashion that prophecy assumed when Israel was a State ($59^{12\text{ff.}}$ 61^{8}); and righteousness is again used in its older meaning side by side with its newer meaning (65^{5}). These data confirm the conclusion reached above of a difference of authorship between 40–55 and 56–66.

ISAIAH, ASCENSION OF.—i. CONTENTS OF THE ETHIOPIC BOOK.—The book falls into two parts: (A) The Martyrdom of Isaiah, (B) The Ascension of Isaiah into the Seventh Heaven. The bracketed sections are generally regarded as interpolations.

A. Hezekiah summons Manasseh, his son, to deliver to him revelations which he had received in his sickness, and writings of the prophet Isaiah. The prophet, who is present, declares that Manasseh will not regard instruction, but will cause him to be sawn asunder. After the death of Hezekiah (ch. 2), Manasseh turns to evil ways, and Isaiah retires with other prophets, first to Bethlehem, and then to the mountains beyond it. The false prophet Belkira (ch. 3) discovers his retreat, and accuses him before Manasseh on three grounds: first, that he has prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem; secondly, that whereas Moses had said, No man can see God and live, Isaiah had said, I have seen God, and, behold, I live; thirdly, that he had called Jerusalem and the princes and people of Judah by the names of Sodom and Gomorrah.

[3^{13}–5^{1} gives as a further reason for Isaiah's martyrdom the anger of Berial (or Beliar) at the visions which he had seen of the coming of the Beloved, etc. This forms an apocalyptic section in which there are many points of contact with the later part of the book, and esp. with 11^{2-22}. After the return of the Beloved to the seventh heaven the twelve apostles will preach throughout the world; but among their converts evil will multiply: and at length Berial will descend in the form of an impious king, the murderer of his mother, and will work miracles, and cause himself to be worshipped as the only God. The Lord will return and destroy him: the resurrection and judgment will follow].

While Isaiah is being martyred (ch. 5) Berial offers to release him, if he will confess that he has prophesied falsely. The prophet defies him, and is sawn asunder with a wooden saw, conversing the while with the Holy Spirit.

B. This begins with a new title: 'The vision which Isaiah the son of Amoz saw in the 20th year of the reign of Hezekiah king of Judah.' Isaiah comes from Gilgal (ch. 6), and is met by many prophets. In the presence of these, and of the king and his princes, he sits on the king's couch and prophesies. While he is speaking he falls into a trance with his eyes open. Afterwards he relates his vision to Hezekiah and the prophets, but not to the people. It is as follows:—

He is taken (ch. 7) by an angel, whose name he may not know, because he is to return to his mortal body, first up into the firmament, where he finds perpetual warfare between Satanic powers. Next he ascends into the first heaven, where he sees a throne with angels on either side; they chant a hymn of praise, which he learns is addressed to the Glory of the seventh heaven and to His Beloved. In the second heaven he finds also a throne with angels, but more glorious; he would fain fall down and worship, but is not permitted. In the third heaven he finds the like; there is there no mention of the deeds of the vain world from which he has come, but he is assured that nothing escapes observation. In the fourth heaven he again sees angels on either side of a throne, the glory of those on the right being, as before, greater than of those on the left; and all are more glorious than those below. The same in yet greater degree is true of the fifth heaven. But in the sixth heaven (ch. 8) there is no throne, and no left hand, but all are alike in splendour: it is in close connexion with the seventh heaven, and its glory makes the glory of the five heavens below seem but darkness. At length he comes (ch. 9) to the seventh heaven, where his entry is challenged, but permitted. Here he sees the just clothed in their heavenly robes, but not yet having received their thrones and crowns. These they cannot have until the descent and return of the Beloved has been accomplished. He is shown also the books which contain the transactions of the world below, and learns that all is known in the seventh heaven. He beholds the Lord of Glory, and is bidden to worship Him. He then beholds a second most glorious one, like unto Him, and again is bidden to worship; and then again a third, who is the angel of the Holy Spirit, the inspirer of the prophets. These two latter worship the ineffable Glory; and the chant of praise (ch. 10) sounds up from the sixth heaven. Then the voice of the Most High is heard speaking to the Lord the Son, bidding Him descend through the heavens to the firmament, and to the world, and even to the angel of the infernal regions; He is to assimilate Himself to those who dwell in each region in turn, so that He may not be recognized as He passes down. He will ascend at length with glory and worship from all. The prophet now beholds the descent of the Beloved. In the sixth heaven there is no change of His appearance, and the angels glorify Him. But in the fifth He is changed, and not recognized, and so in each of the lower heavens, down to the firmament, where He passes through the strife that rages there, still unrecognized. At this point the angel calls the prophet's special attention to what follows (ch. 11).

[Here follows a description of the Birth from a Virgin, and a notice of the life, death, and resurrection of the Lord, and the sending forth of the Twelve (11^{2-22}).]

Then the prophet beholds the ascent through the firmament and the six heavens: the Lord is recognized and glorified as He ascends: at length He reaches the seventh heaven, and takes His seat on the right hand of the great Glory; and the angel of the Holy Spirit sits on the left hand. The prophet is then sent back to his mortal clothing. On his return he warns Hezekiah that these things will come to pass, but that they may not be communicated to the people of Israel.

ii. DOCUMENTS AND EDITIONS.—(a) Ethiopic.—This, the fullest recension, was first published in 1819 by Laurence, Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford, afterwards Archbishop of Cashel, from a MS which he had bought in London, and which also contained an Ethiopic version of 4 Ezra. He accompanied his edition with translations into Latin and English, and with notes and a dissertation. In 1877 this edition was superseded by Dillmann's, which was based on Laurence's MS (now in the Bodleian) and two others in the British Museum. Dillmann gave a literal translation into Latin, which remains the most satisfactory form in which those who are not Ethiopic scholars can read the book. In 1894 a French translation was issued by M. René Basset, as No. 3 of his series Les Apocryphes Éthiopiens; but this, though convenient, is not to be relied on for the purposes of criticism.

(b) Latin.—(1) A Latin version of the second part (B), the Ascension of Isaiah proper, was printed at Venice in 1522 from a MS not now known. It was published by Antonius de Fantis in a small volume containing the visions of the Virgin Mechtild and some other pieces. It was reprinted by Gieseler in a Göttingen programme in 1832; and by Dillmann, together with the two fragments next to be mentioned, in his edition of 1877. (2) Two Latin fragments were printed by Mai (1828) in his Scriptt. Vett. Nova Collectio, iii. p. 238 f., from a Vatican palimpsest. He found them in company with certain Arian writings, recognized them as belonging to some apocryphon of the OT, but did not identify them. They are reprinted by Dillmann, and comprise chs. 2^{14}–3^{13} and ch. 7^{1-19}. They contain enough to show that they represent a form of the book in which the bracketed section of A was present, and in which A and B were combined.

(c) Greek.—In 1878, the year after the appearance of Dillmann's edition, Osc. von Gebhardt published, in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift f. wiss. Theol. (p. 330 ff.), a late recension of the book in Greek from a 12th cent. MS in Paris (Bibl. Nat. 1534), a volume of legenda (Mar.–May). Under May 9 he found: προφητεία, ἀποκάλυψις καὶ μαρτύριον τοῦ ἁγίου καὶ ἐνδόξου καὶ μεγίστου τῶν προφητῶν Ἠσαίου τοῦ προφήτου. This is not alluded to by Dr. Salmon in his excellent article in Dict. Chr. Biogr., and it has also escaped the notice of M. Basset. Its importance lies in the fact that, in spite of its entire recasting of the work, it still gives us considerable portions of the original Greek. But there is little to be gained from it for the history of the tradition of the book. The object of the reviser has been to produce a lection for Church purposes; and he has accordingly reduced the vision of the Ascension to small compass, and has rearranged the materials so as to put the martyrdom at the end. He appends an account of the prophet's burial, and introduces some traditions about the Pool of Siloam, which find parallels in Pseudo-Dorotheus, the Paschal Chronicle, and Pseudo-Epiphanius (see the references and citations given by v. Gebhardt).

(d) Slavonic.—Three versions in Old Slavonic have been published, but they have not as yet been critically investigated. For notices of them see Bonwetsch in Harnack's Altchristliche Litteratur, i. 916, and Basset, p. 7 n.

iii. PATRISTIC REFERENCES.—The most important of these may be noted here, grouped according to the portion of the book to which they belong.

(a) Justin Martyr (Trypho, 120) accuses the Jews of having obliterated from the OT the story of the death of Isaiah, ὃν πρίονι ξυλίνῳ ἐπρίσατε. Tertullian (de Patient. 14) says: 'His patientiæ uiribus secatur Esaias, et de domino non tacet.' The phraseology in each case suggests, though it cannot be held to prove, an acquaintance with A. Origen (Comm. in Matth. 23^{34}; Ep. ad Afric. 9) refers to the story of the martyrdom as contained in an ἀπόκρυφον Ἠσαίου; moreover, he cites (Hom. in Ies. 5) the charge of contradicting Moses ('Moses, aiunt, non uidit; et tu uidisti?'). Jerome (Comm. in Ies. 1^{10}) gives this charge and the further one, 'quod principes Sodomorum et populum Gomorrhæ eos appellauerit,' as the two causes of the prophet's death. Ambrose (in Ps. 118) gives the story of the devil's offer to release Isaiah, if he would declare his prophecies to be false. The anonymous commentary printed with Chrysostom's works (Montf. t. vi.), and known as the Opus imperfectum in Matthæum, refers to Isaiah's prophecy of the disobedience of Manasseh and of his own death, and to Hezekiah's consequent wish to slay his son (Hom. i. p. xx f.).

These references do not of necessity imply more than a knowledge of a Jewish book of the Martyrdom; some of them might be merely allusions to isolated Jewish legends (cf. Fabricius, Cod. pseudepigr. VT, p. 1088 ff.). But Cedrenus (Bonn ed. i. 120 f.) cites the calculation of the reign of Antichrist, with slightly changed figures; and it is noticeable that he speaks of the book as The Testament of Hezekiah.

(b) Jerome, in commenting on Is 64^4, expressly mentions the 'Ascensio Esaiæ,' and says that it contained the quotation cited by St. Paul in 1 Co 2^9 'Eye hath not seen,' etc. This passage is found in Asc. 11^{34}, but only in the Latin version. It is probable, therefore, that Jerome knew the book in a form which contained both A and B. In the context of this last passage he implies that it was used by heretics in Spain; and this accords with a reference in the recently recovered works of Priscillian (Tract. 3, p. 47, Schepss). Epiphanius twice refers to the Ἀναβατικὸν Ἠσαίου, and says that it was used by Hieracas, an Egyptian teacher of the beginning of the 4th cent. (Hær. 67, 3), and by the Archontici, a sect of about the same date (Hær. 40, 2). The former of these references relates to the appearance of the Beloved (ὁ ἀγαπητός) on the right hand of God, and of the Holy Spirit on the left hand: the latter refers to the seven heavens.

There are two references in apocryphal writings which deserve special mention. In the Last Words of Baruch (ch. 9) allusion is made to the martyrdom of Isaiah in such a way as to suggest that the Ascensio in its Christian form was known to the writer (see Rendel Harris's edition, p. 20 ff.). In the Actus Petri Vercellenses (ed. Lipsius, p. 72) we have a quotation from Asc. 11^{14}. As both these books may have been written before the middle of the 2nd cent., their evidence is of special importance.

Two later writings of very small intrinsic worth seem to have used the Ascensio. One is a sermon of Potamius, printed among St. Zeno's works (Verona, 1739, p. 300): it describes the martyrdom, and mentions Belial. The other is the apocryphal Liber Johannis, an Albigensian book, printed at the end of Thilo's Codex Apocryphus NT.

For further references the student may consult Dr. Salmon's art. in Dict. Chr. Biogr., Harnack's Altchr. Litt. p. 854 ff., and Basset's Introduction: in this last he will also find a fairly complete bibliography.

iv. CRITICAL REMARKS.—In the outline given above of the Ethiopic book, Dillmann's critical dissection of it has been in the main accepted. But it may be questioned whether his theory of two separate books, A and B, as we have called them, combined and interpolated at a subsequent period, is not somewhat too rigid. It may be nearer to the truth to suppose that A does indeed reproduce a Jewish book on the Death of Isaiah, but that the whole of the remainder is due to a single Christian hand, which modified the opening section, inserted the apocalyptic vision, and added the vision of the Ascension.

There appears to be no sufficient ground for distinguishing the writer of the apocalyptic section from the author of the Ascension. The fact that the Antichrist assumes the form of a matricidal king does not of necessity take the apocalyptic section back into the 1st cent.: the reappearance of Nero as the Antichrist long haunted the imagination of the Christian apocalyptists. The calculation of the duration of his reign appears to be simply borrowed from the Book of Daniel, and gives us no guidance.

If there was a separately existing Jewish book, this may be the source of the references of Justin Martyr, of Tertullian, and even of Origen. In this case Jerome and Epiphanius (or Hieracas as quoted by the latter) would be our earliest authorities (other than anonymous) for the Christian book. Yet on internal evidence we should place it not much later than the middle of the 2nd cent. 'Elders and pastors' are the only titles applied to Christian ministers; prophecy seems spoken of as still in exercise, though failing in influence; and the description of Isaiah's ecstasy suggests that the writer had witnessed Christian trances.

The closest literary parallel may perhaps be found in the Testaments of the XII. Patriarchs, in which the narrative portions at the commencement of each Testament are directly taken from Jewish books, esp. from the Book of Jubilees, and the remainder, homiletical and apocalyptical, is the work of a Christian hand.

v. Interest for Biblical Students.—The chief points of interest are two—(1) the conception of the firmament (as the abode of evil spirits), and of the seven heavens; (2) the use of the name 'the Beloved' as a Messianic title. If these features could be regarded as directly derived from Jewish sources, without the intervention of the NT writings, they would be important illustrations of the language of St. Paul (Eph 1^{2} 6^{12}, 2 Co 12$^{2-4}$, also Eph 1^{6}). But on the whole it is probable that the apostle's language was familiar to the writer, and was regarded by him as giving a kind of sanction to his conceptions, if it did not actually form their starting-point.

1. For the conception of the seven heavens the student may refer to Mr. Charles' introduction to The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, p. xxx ff. Our author's idea of the seven heavens differs from other descriptions in that he introduces no physical phenomena (as, e.g., ice and snow, sun and moon, paradise, etc.) by way of differentiating them. Tradition has supplied him with nothing but the bare number of seven, and he distinguishes one from another only by a constantly increasing glory. On the other hand, he is unwilling to place any element of evil in any of the heavens, and hence he introduces the firmament as between the earth and the first heaven, so as to find a dwelling-place for the Satanic powers of the air. Perhaps his own main interest lay in the exposition of the idea that the descent of the Beloved escaped the notice of the dwellers in the lower heavens, in the firmament, and on the earth. This idea was found in St. Paul's language in 1 Co 2^{8} 'the hidden wisdom . . . which none of the rulers of this age knew; for, if they had known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of Glory.' 'The rulers of this age' are the powers of the firmament in our book; and the title 'the Lord of Glory' also occurs in it. The same thought is found in the well-known words of Ignatius (ad Eph. 19): καὶ ἔλαθε τὸν ἄρχοντα τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου ἡ παρθενία Μαρίας καὶ ὁ τοκετὸς αὐτῆς, ὁμοίως καὶ ὁ θάνατος τοῦ Κυρίου.

2. The name of the Messiah in every part of this book is 'the Beloved.' There is some ground for thinking that this was a pre-Christian Messianic title. For (1) it is used in the OT (ὁ ἠγαπημένος, LXX) as a title of Israel; e.g. Dt 32^{15} 33$^{5.\,26}$, where it renders 'Jeshurun,' as it does also in Is 44^{2}; again in Is 5, ὁ ἠγαπημένος and ὁ ἀγαπητός render יָדִיד and דּוֹד respectively. It was natural, therefore, that, like the titles 'Servant' and 'Elect,' it should be transferred from the people to the Messiah. (2) At the period when the Gospels were written 'the Beloved' and 'the Elect' were practically interchangeable terms, for Mt writes ὁ ἀγαπητός μου (12^{18}) in citing Is 42^{1}, where the Heb. is בְּחִירִי (LXX ὁ ἐκλεκτός μου); and Lk (9^{35}) substitutes ὁ ἐκλελεγμένος for ὁ ἀγαπητός in the words spoken at the Transfiguration. (3) These two substitutions suggest that, whatever may have been the original meaning of the phrase ὁ υἱός μου ὁ ἀγαπητός (Mk 1^{11} 9^{7}), both Mt and Lk regarded ὁ ἀγαπητός as a separate title, and not as an epithet of υἱός; and it is interesting to note that the Old Syriac version emphasized this distinction by rendering 'My Son and My Beloved.' (4) In Eph 1^{6} St. Paul uses ἐν τῷ ἠγαπημένῳ as equivalent to ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ in a context in which he is designedly using terms derived from Jewish sources. (5) Certain passages of the LXX where ὁ ἀγαπητός occurs were explained by Christian interpreters as Messianic (Ps 44 (45) tit., Zec 12^{10}). (6) Lastly, we have several passages in early Christian writings in which ὁ ἠγαπημένος is used as a title of Christ, e.g. Barn. 3^{6} 4$^{3.\,8}$; cf. Clem. Rom. 59$^{2.\,3}$; Ign. Smyrn. inscr.; Herm. Sim. IX. xii. 5; Acts of Thecla, c. 1; ὁ ἀγαπητός is also used, but usually with υἱός or παῖς (Herm. Sim. V. ii. 6; Mart. Polyc. 14; Ep. ad Diogn. 8; Acts of Thecla, c. 24; in the last three cases in a liturgical formula). It is difficult to suppose that in all these instances from Christian writings the title (esp. in the form ὁ ἠγαπημένος) has for its only source the NT. And in particular the persistent use of ὁ ἀγαπητός in the present book suggests that the writer must have thought its introduction consistent with verisimilitude in a work which sought to be regarded as an ancient Jewish prophecy of Christ.

ISCAH (יִסְכָּה, Ἰεσχά, etym. uncertain).—A daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah, Gn 11^{29} (J). This is the only passage in OT where she is mentioned. There is no probability (see Dillm. ad loc.) in the identification of Iscah with Sarai (Jos. Ant. I. vi. 5, Targ. Jon., Talm., Ephraem, Jerome, Rashi, etc.), and little warrant for the conjecture of Ewald (HI i. 313) that she was the wife of Lot.

ISCARIOT.—See Judas Iscariot.

ISDAEL (Ἰσδαήλ), 1 Es 5^{33}.—In Ezr 2^{56}, Neh 7^{58}, Giddel. The form is probably due to corruption of the Greek, ΓΕΔΔΗΛ being read as ΙСΔΑΗΛ.

ISHBAH (יִשְׁבָּח).—A Judahite, the 'father' of Eshtemoa, 1 Ch 4^{17}. See Genealogy.

ISHBAK (יִשְׁבָּק).—A son of Abraham by Keturah, Gn 25^{2}=1 Ch 1^{32}. In Gn the LXX has, A Ἰεσβόκ (so Luc.), D Ἰεσβούκ, E Ἰεσόκ, in 1 Ch B Σοβάκ, A Ἰεσβόκ. The tribe of which he is the eponym is somewhat uncertain, although Frd. Delitzsch (ZSKF ii. 92) identifies it with Iasbuḳ of the cuneiform inscriptions, where it is mentioned as a land (māt) whose king was allied with Sangara (Shamgar?) of Gargamis (Carchemish) and others against Assur-naẓir-pal and Shalmaneser II. (c. 859 B.C.). Dillmann and Delitzsch point out that the name has nothing to do with Shanbaḳ in the Jebel esh-Shera, which is not heard of till the time of the Crusades.

ISHBI-BENOB.—One of the four Philistines of the giant stock who were slain by the mighty men of David (2 S 21$^{15-17}$). See, however, Gob.

ISHBOSHETH (אִישׁ־בֹּשֶׁת), who disputed the throne of Israel with David for about seven years, was the fourth son of Saul (1 Ch 8^{34} 9^{39}). His real name as preserved by the Chronicler was Eshbaal or Ishbaal (אִישׁ־בַּעַל 'man of Baal'), but he is better known to us by the name Ishbosheth (אִישׁ־בֹּשֶׁת 'man of the shameful thing'), which he bears in 2 S 2^{8} and elsewhere. This double nomenclature is easily explained. Baal is most familiar to us as the name of a Tyrian or Phœn. divinity, but in its primary meaning of 'lord' it was the designation applied by the N. Shemites each to their own particular deity, and we know that at one time it was a frequent appellation even of the God of Israel (Hos 2$^{16.\,17}$). It is in this way that we must explain its use by Saul in naming his sons, for, whatever faults may be chargeable against the first king of Israel, he was certainly no idolater. In later times, when Baal had come to be regarded as a heathenish name, the words of Ex 23^{13} 'Make no mention of the name of other gods,' were interpreted so literally that in reading, and finally in writing, Bosheth ('the shameful thing') was frequently substituted for Baal. (The text of Samuel must, according to Wildeboer, Litt. d. AT 82, have escaped this alteration till after B.C. 250, the date at which the Chronicler still found the original name Ishbaal written there). As Hosea apparently means to express his contempt for the impure worship of the N. kingdom by substituting (Hos 4^{15} 5^{8} 10^{5}) Bethaven 'house of idolatry' for Bethel 'house of God,' for a similar reason the Jerubbaal of Jg 6^{32} is replaced in 2 S 11^{21} by Jerubbesheth. In like manner the name of Jonathan's son was not Mephibosheth but Meribbaal. In this case also it is the Chronicler that has preserved the true name (cf. 2 S 4^{4} with 1 Ch 8^{34} 9^{40}). The offensive component Baal was occasionally got rid of in a different way. In 1 S 14^{49} the name of one of Saul's sons appears as Ishvi (יִשְׁוִי), in which Wellhausen, followed by Budde (Richt u. Sam. 207), sees a corruption of Ishjo (אִישְׁיוֹ) or Ishjahu. This is supported by the LXX (Luc.) Ἰεσσιού. In this instance the word Baal, instead of being degraded to Bosheth, is transfigured into one of the forms of the name J", and the 'man of Baal' (Ishbaal) becomes the 'man of J"' (Ishjahu). On the same principle, David's son *Beel*iada (1 Ch 14^{7}) appears in 2 S 5^{16} as *El*iada (Benzinger, Heb. Archäol. 152).

According to 1 S 31^{2}, Saul's three eldest sons, Jonathan, Abinadab, and Malchi-shua fell with their father upon Mt. Gilboa. David's sovereignty was thereupon acknowledged by the men of Judah; but Abner, who had been Saul's general, remained faithful to the cause of his master and kinsman, and under his directions Ishbosheth was proclaimed king at Mahanaim on the E. side of the Jordan. This locality was probably selected by Abner as his headquarters, because the land of Israel proper was completely overrun by the Philistines. Presently the men of David, under the command of Joab, encountered those of I., commanded by Abner, at Gibeon (2 S $2^{12ff.}$). It was agreed to abide the issue of a combat between twelve champions selected on either side, but this proved indecisive, as all the twenty-four fell mortally wounded. A general engagement now ensued in which Abner's forces were completely routed. Some time thereafter I. had the misfortune to give deadly offence to Abner. Having detected his general in an intrigue with Rizpah, Saul's concubine, he reproached him with what, according to the usages of the time, amounted to an act of treason (2 S 3^{6-11}). Abner hotly resented such treatment, and declared his intention of transferring his allegiance to David. The full accomplishment of his purpose was, indeed, prevented by Joab, who, in order to avenge the death of his brother Asahel, treacherously murdered Abner on the occasion of his visit to David in Hebron. The cause of I., weak before, was hopelessly ruined by the defection and death of its chief supporter, and the unfortunate claimant of his father's throne was not long afterwards murdered by two of his officers (2 S 4^{5-7}). The details of the crime are obscured by the rendering of AV and text of RV, although they are correctly given in the margin of the latter, which follows the Sept. That the latter is here to be preferred to the MT needs no proof (see W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 82). Instead of the unintelligible language and meaningless repetitions of vv.$^{6.7}$, we read, 'And lo, the woman that kept the door was cleaning wheat, and she slumbered and slept, and the brothers Rechab and Baanah passed in unobserved and came into the house as Ishbosheth lay upon his bed, and they smote him and slew him,' etc. The assassins came to David with the head of their victim; but, instead of receiving the reward they expected, they were overwhelmed with reproaches and condemned to instant death (2 S 4^{9-12}). This was the turning-point in the fortunes of David, who, although he had no complicity in the assassination, could not help profiting from the death of his rival. Seeing that he was the only possible leader against the Philistines, the whole nation of Israel now offered him their allegiance, and shortly thereafter he was able vastly to strengthen his position by wresting from the Jebusites the stronghold of Jerusalem, which city was henceforward the capital of the kingdom.

2. Ishbosheth (i.e. Ishbaal) should also prob. be read in 2 S 23^{8} for Josheb-basshebeth (wh. see).

ISHHOD (אִישְׁהוֹד 'man of majesty').—A Manassite, 1 Ch 7^{18} (AV Ishod). See GENEALOGY.

ISHI (יִשְׁעִי 'salutary').—1. A Jerahmeelite, 1 Ch 2^{31}. 2. A Judahite chief, 1 Ch 4^{20}. 3. A chief of East Manasseh, 1 Ch 5^{24}. 4. One of the captains of the 500 men of the tribe of Simeon (which see) who smote the Amalekites at Mt. Seir, 1 Ch 4^{42}. See GENEALOGY, II. 5, IV. 11, 57, VII.^{a} 8.

ISHI (אִישִׁי 'my husband,' LXX ὁ ἀνήρ μου).—The name which Hosea (2^{16}) recommends Israel to apply to J" instead of Baali, 'my lord' (see HOSEA, and cf. W. R. Smith, Proph. of Isr. 171, 408 f.).

ISHMA (יִשְׁמָא).—One of the sons (acc. to LXX) of Etam, 1 Ch 4^{3}. The MT is undoubtedly corrupt. See GENEALOGY.

ISHMAEL (יִשְׁמָעֵאל 'God heareth,' or better, 'May God hear'*).—The son of Abraham, by his concubine Hagar. The history of Ishmael is contained in parts of Gn 16. 17. 21^{8-21} 25—chapters of which $16^{1a.\ 3.\ 15.\ 16}$ 17. $25^{7-11a.\ 12-17}$ belong to P, the rest (so far as it relates to Ishmael) belonging to J (ch. 16) or E (ch. 21). Sarah was barren (Gn 16^{1}); so, in accordance with the manners of the age (cf. $30^{3.\ 9}$, also 22^{24}, Ex 21^{7-8}), she gives Abraham her handmaid Hagar, an Egyptian, as his concubine, in the hope that she may be 'builded up from her' (16^{2}), i.e. obtain a family by her†—viz. by adopting Hagar's offspring as her own. When Hagar saw that she had conceived, a womanly feeling of superiority took possession of her, and she 'despised' Sarah (cf. 1 S $1^{6f.}$), who forthwith complains reproachfully to her husband, uttering the passionate wish that the indignity done to her may be visited upon him, and appealing to Jehovah to judge whether he is not to blame for permitting it. Abraham replies that Hagar is Sarah's slave, and she can do to her as she pleases. She accordingly 'deals hardly' with her, lit. 'humbles' her,‡ viz. by imposing upon her hard or degrading work, from which Hagar seeks refuge by flight (16^{4-6}). Hagar was an Egyptian: so she naturally fled in the direction of Egypt; and there, in the wilderness, by 'the spring on the way to Shur'—the spring known afterwards (v.^{14}) as the well Beer-laḥai-roi, and identified by many § with Muweiliḥ, a watering-place about 25 miles W.N.W. of 'Ain Ḳadîs, on the caravan route between Hebron and

* The name occurs also in early Bab. as that of a slave from the land of 'Martu' or the Amorites (Thureau Dangin, Rev. d'Assyr., 1897, p. 78) and in Minæan (Hommel, Süd.-Arab. Chrestomathie, 117, 135).

† The expression, as 30^{3}. For the family being represented under the figure of a house, cf. Ru 4^{11}, Dt 25^{9}, Ex 1^{21}.

Egypt—the angel of J″ ‘found’ her. He addresses to her three words (16$^{9-11}$): firstly, bidding her return to her mistress, and ‘humble herself’[*] under her hands; secondly, encouraging her to take this step by the promise of a numerous seed; and thirdly, fixing in anticipation the name and character of her future son: ‘thou shalt call his name Ishmael, because Jehovah hath heard thy affliction. And he shall be a wild-ass of a man, his hand being against all, and the hand of all being against him: and in front of all his brethren he shall dwell.’ The wild-ass is a wayward, intractable creature, whose home is the prairie (see the description in Job 39$^{5-8}$; and cf. Hos 8^{9} ‘going alone wilfully’). Ishmael, like many of the other characters in Gn, is an impersonation of his descendants; and the narrator draws here a true and picturesque description of the Bedawis,[†] and of the life led by them to the present day: now, as ever, they are the free and independent sons of the desert, owning no authority save that of their own chief, reckless of life, if occasion demands it, ever ready to plunder the hapless traveller who ventures without permission within their domain. The tribes whom the Hebrews thus regarded as descended from Ishmael, dwelt partly, it seems, on the S. of Canaan; but in the main, as the words ‘in the front of all his brethren’ (so 25^{18b}, cf. v.^{6}) imply,[‡] their home was on the east of Israel and Edom (see below).

The next allusion to Ishmael is in ch. 17 (P), where, after the promise of a son to Sarah, Abraham, incredulous, and still resting his hopes upon Ishmael, utters the entreaty on his behalf (17^{18}), ‘Oh that Ishmael might live before thee!’[§] In reply, God reaffirms His promise to Sarah, but adds (with a play on his name), ‘And as for Ishmael, I have heard thee: behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him into a great nation’ (17^{20}; see 25$^{12-16}$). And at the end of the chapter, it is stated that Ishmael, being 13 years old (cf. 17^{24} with 16^{16}, both P), was circumcised, together with the other male members of Abraham's household.

We again hear of Ishmael some three years afterwards, when Isaac was weaned[‖] (21$^{8-21}$ E). Sarah ‘saw the son of Hagar, the Egyptian, whom she had borne unto Abraham, playing,’ or sporting, jesting (19^{14} 26^{8}, Ex 32^{6}, Jg 16^{25});[¶] her maternal jealousy is excited; she a second time appeals to her husband, and bids him, with some peremptoriness, ‘cast out’ both Ishmael and his slave-mother. Abraham, though resenting this demand,—for Ishmael was his firstborn, and had obviously also (note ‘on account of his son’) won his affection,—is nevertheless encouraged by God—as may be inferred from v.^{14}, in a nocturnal vision or dream—to yield to it: Abraham's genuine ‘seed,’ the inheritors of the promises, are to be in Isaac's line; and national greatness elsewhere is in store for Ishmael also. Resigned by these thoughts to the loss of his son, he sends him away with his mother, giving them a modicum of provision to support them on their journey. They wander to and fro over the dry and stony soil of the desert about Beersheba until their water is exhausted; Hagar then, faint and desperate, flings the child down under the shade of one of the bushes, and seats herself sadly some little way off, not wishing to look upon the death of her son. But God ‘heard’ the voice of the crying child—the word is evidently chosen with allusion to the name Ishmael, even if it be not intended as an explanation of its origin (cf. 16^{11} [J], 17^{20} [P])[*],—called out to his mother, reassured her with a fresh promise (see 16^{10}) of Ishmael's future greatness, and showed her a well of water, which enabled her to revive the dying lad. Ishmael grew up, made his home in the wilderness on the S. of Canaan, and became famous as an archer. His wife, it is added, like his mother, was an Egyptian.

The only other incidents of Ishmael's life which are mentioned, are that he and Isaac buried their father after his death (25^{9} P), and that he himself died at the age of 137 (25^{17} P).

Two expressions in ch. 21 deserve to be briefly commented upon.

(1) מְצַחֵק in v.^{9} was a word which lent itself readily to Haggadistic expositions. R. Aḳiba (on account of its use in Gn 39$^{14.17}$) supposed it to refer to Ishmael's unchastity, R. Ishmael (on account of its use in Ex 32^{6}) to his devotion to idolatry; other Rabbis (on account of the use of שִׂחֵק in 2 S 2^{14}, Pr 26^{19}) to attempts made by him to shoot his brother (Bereshith Rabba, ad loc., p. 254 f. in Wünsche's translation; the second explanation also in Jer. Quæst. ad Gen., and in Targ. Pseud-Jon. ad loc.). There were also other stories current among the later Jews respecting Ishmael's insolence towards his brother, his disputes with him concerning the birthright, etc: see Beer, Leben Abraham's nach Auffassung der jüd. Sage, pp. 49 ff. (where other Haggadistic expansions of the narrative of Ishmael's expulsion are also given), 57, 61. St. Paul, in Gal 4^{29} (ἐδίωκεν), follows some of these later traditions.

(2) ‘Flung’ (הִשְׁלִיךְ) in v.^{15} clearly implies that hitherto Ishmael had been carried by his mother, although according to 16^{16} 21$^{5.8}$ he must have been 15 years old, if not more (see preced. col. and note ‖). Attempts have been made to remove the inconsistency: but it is in reality similar to the one in 12$^{11ff.}$ (as well as others occurring in other parts of Gn); 16^{16} 21^{5}, the passages which fix the age of Ishmael, belong to P, whereas the present narrative belongs to a different writer, E, who took a different view of the chronology, and pictured Ishmael as still an infant (cf. v.^{20} ‘and he grew up’).

The twelve ‘princes’ begotten by Ishmael (17^{20}), or, in other words, the twelve eponymous ancestors of the tribes who were reputed to be descended from him, are enumerated in 25$^{12-16}$ (P): Nebaioth, Ḳedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma', Dumah, Massa, Ḥadad, Têma, Jeṭur, Naphish, and Ḳedemah. The first two of these are mentioned several times besides in the OT, chiefly as wealthy pastoral or trading tribes (Jer 49$^{28-32}$, Is 60^{7}, Ezk 27^{21}; cf. Is 42^{11}, Jer 2^{10}, Ca 1^{5}, Ps 120^{5}), Ḳedar also (Is 21^{17}) as famous for its archers (cf. Gn 21^{20}); Têma (about 250 miles S.E. of Edom) is mentioned Is 21^{14}, Jer 25^{23}, Job 6^{19}: Jeṭur and Naphish appear from 1 Ch 5^{19} to have been neighbours of Reuben on the E. of Jordan; the former in later days moved northwards, and are known in the Roman age as the wild and predatory mountain-tribe of Ituræans, skilled likewise in the use of the bow; for further particulars see the separate names in this Dictionary.[†] The home of Ishmael himself is in Gn 21^{21} the wilderness of Paran, on the S. of Canaan, and no doubt there were Ishmaelites in that neighbourhood;[‡] but the general situation of the tribes descended from him was unquestionably on the east of Palestine, Edom, and the Gulf of 'Aḳabah, in agreement with the expression in 16^{12} and 25^{18b} (cf. v.^{6}) ‘in the front of all his brethren’: some of these tribes (25^{16}) dwelt in fixed villages (חֲצֵרוֹת, cf.

The well (and sanctuary?) of Beer-laḥai-roi may have been a common meeting-place for Ishmaelites and Israelites, at which the old traditions about Ishmael were recounted and kept alive (cf. Stade, ZAW, 1881, p. 348 f.).

the 'villages' of Kedar, Is 42^{11}), others in טִירוֹת, a peculiar word, denoting, as it seems, the temporary circular encampments of nomad tribes (cf. Nu 31^{10}, Ezk 25^{4}).[*] A daughter of Ishmael is also mentioned, as married by Esau, in Gn 28^{9} (where she is called Maḥalath) and 36^{3} (where her name is given as Basemath); no doubt this statement points to the fact that certain Edomite clans (see 36^{13}, compared with v.^{4}) had in them an admixture of Ishmaelite blood.

Ishmaelites are mentioned by J in Gn $37^{25. 27. 28}$ 39^{1} (a caravan of Ishmaelites carrying gums from Gilead to Egypt, to whom Joseph is sold by his brethren: the parallel narrative of E speaks of Midianites, $37^{28. 36}$), Jg 8^{24} (where, as the term is applied to Midianites, who belonged to a different branch of the Abrahamidæ, Gn 25^{4}, it seems to be used in a generalized sense, 'not of race, but of mode of life,' to denote itinerant caravan-traders in general), Ps 83^{6}; and individual Ishmaelites are named in 1 Ch 2^{17} (Jether, 'Amasa's father: read accordingly in 2 S 17^{25}), 27^{30} (Obil, superintendent of David's camels).

The Hebrews classified their neighbours genealogically according to the nearer or more distant relationship in which they were regarded as standing towards themselves. The Edomites were most closely related to them: they were accordingly the descendants of Esau, the twin-brother of their own immediate ancestor, Jacob. Moab and Ammon were descended from Lot, Abraham's nephew. To Naḥor, Abraham's brother, are traced twelve Aramæan tribes,—eight to a wife, Milcah, and four to a concubine, Re'umah ($22^{20\text{-}24}$). Six tribes (one being Midian), and several sub-tribes, are the descendants of Abraham, though not by Sarah, the mother of Isaac, or by Hagar, but by a concubine, Ḳeṭurah ($25^{1\text{-}4}$). And here twelve tribes, spread over different parts of N. Arabia and the country E. of Israel, are traced to Abraham, through a 'handmaid,' Hagar, holding an intermediate position between Sarah and Ḳeṭurah.[†] Historical recollections, similarities of language or civilization,[‡] or other characteristics, the exact nature of which we cannot in every case determine, must have guided the Hebrew genealogists in thus forming ethnic groups, and defining the precise position occupied by each in relation to Israel. The Ishmaelites, being referred to Abraham himself, must have been regarded as belonging to an ancient stock, and evidently (cf. 17^{20} 21^{18} 'a great nation') enjoyed a reputation among the Hebrews, though at the same time some inferiority was implied in the fact that their ancestor was Abraham's son, not by his legitimate wife, but by a 'handmaid': the fact that Ishmael's mother and wife were both Egyptian shows, further, that his descendants were considered to have Egyptian blood in their veins.[§] At a much later date, Ishmael was connected vaguely with Arabia in general:[||] Moḥammed was supposed to have been descended from him through Ḳedar;[*] he is mentioned several times in the Ḳor'ān, and is said to have assisted his father in the construction of the Ka'bah at Mecca.[†] In the OT, however, it is important to observe, Ishmael is hardly at all associated with what we term 'Arabia':[‡] the 'Arabian' peninsula (including parts in the extreme South, as Ḥadramaut and Sheba) is peopled by the Joḳṭanidæ (descendants of Joḳṭan, son of Abraham's sixth ancestor, ''Eber,' and consequently much less closely connected with Israel), Gn $10^{26\text{-}31}$; the Ishmaelites are entirely distinct from these, and are limited to certain specified tribes, living almost entirely on the N. and N.W. of the Joḳṭanidæ.[§] The circumcision of Ishmael at the age of 13 (Gn 17^{25}) is in all probability intended as an explanation of the corresponding custom among the Ishmaelite tribes. Circumcision has for long been practised by the 'Arabs'; but it is commonly performed among them at a much later age than was customary with the Jews:[||] according to Eus. Præp. Ev. VI. xi. 49 it was performed in the 13th year by οἱ Ἰσμαηλῖται οἱ κατὰ τὴν Ἀραβίαν, and so according to Jos. Ant. I. xii. 2 by the Ἄραβες.

The personality of Ishmael must be estimated similarly to that of the other patriarchs (cf. vol. i. p. 15 f.; vol. ii. p. 533 ff.).[¶] It is most reasonable to regard him as a historical character, but a character who at the same time was idealized, and whose biography, as told in the Book of Genesis, was coloured in some of its features by the characteristics, or historical relations, of the tribes who were considered to be his descendants. The racial affinity of these tribes to Israel is clearly indicated in the Biblical narratives; it is possible that the picture of Sarah's jealous opposition to Hagar and her son reflects to some extent old racial rivalries and conflicts, which ended in these tribes being obliged to separate from the ancestors of the Israelites, though they secured a successful independence elsewhere. The human passions and interests of Sarah and Abraham, of Hagar and Ishmael, the promptings, partly of natural affection, partly of religious feeling, under which they act, and the manner in which the hand of Providence guides and moulds the destinies of men, are all portrayed with the vividness and psychological truth which is generally characteristic of the Book of Genesis.

In Gal 4^{21}–5^{1} the narrative of Ishmael and Isaac is expounded allegorically. Hagar and Sarah represent the two covenants, the old and the new: Ishmael is the child after the flesh, born in bondage; Isaac is the child of promise, born in freedom: in the rivalries which arose between them, and ended in the triumph of the latter,

[] The word for 'nations' in Gn 25^{16} is also a peculiar one (אֻמּוֹת), more Arabic ('ummeh*) or Aramaic (Ezr 4^{10}, and often in Dn; cf. in late Heb. Ps 117^{1}) than Hebrew (Nu 25^{15}, also P, 'a head of the peoples, or clans, of a father's house [i.e. of a family] in Midian'), and no doubt adopted here as the technical term used properly of the Ishmaelite tribes.

[†] The recurrence of the numbers 6 and 12 in these tribal systems is an indication that they were to some extent formed artificially.

[‡] In the case of Moab, we know, for instance, that its language differed only dialectically from Hebrew.

[§] Burton (El-Medinah and Mecca, 1855, i. 213 f., cf. iii. 31 f.) remarks on the palpably Egyptian physiognomy of some of the Bedawi clans of Sinai, and quotes Gn 21^{21}. Whether this was the case in ancient times, we do not know; but it is perhaps worth remembering that the Sinaitic peninsula was for long owned and garrisoned by the Egyptians, who worked in it mines of turquoise and copper (Maspero, Dawn of Civil. 349–358).

[||] Josephus (Ant. I. xii. 2) even calls him the κτίστης τοῦ ἔθνους τῶν Ἀράβων.

[*] And so, in the mediæval Jewish writers, לְשׁוֹן יִשְׁמָעֵאל and לְשׁוֹן קֵדָר both mean 'Arabic.'

[‡] In the OT 'Arab' is the name simply of a single comparatively small tribe (above, vol. i. p. 135).

[§] The principal Bedawi tribes are spread also over the N. and N.W. of the Arabian Peninsula (see the Encycl. Brit.^{9} ii. 246–9); but it should be added, to preclude misunderstanding, that we cannot identify any of them specifically with the tribes connected in the OT with Ishmael: all that can be predicated is a general resemblance in their character and mode of life to the description in Gn 16^{12}.

[||] Among the Bedawis of the Sinaitic Peninsula, for instance, at the age of 8 (Palmer, in the Ordnance Survey of the Pen. of Sinai, p. 59); among those of Arabia at the age of 5–6, but sometimes ten years later (Burton, l.c. iii. 81). Ibn Athir says that among the ancient Arabians the age was from 10 to 15 years (Pococke, Spec. Hist. Arab. 319).

[¶] Kuenen (ThT, May 1871, p. 296 f.) and others regard Hagar and Ishmael as simply the eponymous ancestors of the tribes known as 'HAGARENES,' and 'sons of Ishmael' or 'Ishmaelites,' the narratives of Hagar's flight and expulsion being suggested by the meaning of the names (cf. Arab. hajara, to flee; hejrah, flight). Cf. p. 534, notes.

St. Paul sees foreshadowed the conflict in the history of the nascent Church, the defeat of the spirit which clung to carnal ordinances, and the triumph of the spirit of freedom, which had the faith and the insight to see that such ordinances must pass away. The practical conclusion follows: let the Galatian converts 'stand fast' in the freedom in which Christ had set them, and not 'be entangled again in a yoke' of Jewish ordinances.

6. Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, a member of the royal house of David. See Jer 40–42, and the brief summary in 2 K 25$^{23-25}$. After the fall of Jerusalem, Ishmael was a commander of one of the bodies of Jewish troops which maintained their independence in the country districts. Nebuchadnezzar had appointed Gedaliah (wh. see), the son of Ahikam the protector of Jeremiah (Jer 26^{24}), as governor of the remnants of the Jewish state, with his residence at Mizpah; and one of his first cares was to attempt to restore confidence among the scattered inhabitants of the land, and to induce the remains of Zedekiah's army to submit to the Babylonian conquerors. At first Gedaliah's efforts met with a certain success. The captains of the Jewish forces, and Ishmael among the number, came to Mizpah, and made their submission to the new governor. Gedaliah, promising to use his influence with the Babylonians on their behalf, exhorted them to settle quietly in the cities they had occupied, and to gather in the harvest, which was then standing neglected in the fields (Jer 40$^{7-12}$). But the restoration of peace and good order in the desolated country of Judah was not in accordance with the wishes of Baalis, the king of Ammon, who doubtless saw an opportunity of extending his territory at the expense of his neighbours on the west. He found a willing tool in Ishmael, whom he commissioned to assassinate Gedaliah. Ishmael may have been actuated by a fanatical hatred against a fellow-countryman who had consented to acknowledge the Chaldæan supremacy, or by jealousy of the preference given to Gedaliah over a member of the royal house. His designs, however, were not unknown; and Johanan the son of Kareah, and the other officers who had formerly acted with Ishmael but now supported Gedaliah, warned the latter of his danger. Gedaliah, unfortunately, would not listen to their warnings; and when Johanan, seeing how disastrous the death of Gedaliah would be for all the Jews, offered to kill Ishmael privately, the governor refused to consent to the proposal, and declared that the charges made against Ishmael were only calumnies (ib.$^{12-16}$).

In the seventh month, that is, about three months after the fall of Jerus. and two months after the destruction of the city, Ishmael with ten confederates came to Gedaliah at Mizpah.* Here they were hospitably entertained; but during the meal rose up against their hosts, and murdered Gedaliah and all the Jewish and Chaldæan soldiers in his retinue. Ishmael must after this have gained possession of the town, for he succeeded in preventing any news of what had taken place from being published abroad. Two days later a party of eighty pilgrims from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria passed by Mizpah, with offerings which they intended to present at the ruined temple in Jerusalem. On account of the destruction of the sanctuary they were attired as mourners, with beards shaven, and clothes rent, and gashes on their face and hands. With feigned grief* Ishmael went out to meet them, and invited them to visit Gedaliah at Mizpah. Once inside the city, they were put to death by Ishmael and his men. Ten of them, however, were able to ransom their lives by promising to deliver up the stores of wheat, barley, oil, and honey which they had hidden in the fields. The corpses of the seventy murdered men were thrown into a great pit or cistern, which had been made by Asa at the time of his war with Baasha (cf. 1 K 15$^{16-22}$). The people of Mizpah, together with the royal princesses, who had been left by Nebuchadnezzar in charge of Gedaliah, Ishmael now treated as his prisoners, and attempted to carry them off to the country of the Ammonites (Jer 41$^{1-10}$). But tidings of the events at Mizpah had reached Johanan ben-Kareah and his companions. They collected their troops and pursued after the fugitives, whom they overtook by the great pool of Gibeon, the scene of the fight between the men of Joab and of Abner (2 S 2$^{12-16}$). The captives, among whom were the prophet Jeremiah and his scribe Baruch (cf. Jer 40^{6} 42$^{1ff.}$ 43^{3}), gladly went over to the pursuing forces; but Ishmael with eight of his men escaped to the Ammonites. The Jewish leaders, having failed to capture Ishmael, were now afraid of suffering the vengeance of the king of Babylon for the murder of his vassal Gedaliah. Accordingly they did not venture to return to Mizpah, but moved to the neighbourhood of Bethlehem, whence they subsequently fled to Egypt, in spite of the advice and warnings of Jeremiah (Jer 41^{11}–43^{13}). A reference in Jer 52^{30} to 745 persons who were carried captive to Babylon in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, i.e. four years after the fall of Jerus., is perhaps to be connected with fresh measures taken against the Jews in consequence of the outrage of Ishmael. The murder of Gedaliah was kept in memory by a fast instituted in the seventh month (Zec 7^{5} 8^{19}), which is celebrated on the 3rd day of Tisri (Sept.–Oct.)

ISHSECHEL, Ezr 8^{18} RVm.—It is uncertain whether אִישׁ שֶׂכֶל is to be regarded as a proper name (cf. LXX ἀνὴρ σαχών A, ἀν. σαχώχ B), or should be tr^{d} 'a man of discretion,' so Luc. (ἀνὴρ συνετός) and RV; AV 'a man of understanding,' cf. 1 Es 8^{47} ἄνδρα(s) ἐπιστήμονα(s). For the word שֶׂכֶל=discretion, intelligence, cf. 1 S 25^{3}, 1 Ch 22^{12}, Pr 13^{15} 16^{22}, Ps 111^{10} etc. The context leads us to expect the proper name of the representative of the sons of Mahli, and the order of the words is decidedly against the supposition that Sherebiah is meant, the conjunction having been inserted by mistake. With the name Ish-sechel we might compare Eshbaal, 1 Ch 8^{33}, Ishhod, ib. 7^{18}. But such forms are rare, and it is probable that there is some corruption in the text; the proper name may have fallen out before the complimentary designation, or may have been wrongly corrected into the present form Ish-sechel. ISLAND, ISLE (אִי, אִיִּים, νῆσος, νησίον) is the tr. of a Heb. word which has a much wider significance. Its root-meaning is supposed to be habitable land, and in one passage (Is 42^{15}) it means undoubtedly dry land, as opposed to water: 'I will make the rivers islands, and I will dry up the pools' (RV). Accordingly, some translators (Cheyne uniformly in Psalms, and in Deutero.-Isaiah frequently) render it lands or countries, with the maritime connotation entirely left out. In by far the greater number of passages, however, it signifies coastland—land either washed or surrounded by the sea, whether belonging to continents or islands. The idea of distance is usually contained in the word, either implicitly (Ps 97^1, Is 11^{11} 42^{12}) or expressly (Is 66^{19}, Jer 31^{10}), although in Is 20^6 this isle plainly means the coastland of Canaan. The isles that are in the sea (Ezk 26^{18}) are the coastlands, or island-like countries on the seaboard, which profited by the traffic of Tyre; and in one instance, judging by the ivory and ebony which they had to exchange, many isles (Ezk 27^{15}) may be East Africa or India. Usually, however, they are the islands and maritime countries to the West. The isles of the sea on which Ahasuerus laid tribute (Est 10^1) are the Islands and Coastlands of the Ægean, in contrast to the inland countries of Asia, as apparently also are the isles (Dn 11^{18}) of which 'the king of the North' (11^{15}), Antiochus the Great, should 'take many.' The isles of the sea are elsewhere the islands of the Mediterranean and the countries on the western seaboard, with which the people of Palestine traded in later times, as when Simon Maccabæus (1 Mac 14^5 RV) 'took Joppa for a haven, and made it an entrance for the isles of the sea.' The isles of Elishah—one of the sons of Javan (Gn 10^4)—which furnish blue and purple to the people of Tyre (Ezk 27^7), may point to Elis and the Peloponnesus generally which produced those dyes. The isles of the Gentiles (Gn 10^5, Zeph 2^{11}) are the distant coastlands of the Western Mediterranean. The isles are sometimes used in Ps, in Is, and in Jer to designate the West, sometimes the distant West, in contrast to the East. Tarshish and the isles (Ps 72^{10}), and Sheba and Seba, represent respectively the western and eastern boundaries of Messiah's kingdom. The isles and the inhabitants thereof (Is 42^{10}), and the isles of Kittim (Jer 2^{10}) are joined with Kedar to signify all lands from west to east. There are references to individual islands both in OT and in NT. The isles of Kittim (Jer 2^{10}, Ezk 27^6) are the coasts of Cyprus, but the name was used later for any Western maritime people, as far even as Italy (Dn 11^{30}, 1 Mac 1^1 8^5); the isle of Caphtor (Jer 47^4 margin; comp. Am 9^7, Dt 2^{23}, Gn 10^{14}) is held to be Crete, although some authorities identify it with the coastland of the Delta; 'the men of Dedan' (Ezk 27^{15}) are in the LXX (B Ῥοδίων, A Ἀραδίων) called Rhodians (initial R being read instead of D), where the reference would be to the islanders of Rhodes, who were famous mariners; Tyre appears as an island (Is 23^2), although the inhabitants of the isle may be the dwellers on the neighbouring seacoast of Phœnicia. Cyprus (Ac 4^{37} 13^4), Crete (Ac 27, Tit 1), Cauda (Ac 27^{16}, AV Clauda), Melita (Ac 28^1), Patmos (Rev 1^9), are islands mentioned in the NT. One reference, the island of the innocent (Job 22^{30}), which for long puzzled translators and commentators, has disappeared in RV, where the rendering is him that is not innocent, the mistranslation having arisen from confusing 'i, the particle not (found in Ichabod, Jezebel), with 'i, an island. The wild beasts of the island (Is 13^{22} 24^{14}, Jer 1^{39}) have also disappeared and been replaced by wolves, AV having mistaken the derivation of the word.

The object of this article is to give an outline of the political history of Israel, leaving the religious history (as far as possible) to be dealt with in the article on the Theology of the OT, to appear in a later volume of this Dictionary. A further object has been to call attention to the most important reconstructions of parts of the history, which have been offered by recent critics.

i. THE NAME.—(a) The people themselves called themselves in OT times יִשְׂרָאֵל Yisrael * (so also they are called by Mesha, Moabite Stone, lines 5, 7), or בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל Bĕnē Yisrael. The latter form describes the people as the descendants of an ancestor Israel (Jacob), Gn $43^{6. 8. 11}$ (J) etc. See JACOB. In an inscription of Shalmaneser II. (c. 854 B.C.) the name Sir'lai occurs coupled with the mention of Ahab. For the form Y-si-ri'l read on the stele of Merenptah, see below, p. 509^a.

(b) Foreigners, and Israelites speaking of themselves to foreigners, used the term עִבְרִי 'Ibhri, Gn $39^{14. 17}$ (J), Ex 1^{16} 2^6 (E), 1 S $4^{6. 9}$ 13^{19} 14^{11}. The name is found in Tacitus (Hist. v. 2, 'Hebræasque terras'; cf. Gn 40^{15a} 'the land of the Hebrews') and in Jos. in referring to the language (Ant. I. i. 1, 2, Bekker) and to the people (Ant. VI. v. 3, VII. iv. 1, Bekker). No satisfactory explanation of 'Ibhri can be given. It may be connected with the Eber of Gn $10^{21. 25}$; it will then be the designation of several other peoples besides Israel. Again, it may be the adjective corresponding to the substantive עֵבֶר 'Ebher 'other side,' 'beyond'; Is 7^{20} 'beyond the river,' 9^1 [8^{23} Heb.] 'beyond Jordan,' Jer 25^{22} 'beyond the sea.' It would seem from these examples that 'Ibhri (Hebrew) designated the Israelites as not autochthonous, but as intruders in Canaan from some land 'beyond'; cf. Gn 14^{13} where Abram the Hebrew (the new comer, τῷ περάτῃ, LXX) is distinguished from Mamre the Amorite (the old inhabitant). See HEBREW.

* The name Israel appears to mean 'God persists or perseveres' (see JACOB, p. 530^a) rather than 'God strives' in the sense of contends ('es streitet Gott,' Nestle, Eigennamen, 60), or 'El's warrior' (Ges., Ewald, Kautzsch).

(c) Ἰουδαῖος or 'Judæus' ('Jew') was the term used by classical writers, and in part by Jos. (e.g. Ant. VII. iv. 1, 'David ὁ τῶν Ἰουδαίων βασιλεύς') in referring even to ancient times. This use is due, of course, to the great part played by the tribe of Judah and the city of Jerusalem in the post-exilic history of the people. See JEW.

ii. THE NATIONAL CHARACTERISTICS OF ISRAEL.—The character of the ancient Israelites as a nation may be gathered partly from their history, partly from a study of the facts of their history in the light of the characteristics of the modern Bedawin. The Israelites entered Canaan as nomads, and displayed, at least in the earlier period, most of the virtues and vices of tent-dwellers. They seem to have been content with the simple conditions of life under which the Bedawin live; and to have been but little attracted by the civilization (as distinguished from the flesh-pots) of Egypt, or by the culture (as distinguished from the idolatry) of Canaan. Their ideal was that of the shepherd (Gn 46^{32-34} J), which does not in practice exclude such simple agriculture as the care of a few date palms (as among the modern Arabs), or the raising of a few scattered crops of cereals (as among the Zulus before 1878). The Israelites, as revealed in their earliest literature, appear as brave, adventurous, crafty, treacherous, and vengeful in war and enmity (the careers of Gideon, David, and Joab illustrate these characteristics); pure in point of sexual morality within the limits of the polygamy allowed to all Eastern peoples (cf. Gn 39^{9}, 2 S 12^{1-14}; cf. also the laws Ex 20^{17}, and note especially the wide scope of the language used, 21^{7-11}); strong in loyalty to the clan and correspondingly weak in national cohesion (see Judges and 1 and 2 Samuel, passim). The mercantile aptitude shown by Israel so much in modern times is alluded to even by Hosea ($12^{7.\,8=8.\,9\text{ Heb.}}$) and Amos ($8^{4.\,5}$), with further allusion to cheating and fraud. Possibly Israel first learned successful trading from the Canaanites (cf. Hos 12^{7} RVm), but it is more probable that they had already practised it in their nomad period, for the nomads too were merchants, Gn 37^{25} 'Ishmaelites' J, and ^{28} 'Midianites' E, Ezk 27^{21}.

In matters of thought the Israelites were not speculative, nor systematic. They realized, in a way the Greeks never realized, that some things were too high for them. God's government of the world (assumed as existing by all but perhaps the latest thinkers) offered the chief problems of their philosophy. 'Why do the wicked prosper?' was perhaps the chief question of the Hebrew 'philosophers.' Hebrew thought was occupied with the practical problems of religion.

And here it must be said that the Israelite (unlike the nomad) was profoundly religious. The modern Bedawy, as described, e.g., by Doughty (Arabia Deserta, passim), has little sense of the moral claims of religion, though the name of Allah is constantly on his lips. The Hebrews, on the contrary, endured (sometimes well, sometimes, indeed, ill) the yoke of a faith which made strict demands upon them for a morality higher than that of their neighbours (cf. Nowack, Heb. Archäologie, i. 101, 103).

iii. THE LAND OF ISRAEL.—Although Israel was to be 'a peculiar treasure,' סְגֻלָּה sĕgullāh, Ex 19^{5} E, 'a special people' (עַם סְגֻלָּה 'am ṣĕgullāh, RV 'a peculiar people') Dt 7^{6}, the nation as a whole could not be isolated from other nations. Its home, Palestine, held an important place among the lands of the ancient Eastern world. The route connecting Northern Syria and (through Northern Syria) the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris with Egypt ran along the coast of Palestine; and though this road passed for the most part through Philistine territory, its traffic must have had a great material and moral influence on Israel, whose borders lay so near it. East of Jordan ran the great road which connected Damascus with the head of the gulf of Akabah, and with the West Coast of Arabia. This road, again (if it corresponded at all with the modern Derb el-Ḥajj, i.e. the Pilgrim Road to Mecca), lay for the most part outside Israelite territory, but its nearness to Gilead for some 60 miles of its length must have exercised an important influence on the two and a half tribes east of Jordan. Towards the North the fertile plain of Esdraelon, now crossed by a railway, was traversed by a road which connected Damascus with the cities of the coast, ultimately with Tyre itself and with the Western lands beyond the Mediterranean.

With a land thus placed, Israel could not remain untouched by the movements of the great powers of Western Asia. If the Aramæans of Damascus wished to develop their trade on the Tyrian coast, or to find a new outlet for merchandise on the Red Sea, they were bound to make treaties—or war—with Israel. If the Empire of the Euphrates Valley (Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian in succession) wished to crown its conquests with the possession of the Nile, the passage of its armies must mean for Israel terror and spoiling, even if a formal submission and a seasonable payment of tribute should avert for a time worse mischief. Lastly, when Egypt desired to keep war off her own frontiers, it was Palestine which had to supply a confederacy of 'buffer states' to bear the reproach of Pharaoh's faithlessness and the main burden of his defeat.

On the other hand, two facts must be borne in mind which qualify the foregoing account of Israel's position among the nations. (1) Israel was cut off from the sea. It was Phœnicia which represented Palestine to the West. The name of Baal, not that of Jehovah, crossed the Mediterranean in early times. The civilization and religious thought which influenced the coast-lands of the West came from the Zidonians (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL pp. 26–28). (2) Though Israel as a whole was brought into close contact with the powers of Western Asia, yet the position of the Southern kingdom was comparatively isolated. It was the Northern kingdom which sustained the perpetual conflict with the Aramæans, which maintained a close intercourse with Tyre, which finally felt first the weight of the arm of Assyria, and fell first before its armies. Judah was comparatively sheltered from the world until Samaria fell before Sargon (B.C. 722).

Indeed, the territory which fell at the disruption to the Southern kingdom was fitted not only by its geographical position, but also by its physical features, to be a nursery of free men. The Land east of Jordan, the Plain of Esdraelon, and the Maritime Plain, were open to the march of conquering armies, but the Hills of Benjamin and the Hill Country of Judah together formed a Montenegro which a resolute peasantry might defend against the forces of an empire. The ruggedness of the approaches to this district can hardly be exaggerated; the sight of its ravines recalls at once the exploits of Jonathan (1 S 14^{4}), David (23^{14}), and Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac 3^{24} 4^{29-34}), and lends probability to the accounts of the victories of Asa (2 Ch $14^{9\text{ff.}}$) and of Jehoshaphat ($20^{22\text{ff.}}$). One circumstance only made against the isolation of Judah, viz. the mixed origin of the tribe of Judah itself, which seems to have contained a large Edomite element, the Calebites. (See CALEB, vol. i. p. 340).

The bearing of the physical configuration of Palestine as a whole on the history of Israel has been pointed out with great force by G. A. Smith (HGHL, ch. ii.). 'Palestine,' he writes, 'is almost as much divided into petty provinces as Greece, and far more than those of Greece are her divisions intensified by those of soil and climate.' She has been, and always will be, a land where fragments of many races live side by side. Israel at the conquest found 'seven nations' (Dt 7^1 ['four,' Jg 3^3]) occupying Canaan, and was content (after some slaughter) to settle down among them (Jg $3^{3.5}$). These nations represented racial and not merely political divisions; see the illustrations in Sayce, Races of the OT, or in Nowack, Archäologie, i. pp. 122, 126, 365. The influence of foreigners in Israel is apparent at several periods; above all, the incorporation of a mass of the old inhabitants into Israel during the time of the Judges (see JUDGES, PERIOD OF THE) had far-reaching results. The nation always had the foreigner in its midst. We hear of a 'mixed multitude' (עֵרֶב רַב 'ērebh rabh,—read perhaps עֲרַבְרֹב 'ărabhrōbh, 'a mixed people' without reference to numbers,—Ex 12^{38} E; אֲסַפְסֻף 'ăṣaphṣuph, Nu 11^4 J or E) in the wilderness with Israel, of foreign wives (Jg 3^6, 1 K 11^1, Ezr $9^{1.2}$, Ru 1^4), guards (2 S 15^{18}, 2 K 11^4 RV; see GUARD), officers and mighty men (1 S 21^7, 2 S $23^{36ff.}$, Is $22^{15f.}$), task-workers (1 K $9^{20f.}$), artificers (1 K $7^{13f.}$), Rechabites (Jer $35^{2ff.}$), and Gibeonites (2 S $21^{1ff.}$, cf. Jos $9^{3ff.}$). The presence of the stranger (gēr) was recognized by law (Ex 20^{10} 23^9), and his conversion to Israel's faith was contemplated (1 K $8^{41ff.}$, Is $56^{3ff.}$). In fact, in a land like Canaan, broken up into small districts, each of which was the home of a tribe, Israel could not be kept from intermixture with foreigners. See, further, FOREIGNER, GER.

In judging of the climate and fertility of the land, the true meaning of the phrase 'a land flowing with milk and honey' (Nu 13^{27} JE) must be remembered. It is the nomad's praise of a pastoral country, and if we add to this description the additional advantages mentioned in Dt 6^{11} ('vineyards and olive trees'), we shall arrive at a just appreciation of the nature of that part of Palestine which was permanently held by Israel. It was not (with one important exception) agricultural territory. Its rocky slopes were suited for vines and olives, its hills and uplands for pasture, but only the plain of Esdraelon deserves the description of 'a land of wheat and barley' (Dt 8^8). The Maritime Plain testifies even now, under the hands of the German colonists, to its former fertility, but the plain was in the hands of the Philistines. Under these circumstances the Israelites never had a stock of corn, and famine is a frequent feature in their history (2 S 21^1, 1 K $17^{1ff.}$, 2 K $4^{38ff.}$ 8^1, Hag $1^{6ff.}$, Neh 5^3). We must remember, therefore, another description of Palestine as 'a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof,' Nu 13^{32} P (so LOT^{6} p. 62, in spite of a misprint). The phrase (cf. Ezk 7^{15}) describes a land subject not only to famine, but also to pestilence. The latter also played a part in the history of Israel (1 S 5^6 6^{19}, 2 S 24^{15}, 2 K 19^{35} 20^7). The epigram quoted by Abu'l-Fida on Syria as a whole applies to Palestine, at least in part—

> 'Its atmosphere is—pestilence,
> Its dwellings are—straitness,
> Its soil is—stone,
> Its epidemics are—everlastingness.'

iv. SOURCES OF THE HISTORY.—(a) For the earliest period:—the narratives of J and E in the Hexateuch. (Unsupported statements in P are generally doubtful).

(b) For the period of the Judges:—Jg 2^6–18^{29}, apart from the editorial framework in which it is set.

(c) The undivided kingdom:—1 S 9–2 S 20^{26}. A large part of 2 S consists of a court history of David of great historical value. 2 S 21^1–24^{25} is an appendix of less value. 1 K 1^1–11^{43} (apart from additions by the Deuteronomic editor).

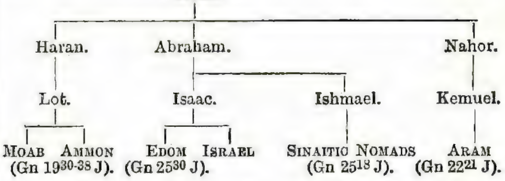
(d) The divided kingdom, (α) 1 K 13–2 K 17 (mainly concerned with the Northern kingdom); the parallel passages of Chronicles add little to our information, but much illustrative matter can be obtained from Amos and Hosea. (β) 2 Ch 11–28 (mainly concerned with the Southern kingdom, and mostly treated as a romance by modern critics). (γ) 2 K 18–25 (the fall of Judah); this part of the history receives much illustration from Isaiah (first half), Micah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. Monuments (Moabite, Egyptian, and especially Assyrian and Babylonian) give some additional light, but the statements of classical writers, e.g. Herodotus, are confused for the most part and untrustworthy.

(e) The Persian Period. Ezra and Nehemiah are valuable in that they contain the memoirs of those two great men, but the books as a whole are ill compiled and incomplete, and it is difficult to extract a coherent story from them. Haggai and Zechariah (1–8) furnish valuable information.

(f) The Greek Period. Josephus (Ant. XI. viii.–XIII. vii.) gives some information, but his romantic stories are doubtful. For the age of the Maccabees we have a generally trustworthy guide in 1 Mac, and some hints may be gathered from 2 Mac. The Book of Daniel (written c. 167 B.C.?) is generally appealed to in illustration of this age.

v. THE HISTORY.

1. The Origins of Israel.—The relationships of the Israelite people according to the earliest source preserved in Genesis are shown in the following table:—



That Moab, Ammon, Edom, and Israel formed together a group of tribes of kindred origin, is generally acknowledged and need not be doubted. It has, however, been questioned whether Israel was really related to Aram (the Aramæans or 'Syrians'), and Wellhausen has suggested that Israel's claim to such relationship was founded not on fact, but on an ambitious desire to be reckoned to belong to 'the mighty Aramæans' (IJG^{3} p. 8). Yet against this we may set the fact asserted by Kittel (Geschichte, i. 155), that it is an unchanging trait of Israelite tradition that the origins of the Hebrew people lay beyond the Euphrates, i.e. in Aram-naharaim, 'Aram of the two rivers,' the country between the Euphrates and the Ḥabor. To the passages in Genesis we may add two interesting references outside it. In Dt 26^5 (D) the Israelite is told to call his ancestor 'a wandering (or 'lost') Aramæan' (cf. RVm), and in Hos 12^{12} (12^{13} Heb.)—an interpolation acc. to Nowack (in loco), but even so, probably independent of the present form of Genesis — we have mention of Jacob's flight into 'the field of Aram' (RV), an event which surely implies some previous connexion with the people of Aram.

On the other hand, the nearness of kinship between Israel and the population of the Sinai peninsula is pronounced by Wellhausen 'very probable,' and he points out that 'the real home of the Patriarchs lay between Edom and Egypt,[*] where the South of Palestine merges itself in the Desert' (Geschichte, p. 9). On the whole, however, it seems best to accept both relationships of Israel, for the two are equally well attested in the earliest records. Israel was no more homogeneous than any other tribe which migrates and conquers. Abraham's grand-nephew Laban was of Ḥaran (Gn 27^{43} 29^{4}, both J), and Isaac's wife came from Aram-naharaim (so RVm Gn 24^{10} J), whence Abraham himself also derived his origin (v.^{4} J). (See art. ABRAHAM, vol. i. p. 15^{a}). On the other hand, the genealogical table given above shows a relationship between Israel and the nomads of Sinai, and the Calebite origin of a large part of the tribe of Judah has already been alluded to. The general presentation in the earliest sources of the history of the patriarchs, viz. that Israel was a tribe from the north drawn southward, falling under the spell of Egyptian influence, and leaving behind it in the Sinaitic peninsula nomads akin to it in blood, has the strongest claims to be received as true. The historical character of the lives of the patriarchs themselves is discussed elsewhere; see especially ABRAHAM, vol. i. p. 15, and JACOB, below, p. 533 ff.

2. Israel under the Egyptians.—It has been denied that Israel was ever 'in Egypt'; it is therefore necessary to ascertain exactly what is asserted in the biblical accounts. The people dwelt in Goshen apart from the Egyptians (Gn 46^{28}–47^{4} J), as indeed the narrative of the plagues presupposes (cf. Ex 8^{22} 9^{26}, both J). Such passages as Ex 3^{22} $11^{2f.}$ (both E) do not essentially disagree with this representation: Goshen (if Pithom and Rameses, Ex 1^{11} J, were in Goshen, and if the first of these cities has been correctly identified by Naville with ancient remains near the Sweet Water Canal) bordered on Egypt proper, so that the Israelites would have Egyptian 'neighbours' north and west of them. Now the fact that we find no certain mention of the Hebrews (Israelites) on the Egyptian monuments (at present known) belonging (presumably) to the period of the Oppression and of the Exodus, does not discredit this story of Israel's sojourn and servitude in Goshen. Israel was not the only people which was impressed to work on Pharaoh's buildings; the story of Israel might very well be lost to the Egyptians amid a dozen similar memories. As a matter of fact, however, one name does meet us in the Egyptian records which recalls the name of the Chosen People. Certain foreigners called 'prw (? 'Aperu) were employed on task-work under Ramses II., and as late as the time of Ramses IV. This name has been compared with 'Ibhri ('Hebrew'). The fact that the Exodus is always supposed to have taken place before the reign of the latter monarch is of small account. The name may have been passed on from the sons of Israel to their successors in the task-work. (See, however, art. EGYPT, vol. i. p. 665). If the Ḥabiri, so often mentioned on the Tel el-Amarna tablets as the foes of Egypt in Syria, be the Hebrews, then the Exodus must have taken place as early as the time of the Eighteenth Dynasty, and the same conclusion must be drawn if the Y-si-r-'l of the recently discovered stele of Merenptaḥ (Meneptah) be Israel, for Y-si-r-'l appears as a Syrian people upon whom the chastisement of Pharaoh has fallen (cf. G. Steindorff, ZATW xvi. 330 ff.). Of the true date of the Exodus we still know nothing for certain (see CHRONOLOGY OF OLD TEST., vol. i. pp. 398, 399; and articles by Sayce, Hommel, etc., in Expos. Times, vols. viii. and ix.).

3. The Exodus and the Wilderness.—The Exodus was the natural revolt of a pastoral people against compulsory brick-making and building, against a system which involved a reckless expenditure of the lives of the workmen; cf. Erman, Anc. Egypt, p. 475 ff. In the earlier sources (JE) the Israelite leader is Moses, in the later (P) his leadership is somewhat obscured by the fact that Aaron is constantly co-ordinated with him. The plagues, eight in number in JE (the lice כִּנִּים kinnim or כִּנָּם kinnām, Ex 8^{16} [8^{12} Heb.], and the boils שְׁחִין shĕḥīn, 9^{9}, being due to P), are the means of forcing Pharaoh's consent. It is noteworthy that Foreign War is not reckoned among the plagues. The theory, therefore, that the Libyan invasion in the reign of Merenptaḥ facilitated the Exodus, receives no support from the biblical accounts.

With the passage of the 'Red Sea' (see EXODUS AND JOURNEY TO CANAAN, vol. i. p. 802) we arrive at contemporary history. In Ex 15^{1b-3} (Moses' Song) 'we seem,' acc. to Dillm. and Driver (LOT^{6} 30), 'to hear Moses himself speaking'; and the latter, while pointing out certain redactional additions, writes, 'Probably the greater part of the song is Mosaic.' The Passage of the Sea must retain its place among the best attested facts of history; no argument drawn from the silence of later documents can weigh against this contemporary attestation. Moreover, as Kittel well points out (Geschichte, i. 206), this event lends support on the one side to the story of a sojourn in Egypt, on the other to the story of Wilderness wandering.

Early accounts (Nu 14^{33} JE, cf. Am 5^{25}) reckon the period of the Wandering at forty years. Of the events which marked it very little is known. One thing, however, is clear. Israel was not ready at the Exodus for the immediate conquest of Canaan (Ex 13^{17} E, Nu $14^{3.\,40ff.}$ JE, Dt 1^{27}).

The Mosaic Religion.—During these forty years some organization based on religion, and mainly of a religious character, was given to Israel (Ex $18^{25f.}$ 19^{3}–24^{14} E and J). A 'covenant' was made between J" and the people, and the foundation stone of Israel's nationality was thereby laid (Ex 34^{10-27} E or J). Israel professed Islām (resignation to God) and prepared for a Jĭhād (a war of conquest undertaken in the name of God). Moses was a pre-Christian Mohammed with a more fruitful revelation in his hand.

So far all is clear, what, however, were the exact contents of the revelation given by Moses? The two passages of Exodus referred to above (19^{3}–24^{14} and 34^{10-27}) contain very ancient (probably Mosaic) material, but the relation between the two passages is uncertain (cf. Driver, LOT^{6} pp. 39, 40), and the limits of what is ancient are subject to much dispute. Critics are not even agreed as to the identity of the Ten 'Commandments' (דְּבָרִים dĕbhārīm, 'words') which seem to be the foundation of the written Law, and Wellhausen has discovered in Ex 34 'Ten Words' of mainly ceremonial contents to dispute the title of 'The Ten Words' with Ex 20^{2-17}.

Two 'Words,' however, are found in both the rival Decalogues: (1) Jehovah alone is Israel's God; (2) molten images may not be made. It seems most reasonable to say that the principles of the Mosaic religion were Monotheism (a personal relation of one God to Israel), and a Repudiation of image-worship as likely to entangle the people in polytheism like that of Egypt. (See, further, Kittel, Geschichte, i. 246 ff.).

4. The Conquest of Canaan.—That Israel obtained a firm footing east of Jordan before entering Western Palestine is generally acknowledged. The war against Sihon, however (Nu 21^{21-30} JE, according to some E, cf. Dt $2^{26ff.}$), has been questioned, and the ancient song (Nu 21^{27-30}) has been referred to a war of Israel against Moab in the 9th cent. It is more natural, however, to find in the song early testimony to a victorious war of the Amorite against the Moabite, followed by a war of retribution waged by Israel, Moab's kinsman, against the victor. Such a war as the latter could have taken place only in very early times such as those of Moses. (See G. A. Smith, HGHL, Appendix III.). The war against Og, the king of Bashan (Nu $21^{33\text{ff.}}$, Dt $3^{1\text{-}4}$), is not equally well attested. See also JAIR, HAVVOTH-JAIR.

Of the conquest of Western Palestine we possess two early accounts. The first of these is contained in Jos 2^1–11^9; it is the narrative of JE (J and E cannot be accurately separated) broken and expanded by additions from a Deuteronomic Redactor (D^2) and from P. This narrative of JE contains all the well-known features, such as the reception of the spies by Rahab, the drying up of the waters of Jordan, the capture of Jericho, the trespass of Achan, the two attacks on Ai, the treaty with the Gibeonites, and the battles of Beth-horon and of the waters of Merom. Joshua appears as the successor of Moses and as the leader of the whole people. The conquest is represented as the work of united Israel, and its course, save for the repulse at Ai, is uniformly successful. On the other hand, generalizing passages, e.g. $10^{28\text{-}43}$ ('all these kings and their land did Joshua take at one time,' v.^{42}) and $11^{10\text{-}23}$ ('So Joshua took the whole land. . . . And the land rested from war,' v.^{23}) are assigned to D^2.

The second early account of the conquest of Western Palestine is found in scattered notices in the later chapters of Joshua and in ch. 1 of Judges. These notices show a similarity of style, and it is possible to make a tentative reconstruction of the narrative from which they have been taken (see Driver, LOT^{6} pp. 162, 163). This reconstructed document gives us three glimpses of the conquest, according to which the tribes fight in groups, and not as a united Israel under one leader (Joshua). (1) We first see Judah and Simeon together with nomad tribes of the Sinaitic peninsula, such as the Kenites (Jg 1^{16}), Calebites (Jos 15^{13}), and Kenizzites (Jos 15^{17}), conquering the hill-country of Judah, the 'south' of Arad (Jg 1^{16} MT, 'Descent of Arad' LXX; cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL pp. 277, 278), Hebron, and Debir (Kiriath-sepher). (2) We next see the house of Joseph establishing itself on the central ridge at Bethel (Jg 1^{22}), but failing to drive out the inhabitants of Gezer (v.^{29}), and complaining to Joshua that progress northward was stayed by the chariots of iron which the Canaanites had in the Valley of Jezreel (Jos $17^{14\text{ff.}}$). Joshua advises them to make room for themselves by clearing the jungle on the central ridge. (3) The third glimpse which the reconstructed document gives is of the limitations set to the conquests of the three northern tribes, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali, and of the tribe of Dan, by the stiff resistance of the Canaanite and Amorite (Jg $1^{30\text{-}34}$). Dan seeks by conquest a new home in the north at Leshem = Laish (Jos 19^{47}; cf. Jg $18^{27\text{ff.}}$).

In comparing these two accounts we must remember that the second is put together from fragments, and is quite incomplete. It is defective as regards Joseph and all the northern tribes, nor does it make clear to us the position of Joshua (Jos $17^{14\text{ff.}}$); does it treat him (as some think) as simply the leader of the House of Joseph? There is little in it, however, which clearly contradicts the account of JE in Jos 2^1–11^9, and by piecing together the two accounts we can construct a narrative of the conquest of Western Palestine which has strong claims to be accepted.

Israel, bereaved of Moses (as Islam of Mohammed) at the beginning of a career of conquest, accepted Joshua as Moses' Khalifa (successor), and persevered on the path of conquest (JE). The Jordan was crossed (JE). Jericho, 'the city of palm trees,' was won (JE and F*). Gibeon in a panic made terms with Israel (JE). Israel, united under Joshua, won a great victory over a southern confederacy at Beth-horon (JE). Elated by these repeated successes, Judah (perhaps a small tribe at this time) broke loose from the main body, and turned southward to join the Calebites in a division of the southern end of the central ridge (cf. F). Joshua, at the head of the strong tribe of Joseph, and followed by the tribes which afterwards settled in the north, burst in the full tide of victory across the plain of Esdraelon and defeated a northern confederacy at the Waters of Merom (JE). The Canaanites, however, after bending before the storm, recovered courage, and by their chariots and fortified cities retained control of the plain of Esdraelon and compelled the Israelites to keep to the hills (F; cf. Jg 4. 5). (On the historical probabilities considered in the light of geography, see HGHL, Appendix II.).

5. The Transformation of Israel.—This took place under the Judges (see JUDGES, PERIOD OF THE). It is clear from the earliest records of the conquest that the Canaanites were not exterminated, as the later record (D^2) seems sometimes to assert (Jos 10^{40} 11^{14}). The conquerors settled down in the midst of the half-conquered majority, and the question arose which stock, which civilization, which religion, Canaanite or Israelite, would survive? The result was a compromise: a mixed stock arose, over which it was possible to set up one kingdom, the kingdom of Saul and David. The Canaanite-Israelite was not a nomad, but an agriculturalist, a city-dweller, a merchant, with a wide outlook on the world, such as became the member of an empire which touched the highway of the world of Western Asia, the Euphrates. In religion also the Canaanite-Israelite was a new production. He held his monotheism somewhat loosely, and was ready to worship at Canaanite shrines. Lastly, the new nation was much more numerous than the old invading tribes. David's armies, composed of these Canaanite-Israelites, were not inconsiderable; they enabled him to found an empire. The fusion of races which made a nation capable of winning victories like those of David took place in the period of the Judges.

6. The Undivided Kingdom.—We have an express statement (Gn 36^{31}, apparently from an early document) that Edom was governed by kings before any king reigned over Israel. It is probable that the same is true of Ammon (cf. 1 S $11^{1\text{-}3}$; Jg $11^{12\text{-}28}$, however, seems to be late) and of Amalek (1 S $15^{8\text{ff.}}$, though the passage is not early). The first movement towards the establishment of a kingdom over Israel came from the half-Canaanite Abimelech (Jg $9^{1\text{ff.}}$), and affected only the central tribes. In fact it was only hard experience which made the Israelites (still children of the desert in nature) willing to submit to the restraint of an organized kingdom. No doubt the Canaanite leaven in the population hastened this submission.

Of the occasion of the establishment of the kingdom we have two accounts in 1 Samuel (Driver, LOT^{6} p. 175 ff.). According to the earlier account (1 S 9^1–10^{16} $11^{1\text{-}11.\ 15}$), J″ chooses a king (Saul) who is to save His people from the Philistines, and commands Samuel to anoint him ($9^{16\text{f.}}$). The language used reminds us of Ex 3^7 (God charges Moses to lead Israel out of Egypt). Samuel promises Saul 'all that is desirable' in Israel (9^{20} RV), and encourages him to act as king, as occasion offers, in the assurance of divine support (10^7). The occasion for action comes in the invasion of Nahash the Ammonite, and on Saul's success the people make him king with rejoicings.

According to the later account (1 S 8. $10^{17\text{-}27}$ 12) the Israelites, disgusted with the corrupt administration of justice by Samuel's sons, ask Samuel to make them 'a king to judge [them] like all the nations' (8^{5}). Samuel (as divinely instructed) treats this demand as a rejection of J″ as king, and, while granting the request, tells the people that they will have reason to repent of it, for their king will take from them all that is desirable in his eyes (8^{11-17}). Samuel describes Saul to the people after his election (12^{13}) as 'the king whom ye have chosen,' and tells them (v.^{17}) that their wickedness was great in asking for a king. (There may be a trace of a third account in 12^{12}, where, somewhat inconsistently with 8^{1-5}, the invasion of the Ammonites is given as the immediate occasion of the demand for a king).

* F = Fragmentary reconstructed accounts.

The first and earliest account accords best with the known facts. Saul established his throne in the midst of a great Philistine Oppression (1 S $13^{6.\,19}$), when the Phil. had a garrison (? נְצִיב) in the heart of Benjamite territory (ib. $14^{1\text{ff.}}$), and some of the 'Hebrews' were serving by constraint in the Philistine ranks (ib. v.^{21}). Saul's reign (the duration of which is quite uncertain) was an almost continuous struggle against his western neighbours (1 S 13^{3} 14^{52} 17^{1} 18^{25} $23^{1.\,27}$ 28^{1} 31^{1}); he taught Israel to face the Philistines.

The Rise of David.—Saul was the fighting chief of an infant nation, David the founder and organizer of a powerful state. Saul was the Lascaris,* but David the Vataces of Israel. The government gained vastly in intellectual power by the accession of David. Saul perhaps could not write (1 S 11^{7}); David wrote the first letter mentioned in the Bible (2 S 11^{14} !), was 'prudent in speech' (1 S 16^{18} RV), a poet of considerable power (2 S $1^{17\text{ff.}}$), if not also a Psalmist (2 S $22^{1\text{ff.}}$, a passage belonging to the Appendix to 2 Samuel), and a man who reflected (23^{1-7}). The whole history of the suppression of Absalom's rebellion stamps David as a man of the highest mental power. The king who could command and apply in the moment of his greatest need the wrathful family faithfulness of Joab and Abishai, the salt-truth of Ittai the Philistine, the friendliness of the priests Zadok and Abiathar, the allegiance of the aged counsellor Hushai, and the helpfulness of Shobi the Ammonite and Barzillai the Gileadite (2 S $17^{27\text{f.}}$), must have been a man of intellectual power far above the ordinary.

David's reign was marked by three events—(a) the choice of Jerusalem as capital; (b) the rise of the tribe of Judah; and (c) the foundation of an Israelite empire.

(a) Jerusalem before David's day probably consisted of a half-Israelite town grouped round the Jebusite citadel, which stood on a hill S.E. of the present Ḥaram hill, but probably separated from it by a depression now filled up. Such a town was unsuitable for the Israelite capital so long as it was dominated by the Jebusite fort. David's capture of this fort gave him a site from which he could build towards the North and West, taking in other hills; he thus formed a capital of ample size and of great natural strength.

(b) The rise of the tribe of Judah under David is a remarkable fact. In Judges this tribe plays hardly any part save at the Conquest (ch. 1), in which it is almost overshadowed by Calebites, Kenizzites, and Kenites. It is not mentioned in the present text of the Song of Deborah (Jg 5). The earlier leaders of Israel, Moses, Aaron, Joshua, Samuel, and Saul, all belonged to other tribes, and no judge was a Judæan. Under these circumstances it has been supposed (Stade, GVI i. 132) that Judah entered Canaan from the south before the rest of the tribes entered from the east, and that in ancient times Judah stood in no union with the rest of Israel. Be this as it may, from the time of David Judah played a great part in Israel's history.

(c) It may be surprising that so small a people as Israel was able to found an empire which stretched from the borders of Egypt to the Euphrates. In the south Egypt claimed a hegemony over Syria; in the north the Hittites (1 K 10^{29}, 2 K 7^{6}) and the Aramæans (Syrians) were strong, and, lastly, in the east lay the great Assyrian power. But after the reign of Tiglath-pileser I. (c. 1120–1100 B.C.) Assyria was in a state of temporary decline until about the end of the 10th cent. B.C. (McCurdy, HPM i. § 181); and the Hittites had ceased to exercise an imperial sway (ib. § 179); lastly, from c. 1240 to 930 B.C., under the 20th and 21st dynasties, Egypt was weak and divided (see art. EGYPT, vol. i. 662 b). Thus room is left for an Israelite empire, c. 1017–937 B.C., the period assigned to the reigns of David and Solomon (see CHRONOLOGY OF OLD TEST. vol. i. p. 401).

The empire of David and Solomon was greater in appearance than in reality, and it was, moreover, unstable. Garrisons (or 'governors' נְצִבִים) were placed in Damascus and in Edom (2 S $8^{6.\,14}$), but other provinces simply paid a tribute (cf. ib. v.$^{11\text{f.}}$), the amount of which depended, no doubt, on the strength of their fears.

The reign of Solomon was magnificent and oppressive, the very opposite, in fact, of the ideal given in Dt 17^{16-17}. He put 30,000 Israelites to task-work (1 K $5^{13\text{f.}}$; 1 K 9^{22} is a later gloss), and alienated the northern tribes (12^{4}), already dissatisfied with the House of Jesse (2 S $20^{1\text{f.}}$); he filled his harem with foreign wives for the sake of prestige and policy, and patronized foreign worship (1 K $11^{5.\,7}$) in order to conciliate allied or subject nations. Of twenty years given to building, he devoted seven to the erection of a temple, on which he employed foreign builders (1 K 5^{18}), and in which he admitted foreign devices, such as the Second Commandment condemns (1 K 6^{23}). Whether Solomon had any strong religious feeling (such as his father had) we cannot tell; the Prayer of Dedication in 1 K 8^{23-61} is the work of the compiler of Kings (so Driver, LOT^{6} p. 191). On the whole, he reminds us of the typical Pharaoh, who built, oppressed, and boasted of Divine favour. The importance of the Temple must not be exaggerated; David had already made Jerusalem a Holy City by transferring thither the ark (2 S 6^{12}).

7. The Hundred Years' War with Aram.—The disruption of Solomon's kingdom relegated the southern half ('Judah') to a comparatively safe obscurity, and imposed upon the northern half ('Israel') the task of preventing the Aramæans (Syrians) of Damascus from advancing to the shores of the Mediterranean. From a nation like the Aramæans, eager for mercantile and material advantages, Israel invited attack in three directions. (1) The short route to Tyre by Dan and Abel-beth-maacah was worth seizing (1 K 15^{20}). (2) The fertile plain of Esdraelon was valuable in itself, and also because it led to the sea; hence the fortress of Aphek in the Philistine plain became a point for Aramæan armies to march on (1 K 20^{26}, 2 K 13^{22}, LXX, Lucian's text; W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} p. 435; Expositor, Dec. 1895. See also APHEK). (3) Ramoth-gilead (precise site uncertain) was surrounded by good pasture-land, and commanded one of the trade routes which ran east of Jordan leading to Arabia (1 K 22^{3}).

The kings of the house of Omri (1 K 16^{16}–2 K 9^{26}) met the Aramæan danger with courage and skill. Alliances with Tyre (1 K 16^{31}) and with

* Cf. Gibbon, Decline and Fall, ch. lxii. beginning: 'In his first efforts the fugitive Lascaris commanded only 3 cities and 2000 soldiers; his reign was the season of generous and active despair: in every military operation he staked his life and crown; and his enemies . . . were surprised by his celerity and subdued by his boldness.'

Judah (1 K 22^{2-4}, 2 K 3^{7}) secured the left flank and rear of Israel, a new capital well situated for defence was built and fortified on the hill of Samaria (1 K 16^{24}), Ahab routed Ben-hadad at Aphek (1 K 20^{26}), and Joram, it seems, recovered Ramoth-gilead from Hazael (2 K 8^{28}, cf. 9^{1}).

The fortune of war changed at first under the new dynasty, that of Jehu and his sons. The Aramæans under Hazael and his successor Ben-hadad began to prevail perhaps in the days of Jehu himself; they almost annihilated the armies of his successor Jehoahaz, and became masters of all the land east of Jordan (2 K $10^{32f.}$ 13^{3-7}). On one occasion Hazael traversed the northern kingdom, reached Philistine territory, captured Gath, and threatened Jerusalem (12^{17}). The affliction of Israel in those days was 'very bitter, for there was not . . . any helper for Israel' (14^{26}). A change came again under Joash, the third king of Jehu's line. He thrice defeated Ben-hadad, and recovered the cities taken by Hazael, presumably the cities east of Jordan (13^{25}, cf. vv.$^{14-19}$). He even found leisure for a civil war with Amaziah of Judah, which ended in the capture of Jerusalem (14^{8-14}). But if Joash was the deliverer, Jeroboam II., the son of Joash, was the avenger of Israel. Under him Israel recovered according to 2 K 14^{28} 'Damascus and Hamath,' according to v.^{25} 'from the entering in of Hamath unto the sea of the Arabah.'

The religious policy of Ahab (the true representative of the house of Omri in this) was to patronize the Baal-worship of his Tyrian allies and of his half-Canaanite subjects without actually rejecting the religion of J″ (1 K 18^{21}). If he allowed Jezebel to slay the prophets of the Lord (18^{13}), it was doubtless because these prophets were bold enough to protest against such toleration, and not merely because they were prophets of J″. The work of the great prophet Elijah and of the house of Jehu which embraced his cause (19^{17}), was to inflict such blows on the worshippers of Baal that they never again hoped for any support for their religion from the heads of the Israelite state.

The Religion of the Prophets.—The reign of Jeroboam II. marked the highest point of material prosperity which Israel reached after the disruption, and perhaps the lowest point of Israel's moral degradation. Amos and Hosea, who prophesied under Jeroboam and his immediate successors, met this degradation with a revelation of God which differs in breadth and depth from the Mosaic revelation as sketched above. God, they taught, was not only Israel's God, but also the God of all the world; He would not favour Israel regardless of its moral condition, rather He would punish the sinful nation, whether that nation were Israel or another. If it be uncertain whether the Ten Commandments be Mosaic, it is at least certain that they were the code of the prophets of the 8th cent. Amos and Hosea taught Israel to worship One God, a God of Righteousness and Purity. But the manner as well as the matter of the teaching of these prophets challenges attention. Unlike Elijah and Elisha, they were 'writing prophets.' A prophet was no longer a voice only; he left a body of teaching behind him, to serve in the religious education of his people.

8. The Tyranny of Asshur (Assyria).—The contest between Israel and the Aramæans was ended by the interference of the Assyrians, who crushed both. We may pass over the victory of Shalmaneser II. over a confederate Aramæan-Israelite army in the days of Ahab (B.C. 854), and Jehu's payment of tribute to Shalmaneser (B.C. 842), as well as the boast of Ramman-nirārī III. (B.C. 811–783) that he exacted tribute from the 'land of Omri.' Assyria declined while Israel flourished under Jeroboam II. (B.C. 782–741). Unfortunately Assyria revived under Tiglath-pileser III. (B.C. 745–727). We need not believe that he had anything to do with Uzziah (Azariah) of Judah[*] (2 K 15^{1}), but we have monumental references to his defeat of the allied kings Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus (16^{5-9}), and the monuments tell us what the Bible does not, viz. that Ausi'i' (Hoshea) was confirmed as king of Israel by Tiglath-pileser. But Hoshea succeeded to a diminished and depopulated kingdom (2 K 15^{29}); the extreme north and the land east of Jordan, after being ravaged, passed perhaps into the hands of some faithful client of Asshur. It would have been well for the kingdom of Samaria, if it had had only the open foe (Assyria) to reckon with; unfortunately, however, the false friend (Egypt) played a decisive part. From the days of Thutmosis (Thothmes) III. (B.C. 1500?) of the eighteenth dynasty and Ramses II. of the nineteenth, Egypt had looked on Canaan as within the sphere of her 'influence'; and, even when lower Egypt was divided among petty princes, one of these 'So'[†] (2 K 17^{4}) could not resist the temptation to claim a footing in Palestine by intriguing with Hoshea of Samaria against the Assyrians (see EGYPT, vol. i. p. 663^{a}). Shalmaneser IV. (B.C. 727–722), the successor of Tiglath-pileser, 'found conspiracy in Hoshea,' marched against Israel, and laid siege to Samaria (2 K $17^{4f.}$), which was taken by Sargon (Is 20^{1}), a usurper (B.C. 722–705) who succeeded Shalmaneser (KIB ii. 54, 55). Sargon tells us, 'I led forth (aślula) 27,290 of those who dwelt in the midst of it'; according to 2 K 17^{6} Israel was transported to Mesopotamia and Media. In any case the land was grievously depopulated; for even after colonists had been brought in from Babylonia and northern Syria (2 K 17^{24}), so much of the land still lay waste that lions increased and committed great ravages.

Israel having been crushed, Sargon marched against So (Sib'u) of Egypt and Hanun of Gaza, the confederates of Hoshea, and defeated them at Raphia (Rapihi) on the border of Egypt. The Pharaoh (Pir'u), plainly a different person from So, thereupon prudently paid 'tribute,' and Sargon retired.

Of the subsequent history of what had been the northern kingdom we know (until the time of the Return) only two facts. (1) Samaria was involved with Hamath, Arpad, and Damascus in a futile rising against Sargon (KIB ii. 56, 57). (2) In the decline of the Assyrian power Josiah was able to carry out his reforming measures in Bethel (2 K 23^{15}), the 'chapel' of the northern kings (Am 7^{13}), and in the cities of Samaria generally (2 K 23^{19}).

The capture of Samaria and the march of Sargon to the Egyptian frontier revealed the danger in which Judah stood from the Assyrians.

Three policies now presented themselves to Hezekiah. (1) He might ally himself (not as Hoshea with a kinglet of lower Egypt, but) with the growing power of Ethiopia (Is $18^{1f.}$ 20^{5}), under Sabakon (B.C. 707–695), who is perhaps meant, though his successor, Tirhakah (B.C. 690–664), is named in 2 K 19^{9}. Thus supported, Judah might perhaps defy Assyria. (2) He might (like his father Ahaz) throw himself without any serious invitation into the arms of the king of Assyria, and accept his protection, his yoke, and his god, or at least his altar (2 K 16^{7-12}). (3) He might accept the assurance of J″ given through Isaiah of the safety of Jerusalem and of those who took refuge in it (Is 28^{16} 29^{7} 30^{19} $31^{4f.}$). According to this last policy, Hezekiah would not attempt to defend cities like Lachish and Libnah, which lay more or less in the great king's path to Egypt, but would withdraw his people as much as possible into the hill country and into Jerusalem itself. Judah would thus bow before the storm, and neither resist the Assyrian king nor attempt to make friends with him.

Of course in a case in which three policies were possible, no one was consistently followed. In 701 Sennacherib, the son and successor of Sargon, marched into the west, having Egypt for his final objective (Herod. ii. 141). Hezekiah sent tribute (2 K 18^{14}), but Libnah and Lachish, fortresses which might assist the march of the Egyptians and retard that of the Assyrians, were not surrendered to Sennacherib. The Assyrian king, in accordance with his general plan, set himself with his main army to reduce these fortresses; but he sent 'a great host,' under the Turtan (Tartan), i.e. the Commander-in-chief who commanded in the absence of the king, to reduce Jerusalem (2 K 18^{17}). Hezekiah was blockaded, and derided in his helplessness by the Assyrian leaders.

Thus far the Bible and the monuments agree, but the sequel is differently told. According to 2 K 19^{35} the Angel of the Lord (no doubt the pestilence) slew 185,000 of the Assyrian army, and Sennacherib departed to his own land. According to Sennacherib's own account, fear fell on Hezekiah, and he acknowledged the majesty of Sennacherib by sending presents of every kind. It is hard to resist the impression that the Assyrian is escaping from the acknowledgment of failure in the long and wordy list of presents, and that the Hebrew account is based on a trustworthy tradition. In any case, Sennacherib does not claim to have taken Jerusalem, nor to have inflicted any personal chastisement on Hezekiah. The strange tradition with which Herodotus explains the retreat of 'Sanacharibus, king of the Arabians and of the Assyrians' from the frontiers of Egypt, supports as far as it goes the biblical account (ii. 141).

The retreat of Sennacherib, however,—be it remembered,—meant the escape of Jerusalem from the horrors of a sack by the Assyrians, and not the permanent deliverance of Judah from Assyrian vassalage. Esar-haddon (B.C. 681–669), continuing the work of his predecessor, conquered Egypt (B.C. 671), and we may believe him when he tells us that he demanded building materials for his palace from twenty-two kings of the west, including Manasseh, king of Judah, if Mi-na-si-i šar (maḫāzu) Ja-u-di be he (KIB ii. 148, 149). The next king, Assur-bani-pal (the Osnappar of Ezr 4^{10}), also made successful expeditions against Egypt, and it is not improbable that on one of these occasions Manasseh was carried off, as the chronicler says (2 Ch 33^{11}), bound in fetters to Babylon.

Religion in Judah during the Assyrian Period.—The religious conflict was hardly less severe than the political. Under Ahaz (2 K 16$^{3f. 10f.}$) and Manasseh (ib. 21$^{3ff.}$) foreign worships and foreign superstitions were practised (cf. Is 2^{6} 8^{19} etc.), and against these Isaiah and Micah prophesied with fearless invective and threatening. Supported by the prophets, Hezekiah (according to 2 K 18$^{4. 22}$) made some sweeping reforms, including the destruction of the brazen serpent, the removal of the high-places, and the centralization of the cultus in Jerusalem.

Wellhausen (IJG^{3} p. 90 f.) doubts whether the last two measures were carried out, supporting his doubt by a reference to 2 K 23^{13}, where, however, the defilement (not the destruction) of Solomon's high-places is ascribed to Josiah. Practical religion must have been at a very low ebb during this whole period, if we may judge from the denunciations uttered by Isaiah and Micah (esp. Mic 3$^{10ff.}$), and from Isaiah's favourite thought that only a remnant can survive God's judgment on Judah and Jerusalem.

9. The Fall of Judah.—Under Josiah (B.C. 639–608), Judah had a brief breathing space. Assur-bani-pal, the last great sovereign of Assyria, died in 626, and the Assyrian power rapidly declined. Josiah took courage to repair the temple (2 K 22$^{3ff.}$), to destroy the high-places, removing the priests attached to them, and even to extend his activity northwards to Bethel and to 'the cities of Samaria' (ib. 23^{19}). Under him also was published 'the book of the law' (i.e. the Book of Deuteronomy), and the people entered into a covenant to obey its morality, and to worship J″ only in the one place which He had chosen for his sanctuary (cf. Dt 12$^{5f.}$). Josiah himself set an example of kingly virtue (Jer 22$^{15f.}$) as well as of Deuteronomic orthodoxy (cf. 2 K 23^{21}), and the removal of the yoke of Asshur seemed to promise an era of comparative prosperity for Judah.

Unfortunately the fall of Assyria involved a contest for the spoils between Egypt under Neco(h) (AV Necho(h)) and Babylon under Nabopolassar. Necoh 'went up against the king of Assyria to the river Euphrates' (2 K 23^{29}), passing through Megiddo (somewhere near Mount Carmel) on his march, and at Megiddo Josiah met his death at the hands of the Egyptian king. Of the circumstances of his death we have two accounts. According to 2 Kings (cited above), Josiah went to meet (Heb. not EV) Necoh, doubtless in order to come to some understanding with him, perhaps to do homage to him. Necoh, however, judging perhaps that Josiah was too strong a man to be a good vassal, had him slain at the audience ('when he saw him'). According to 2 Ch 35$^{20ff.}$ (=1 Es 1$^{25ff.}$), on the contrary, Josiah's fate is precisely that of Ahab. He fights against Necoh in spite of a Divine warning, and is mortally wounded by an archer. (An obscure passage in Herodotus, ii. 159, gives no help). The sequel, however, is clear: Judah became a vassal to Egypt, and Necoh appointed the infamous Jehoiakim (2 K 23^{34}, Jer 22$^{13ff.}$) to be king.

Egypt's triumph was short. Nebuchadrezzar, the son of Nabopolassar, swept Necoh out of Syria, and made Judah transfer its allegiance to Babylon. Twice Judah proved faithless to its new lord. The first revolt was punished heavily enough. Jerusalem was taken, the golden vessels of the temple were made a spoil, and Jehoiakim's son and successor Jehoiachin was carried into captivity to Babylon with his officers, his mighty men, and all the skilled artificers—10,000 captives in all (cf. Jer 24$^{1-7}$). Nebuchadrezzar appointed as king in Judah Zedekiah (a son of Josiah), and bound him with an oath of fealty (cf. Ezk 17$^{12ff.}$). But Zedekiah was too unstable to keep an oath, and too weak to resist the temptation of an alliance with Egypt. After a disordered reign of eleven years, during which the princes ruled rather than the king (Jer 38$^{5. 25}$), the Babylonians took Jerusalem by blockade, blinded Zedekiah, slew his officers, burned the temple, broke down the city walls, and carried away a number of captives (Jer 52$^{28-30}$, Heb. not LXX B). A poor remnant of the people was left to prevent the land from relapsing into desert, and Gedaliah, son of Ahikam (the patron of Jeremiah), was appointed 'overseer' ('governor' would have been too grand a title) over them (Jer 40$^{5ff.}$).

This—the catastrophe of Jerusalem—took place c. 587 B.C., but it must be remembered that Judah had been falling ever since the days of Ahaz. In fact the Southern kingdom slowly bled to death from the moment when its isolation was broken down by the dying struggles of the Northern kingdom under Pekah (2 K 15^{29} 16^{5}, cf. Is 7$^{1ff.}$). In particular, Judah never recovered from the brutal devastation wrought by Sennacherib, when 46 fortified towns were taken and 200,150 persons led captive (KIB p. 94 f. ; cf. 2 K $18^{13.23}$). We cannot form any satisfactory estimate of the numbers carried off at various times by the Chaldæans, for the passage (Jer 52^{28-30}) which contains the most precise statements on this point is absent from LXX BℵA, and is in conflict with 2 K 24^{14}; but it seems probable that the Chaldæan ravages were less extensive than the Assyrian, because the population had dwindled, and prosperity had diminished in the meantime. (See, further, Kosters, ThT xxxi. (1897) 518 ff.).

10. The Exile and the Return.—The captivity of Judah, reckoned from the fall of Jehoiachin (B.C. 597), lasted 59 years, or from the fall of Zedekiah (B.C. 587), 49 years, reckoning B.C. 538 as the probable terminus ad quem. The 'seventy' years of Jer 25^{12} is a round number. Of the condition of the Jews in exile we have contradictory indications, from which we may conclude that the circumstances varied in different places and at different times. The first band of exiles were allowed to 'build houses and plant gardens' (Jer $29^{5f.}$), and to live in communities of their own (Ezr 8^{17}, Ezk 1^{1}) under their own elders (Ezk 8^{1} 14^{1} 20^{1}). Jehoiachin, after thirty-six years of captivity, received special marks of favour from Evil-Merodach (Amil-Marduk), the successor of Nebuchadrezzar (2 K $25^{27ff.}$). On the other hand, seditious prophets from time to time provoked the Chaldæans to cruel acts of repression (Jer $29^{21f.}$), and it is probable that some at least of the Jews were put to task-work, for the 'hard service' (Is $14^{3f.}$) wherein Israel was made to serve, looks like an allusion to Nebuchadrezzar's canal-works or temple-restoration, or to like undertakings of his successors, especially Nabuna'id (Nabonidus) (KIB iii. 2, p. 60 ff., p. 96 ff.). Yet that the lot of many Jewish families (after the first bitterness of expatriation was past) was at least tolerable in Babylonia, is clear from the fact that a considerable number of Jews (the vast majority, according to some critics) did not take part in the First Return under Sheshbazzar.

With regard to the Return a good deal has been written of late years (particularly since 1889) tending towards a reconstruction of the whole narrative. It will, however, be most convenient in this article to reproduce the account given in Ezra-Nehemiah, while pointing out from time to time how critics propose to correct and supplement it. In the first year, then, of Cyrus (Ezr 1^{1}), i.e. c. 538 B.C., the 'Persian' (see CYRUS, vol. i. p. 541 f.) king issued an edict for the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem, and invited the Jews to undertake the work. [We may compare with this the mutilated inscription in which Cyrus speaks of his restoration to the cities of Babylonia of gods which Nabonidus had carried off to Babylon (KIB iii. 2, p. 126 f.)]. The heads of Judah and Benjamin, together with the Levites, responded to the invitation, and Cyrus gave up the golden vessels of the temple, which had been carried away by Nebuchadrezzar, to Sheshbazzar (τῷ Σαβανασάρ LXX B, τῷ Σασαβασσάρῳ A, Ezr 1^{8}; Σαναμασσάρῳ, 1 Es 2^{11} LXX B, but Σαναβασσάρῳ, LXX A^{a}), 'prince (נָשִׂיא nāsī) of Judah,' who brought them back to Jerusalem, together with a band of returning exiles. This—the First Return—resulted, we learn indirectly, in the laying of the foundation of the temple (Ezr 5^{16}, but cf. $3^{9f.}$), but we do not know the number of those who accompanied Sheshbazzar, nor any other particulars. It is, however, negatively clear that the movement was not a success. In Babylonia the edict (in spite of the prophecies of Deutero-Isaiah) probably took the Jews by surprise, while in Judah (cf. Ezr $4^{4f.}$, a misplaced passage) there were 'many adversaries.' The time, as the Jews said even sixteen years later (Hag 1^{2}), was not yet come for so important an undertaking as the rebuilding of the temple. Some critics, indeed, smile altogether at the story of this 'First Return,' and reduce it to a conciliatory appointment by Cyrus of a prince of the house of David (Sanabassar) to be governor in Judæa (cf. Cheyne, Jewish Religious Life, pp. 5–7).

At the beginning of the reign of Darius Hystaspis (c. 522 B.C.), however, the Jewish exiles were prepared for a great movement, and there was, it seems, a Second Return under Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, a descendant of David, and Jeshua the son of Jozadak the priest (Ezr 2^{2}). The whole 'congregation' numbered 42,360, exclusive of servants and handmaids (ib. $2^{64f.}$). Of this great immigration, and of Zerubbabel and Jeshua who led it, much was expected, imprimis the rebuilding of the temple (Zec 6^{15}), but the realization of the hope was delayed. The people went up 'unto Jerusalem and Judah, every one to his own city' (Ezr 2^{1}), and, after the heads had relieved their consciences by making a money-offering for the work of rebuilding, all the exiles 'dwelt in their cities' (ib. $v.^{70}$), or, as Haggai complained, they ran 'every man to his own house,' and allowed God's House to lie waste (Hag 1^{9}). In the autumn (Ezr $3^{1ff.}$) they did indeed gather themselves as one man to Jerusalem for the erection of an altar of burnt-offering, 'but the foundation of the temple of the Lord was not yet laid' (ib. $v.^{6}$).

How did the work of the temple begin at last in earnest? We have two answers, one in a 'prophetical' passage of Ezra (4^{24} $5^{1f.}$), written in the Aramaic tongue, and another in a 'priestly' passage, written in Hebrew by the compiler of the same book (3^{8-13}). The former treats the foundation as already laid (cf. 5^{16}), and reckons the date by the year of Darius characteristically, for the prophet's eye always noted political changes; the second, on the contrary, describes in touching detail the laying of the foundation, and mentions as the date 'the second year of their coming to the House of God,' again characteristically, for the priest's eye was all for the holy place. The discrepancy between the two passages is one of words only—(1) as regards date, if the Return of Zerubbabel and Jeshua took place, as suggested above, at the beginning of the reign of Darius; and (2) as regards the nature of the work, if we assume that after sixteen years of malice, neglect, and weather, the foundations needed some attention, which might be popularly described as relaying.

Ezr 3^{8-13}, however, has a great omission, it says nothing of the activity of Haggai and Zechariah. Yet there can be no doubt that the voice of these two prophets was the deciding factor in the work; words such as Hag 1^{4} 2^{9}, Zec 4^{6-10} were not uttered in vain. In the second year of Darius, the second year of their return to Palestine, the exiles began to build, and in spite of an interruption by Tattenai, governor of Syria (Ezr $5^{3ff.}$), the house was finished in the 6th year of Darius (6^{15}).

This account is traversed and disputed by some modern critics. It is urged that Haggai and Zechariah never mention the Great Return of 42,000 persons, and consequently it is maintained that no considerable body of exiles (the Gōla) did return till the mission of Ezra, c. 432 B.C. (so Cheyne, Introd. to Is. p. xxxix). From this it follows that the temple which was completed c. 516 B.C. was built, not by the returned exiles, but by 'the people of the land,' the descendants of those left by Nebuzar-adan. But what if Haggai and Zechariah do not dwell upon the Return because they took part in it, and spoke to those who took part in it? What if they do speak, at least once (Zec 6^{15}), as the forerunners of a mighty host advancing from Babylon?

One subject remains to be noticed, viz. the attitude of the builders of the temple towards the Samaritans. According to Ezr $4^{2f.}$ (a passage due to the compiler of the book) Zerubbabel and Jeshua peremptorily rejected the offer of the 'adversaries (צָרִים ẓārîm, 'rivals') of Judah and Benjamin' to co-operate in the rebuilding. Cheyne, on the contrary, characterizes the story of rejection as 'pure imagination,' and asserts that the Samaritans maintained their connexion with the holy place 'till Nehemiah, armed with a Persian firman, interposed' (JRL p. 26).

After the completion of the temple a break of nearly sixty years occurs in our records, and when they speak again the Davidic line which Zerubbabel had represented has disappeared. Some critics (e.g. Cheyne and Sellin) partly fill the gap with a reconstruction which represents Zerubbabel as the accepted Messiah of the Jews, a rebel against Persian authority, and a martyr whose martyrdom ruined all the political prospects of the house of David. Cheyne refers Zec 6^{11-13} (in a revised text) to the coronation and reign of Zerubbabel (JRL p. 14 f.), and Sellin thinks that he is meant by the Suffering Servant of Is 52^{13}–53^{12}. The ruin of the walls of Jerusalem, which Nehemiah deplored (Neh 1^{3}), may have been part of the vengeance taken by the Persians (or their deputies) on the Messianic kingdom of Zerubbabel.

The biblical records begin again in 'the seventh year of Artaxerxes' (Ezr 7^{8}), i.e., if Artaxerxes Longimanus be meant, in B.C. 458. In that year Ezra the scribe, a man of high-priestly family, went up to Jerusalem armed with a decree (given in Aramaic, ib. vv.$^{12-26}$) entrusting him with large powers, and ordering a large offering to be made in the king's name for the support of the worship of the temple. Strangely enough all that we know of the exercise of these powers is that Ezra called an assembly of the whole people in order to deal with the question of mixed marriages, that the people acknowledged the duty of putting away foreign wives, but pleaded for delay, and that a formidable list was drawn up (including the names of men of high-priestly family) of those who had taken foreign wives. Out of this list four persons (priests) actually 'gave their hands' to put away their foreign wives (Ezr 10^{6-44}).

In the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (Neh $2^{1.9}$), i.e. in B.C. 445, came the mission of Nehemiah. He, unlike Ezra, was a layman and an officer at the Persian Court, and, unlike Ezra (Ezr 8^{22}), enjoyed the prestige of arriving with an escort of Persian officers and horsemen (Neh 2^{9}). In spirit, however, Ezra and Nehemiah were one. Both aimed at reforming the religion of their people on lines stricter than any which had hitherto been laid down. To Ezra (or to the school of which he is the most conspicuous member) is probably due that rewriting with increased stringency and particularity of the earlier codes of the Hexateuch, which resulted in the formation of that which is commonly called the Priestly Code. The object which Ezra and his adherents set before themselves was the holiness of Israel (i.e. its separation from other peoples, and its greater strictness in the service of God).

Nehemiah worked on practical lines. He first made the separation of Israel possible by rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem 'in fifty and two days' (Neh 6^{15}). He next removed the causes of disaffection among the poorer Jews by compelling the richer sort to restore lands and houses taken in pledge, and to forbear the exaction of usury (ib. 5^{1-13}). Ezra's edition of the book of the Law was recited and explained before an assembly of the whole people (ib. 8^{1-8}). At a great Day of Humiliation the people, headed by Nehemiah, vowed to separate themselves from the 'people of the land,' and to forbear from mixed marriages and from buying and selling on the Sabbath; they also undertook to observe the seventh year as a year of release, and to pay a third part of a shekel* for the maintenance of the sanctuary and its services (Neh $9^{1ff.}$ $10^{1ff.}$). Lastly, Nehemiah took measures for increasing the population of Jerusalem (Neh $11^{1ff.}$).

Nehemiah's second mission to Jerusalem, 'in the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes' (ib. 13^{6}), i.e. c. 433 B.C., apparently lasted only a short time. He found some of the old abuses still existing, and acted with his accustomed vigour against them. Some critics believe that Ezra's caravan of exiles (Ezr $8^{1ff.}$) returned not in B.C. 458 (see above), but in connexion with this second mission of Nehemiah.

Of the fortunes of the Jews in the later days of the Persian empire we know next to nothing for certain, but it is probable that they took part in the rising against Artaxerxes III. 'Ochus' (B.C. 361–338), and were punished for it by a partial captivity to Hyrcania. The miseries of the times of Ochus are, it is sometimes supposed, alluded to in Is 24–27 and in several of the Psalms. On the other side, Wellhausen (IJG^{3} p. 160) believes that the Jews increased greatly in numbers under Persian rule, and that they assimilated to themselves a large element from 'the people of the land' whom Ezra and Nehemiah had tried to exclude.

11. The Greek Period.—The victory of Alexander the Great over Darius at Issus (B.C. 333) put an end to Persian rule in Syria. Greek influence was now brought to bear upon Palestine from two great centres, viz. Alexandria and Antioch. Moreover, the Jewish people was forced by the stress of outward events to leaven itself with foreign thoughts and foreign customs. A great dispersion took place. When at the beginning of the 3rd cent. B.C. Syria was under the rule of Egypt, Ptolemy the son of Lagus transported thousands of Jews to Egypt, to serve as colonists and as a support to his dynasty. Moreover, the Jews had learned to trade, and the openings for world-wide traffic which Alexander's conquests had made for the Greeks, attracted the Jews also. Yet the Jews who spread themselves abroad, left their hearts at home; from time to time they returned on visits to Jerusalem, themselves Hellenized, and exerting a subtle Hellenizing influence in the Holy City itself.

More than a hundred years, however, elapsed after Alexander's conquests before Greek influence drew the inhabitants of Judæa into serious political trouble. For a long time the small province, though hemmed in by Greek cities, Gaza, Joppa, Straton's Tower (i.e. Cæsarea), and Samaria, held out against Hellenization. But at last, at the beginning of the reign of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (B.C. 175–164), the Greek party in Jerusalem, to which most of the ruling class belonged, felt themselves strong enough to take a decided step. A certain Jason got himself appointed high priest by Antiochus for a sum of money, with permission to set up a gymnasium in Jerusalem, and to enrol its inhabitants as citizens of Antioch, i.e. to confer on them the title and privileges of these citizens. A certain Menelaus in turn intrigued against Jason, and succeeded in supplanting him as high priest. The disorders consequent upon Greek innovations and scandals in the high-priesthood led to the direct interference of Antiochus, who in B.C. 168 had undertaken an expedition against Egypt. Foiled in this expedition by the veto of the Romans, Antiochus wrathfully determined to reduce the affairs of Judæa to order. The external means used were a massacre, an enslavement, and a Syrian occupation of the citadel (ἡ ἄκρα) of Jerusalem. On these followed an attempted conversion by force of the Jewish people to heathenism. The observance of the Sabbath and of circumcision was forbidden, copies of the Law were burnt, an altar was erected to Zeus in Jerusalem, and the Jews were compelled under penalty to participate in heathen sacrifices and to eat swine's flesh (1 Mac $2^{15ff.}$, 2 Mac $6^{18ff.}$). A large party among the Jews were willing to fall in (at least outwardly) with the king's plans, a large party again (the חֲסִידִים ḥăsîdîm, Gr. Ἀσιδαῖοι) preferred to offer only passive resistance (1 Mac 2^{29-38} 7^{10-17}), but there was fortunately a third party—perhaps not large in numbers at first—led by a priestly family afterwards called 'Maccabees.' Judas 'the Maccabee' was a hero of the stamp of David. Personally brave, he was also no contemptible leader, and though he died early, he had first taught the Jewish forces to face their enemies in battle with success.

* Probably equivalent to the half-shekel of Ex 30^{13} (cf. Ryle, Ezra-Neh. p. 274 note).

The campaigns of Judas fall into three divisions. (1) Defensive, against the Syrians. By victories at Beth-horon and at Beth-zur he repulsed the enemy advancing from the West and from the South, and was not overcome until, in B.C. 162, Lysias, accompanied by the young king Antiochus V., led an army of 120,000 men and thirty-two elephants (1 Mac 6^{30}) into Judæa. (2) Offensive-defensive in Gilead and (with his brother Simon in immediate command) in Galilee. From both these districts the Jewish 'garrisons,' with their wives and children, were withdrawn and brought into Judæa. (3) Offensive, against the Edomites and Philistines, to enlarge the borders of his tiny state.

Against the immense resources of the Syrian kingdom the courage and skilful generalship of Judas would perhaps have failed had they not been seconded by the rivalries of various claimants to the Syrian throne. In the hour of victory (B.C. 162) Lysias was forced to grant to the Jews that religious freedom, the denial of which had occasioned the five years' war. In spite of further conflicts, in the course of which Judas fell, the cause of Jewish autonomy never went back, and at last, in B.C. 153, Jonathan the brother of Judas was able to put on the sacred vestments as high priest of the Jews, acknowledged by Alexander Balas, king of Syria (1 Mac $10^{15ff. 59ff.}$). In B.C. 142 Simon, the brother and successor of Jonathan, forced the Syrian garrison to evacuate the citadel of Jerusalem, and in the following year the whole nation of the Jews acknowledged the great services of the Maccabæan family by declaring Simon to be 'high priest, captain, and governor' for ever (1 Mac 14^{27-47}). W. EMERY BARNES.

ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.—The tribes that had settled in the south of Pal. were from the first cut off from the northern tribes by a line of Canaanitish cities, Har-heres, Gezer, Aijalon, and Shaalbim (Jg $1^{29.35}$); and during the period of the judges, while there was a growing tendency among the northern tribes to coalesce under pressure of invasion, the southern tribes remained distinct. Saul never seems to have gained a paramount influence over these mountaineers of the S., who in large numbers espoused the cause of David. Though the latter, by choosing as his capital Jerus., which lay on the border-land between Benjamin and Judah, and other acts of diplomacy, succeeded in uniting for a time the northern and southern tribes, the union seems never to have been very complete, and once at least the jealousy between them nearly broke out into civil war (2 S 19^{41}–20^{2}). Solomon's policy was specially calculated to exasperate the northern tribes. While they were heavily taxed, and had forced labour imposed upon them, his own tribe seems to have been entirely exempt (1 K 4^{7-19} 5^{13-18}). The rebellion led by Jeroboam, which was suppressed by Solomon, broke out in more formidable proportions under Rehoboam, who continued with even greater severity the oppressive policy of his father.

The separation, encouraged by the prophet Ahijah, who objected to Solomon's idolatrous practices (1 K 11^{29-39}), took place without serious opposition, and Jeroboam became the first king of Israel (12^{20}). His aim was to counteract the centralizing effect of the great temple at Jerus. by setting up a more popular ritual at two of the many already existing local shrines, Bethel and Dan (12^{29}), where from this time J″ was worshipped under the symbol of a golden calf, probably as the God of agriculture. This cult may be regarded as a reaction from that more spiritual mode of worship which, under prophetic influence, had been established at Jerusalem. The view of the editor of the Book of Kings, that Jeroboam's act was a schismatic separation from the worship of the only legal sanctuary, is the reflexion of a post-Deut. age.

The hostility between North and South continued intermittently until the political and commercial alliance between Ahab and Jehoshaphat. While the invasions of Shishak (1 K 14^{25}) and Zerah (2 Ch 14^{9}) weakened the power of Judah, Israel was already being hampered by the growing power of the Syrians of Damascus (1 K 20^{34}). Ahab, whose father Omri was the founder of the dynasty, married Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians (1 K $16^{31\text{ff.}}$), and she introduced the worship of the Tyrian Baal and Ashtaroth, with its cruel and immoral rites. In this she was opposed with varying success by the prophets Elijah and Elisha (1 K 18 ff.), through whose influence the dynasty was eventually overthrown by Jehu, and the cult exterminated by him (2 K 9. 10).

During this period the Syrians of Damascus began to take a prominent part in the history of Israel. Were the scanty records of OT our only source of information, we should have supposed the relation between Israel and Syria to have been that of practically unbroken hostility, the treaty of Benhadad II. in 1 K 20^{34} appearing as merely a compact wrung from him in a moment of danger, and broken at the first opportunity ($22^{1.2}$). In fact, the prophetic historian had little interest in events which lay outside the horizon of Israel, and even within it he had little in those which did not directly serve his religious purpose. We find, for example, no explanation how it was that Ramoth-gilead, after the events of 1 K 22, passed into the hands of the Israelites, as we find it in 2 K 8^{28} 9^{1}. Again, from the variety of sources from which the history is drawn without the needful sifting and arrangement, there are some serious inconsistencies. It is difficult, for example, to reconcile 2 K 6^{23} with 6^{24}. From the Assyr. inscriptions, however, we learn that in 854 Israel was a member of a very important alliance of small kingdoms centring in Damascus, which was summoned to his assistance by Irkhulini, king of Hamath, against the Assyr. king, Shalmaneser II. (see BABYLONIA, vol. i. p. 184^{b}). Ahab is said to have furnished no fewer than 2000 (!) chariots and 10,000 footmen, Benhadad 1200 chariots and 10,000 footmen. Altogether 80,000 to 90,000 men were brought into the field. A great battle was fought at Ḳarḳar (Aroer). After a desperate encounter the Assyrians claim to have won the day, killing 14,000 (or according to another account 20,500), but Shalmaneser seems to have been too crippled to make any further advance. The alliance now appears to have broken up. At any rate, in the next two Assyr. campaigns against Benhadad, in 849 and 846, Ahab takes no part. Syria, from its position, was more exposed to attack than Israel, which was encouraged by this circumstance to attempt the recovery of Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22^{1}). During Benhadad's reign hostilities between the two kingdoms usually took the form of guerilla warfare, bands of the Syrians continually breaking into the country and carrying off spoil. Hazael, the murderer and successor of Benhadad II., proved a far more serious enemy. At first, however, he was kept in check by Assyria. In 842 Shalmaneser invaded Syria, defeated Hazael, who was now deserted by his allies, with the loss of 1600 men, but was not successful in his attempt to take Damascus. The other small states, and Jehu among them, did not venture to resist, but sent tribute to Shalmaneser. The account of this campaign is inscribed on what is known as the Black Obelisk in the British Museum (No. 98). One of the sculptures represents Jehu paying tribute to Shalmaneser, and underneath is the following inscription:—'The tribute of Yahuah (Jehu), son of Khumri (Omri!), silver, gold, bowls of gold, vessels of gold, goblets of gold, pitchers of gold, lead, sceptres for the king's hand, (and) staves I received' (see RP v. 41). But towards the end of Jehu's reign Hazael, left unmolested by Assyria, invaded the territory of the Transjordanic tribes with such effect as to reduce them to complete submission (2 K $10^{32.33}$). He afterwards invaded the South, taking Gath, and forcing even Jerus. to capitulate. In Israel itself, during the reign of Jehoahaz, the son and successor of Jehu, Hazael's successes were so great that the fighting men were reduced to the merest minimum (2 K 13^{7}). The tide of fortune began to turn in the reign of his son Jehoash, who is said to have recovered from Benhadad III. all the cities taken from his father by Hazael. He also defeated an expedition sent out by Amaziah, king of Judah, and proceeded to invest Jerus., where he broke down a large part of the wall and reduced it to submission (2 K 14^{13}). It was during his reign that Ramman-nirari, the warlike grandson of Shalmaneser II., defeated the feeble Mari'a, the successor of Benhadad III., and even took Damascus; but it is not certain whether the Israelites were affected by this campaign. The Syrians being thus temporarily crushed, and the Assyrians being at first too much engaged with Eastern affairs, and afterwards too much weakened by internal discords and the feebleness of their rulers to interfere, the kingdom of Isr. continued to gain strength, and reached the height of its power under Jeroboam II., who even 'recovered Damascus and Hamath' (2 K 14^{28}).

With Jeroboam's death the kingdom rapidly declined. Divided by political factions, enervated by its moral corruption and social selfishness (Hos 4^{11-14}, Am 2^{8} 4^{1} $8^{5.6}$ etc.), it easily fell a prey to the Assyrians, who gained an accession of strength under the warlike Tiglath-pileser III. (Pul, 2 K 15^{19}). With the exception of Pekah, none of the petty kings, who ruled for very short periods, have the least historical importance, except so far as by their folly or selfishness they advanced the ruin of their country. Twice Tiglath-pileser successfully invaded the North, and on both occasions probably Menahem paid tribute, thereby reducing his country to vassalage for the sake of securing his own rule, and in order to obtain money had to impose heavy taxes (2 K $15^{19\text{f.}}$). A spirited effort to resist Assyria was made by Pekah, who, like so many of the kings of Israel, gained his kingdom by the sword. In alliance with Rezin, king of Damascus, he invaded Judah (in 735), in order to depose Ahaz and set up the Syrian Tabeel, with a view to forming an alliance against Assyria (Is 7^{1-9}). But Ahaz had already submitted, and sent tribute, to Tiglath-pileser, and in the next year the latter invaded the North and utterly defeated Rezin and other Syrian members of the alliance, capturing and spoiling no fewer than 591 Syrian cities. At the same time the Israelitish cities east of Jordan fell into his hands (2 K 15^{29}), and the population was taken captive; some of the Western cities were also taken. Pekah himself was forced to take refuge in Samaria, while the rest of the country was reduced to a desert. The final effort to throw off the Assyr. yoke made by Hoshea, who adopted the fatal policy of allying himself with So (Shabaka), king of Egypt (2 K 17^{4}), brought about the invasion of Israel by Shalmaneser, and the final captivity of Israel (in 721).

The most striking feature in the history of the kingdom of Israel is its want of stability. There was no one central bond, either religious or political, to unite the people and infuse a national spirit. The seat of royalty was constantly being changed —Shechem, Tirzah, Samaria. Dynasty followed dynasty; one succeeding the other by violence. The longest, that of Jehu, lasted only five generations. The king generally held his life in his hands, and often had to maintain his authority by acts of terrorism and cruelty. There was no central religious shrine to inspire a common feeling of reverence. Religious worship, if not always absolutely revolting, as in the days of Ahab and Ahaziah, was to a large extent heathenish in its methods and conceptions (Hos 4^{13} 7^{14} Am 4^{5} 8^{14}), and in the declining days of the nation's history exercised no influence on its social life. At the same time the history has its elements of interest. While the Judæans, in their isolated position on the S. hills, were developing that marked national character which has distinguished them from other nations, the Isr. were constantly coming in contact with the Can. and other foreign tribes. From these they derived not merely the evils of a bad religious influence, but also many of the advantages of a higher civilization and culture. Humanly speaking there were greater possibilities in the N. than in the S. Until almost the last page of their history, from Elijah downwards, all the great prophets came from the North, or, like Amos, carried on their work there. If in the more refined worship of Solomon's temple was the germ of the stately ritual of post-exilic Judaism, we must confess that it was in the teaching of Northern prophets, such as Elijah and Hosea, that we can trace the main growth of those spiritual truths which became the precious heritage of the Jews, and through them of the Christian world.

LITERATURE.—Apart from the historical books of OT and the works of the prophets Amos and Hosea, the most important sources of information are the monumental remains, esp. those of Assyria. Collections of these are contained in RP, Schrader, COT. The history has been thoroughly treated in Ewald's HI (Tr. 1883-1885), and those of Wellhausen, Kittel, and Reuss. On archæological questions, Nowack's Heb. Arch. 1894, is by far the best. The 'Books of Kings' in the Speaker's Commentary, though from a critical point of view behind the time, still contains much useful information. A History of the Hebrew People by Professor Kent is an excellent book, and quite up to date. The second volume appeared after this article was written.

ISRAELITE (Jn 1^{47}).—See NATHANAEL.

ISSACHAR (יששכר, pointed by the Massoretes יִשָּׂשכָר:* Yissākār, the second ש being ignored, but the true pointing should probably be יֵשׁ שָׂכָר; LXX Swete Ἰσσαχάρ (but Tisch. Ἰσσάχαρ), and so NT, Treg. WH; Ἰσαχάρ TR).—1. The ninth son of Jacob and the fifth of Leah, Gn 30^{18} 35^{23} etc. The meaning of the name is uncertain. Probably it means 'there is a reward' (cf. Jer 31^{16}, 2 Ch 15^{7}); if Wellhausen's suggestion (Text der Büch. Sam. 95), that the name should be interpreted as אִישׁ שָׂכָר, is correct, it will probably mean 'hired labourer,' though it might also be translated 'man of reward,' whatever the precise sense of that might be. In favour of the view that it means 'hired labourer' is the character given to the tribe in the Blessing of Jacob (Gn $49^{14.15}$). Kuenen (ThT v. 292 f.) has inferred from this passage that it is to its subject condition that the tribe owes its name. Ball (SBOT Genesis, on Gn 30^{18}) thinks it may mean 'Sokar's man,' Sokar or Seker being an Egyptian god, but perhaps is a designation of the tribal totem, meaning 'The Red' and referring to the ass (cf. Gn 49^{14}). In Genesis a double explanation of the name is given. J accounts for it by the fact that Leah hired Jacob from Rachel with the mandrakes found by Reuben (Gn 30^{16}). E interprets it as a reward conferred by God on Leah, because she had given Zilpah to Jacob (v.^{18}).

Our knowledge of the tribe is very meagre. Its territory in Palestine is of uncertain extent, for the delimitation of its boundaries in Jos 19^{17-23} is from P (cf. Dillm. ad loc., and Moore on Jg 5^{15}). It lay S. of Zebulun and Naphtali, and N. of Manasseh. On the E. it was bounded by the Jordan. Whether it ever reached the sea is uncertain (see Dt $33^{18.19}$). Probably it remained an inland tribe. Its lot included nominally the very fertile plain of Esdraelon, but this was for the most part in the possession of the Canaanites. Robinson says: 'We were greatly struck with the richness and productiveness of the splendid plains, especially of Lower Galilee, including that of Esdraelon. . . . Zebulun and Issachar had the cream of Palestine' (BRP^{2} iii. 160). Since the tribe is not mentioned in Jg 1, we do not know anything of the circumstances of its settlement in Palestine. Apparently both Deborah and Barak belonged to it, and in Deborah's Song (Jg 5^{15}) it is mentioned as having taken part in the battle against Sisera. One of the judges, Tola, is said to have belonged to it (Jg $10^{1.2}$, on the text of which see Moore's note). Baasha, who conspired against, slew, and succeeded Nadab the son of Jeroboam I., also sprang from this tribe (1 K 15^{27}). In the Blessing of Jacob (Gn $49^{14.15}$) the tribe is taunted with its indolent preference of undisturbed enjoyment of its fruitful land to independence. The reference would be to a later period than the conflict with Sisera, in which it had taken a distinguished part. No reproach is uttered in the Blessing of Moses (Dt $33^{18.19}$). The latter passage is obscure (see Driver's note), but it apparently refers to the possession by Zebulun and Issachar of sanctuaries to which non-Israelites ('the peoples') resorted, and to material advantages which these tribes thus secured. 'The peoples' (v.^{19}) would probably be Phœnicians, on account of the reference to 'the abundance of the seas.'

According to P the numbers of this tribe at the first census amounted to 54,400 (Nu 1^{29}), at the second to 64,300 (26^{25}); while the Chronicler gives the number in the time of David as 145,600. Unfortunately we can attach no weight to any of these figures.

2. Mentioned in the Chronicler's list of Korahite doorkeepers as the seventh son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26^{5}).

A. S. PEAKE.

ISSHIAH (יִשִּׁיָּה).—1. One of the heads of the tribe of Issachar, 1 Ch 7^{3} (AV Ishiah). 2. A Korahite who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12^{6} (AV Jesiah). 3. The son of Uzziel, 1 Ch 23^{20} (AV Jesiah), 24^{25}. 4. A Levite, 1 Ch 24^{21}. See GENEALOGY.

ISSHIJAH (יִשִּׁיָּה).—One of those who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{31} (AV Ishijah), called in 1 Es 9^{32} Aseas.

ISSUE.—See MEDICINE.

ISTALCURUS (A Ἰστάλκουρος, B Ἰστάκαλκος) 1 Es 8^{40}.—'Uthi the son of Istalcurus' here stands for 'Uthai and Zabbud' in Ezr 8^{14} (A καὶ Ζαβούδ, B om.). The name is apparently a corruption of the form in the Ḳĕrê וְזַכּוּר ('and Zaccur'). See ZABBUD.

* Ben-Naphtali (Baer, Gen. p. 84) points יִשְׂשכָר.

ITALY (’Ιταλία), the geog. term for the country containing the headquarters of the Rom. empire, was originally applied only to the S. part of the peninsula round the Gulf of Tarentum. It was afterwards extended to include all the country to the foot of the Alps. Jews first attained prominence in Italy after the triumph of Pompey, B.C. 62, and, under the protection of Julius Cæsar, they rapidly increased in numbers. They seem to have characteristically appropriated a quarter of the capital, and spread to other cities. Horace (Sat. I. ix. 69, ‘vin’ tu curtis Judæis oppedere’) and Juvenal (Sat. iii. 296 and xiv. 96, ‘Judaicum ediscunt jus’) speak of them as a constant element in the population. In A.D. 50 an imperial edict of Claudius banished the Jews from Rome, possibly owing to riots between the latter and the Christians (Suet. Claud. xxv.) as to the claims of Christ to be the Messiah. Aquila and Priscilla are mentioned among the exiles (Ac 18^{2}) from I., which is apparently used as almost synonymous with Rome. See, further, Schürer, HJP II. ii. 232 ff., and the Literature cited there.

Cornelius, the first Gentile convert to Christianity, is described as a member of the Italian band or cohort (Ac 10^{1}), i.e. the regiment recruited in I., and consisting of native Italians, as distinguished from troops levied in the provinces. See AUGUSTUS’ BAND.

I. is again mentioned as the destination of St. Paul (Ac 27^{1}) when he appealed to Cæsar. The ship on which the prisoners were embarked was on its way back to Adramyttium in Mysia, and would call at several ports on the coast of Asia, at one of which the centurion intended to transfer his charges to a vessel bound for Rome. This shows the existence of a considerable trade between that city and the Mediter. ports. The expression in He 13^{24} ‘they of I. (οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς ’Ιταλίας) salute you,’ is of too uncertain meaning to decide anything as to either the destination or the place of composition of this Epistle.

Christianity was introduced into I. in early times, probably on the return of the Roman Jews who are called ‘strangers from Rome’ (Ac 2^{10}) to their native country after the Feast of Pentecost. The Ep. to the Romans, written about A.D. 58, points to the existence of a numerous body of Christians in that city who were partly Jews and partly Gentiles (Ro 1^{13}). C. H. PRICHARD.

ITERATE.—Sir 41^{23} ‘Of iterating and speaking again, that which thou hast heard’ (ἀπὸ δευτερώσεως, RV ‘Of repeating’). Cf. Knox, Works, iii. 56, ‘I knaw ye will say, it [the Mass] is none uther sacrifice, but the self same, save that it is iteratit and renewit’; Boyle, Works, iv. 552, ‘Having wiped and cleansed away the spot, I iterated the experiment.’ The mod. ‘reiterate’ is scarcely equivalent. J. HASTINGS.

ITHAI (אִתַּי).—A Benjamite, one of David’s heroes, 1 Ch 11^{31}. In the parallel passage 2 S 23^{29}, the name is אִתַּי ITTAI (wh. see).

ITHAMAR (אִיתָמָר ‘island of palms’ (?)[*]) is known to us only from P and the Chronicler. According to these writers I. was the youngest son of Aaron by Elisheba (Ex 6^{23}, Nu 3^{2} 26^{60}, 1 Ch 6^{3} 24^{1}). Together with his three brothers, and Aaron their father, he was consecrated to the priesthood (Ex 28^{1}), but the two elder brothers Nadab and Abihu were slain for offering strange fire (Lv 10; cf. Nu 3^{4} 26^{61}, 1 Ch 24^{2}).

During the wilderness wanderings the tabernacle and its equipment, together with the Gershonites and Merarites, were under the supreme direction of Ithamar (Ex 38^{21}, Nu 4$^{28. 33}$, 7^{8}). In the reign of David the families of Eleazar and I. are said to have been divided into courses in the proportion of two to one (cf. 1 Ch 24$^{3. 4}$). The compiler of the books of Chronicles represents the high priesthood as descending in unbroken succession until the captivity in the family of Eleazar (1 Ch 6$^{3-14}$). But in the earlier historical books we find the ark under the charge of Eli and his descendants, and a comparison of 1 Ch 24^{3}, 1 S 22^{9}, 14^{3} would suggest that Eli belonged to the house of I. Josephus expressly states that this was the case (Ant. VIII. i. 3). See High Priest under PRIESTS AND LEVITES. W. C. ALLEN.

ITHIEL (אִיתִיאֵל, prob. ‘with me is God’).—1. A Benjamite (Neh 11^{7}). See GENEALOGY. 2. One of two persons to whom Agur addressed his oracular sayings, the other being Ucal (Pr 30^{1}). Neither LXX nor Vulg. recognizes a proper name here, and most modern commentators point differently, לָאִיתִי אֵל לָאִיתִי אֵל וָאֵכֶל instead of לְאִיתִיאֵל לְאִיתִיאֵל וְאֻכָל, and tr. ‘I have wearied myself, O God, I have wearied myself, O God, and am consumed.’ So RVm. H. A. WHITE.

ITHLAH (יִתְלָה, B Σειλαθά, A ’Ιεθλά, AV Jethlah).—A town of Dan, near Aijalon, Jos 19^{42}. The site is unknown.

ITHMAH (יִתְמָה).—A Moabite, one of David’s heroes, 1 Ch 11^{46}.

ITHNAN (יִתְנָן).—A city in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15^{23}) whose site is uncertain. It is preceded by Hazor and followed by Ziph. In the B text of the LXX it is combined with the former of these names, ’Ασοριωνάιν, and in A with the latter ’Ιθναζίφ, although Luc. has ’Ιθνάν, Ζείφ.

ITHRA (יִתְרָא ‘abundance’ (?), ’Ιοθόρ). — The father of Amasa, and husband of Abigail, David’s sister. He is described as an Israelite (2 S 17^{25}), but the Chronicler undoubtedly has the better reading, ‘Jether the Ishmaelite’ (1 Ch 2^{17} יֶתֶר הַיִּשְׁמְעֵאלִי; B ’Ιοθόρ, A ’Ιεθέρ), which is also given by A at 2 S 17. See JETHER.

ITHRAN (יִתְרָן).—1. Eponym of a Horite clan, Gn 36^{26}, 1 Ch 1^{41}. 2. An Asherite chief, 1 Ch 7^{37}, possibly identical with Jether of the following verse. See GENEALOGY.

ITHREAM (יִתְרְעָם 2 S 3^{5}; B ’Ιεθεραάμ, A Ἐλεθεραάμ; 1 Ch 3^{3} ’Ιθαράμ, A ’Ιεθράμ, Jethraam), the sixth son of David by EGLAH (wh. see), born to him at Hebron.

ITHRITE, THE (הַיִּתְרִי; B ὁ Αἰθειραῖος, ὁ ’Εθθεναῖος, ὁ ’Ηθηρεί [ℵ ὁ ’Ιθηρεί], ’Ιοθηρεί; A ’Εθραῖος, Τεθρίτης, ’Ιεθερί), a gentilic adjective applied to the descendants of a family of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2^{53}), amongst whom were two of David’s guard (2 S 23^{38}, 1 Ch 11^{40} IRA and GAREB). Possibly, however, the text of 2 S 23 and 1 Ch 11 should be pointed הַיַּתִּרִי = ‘the Jattirite’ (so Thenius, Klostermann, Budde), i.e. an inhabitant of Jattir (mentioned in 1 S 30^{27} as one of David’s haunts) in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15^{48} 21^{14}). The Peshiṭta (2 S 23^{38a}, 1 Ch 11$^{40\,bis}$) reads ܕܝܬܝܪ (=of Jattir), cf. its rendering 2 S 20^{26}. J. F. STENNING.

ITS.—‘Its’ does not occur in AV of 1611. But in Lv 25^{5} ‘it’ was used where we should now use ‘its’ (‘That which groweth of it owne accord of thy harvest, thou shalt not reape’), and in 1660 this was changed into ‘its,’ and is so printed in all modern editions. That is the only place in which even in modern edd. the word is found.

[*] See Hommel, Anc. Heb. Trad. 116; Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 246 n.

There is no doubt that about 1611 'its' had begun to struggle for recognition. But it is not once used by Spenser; and although it is found nine times in Shakespeare's First Folio (five of these in Winter's Tale), it is suspected that they were all introduced after his death. Bacon has it very rarely; Milton three times in his poetry (PL i. 254, iv. 813; Ode on Nativity, 106) and twice in his prose. By the time of Milton's death the word was established in the language.

The third pers. pron. in Anglo-Saxon was—

	Mas.	Fem.	Neut.
Nom.	he	heo	hit
Gen.	his	hire	his

The mas. forms are still in use; the fem. were both changed early; the nom. of the neut. lost its h, but retained his as the regular form for the gen. (i.e. possessive) up to the time we have spoken of. Consequently in AV his is the usual poss. case of 'it' as well as of 'he.' Thus Gn 3^{15} 'it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel' (Tind. 'And that seed shall tread the on the heed, and thou shalt tread hit on the hele'); Lv 23^{37} 'everything upon his day'; Nu 20^{8} 'speak ye unto the rock, and it shall give forth his water'; Pr 23^{31} 'Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself (1611 it selfe) aright'; 2 Es 4^{19} 'the sea also hath his place to bear his floods'; Wis 19^{20} 'The fire had power in the water, forgetting his own virtue; and the water forgat his own quenching nature.'

But when the poss. of both genders was the same there was always the risk of some confusion. Examples that need attention are, Lv 1^{15} 'And the priest shall bring it unto the altar, and wring off his (RV 'its') head, and burn it on the altar'; 1 S 6^{9} 'if it goeth up by the way of his own coast to Bethshemesh' (RV 'its own border'); 2 S 6^{17} 'And they brought in the ark of the LORD, and set it in his place' (RV 'its'); Dn 7^{9} 'I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his (mas.) throne was like the fiery flame, and his (neut.) wheels (RV 'the wheels thereof') as burning fire'); Mt 6^{33} 'But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness' (i.e. 'God's righteousness; but Tind. has 'the kyngdome of heven and the rightwisnes therof,' and he is followed by Cov., Cran., and Gen.; Rhem. 'the justice of him'; Bish. as AV, which is practically the tr^{n} of Wyc. 'seke ye first the kyngdom of god and his rightfulnesse'; RV 'But seek ye first his kingdom, and his righteousness,' omitting τοῦ θεοῦ with edd.); 1 Co 15^{38} 'But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body' (RV 'a body of its own').

Various methods were adopted to avoid confusion between 'his' mas. and neut. (1) The use of 'it' for the poss. is regarded as a dialectic peculiarity, belonging to the North-Western counties. Its single occurrence in AV (Lv 25^{5}) comes from the Geneva version.* Its presence in Shaks. is sometimes due to imitation of the language of childhood; thus King John II. i. 160—

> 'Go to it grandam, child:
> Give grandam kingdom, and it grandam will > Give it a plum, a cherry, and a fig.'

But this is not always the case; and examples may be quoted from other authors, as Judgement of Synode of Dort (1619), p. 9, 'Election . . . is to bee propounded with the spirit of discretion, religiously, and holily, in it place and time.' Indeed the often occurring 'it self' in AV 1611, is an example just as good as 'it own': cf. Bp. Hall, Works, ii. 79 ('Contemplations,' bk. iii.), 'Why may wee not distinguish of fire, as it is it selfe, a bodily creature, and as it is an instrument of God's justice, so working, not by any materiall vertue, or power of it owne, but by a certain height of supernaturall efficacie, to which it is exalted by the omnipotence of that supreme and righteous Judge?' (2) Occasionally the was used for 'his,' as in Robynson's tr^{n} of More's Utopia (Lumby's ed. p. 101), 'They marveile also that golde, whych of the owne nature is a thing so unprofytable, is nowe amonge all people in so hyghe estimation.' (3) Sometimes the noun was personified and the fem. her then used. This is Milton's favourite device, as in Hymn on Nativity, 140—

> 'And Hell it self will pass away,
> And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day.'

Cf. Tindale's tr^{n} of Nu 4$^{9.10}$ 'And they shall take a cloth of Iacyncte and cover the candelsticke of light and hir lampes and hir snoffers and fyre pannes and all hir oyle vessels which they occupye aboute it, and shall put apon her and on all hir instrumentes, a coverynge of taxus skynnes, and put it apon staves.' So in AV, Jon 1^{15} 'the sea ceased from her raging'; Rev 22^{2} 'the tree of life, which . . . yielded her fruit every month.' (4) Occasionally 'of it' was adopted, as Dn 7^{5} 'it had three ribs in the mouth of it, between the teeth of it.' (5) Very often the phrase was slightly turned, and 'thereof' used, as by Fuller, Pisgah Sight, p. 40, 'Twice was it [Solomon's Temple] pillaged by foreign foes, and four times by her own friends before the final destruction thereof.' But 'the most curious thing of all in the history of the word "its" is the extent to which, before its recognition as a word admissible in serious composition, even the occasion for its employment was avoided or eluded. This is very remarkable in Shakespeare. The very conception which we express by "its" probably does not occur once in his works for ten times that it is to be found in any modern writer. So that we may say the invention, or adoption, of this form has changed not only our English style, but even our manner of thinking.'—Craik, Eng. of Shaks. p. 103.

J. HASTINGS.

ITTAI (אִתַּי, perh. 'companionable').—1. A native of Gath, whence he was banished (?) (2 S 15^{19}) with 600 followers, who with their families (v.^{22}) joined David not long (v.^{20}) before the revolt of Absalom. ('After him,' etc., in v.^{18} refers to Ittai, whose name has probably dropped out. So Wellhausen in Driver, Heb. Text of Sam. ad loc.). Ewald, following Jos. (Ant. VII. ix. 2), identifies this band with the 600 whom David commanded when an outlaw (1 S 23^{13} 25^{13} 27^{2} 30^{9}), and these, again, with the gibborim (mighty men), reading, after Thenius, in v.^{18} gibborim for Gittim. The LXX and Vulg. are cited as supporting this emendation; but the LXX here is at once conflated and defective. The genuine LXX (acc. to Wellhausen) and the Vulg. interpolation are merely explanatory of 'Cherethites—Gittites.' The gibborim of 2 S 16^{6} included the Cherethites, etc.; see also 2 S 23^{8}. David's original followers were Hebrews (1 S 22^{2}), but Ittai's 600 were Philistines (2 S 15^{18} 'from Gath,' ^{20} 'thy brethren'); on the other hand they were different from the Cherethites, etc., whose captain was Benaiah. It may be added that the phrase 'the Gittith' (titles of Ps 8. 81. 84) is rendered by Hitzig and Delitzsch 'a march of the Gittite guard.'

---

* The LXX is τὰ αὐτόματα ἀναβαίνοντα. In Ac 12^{10} the same Gr. word (ἥτις αὐτομάτη ἠνοίχθη [edd. ἠνοίγη] αὐτοῖς) is tr^{d} in AV 'the iron gate . . . which opened to them of his own accord.' In Luther's Bible Lv 25^{5} is von ihm selber; Ac 12^{10} von ihr selbst. The Gen. NT has in Ac 12^{10} 'which opened to them by it owne accorde.'

The scene in which we first meet Ittai (2 S 15^{19-22}) almost surpasses the parting of Naomi and her daughters-in-law as a portrayal of noble unselfishness, and of intense personal devotion. David, never so kingly as when in affliction, urges Ittai, as a stranger (נָכְרִי), to retire from a desperate cause, bids him either engage in the service of the new king, or return home to Gath, and dismisses him with a gracious benediction. Ittai in reply, swearing by the God of Israel, affirms an undying loyalty. In the battle with Absalom, Ittai was one of David's three generals (2 S $18^{2.5.12}$). It is possible that he fell in the engagement, as we hear of him no more. Jerome (Qu. Heb. on 1 Ch 20^2) cites a tradition that it was not David but Ittai that took the crown off the head of the Ammonite idol Milcom, it being forbidden to a Hebrew to take, with his own hands, gold or silver from an idol. 2. 2 S 23^{29} (1 Ch 11^{31} Ithai אִתַּי) one of David's heroes. N. J. D. White.

ITURÆA is the EV translation of the first term in St. Luke's description of Philip's tetrarchy (τῆς Ἰτουραίας καὶ Τραχωνίτιδος χώρας, Lk 3^1, AV 'Ituræa and the region of Trachonitis'). But Ramsay has shown (Expositor, 1894, ix. pp. 51 ff., 143 ff., 288 ff.) that the word is not used as a noun by any writer before Eusebius in the 4th cent. after Christ, and doubtfully even by him (so not even in Jos. Ant. XIII. xi. 3, where Niese reads Ἰτουραίους; nor in Appian, Civ. v. 7: read τὴν Ἰτουραίων). Strabo calls it τὴν Ἰτουραίων ὀρεινήν (XVI. ii. 16), and τὰ Ἀράβων μέρη καὶ τῶν Ἰτουραίων (XVI. ii. 20), and Dio Cassius, τὴν τῶν Ἰτουραίων τῶν Ἀράβων (lix. 12). Epiphanius (adv. Hæres. xix. 1) uses the adjective ἀπὸ τῆς Ναβατικῆς χώρας καὶ Ἰτουραίας, and Ramsay (op. cit. 289 n. 2) argues for the adjectival meaning of Ἰτουραῖοι even in Euseb. (Onom. ed. Lag. 268, 298), and more doubtfully in Jerome's translation. Elsewhere, in Greek and Latin authors, it is the name of the people which is given, Ἰτουραῖοι, Ituræi, Ityrei, etc. 'There remains, then, no single passage in ancient literature to justify the noun which has been forced on Luke' (Ramsay, 289), which noun, further, would render the sentence 'degenerate Greek,' 'in utter disregard of the rules of Greek expression as observed by the older classical authors' (ib. 144).

The Ituræans were well known to the Romans as a race of hardy archers, and they frequently appear in the pages of Latin writers. They fought with Cæsar in the African war (Bell. Afric. 20), and formed a bodyguard for Mark Antony when he was triumvir, rattling with their arms through the forum to the indignation of Cicero (Philipp. ii. 19, 112, xiii. 18). Virgil sings them, 'Ituræos taxi torquentur in arcus' (Georg. ii. 448), and Lucan, 'Ituræis cursus fuit inde sagittis' (Pharsal. vii. 230), 'tunc et Ituræi Medique Arabesque soluto arcu turba minax' (ib. vii. 514). In A.D. 110 there was a 'cohors I Augusta Ituræorum sagittariorum' (CIL t. iii. 868). About A.D. 255 we have the statement 'habes sagittarios Ityræos trecentos' (Vopiscus, Vita Aureliani, c. 11), and in his Gazetteer of the geographical terms of the Latin poets, Vibius Sequester (c. A.D. 500) names them as 'Ithyrei, vel Itharei, Syrii usu sagittæ periti' (ed. Hesselii, 155).

The quotations given above from Strabo, Appian, and Lucan * call them or associate them with both Arabs and Syrians; and, as Schürer points out (HJP I. ii. App. I. 'History of Chalcis, Ituræa, and Abilene,' 326), the proper names of Ituræan soldiers, mentioned in Latin inscriptions, are Syrian (cf. Münter, de Rebus Ituræorum, 1824, 8–10, 40 ff.; CIL t. iii. n. 4371; C. I. Rhenan, ed. Brambach, 1233 f.). This agrees with the position assigned to them on and about the skirts of the Lebanons; and considering the incessant drift upon these parts of nomad Arabs from the neighbouring deserts, we ought probably to see in the Ituræans the descendants of Jetur (יְטוּר) mentioned in Gn 25^{15} and 1 Ch 1^{31} as among the sons of Ishmael, i.e. as Arabian desert tribes. Eupolemus (c. B.C. 150), quoted by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ix. 30), mentions Ituræans along with Ammonites, Moabites, Nabatæans, etc., as among the objects of David's campaigns E. of the Jordan.

Because of this semi-nomadic state and this gradual drift from the desert to the fertile parts of Syria, the exact territory of the Ituræans is difficult, if not impossible, to define. Josephus places the Ituræan kingdom in or upon the N. of Galilee in B.C. 105 (Ant. XIII. xi. 3), when Aristobulus having defeated them added a large part of their territory to Judæa. Upon an inscription of about A.D. 6 (Ephemeris Epigraphica, 1881, 537–542) Q. Æmilius Secundus relates that being sent by Quirinius 'adversus Ituræos in Libano monte castellum eorum cepi.' Dio Cassius (xlix. 32) calls Lysanias, who ruled Lebanon from Damascus to the sea with his capital at Chalcis, king of the Ituræans; and the same writer (lix. 12) and Tacitus (Ann. xii. 23) call Soemus, who was tetrarch in Lebanon (Jos. Vita, 11), their governor; while Strabo places them in Anti-Lebanon with their centre at Chalcis in the Beka'. This evidence appears to prove Schürer's conclusion, that Anti-Lebanon and the valley to the east was the centre of the Ituræans just before and at the beginning of the Christian era; and Ramsay's contention, that 'the true home of such a race is not the long-settled and well-governed land between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon,' conflicts not only with the data of classical writers, but with the constant proof of how rich lands in Syria were being overrun and occupied by nomadic tribes from the desert. It is probable, however, that the Ituræans extended their influence eastwards and south-eastwards from Anti-Lebanon. About B.C. 25 Zenodorus leased the domains of Lysanias, whom Dio Cassius (xlix. 32) calls king of the Ituræans, and Zenodorus' territory included Ulatha, Paneas, and the country round about. The question remains, whether the 'Ituræan region' extended so far as to include or overlap Trachonitis, the country around the Trachons, one of which is the modern Lejá. Ramsay maintains that, both according to St. Luke's statement and as a matter of fact, it did. But of the latter there is absolutely no evidence before Eusebius in the 4th cent., and in face of such silence his testimony about the east of the Jordan in the beginning of the 1st cent. cannot be allowed to prevail. In the absence of evidence, the following facts are all we have to go by. Names have been constantly in drift in that part of Syria, and as Philo extended over all Philip's tetrarchy the name of its eastern portion Trachonitis (Legat. ad Gaium, 41) it is possible that the adjective 'Ituræan' may likewise have been sometimes extended eastward so as to cover Trachonitis, especially as the Ituræans themselves were probably driven in that direction after the Romans took their Lebanon territory from them. At the same time, Strabo, writing after this was accomplished, still treats of Ituræa and Trachonitis as distinct. Whether, therefore, St. Luke meant by his phrase τῆς Ἰτουραίας καὶ Τραχωνίτιδος χώρας 'two distinct portions of Philip's tetrarchy or two equivalent or overlapping names for it; and whether on either of these interpretations of his words he was correct—are questions to which the geographical data of the 1st cent. supply us with no certain answer.'* Besides the literature quoted above, see the present writer's HGHL 544 ff., and Expositor, 1894, viii. 406, ix. 51 ff., 143 ff., 231 ff., 331 f.

IVORY (שֵׁן shên, ἐλεφάντινος).—The word shên signifies a tooth, and is freq. employed in its orig. sense in OT (Ex 21^{24}, Lv 24^{20} etc.). It is also freq. used in the sense of ivory, as being the elephant's tooth (AVm 1 K 10^{22} ; see שֶׁנְהַבִּים under Elephant). Once ivory is spoken of as 'horns of teeth,' קַרְנוֹת שֵׁן (Ezk 27^{15}). The word horns alludes to the shape of the tusk, but its construction with teeth shows that the Hebrews understood what ivory really was. The context always makes it clear when shên should be rendered ivory.

In Ps 45^{8} הֵיכְלֵי שֵׁן prob. refers to palaces or chambers in them, inlaid with ivory (cf. בָּתֵּי הַשֵּׁן Am 3^{15}, and בֵּית הַשֵּׁן 1 K 22^{39}). Chambers with elaborate panellings of ivory and ebony exist in Damascus and other cities of the East to-day. Tables, stands, screens, picture-frames, pipes, and many other articles, inlaid with ivory, mother-of-pearl, silver and gold, are found in the houses of well-to-do people in the East. Solomon imported large quantities of ivory (1 K 10^{22}). His throne was made of it (1 K 10^{18-20}). It was also used for making or inlaying couches (Am 6^{4}), and the benches of galleys (Ezk 27^{6}).

The Egyp. and Assyr. monuments allude to the trade in ivory, and porters bearing tusks are figured on them. Among the merchandise of Babylon (Rev 18^{12}) were vessels of ivory. It was probably brought to Pal. by the caravans ('travelling companies') of Dedanîm (Is 21^{13}), as well as the ships of Tarshish (1 K 10^{22}). The 'tower of ivory' (Ca 7^{4}) may have been a tower richly ornamented with this substance, or a figure to illustrate the whiteness of the bride's neck, as we say 'a snowy neck,' or 'an alabaster arm.'

IVVAH (עַוָּה ; LXX variants are numerous, see Swete).—According to 2 K 18^{34} (wanting in B of LXX), 19^{13} (=Is 37^{13} ; the name is wanting in both MT and LXX of Is 36^{19}) a city conquered by the Assyrians, named along with Sepharvaim and Hena. It is frequently identified with Avva (עַוָּא), whence, according to 2 K 17^{24}, Sargon (but see Winckler, Alttest. Untersuchungen, 100 ff.) brought colonists to Samaria. Regarding Avva no information is to be gathered from the inscriptions (Schrader, *KAT*² 281, 384 [*COT*² i. 273, ii. 8]). Hommel (Expos. Times, April, 1898, p. 330 f.) supports the view that Hena and Ivvah (or, as he prefers, Avvah) are not places at all, but the names of the two chief gods of the three Syrian cities, Hamath, Arpad, and Sepharvaim. (For the grounds of this conclusion and the various stages through which he holds the MT to have passed before reaching its present form in 2 K $17^{30f.}$, see the article just cited). Winckler (op. cit.), on the other hand, considers that the parallelism, not to speak of other reasons, requires in 2 K 18^{34} 19^{13} (=Is 37^{13}) one place name, which, judging from the variety of LXX readings, has been ill preserved, but may have been Avvah or Ivvah, and must have designated a city coming within the sphere of vision of the Jews—probably situated, like Sepharvaim, in Syria.

J. A. Selbie.

IVY (κίσσος, hedera).—This plant was sacred to Bacchus. The Jews were compelled, at the time of the feast of this god, to carry ivy in procession in his honour (2 Mac 6^{7}). The 'corruptible crown' (1 Co 9^{25}) of the Isthmian games was sometimes made of its leaves, at other times it was a garland of pine. The ivy, Hedera Helix, L., grows wild in Pal. and Syria, and climbs up the faces of the cliffs along the coast and to the middle zone of the mountain ranges.

IYE-ABARIM (עִיֵּי הָעֲבָרִים 'Iyim of the regions beyond,' distinguishing this place from the Iim of Jos 15^{29}).—The station following Oboth mentioned in Nu 21^{11} 33^{44} and described (21^{11}) as 'in the wilderness which is before Moab toward the sunrising,' and more briefly (33^{44}) as 'in the border of Moab.' Nothing is known as to its position beyond these indications. The versions, though affording no geographical information, are interesting in their renderings of the first word ; the LXX of 21^{11} has Χαλγλεί B, with a variant Ἀχελγαί in A, and (perhaps) F, and in $33^{44.\,45}$ Γαί. The Syriac takes the word as עַיִן 'fountain,' Targ. Onk. has מגות as its equivalent in 21^{11} and 33^{44}, and in 33^{45}. This word is used for a ford or passage in Targ. of 1 S 13^{23} 14^{4}, and in Targ. Jon. of Gn 32^{22}. See, further, Dillm. on Nu 21^{10}.

A. T. Chapman.

IYIM (עִיִּים 'heaps' or 'ruins').—1. Short form of Iye-abarim in Nu 33^{45}. See Iye-abarim for renderings of the VSS. 2. Jos 15^{29} (AV and RV incorrectly Iim), a town in Judah, one of the 'uttermost cities toward the border of Edom.' The LXX has Βακώκ B ; Αὐείμ A, reading עוים ; and Syr. reads עלין.

IYYAR (אִיָּר, Ἰάρ).—See Time.

IZHAR (יִצְהָר 'fresh oil' or 'shining').—Son of Kohath the son of Levi, Ex $6^{18.\,21}$, Nu 3^{19} 16^{1} P, 1 Ch $6^{2.\,18.\,38}$ $23^{12.\,18}$; patron. Izharites, Nu 3^{27}, 1 Ch 24^{22} $26^{23.\,29}$.

IZLIAH (יִזְלִיאָה, AV Jezliah).—A Benjamite, head of a 'father's house,' 1 Ch 8^{18}. See Genealogy.

IZRAHIAH (יִזְרַחְיָה 'J" will arise or shine').—A chief of the tribe of Issachar, 1 Ch 7^{3}. See Genealogy.

IZRAHITES (הַיִּזְרָח).—Gentilic name in 1 Ch 27^{8}, but should probably be read הַיִּזְרָחִי, which is possibly another form of הַזַּרְחִי Zerahites vv.$^{11.\,13}$. See Genealogy.

IZRI (יִצְרִי).—Chief of one of the Levitical choirs, 1 Ch 25^{11}, called in v.^{3} Zeri. See Genealogy.

IZZIAH (יִזִּיָּה 'J" will sprinkle'?) AV Jeziah.—One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10^{25}), called in 1 Es 9^{26} Ieddias. See Genealogy.

* The identification of the name Jetur or Ituræan with the modern Jedur (i.e. Gedur) to the S. of Damascus, is philologically impossible.

J

J.—The symbol used by critics for the Jahwistic document. See Hexateuch.

JAAKAN.—See Beeroth-Bene-Jaakan.

JAAKOBAH (יַעֲקֹבָה).—A Simeonite prince, 1 Ch 4^{36}. See Genealogy.

JAALA (יַעֲלָא Neh 7^{58}) or JAALAH (יַעֲלָה Ezr 2^{56}).—The name of a family of the 'sons of Solomon's servants' who returned to Palestine with Zerubbabel. In 1 Es 5^{33} Jeeli. See Genealogy.

JAAR (יַעַר).—Usually in OT a common noun, meaning forest or wooded height, e.g. Jos 17^{15}, Hos 2^{14}. Once only as proper name, RVm of Ps 132^{6} 'We found it in the field of Jaar.' Here, according to some of the best authorities, it is a poetical name for Kiriath-jearim, 'forest town,' cf. Ps 78^{12} 'field of Zoan.' The name of this place appears in several forms, see Jos 15$^{9.60}$, 2 S 6^{2}, and in 1 Ch 13^{5} an account is given of the bringing up of the ark from Kiriath-jearim, where it had lain for twenty years after its restoration by the Philistines. The rendering of this obscure verse,—conjectured to be a fragment of antique song,—which was first suggested by Kühnöl, and has been adopted by Delitzsch, Perowne, and most moderns, would make it run thus: 'We heard of it (the ark) as being at Ephrathah, we found it in the field of Jaar (i.e. Kiriath-jearim).' Baethgen, however, understands the word as an appellative, 'auf waldigem Gefilde' (cf. LXX ἐν ταῖς δασέσι τοῦ δρυμοῦ, and Jerome 'in regione saltus'; so RV (text) 'in the field of the wood'), referring 'it' to the oath of David quoted in vv.$^{3-5}$, reading 'published' (הוצאנוה) for 'found' (מצאנוה), and supposing the 'wooded field' to be a poetical designation of the country at large. Similarly Ew. (so Targ.), though he explains the 'field of the wood' of Lebanon as representing N. Palestine. However, the general drift of the reference to the ark can hardly be mistaken.

W. T. Davison.

JAARE-OREGIM (יַעְרֵי אֹרְגִים; BA Ἀριωργείμ, other MSS Ἀρωρί; saltus polymitarius), according to 2 S 21^{19}, a Beth-lehemite, the father of Elhanan, who slew Goliath the Gittite. It is, however, highly probable that the text is corrupt, the former part of the name being a mistake for Jair (יַעְרֵי for יָעִיר), while the latter half (אֹרְגִים oregim=weavers) has been accidentally repeated from the following line. This view, which is supported by the parallel passage 1 Ch 20^{5} (Ḳerê בֶּן יָעִיר=son of Jair; Kethibh בֶּן יָעוּר), has been adopted by Thenius, Wellh., Driver, and Budde. Klostermann, following the reading of Lucian (Ἐλλανὰν υἱὸς Ἰαδδεὶν υἱοῦ τοῦ Ἐλεμί), prefers to restore 'the son of Dodai the Beth-lehemite' (בֶּן דּוֹדַי בֵּית הַלַּחְמִי, cf. 2 S 23^{24}). The rendering of the Peshiṭta (ܒܪ ܡܠܦ ܐܘܦܙܐ) probably points to the same text as the Hebrew (omitting Jaare), though the Arabic, which is based upon it, takes the second word (ܡܠܦ=doctus) as a proper name (Malaph). Similarly the Targum of Jonathan hardly presupposes a different text, since its rendering 'and David the son of Jesse, the weaver of the veils of the house of the sanctuary, who was of Bethlehem, slew Goliath the Gittite' (וקטל דוד בר ישי מחי פרוכית בית מקדשא דמבית לחם ית גלית גיתאה), is an obvious attempt at harmonizing the present text with 1 S 17. Jerome seems to have read יַעַר=saltus, instead of יַעְרֵי (Jaare), and so far confirms the reading of 1 Ch 20^{5}. For a further discussion of the relation of 1 Ch 20^{5} to 1 S 17 and to 2 S 21^{19}, see Samuel (Books of), and Elhanan.

JAARESHIAH (יַעֲרֶשְׁיָה, perhaps = 'J″ fattens,' AV Jaresiah).—A Benjamite chief, 1 Ch 8^{27}.

JAASIEL (יַעֲשִׂיאֵל).—The 'ruler' of Benjamin, 1 Ch 27^{21}, prob. = 'J. the Mezobaite' (which see) of 11^{47}.

JAASU (יַעֲשׂוּ Ezr 10^{37} Kethibh) or JAASAI (יַעֲשַׂי Kerê, so RVm), AV Jaasau.—One of those who had married foreign wives in the time of Ezra. LXX, regardless of the meaning, rendered καὶ ἐποίησαν ('and they did'), i.e. וַיַּעֲשׂוּ for יַעֲשׂוּ.

JAAZANIAH (יַאֲזַנְיָהוּ 2 K 25^{23}, Ezk 8^{11}; יַאֲזַנְיָה Jer 35^{3}, Ezk 11^{1}, 'J″ hears.' See also Jezaniah. LXX 4 K 25^{23}, B Ὀζονίας, A. Luc. Ἰεζονίας, Ezk 8^{11} 11^{1}, Jer 42^{3} [Heb. 35^{3}], B Ἰεχονίας).—1. A Judæan, styled 'son of the Maacathite,' one of the military commanders who came to Mizpah to give in their allegiance to Gedaliah, the governor of Judah appointed by Nebuchadrezzar (2 K 25^{23}=Jer 40^{8} Jezaniah). After Ishmael, son of Nethaniah, had murdered Gedaliah, and carried captive the Judæans who were left at Mizpah, Jaazaniah, though not mentioned by name, appears to have joined with the other captains of the forces in giving battle to Ishmael and recovering the captives (Jer 41$^{11ff.}$). Probably also he was one of those who determined, against the advice of the prophet Jeremiah, to abandon the land of Judah, and to lead the remnant of the people down into Egypt (Jer 42).

2. A chieftain of the clan of the Rechabites, whose fidelity to the commands of his ancestor Jonadab was tested by the prophet Jeremiah as an example to the people of Judah (Jer 35^{3}).

3. Son of Shaphan, who appeared in Ezekiel's vision as ringleader of seventy of the elders of Israel in the practice of secret idolatry at Jerusalem (Ezk 8^{11}).

4. Son of Azzur, one of the princes of the people at Jerusalem, against whose counsels Ezekiel was commanded by J″ to prophesy (Ezk 11$^{1ff.}$).

C. F. Burney.

JAAZIAH (יַעֲזִיָּהוּ).—A son of Merari, 1 Ch 24$^{26.27}$. The text is hopelessly corrupt. (Cf. Berth. and Oettli, ad loc.; Kittel's proposed restoration of the text and note in Haupt's Sacred Books of OT; and Kautzsch's AT, ad loc.). See Genealogy.

JAAZIEL (יַעֲזִיאֵל).—A Levite skilled in the use of the psaltery, 1 Ch 15^{18}, called in v.^{20} Aziel. Kittel (see note, ad loc., in Haupt's SBOT) would correct the text in both instances to עֻזִּיאֵל Uzziel.

JABAL (יָבָל, LXX A Ἰωβέλ, E Ἰωβήδ, Luc. Ἰωβήλ).—Son of Lamech by Adah, and originator of the nomadic form of life, Gn 4^{20} (J). See König in Expos. Times, May, 1898, p. 347^{a}. The meaning of the name is quite uncertain; for conjectures see Dillm. ad loc. and Ball in SBOT.

JABBOK (יַבֹּק, Ἰαβόκ).—One of the principal rivers of E. Palestine, now called Wady Zerḳa from the bluish colour of its water. Its course may be indicated thus: take on a map a point 18 miles E. of the Jordan on the latitude of Nâblus, and from it draw a line 18 miles long due south. On this line as diameter, and to the E. of it, draw a semicircle; and from the N. end of its diameter (the point originally taken) draw a line inclining slightly to the S. as far as the edge of the Jordan valley (here about 5 miles from the river); and from that edge draw a line in a S.W. direction to the Jordan. The figure will give approximately the course of Wady Zerka, though in its numerous windings it continually deviates from the outline figure above indicated. In its upper semicircular portion it forms a boundary between east and west; while in its lower portion it forms a boundary between north and south. These two portions are referred to in Nu 21^{24}, where the territory of Sihon is described as extending 'from Arnon unto Jabbok, even unto the children of Ammon'; i.e. the lower portion of the Jabbok formed the N. boundary, while the upper portion formed the E. boundary of Sihon's kingdom; and the verse may be made clear by inserting 'northwards' after Jabbok and 'eastwards' after Ammon. The upper portion is referred to in Dt 2^{37}, where the border of the children of Ammon is described as 'all the side of the river Jabbok.' The river Jabbok is also mentioned as a boundary Dt 3^{16}, Jos 12^{2}, Jg $11^{13.22}$.

One remarkable incident in the patriarchal narratives is connected with this river. Jacob, after sending all that he had over the stream, was left alone to wrestle with the mysterious visitor, and to prevail (Gn $32^{24ff.}$ referred to in Hos 12^{4}). The Heb. word for wrestling (from the root אבק), which is used only here, is similar in sound to Jabbok, and it is intended that the name of the river should call to mind this instance of favour shown to the ancestor of the chosen race. A probable derivation of the word is from the root בקק 'pour out.' The river Jabbok is mentioned only in connexion with Jacob, and as a boundary existing at the time of Israel's appearance E. of Jordan, in the passages already noted. A. T. CHAPMAN.

JABESH (יָבֵשׁ).—Father of Shallum, who usurped the kingdom of Israel by the assassination of king Zechariah (2 K $15^{10.13.14}$).

JABESH-GILEAD (יָבֵשׁ גִּלְעָד, also יָבֵשׁ or יָבֵישׁ alone in 1 S $11^{1.3.5.9.10}$ $31^{12.13}$, 1 Ch 10^{12}).—While the history of this East Jordan city as furnished in the Bible is meagre, it gives us vivid pictures of both tragic and tender scenes in ancient Hebrew life. In the early period of Jewish history it seems to have been prominent, and later to have fallen into insignificance. Its first appearance is when the Israelites are said to have made a raid upon it with a powerful force, put all the males and married women to death, destroyed the city, and carried off 400 virgins, who became wives to the Benjamites (Jg 21). Afterwards, when it had regained its position of importance, it was attacked by the Ammonites under Nahash, when Saul, to whom the inhabitants appealed for succour, came quickly with his army and utterly routed the enemy (1 S 11). Later, when Saul and his sons were slain in the disaster at Mount Gilboa, and their bodies were being ill-treated by the Philistine conquerors, the men of Jabesh-gilead rushed into the face of death, recovered the bodies, and saw that they were cared for in the kindest manner and buried with proper honours (1 S 31). David, when he was made king at Hebron, remembered this act, and sent special messengers with commendatory blessings to the men of Jabesh-gilead for their heroic devotion to Saul (2 S 2^{5}). Subsequently the bones of Saul and his sons were brought thence by David and buried in the territory of Benjamin (2 S 21^{12-14}).

No doubt the name Jabesh is preserved in the modern Yabis, and when on the line of this stream in the Gilead hills one is near the site of this ancient city. Robinson (BRP^{2} iii. 319 f.) suggested a place, ed-Deir, lying south of Wady Yabis; but this has no ancient ruins, and, besides, it is some distance off the main road. From researches made in this region by the present writer, a more appropriate place would seem to be Miryamin, a point north of Wady Yabis on the ancient road leading over the mountain, where there are massive ancient remains. This is about 7 miles from Pella, and corresponds to the statement of Eusebius in his Onomasticon (268. 81), our best authority in the absence of any special biblical indications as to its site (Merrill, East of the Jordan, p. 439).

S. MERRILL.

JABEZ (יַעְבֵּץ).—A descendant of Judah, who was 'more honourable than his brethren.' His name is traced to the fact that his mother bare him with sorrow (עֹצֶב 'ōẓeb), 1 Ch 4^{9}. The same play upon words recurs in his prayer or vow in the expression לְבִלְתִּי עָצְבִּי 'that it be not to my sorrow,' v.^{10}. (On the correctness of MT see Kittel's note, ad loc., in Haupt's SBOT, and on the possibility of a clause having dropped out, Kautzsch, ad loc., in his AT).

J. A. SELBIE.

JABEZ (יַעְבֵּץ).—A place inhabited by scribes, apparently in Judah, 1 Ch 2^{55}. The site is unknown.

JABIN (יָבִין 'discerning,' Ἰαβείν, Ἰαβείς).—1. King of Hazor in N. Palestine, defeated by Joshua at the Waters of Merom [Jos 11^{1-9} (JE) $^{10-15}$ (D^{2})].

2. Jabin, 'king of Canaan, that reigned in Hazor,' occurs again in Jg 4. He takes no part in the battle of the Kishon, nor is he mentioned in the ancient song (Jg 5). The introduction of Jabin and of Hazor into this narrative creates many difficulties, and the title 'king of Canaan' arouses suspicion. The probability is that two traditions relating to Jabin and Sisera have been united, and harmonized by making Sisera the captain of Jabin's host (cf. Ps $83^{9.10}$, which implies the union of the two traditions). The Jabin tradition probably preserved an account of the early struggles of Naphtali and Zebulun for their territory in the north. The two clans had made Kedesh their headquarters, and successfully defeated Jabin king of Hazor, who had combined with the neighbouring Canaanites to resist the intruders. This tradition forms the basis of the battle of Merom in Jos 11, which has been generalized by the Deut. redactor, and treated as the conquest of N. Palestine by Joshua and all Israel. G. A. COOKE.

JABNEEL (יַבְנְאֵל 'El causeth to build,' B Λεμνά, A Ἰαβνήλ, for other forms see below; in Apocr. Ἰαμνεία or -ία or -νν-, Jebneel, Jabnia, Jamnia).—1. A town on the northern border of Judah, near the sea, mentioned after Ekron, Shikkeron, and Mount Baalah (Jos 15^{11}). It is not mentioned in the lists of cities of Judah, Dan, or Simeon in the Bk. of Joshua, but in Jos 15^{46} LXX substitutes Γεμνά (B) or Ἰεμναί (A), Jabneh, for MT יָמָּה 'even unto the sea.' It does not appear again in the OT until 2 Ch 26^{6}, where under the name of Jabneh (יַבְנֵה, LXX B Ἀβεννήρ, A Ἰαβείς) it is captured along with Gath and Ashdod from the Philistines by king Uzziah, and its wall broken down. Josephus (Ant. V. i. 22) describes it as belonging to the tribe of Dan, in company with Gath and Ekron, and mentions it with the inland towns Marissa and Ashdod in contradistinction to the maritime towns Gaza, Joppa, and Dora (Ant. XIV. iv. 4; BJ I. vii. 7). It is spoken of (Jth 2^{28}) under the name of Jemnaan as in fear and dread of Holofernes. Under the name Jamnia (1 Mac 4^{15} 5^{58} 10^{69} 15^{40}) it is referred to as a garrison, with plains near it, Gorgias in command (Ant. XII. viii. 6). In 2 Mac $12^{8.9.40}$

Judas Maccabæus set fire to the haven and navy of Jamnia, so that the light of the fire was seen at Jerusalem, 240 furlongs off. Pliny (HN v. 13) speaks of the two Jamnias 'Jamnes duæ, altera intus,' and places them between Azotus and Joppa. See Reland, Pal. p. 823. Ptolemy (v. 16) speaks of the port of the Jamnites between Azotus and Joppa, and subsequently mentions Jamnia among the cities of Judæa.

In common with Ashkelon, Azotus, and Gaza, the harbour or naval arsenal of Jamnia bore the name of Majumas (Reland, p. 590 f.; Raumer, Kenrick, Phœnicia; Le Quien, Oriens Christ.). Jamnia was taken from the Syrians (c. B.C. 142) by Simon Maccabæus (Ant. XIII. vi. 7; BJ I. ii. 2), and it was restored (B.C. 63) to its inhabitants by Pompey (Ant. XIV. iv. 4); it was repaired or rebuilt (c. B.C. 57) by Gabinius (BJ I. viii. 4), and was given to the Jews by Augustus (B.C. 30). Herod bequeathed (B.C. 4) Jamnia (Ant. XVII. viii. 1) to Salome his sister, and she left it with all its toparchy to Julia the wife of Augustus Cæsar (Ant. XVIII. ii. 2; BJ II. ix. 1). Philo Judæus (de Legat. ad Gaium, Opp. vol. ii. p. 575) states that in this town, the most populous of Judæa, a Roman officer named Capito raised an altar of mud for the deification of the emperor Caligula; the Jews demolished the altar, and the incensed emperor forthwith ordered an equestrian statue of himself to be erected in the Holy of Holies at Jerusalem (c. A.D. 37). Strabo (Bk. 16, 'Syria') states that Iamneia and the settlements around were so populous that they could furnish 40,000 soldiers. The Talmud abounds with references to the learned Rabbins who frequented the school at Jamnia. Milman (Hist. of Jews) states that it contained a school of Jewish learning which obtained great authority, and whether from the rank and character of its head, or from the assemblage of many of the members of the ancient Sanhedrin, who formed a sort of community in that place, it was looked upon with great respect and veneration by the Jews who remained in Palestine. This school was subsequently suppressed by the Romans, owing to the imprudent speeches of the fiery Simon ben-Jochai. Before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, according to Jewish tradition the Sanhedrin escaped the general wreck. Before the formation of the siege, it had followed Gamaliel, its Nasi, or Prince, to Jabneh (Jamnia; Milman, Hist. of Jews). According to tradition also, the great Gamaliel was buried in Jamnia, and his tomb was visited by Parchi in the 14th cent. In the time of Eusebius, Jamnia was but a small place of little importance. It gave a bishop to the Council of Nicæa, and had still a bishop in the time of the emperor Justinian (Epiph. adv. Hær. ii. 730).

The Crusaders found the ruins called Ibelin (A.D. 1144, William of Tyre), where they built the fortress Ibelin (corrupted from Jabneel), mistaking it for Gath, and it gave its name to the French family of d'Ibelin, one of whom, Jean, count of Jaffa and Ashkelon, restored (c. 1255) the famous code of the 'Assises of Jerusalem,' originally composed by Godfrey de Bouillon (Gibbon, ch. 58; Samut. l. iii. p. xii, c. 58). Benjamin of Tudela (c. A.D. 1163) identified Ibelin, three parasangs south of Jaffa, as the ancient Jabneh, and states that the site of the schools might still be traced there (Early Travels, p. 87). The Itin. Ant. places Jamnia 12 MP. from Diospolis (Lydda) and Joppa, 20 MP. from Ashkelon, and 36 MP. from Gaza. It was on the old road from Joppa to Ashkelon, through Jamnia and Azotus (Peutinger Tables); another road led to it from Diospolis.

The modern village of Yebnah stands on the ruins of the town of Jamnia. It occupies a strong site, 170 ft. above the sea, on an isolated rounded hill, south of the Wady Rûbîn, in the position assigned to it by the Itin. Ant., and the old road from Jaffa to Ashkelon passes by it. The houses are of mud, but there are interesting ruins of a church and also of a mosque erected by Crusaders and Saracens. The ancient Majumas or harbour of Jamnia is situated immediately south of the mouth of the Wady Rûbîn. The port seems to have been double, and entered by narrow passages as at Tyre and Jaffa. The northern bay is some 400 paces across (north and south), flanked with a rocky promontory on each side. The southern bay is larger, and on the promontory south of it are the ruins of ed-Dubbeh. A large reef is visible outside, beneath the water (SWP vol. ii. p. 269). The port would seem to be naturally better than any along the coast of Palestine south of Cæsarea. A very little trouble in clearing a passage through the reefs would probably render the Minet Rûbîn a better port than Jaffa, as the reefs are farther from the beach (Conder, PEFSt, 1875, p. 168). The harvests about Yebnah are very abundant, and the ground is of surprising fertility (Land and Book). The present writer (PEFSt, 1875, p. 181) suggests that Yebnah or Ibnah may be the modern equivalent of Libnah as well as Jabneel. Libnah was given over to the priests, the sons of Aaron (Jos 21^{13}, 1 Ch 6^{57}), within the boundary of the tribe of Judah, and has not been identified, though supposed to be near Beersheba. Both Jabneh (Jos 15^{11} B) and Libnah appear as Λεμνά in the LXX.

2. (B Ἰεφθαμαί, A Ἰαβνήλ, Jabnæel). It appears in Jos 19^{33} in connexion with Adami-nekeb and Lakkum as part of the northern boundary of Naphtali, Lakkum being near the Jordan. There is no clue to identifying its position. Conder (Handbook to the Bible, p. 269) gives the following identifications to the places in Jos 19^{33}:—

Heleph is probably Beit Lîf, at the edge of the higher mountains towards the west. Adami is the ruin Adain; Nekeb (the Talmudic Tziidetha, Talm. Jerus. Megillah i. 1) is the ruin Seiyâdeh; Jabneel (the Caphar Yama of the Talmud) is Yemma, 7 miles south of Tiberias in Naphtali (SWP i. p. 365). The Variorum Bible, however, gives 'Adami-hannekeb,' i.e. 'Adami in the pass.' Schwarz (p. 144) places Kefr Yamah ('the village by the sea') on the southern shore of the Sea of Galilee; and Neubauer (Géog. du Talmud, p. 225) places it between Tabor and the Sea of Galilee, thus apparently agreeing with Conder in the identification of Yemma as Jabneel. Josephus speaks of Ἰαμνεία (Vita, 37) or Ἰαμνίθ (BJ II. xx. 6) as a rocky fastness in Upper Galilee which he fortified, together with Meroth, Achabari, and Seph (cf. BJ II. vi. 3).

JACHIN (יָכִין).—1. Fourth son of Simeon, Gn 46^{10}, Ex 6^{15}. In 1 Ch 4^{24} he is called Jarib (יָרִיב), but Kittel corrects this to Jachin. In Nu 26^{12} the patronymic Jachinites occurs. 2. Eponym of a priestly family, 1 Ch 9^{10}, Neh 11^{10}. See GENEALOGY.

JACHIN.—One of the brazen pillars erected in front of Solomon's temple, that on the right (looking eastward) or south of the porch, see 1 K 7^{21}, 2 Ch 3^{17}, Jer 52^{21}. See for particulars BOAZ and TEMPLE.

JACINTH (ὑάκινθος, hyacinthus), one of the foundation stones of the New Jerusalem (Rev 21^{20}), RVm 'sapphire.' The uncertainty which surrounds the real meaning of many of the precious stones named in the Bible applies also to the jacinth; this was inevitable in an age when the principles of chemistry and crystallography were unknown. According to C. W. King (Nat. Hist. of Gems, p. 167), the jacinth comes to us from the Italian giacinto, and this from the Latin hyacinthus. In mediæval times the jacinth seems to have been a gem of a yellow colour, but sometimes tinged blue or purple:—characteristics which belong to varieties of quartz, such as the cairngorm and amethyst; and it was frequently employed by the Greeks for intagli in early times, and by the Romans for cameos. According to Pliny (HN xxi. 26), 'Hyacinthus in Gallia eximiè provenit. Hoc ibi pro cocco hysginum tingitur.' The dye hysginum is usually translated 'blue.'

The modern hyacinth includes the bright-red varieties of zircon; a silicate of zirconia with a little oxide of iron. It crystallizes in the form of a square prism or octahedron, and is found at Assouân on the Nile, Auvergne, Bohemia, and other volcanic countries. Large crystals have been obtained from Siberia and Ceylon.

JACKAL.—This word is not found in the text of AV. It occurs in text of RV as the equivalent of tannîm (Is 34^{13}, Jer 9^{11} 10^{22} 49^{33} 51^{37}, Mic 1^{8}), which is tr. AV 'dragon.' We prefer in these passages the tr. wolves (see DRAGON 1). In one passage (Jer 14^{6}) RV text tr. tannîm, 'jackals,' marg. 'the crocodile,' AV text 'dragons.' In two places (Is 13^{22} 34^{14}) אִיִּים 'iyyîm is wrongly tr^{d} in AV 'wild beasts of the islands,' RV 'wolves.' The word 'iyyîm, however, is etymologically equivalent to the Arab. benât-âwa, which means jackals. We think, therefore, that it should be so tr^{d} here. If our views are accepted, the first passage would read 'and the jackals ('iyyîm) shall cry in their castles, and the wolves (tannîm) in their pleasant palaces,' and the second (including latter clause of v.^{13}) 'an habitation for wolves (tannîm), a court for ostriches, and the wild beasts of the desert shall meet with the jackals ('iyyîm).'

Jackal also occurs in RVm as the equivalent of shû'âl (Jg 15^{4}, Neh 4^{3}, Ps 63^{10}, La 5^{18}), text AV and RV 'fox.' See Moore on Jg 15^{4}, and art. FOX, p. 64^{a}, where the meaning of shû'âl is more fully discussed.

G. E. POST.

JACOB (יַעֲקֹב 'supplanter' [see below]; Ιακωβ).—1. Son of Isaac and Rebekah, also called Israel, the father of the twelve patriarchs, who were the reputed ancestors of the twelve tribes of Israel. The history of Jacob is contained in parts of Gn 25^{21}–50^{13},—the narrative being chiefly JE, the passages (so far as they relate to Jacob) which belong to P being 25^{26b} 26$^{34.\ 35}$ 27^{46}–28^{9} 29$^{24.\ 29}$ 31^{18b} (from 'and all'), 33^{18a} 34 (partly: see below), 35$^{9-13.\ 15.\ 22b-29}$ [*] 36 (in the main: v.$^{6-7}$ in particular belong here), 37^{1-2a} (to 'Jacob'), 46$^{6-27}$ 47^{5-6a} (to 'dwell'), $^{7-11.\ 27b}$ (from 'and they'), ^{28} 48$^{3-6.\ 7}$ 49^{1a} (to 'sons'), ^{28b} (from 'and blessed them'), $^{29-33}$ 50$^{12.\ 13}$. As in most other places in Gn, P gives little more than a skeleton of the facts, the picturesque, lifelike narratives are almost entirely the work of J and E. J and E are here closely interwoven: the distinction between them will be noted where necessary; but in general these two narratives appear to have covered largely, when intact, the same ground, and, though exhibiting sometimes divergent traditions, to have been substantially similar in their contents.

The birth of Jacob is recounted in Gn 25$^{21-26}$. Isaac must be pictured as still dwelling by the well Beer-lahai-roi, near Beersheba (25^{11b}); Rebekah, like Sarah before her, was barren; but in consequence of Isaac's prayer to J″, she became fruitful. The Hebrews loved to picture the characters and fortunes of the peoples with whom they were themselves acquainted, as foreshadowed in their ancestors (cf. Gn 9$^{25-27}$ 16^{12}): and in the case of the ancestors of Israel and Edom the rivalry which became such a marked feature in later generations, began even before their birth. The twin fathers of the two nations struggled together in the womb: their mother, concerned at such an ill-omened occurrence, went to inquire of J″,—we may suppose, at the sanctuary of Beersheba (21^{33} 26$^{23-25}$),—and received in answer the oracular declaration, couched in poetical form:—

Two nations are in thy womb,
And two peoples even from thy bowels shall be parted asunder;[*]
And one people shall be stronger than the other people,
And the elder shall serve the younger.

When the time came for Rebekah to be delivered, the elder of the twins, we read, was born with the hand of the younger holding his heel,—i.e. endeavouring to hold him back, and to secure the first place for himself: so early did Jacob's characteristic nature display itself. From this circumstance, it is said, he was called Jacob (יַעֲקֹב), i.e. 'one who takes by the heel,' 'endeavours to trip up or supplant,' from עָקֵב 'a heel.'

This, at least, is the idea which the name Jacob suggested to the Hebrew ear. עקב is 'to take by the heel,' Hos 12$^{3(4)}$ (with allusion to the same occurrence), 'to trip up,' 'supplant,' fig. 'to defraud,' 'deceive,' Jer 9$^{3(4)}$, 'trust ye not in any brother, for every brother will utterly supplant, and every neighbour will go about with slanders'; עָקוֹב Jer 17^{9} is 'deceitful,' and עָקְבָה 2 K 10^{19} is 'subtilty.' It is another question whether this explanation expresses the actual meaning of the name. It has been supposed, for instance, that Jacob is really an elliptical form of Jaḳob'ēl: in this case El, 'God,' would be the subject of the verb (like Ishmā'ēl, 'God heareth,' Isrā'ēl, 'God persisteth,' Yeraḥme'ēl, 'God is compassionate'),[†] and the word might be explained from the Arab. 'God follows,' or (from conj. IV.) 'God rewards.'[‡] In fact there is now evidence that the name is much older than the date at which, according to the Biblical narrative, Jacob must have lived: Mr. Pinches has found on contract tablets of the age of Khammurabi (c. 2300 B.C.) the personal name Ya'ḳub-ilu (analogous to Yashup-ilu, Yarbi-ilu, Yamlik-ilu, Yakbar-ilu, etc., of the same age);[§] and according to Hommel (AHT 203), the contracted form Yaḳubu occurs likewise. Further, in the lists of 118 places in Palestine conquered by Thothmes III. (B.C. 1503–1449, Sayce and Petrie), which are inscribed on the pylons of the temple at Karnak, there occur (Nos. 78 and 102) the names Y-ša-p-'a-ra and Y-'-ḳ-b-'â-ra. These names (the Egyp. r standing, as is well known, also for l) can be only יספאל Joseph-'ēl and יעקבאל Jaḳob-'ēl; and we learn consequently that places bearing these names (cf. for the form the place-names Jezre'el, Jabne'ēl Jos 15^{11} [= Jabneh 2 Ch 26^{6}], Yiphtaḥ'ēl Jos 19$^{14.\ 27}$, Yeḳabẓe'ēl Neh 11^{25}, Yirpe'ēl Jos 18^{27}) existed in Palestine, apparently in the central part, in the 15th cent. B.C.[‖] What connexion, if any, exists between these names and those of the patriarchs, may never perhaps be ascertained; but their existence at such a date in Palestine is remarkable. These facts, however, make it not improbable that (as had indeed been supposed even before their discovery[¶]) names of the type Jacob, Joseph, Jephthah, etc., are elliptical forms of a more original Jaḳob'ēl, Joseph'ēl, etc. But, however that may be, to the Hebrews, as we know them, the idea which Jacob suggested, and in which it was supposed to have originated, was that of supplanter.

The boys grew up: Esau was a clever hunter, living in the open field; Jacob was a 'plain man, living in tents,' i.e. a quiet, home-loving man, pursuing the life of a shepherd among his tents

(cf. Gn 4^{20}). An incident soon occurred, which displayed the contrasted characters of the two brothers. Esau returned one day exhausted from the chase: his brother was cooking pottage, and half fainting he asked to be allowed to swallow (הַלְעִיטֵנִי־נָא) a little. But Jacob saw his opportunity; and did not scruple to make the most of it. 'Sell me first thy birthright,' he said. Esau, feeling in his exhaustion that his life depended upon it, too readily consented. Jacob, however, is still not fully satisfied; and to make the compact more sure, obliges Esau to seal his promise with an oath. Thereupon he gives Esau the bread and pottage which he desired. The birthright, it need hardly be remarked, was a highly valued possession: it implied both a better position in the family, and also, ultimately, a larger inheritance, than fell to any of the other brothers (cf. 43^{33} 48^{13-20}, Dt 21^{17}). The narrator comments on the heedlessness with which Esau, thinking only of the moment, surrendered what would otherwise have been an inalienable right: the modern reader is more impressed by the avarice and selfishness shown by Jacob in taking such a mean advantage of his brother's need.

Gn 27^{1-45} relates another characteristic incident in Jacob's life, and tells the story of the artifice by which, instigated by a designing mother, he deceives his aged father, and wrests from his brother his father's blessing. The narrative, which belongs chiefly, if not entirely, to J, is told with the picturesque detail and the psychological truth which that gifted narrator habitually displays. There is no need to repeat the details here: the vivid description of Rebekah's treacherous scheme for defeating her husband's purpose, of Jacob's too willing compliance when, with his usual caution, he has once satisfied himself that he can yield it safely, of the ready falsehood with which he allays his father's suspicions, of Isaac's dismay, and Esau's bitter cry of disappointment, when the truth is discovered, will be fresh in the memory of every reader. Only two or three points may be selected for comment. The contrasted blessings of Jacob and Esau express clearly the different geographical and political conditions of the countries owned afterwards by their respective descendants. Of Jacob, his father says:

27b See, the smell of my son
Is as the smell of a field which Jehovah hath blessed:
28 And God give thee of the dew of heaven,
And of the fatness of the earth,
And plenty of corn and must:
29 Let peoples serve thee,
And nations bow down to thee:
Be lord over thy brethren,
And let thy mother's sons bow down to thee:
Cursed be every one that curseth thee,
And blessed be every one that blesseth thee.

In vv.$^{27b.\,28}$ the poet thinks of the fruitful fields and vineyards of Canaan, watered by copious dews (Dt 33^{28d}), and yielding in abundance 'corn and must,'—two of the three staple productions of Palestine, often mentioned together as a triad of blessings (Dt 7^{13} 11^{14} al.; cf. 33^{28c}): in v.^{29} he thinks further of the peoples of Canaan, subjugated under the Israelites, and of the neighbouring nations, Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites,—all 'brothers,' or other near relations of Israel (Gn $19^{37f.}$),—made tributary by David (2 S 8).

The 'blessing' of Esau (vv.$^{39.\,40}$) is a very qualified one. Playing on the ambiguous sense of a Hebrew preposition,—which would more naturally mean from or of in a partitive sense (as v.^{28}), but might also mean away from, if such a sense were favoured by the context,—the poet puts into the patriarch's mouth these words—

39b Behold, (away) from the fatness of the earth shall be thy dwelling,
And (away) from the dew of heaven above:
40 And by thy sword shalt thou live, and thou shalt serve thy brother;
And it shall come to pass, as thou roamest about at large,*
That thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck.

The contrast to v.^{28} is manifest. The reference is to the relatively rocky and arid territory of the Edomites, which obliged its inhabitants to find their livelihood elsewhere, by means of war and plunder. In v.^{40} the doom of subjection to Jacob is not revoked; but it is limited in duration: the time will come when, after repeated efforts,† Edom will regain its freedom. Edom revolted from Judah in the reign of Jehoram (2 K 8^{20-22}): no doubt, circumstances with which we are unacquainted,—perhaps a series of abortive efforts preceding the final success,—suggested the terms of v.^{40b}.

Jacob's treatment of his brother was followed by its natural consequences. Esau 'hated Jacob because of the blessing wherewith his father blessed him,' and only waited for his father's death in order to take vengeance on him. But his mother, Rebekah, ever watchful of the interests of her favourite son, urged him to flee forthwith to her brother Laban, in Ḥaran (across the Euphrates, on the Belikh, N.N.E. of Palestine), and to remain with him until Esau's resentment should have been dulled by time (27^{42-45}).

At this point the compiler of the Book of Genesis has inserted a passage (27^{46}–28^{9}) from P, suggesting an entirely different motive for Jacob's visit—it is not here spoken of as a flight—to Laban. Esau, the same narrator had stated previously ($26^{34f.}$), had, to his parents' great vexation, taken two 'Hittite' wives; and now Rebekah, fearful lest Jacob should do the same, mentions her apprehensions to Isaac, who thereupon charges Jacob to journey to Paddan-aram, and find there a wife among the daughters of his uncle Laban. Jacob obeys; and departs accordingly with his father's blessing.‡ It is of course true that, in itself, this representation is not inconsistent with that in 27^{42-45}: men notoriously act often under the influence of more motives than one; and Rebekah may not have mentioned to Isaac her principal motive for wishing Jacob to leave his home. But presenting, as this paragraph does, all the literary marks of a hand different from the author of 27^{1-45}, there can be no doubt that it forms part of a different representation of the current of events.

28^{10-22}§ forms the true sequel of 27^{1-45}. Jacob starts from Beersheba, on his journey to Ḥaran. Travelling northwards through Canaan, he lights upon a spot where he passes the night. Even now the soil at Bethel is 'covered, as with gravestones, by large sheets of bare rocks, some few standing up here and there like cromlechs' (Stanley, S. and P. 219), and the hill a little to the S.E. rises to its top in terraces of stone.‖ He dreams; and in his dream the natural features of the locality shape themselves into a 'ladder,' or flight of stone steps, rising up to heaven; angels are ascending and descending upon it; and by his side ¶ (v.^{13} RVm) stands J″, addressing him in words of encouragement and hope, promising him a countless posterity, who will possess the land on which he lies, and assuring him that He will be with him on his journeyings, and will bring him back in safety to the land he is leaving. The dream represents under a striking symbolism the thought that heaven and earth are connected, that an ever-present providence watches over the destinies of men, and also, in particular, that this was a place in which above others God was manifest upon earth, and which deserved pre-eminently to be termed His 'house.' As a mark of the sacredness of the spot, Jacob consecrates the boulder on which his head had rested, setting it up as a 'pillar,' and pouring oil upon the top of it: he also promises solemnly, if he returns home in safety, to make it a 'house of God,' and to pay J″ tithes of all his gains. Bethel became afterwards a famous and much-frequented sanctuary (Am 7^{13} etc.); and no doubt it was the 'pillar,' that would naturally stand beside its altar (Am 3^{14}: cf. Hos 10^{1}), and the custom of paying tithes there (Am 4^{4}), the origin of both of which was thus attributed by tradition to Jacob. The Phœnicians believed in λίθοι ἔμψυχοι (Eus. Præp. Ev. i. 10. 18); and there are many traces in antiquity of stones, esteemed as sacred, being anointed with oil (λίθοι λιπαροί), and venerated as divine (Arnob. adv. Gent. i. 39, vi. 11; Is 57^{6}: cf. vol. i. p. 278^{a}; also W. R. Smith, RS^{1} 109, 184–188, 214 f. [^{2} 116, 201–205, 232 f.]);[*] and the sacred 'pillar,' or monolith, of Bethel, it is difficult not to think, must in its actual origin have been regarded similarly as a shrine or abode of the deity; but in the existing narrative the idea may possibly be that Jacob venerated it as the channel through which he received his dream.[†]

¶ Properly, '(bending) over him.'

29^{1-14} Jacob proceeds on his journey, reaches Ḥaran, and quickly meets with his relations. In his uncle, Laban, Jacob finds, at least for a time, his match in the art of overreaching; and the narrative recounts first the engagement concluded by him with Laban, and then the ruse by which the latter succeeded in marrying first his elder daughter Leah, and so in securing Jacob's services as a shepherd, for 7 years more, in return for his younger daughter Rachel.[‡] The section 29^{31}–30^{24} narrates the birth of 11 of Jacob's 12 sons, and of a daughter Dinah, alluding at the same time incidentally to the family jealousies which arose in consequence between his two wives. It is unnecessary to dwell here upon details: it will be sufficient to state that first Leah bears, in succession, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah: then Rachel's handmaid, Bilhah, bears two sons, Dan and Naphtali, in her mistress' name; next Zilpah, Leah's handmaid, bears Gad and Asher; after this, Issachar and Zebulun, as also a daughter Dinah, are born to Leah; lastly, Rachel bears Joseph. A collateral aim of the narrative, to which evidently no small importance is attached, is to explain the names borne afterwards by the corresponding tribes: the explanations (as is constantly the case in similar cases in the OT), though apparently etymological, are, however, in reality based, not upon etymologies (in our sense of the word), but upon assonances, and must not, therefore, be understood as necessarily expressing the real meaning of the names. In the case of several of the names, a double explanation is given (or alluded to), — an indication of the composite character of the narrative (v.^{16} and v.^{18}; v.^{20a} and v.^{20b}; v.^{23} and v.^{24}).[*]

Jacob, having been in Laban's service for 14 years, was now anxious to return home to his father. He accordingly begs his uncle to let him go, together with his wives and children. Laban, however, is reluctant to part with a servant who, he is obliged to own (30^{27b}), has served him well; and with feigned magnanimity invites him to name the terms on which he will remain with him. Jacob, in reply, professing to be very generous, declares his willingness to serve him for nothing, if he will agree to the following arrangement: Jacob will remove from the flocks all the parti-coloured animals, and having done this will take nothing but the animals so marked, which are born afterwards, as his wages. Laban, supposing that these would be few or none, closes eagerly with the offer; and in order to make the arrangement doubly secure, removes the spotted animals from the flock himself, gives them into the hands of his sons, and places three days' journey between himself and the flocks left with Jacob (30^{31-36}). Jacob, however, is equal to the occasion; and by means of various ingenious devices, succeeds in outwitting his not too generous uncle. (1) Jacob placed parti-coloured rods in front of the ewes at the time when they conceived, so that the latter in consequence bore parti-coloured young (vv.$^{37-39}$).[†] (2) He arranged that the spotted lambs and kids thus produced should be in view of the rest of the flock, so that, when the ewes conceived, there should be a further tendency to bear spotted young (v.^{40}).[‡] (3) Jacob further put up the peeled rods only when the stronger sheep were about to conceive: he thus secured all the strongest animals for himself (v.^{42}). The result was (v.^{43}) that Jacob's possessions increased immensely.

Jacob's increasing prosperity soon arouses the envy of Laban; and he no longer views him with the same friendliness as before. Encouraged by J″ (31^{3}), Jacob resolves accordingly, without again consulting his father-in-law, to return home: he explains his position to his wives, pointing out to them Laban's arbitrary and ungrateful treatment of him; and they agree to accompany him (31^{4-16}). Here it is to be observed that the description of Laban's arrangement with Jacob, and of the manner in which its consequences were evaded by Jacob, differs from that given in ch. 30: in 31^{7-12} Jacob says that Laban had been in the habit of arbitrarily changing his wages (so 31^{41}), as seemed most likely to benefit himself, of which there is nothing in ch. 30; and further, that the effect of the change had each time[§] been frustrated, not by his own ingenious contrivance (as in 30^{37-42}), but by the intervention of Providence (31^{8-9}):[‖]

[*] See, further, Tylor, Primitive Culture^{3}, ii. 160–167.

[†] It is observable that in v.^{22} the title, 'house of God,' is applied to the monolith itself, not to the place marked by it. Some have seen in the passage (esp. v.^{11}) an allusion to the custom of 'incubation': cf. Smend, AT Theol. 39; Holzinger, ad loc.

[‡] V.^{27} 'fulfil the week of this one,' i.e. the week of festivities usually accompanying a marriage (Jg 14^{12}, To 11^{19}): do not break off the usual round of wedding festivities. When they were ended, Jacob received Rachel on the understanding that he was to serve Laban for 7 years more.

[*] See, further, the articles on the several names. 29^{34} 'be joined'; the name 'Levi' is played on similarly in Nu $18^{2.4}$ (lāwāh, to join). 30^{3} 'be builded up from her': so 16^{2} of Hagar, the fig. being that of a house (cf. Ru 4^{11}, Dt 25^{9}). 30^{14-16} 'mandrakes,' or better love-apples, were supposed to possess aphrodisiac properties, and to ensure conception: hence the reason why Rachel asks for them. In v.^{16} Leah 'hires' Jacob with the love-apples she had given to Rachel; in v.^{18} Leah says that Issachar is the 'hire,' or payment, which she has received for having given Zilpah to Jacob,—manifestly two explanations of the name Issachar (sāchār, 'hire' or 'wages').

[†] The physiological principle involved is well established. According to an authority quoted by Delitzsch, cattle-breeders now, in order to secure white lambs, surround the drinking-troughs with white objects.

[‡] This seems to be the meaning of v.^{40} as it stands. But many modern scholars think that the words 'and set . . . of Laban' are a gloss; in which case the verse will merely state that the parti-coloured young, produced as described in v.^{39}, were kept by themselves, and not mixed with those of uniform colour (which would be Laban's).

[§] Notice the imperfect tenses in 31^{8}.

[‖] The dream (31^{10-12}) is mentioned as a notification to Jacob that the birth, by natural means (and not through Jacob's artifice), of the parti-coloured young was by God's appointment, in compensation for Laban's treatment of him (v.^{12} end).

ch. 30 gives J's representation of the transactions, ch. 31 gives that of E.* Jacob takes flight while Laban is engaged in sheepshearing (cf. 1 S $25^{2. 7. 11}$, 2 S 13^{23}); he crosses the Euphrates, and directs his steps towards Gilead (31^{17-22}). Rachel, at the same time, steals her father's teraphim, or household gods (cf. 1 S $19^{13. 16}$), as though (Ewald) to appropriate and carry with her into Canaan the good fortune of her paternal home.

Laban, upon hearing of Jacob's departure, starts in pursuit, and overtakes him in the hill-country of Gilead. The account of the meeting is told in 31^{26-55}. Laban begins by expostulating with Jacob on the manner in which he has left him, and especially on the theft of his household gods, with which he charges him. Rachel, who was alone the guilty person, by a piece of woman's wit conceals the theft, and, in her turn, outwits her father: this gives Jacob the opportunity of retorting upon Laban, of reminding him of the 20 years which he had spent ungrudgingly in his service, and of reproaching him with the many attempts he had made to deprive him of his lawful earnings (vv.$^{26-42}$). Laban, smitten by his conscience (vv.$^{24. 29}$), and unable to reply, seeks to close the dispute by proposing a treaty of friendship. Up to this point the narrative has been clear; but from v.^{46} it becomes somewhat confused, two different accounts (J and E) having, it seems, been combined together, and at the same time enlarged with additions by a redactor. The analysis is difficult, and some of the details are uncertain; but it is clear that both a 'pillar' and a heap of stones are described as erected as a witness; that two distinct agreements are entered into—one (v.^{50}) that Jacob will in no way ill-treat Laban's daughters, the other (v.^{52}) that neither Jacob nor Laban will pass the boundary marked by the heap of stones with hostile intent toward the other; that the heap of stones is the witness of the former agreement (vv.$^{48-50}$), and the pillar, therefore, presumably (v.^{52}) of the latter; and further, that each agreement is sealed by a common meal (v.^{46}; v.^{54}).† The narrative explains in addition the name 'Gilead,' which is derived, by a popular etymology, from Gal-'ēd, 'Heap of witness.'‡ There must, it seems, have been somewhere on the N.E. frontier of Gilead, a cairn of stones, with a single boulder, standing up prominently beside it, the origin of which was popularly attributed to this compact between Laban and Jacob.§ The narrative, as it stands, explains also (v.^{49}) the name Mizpah, the 'Watch-tower,' a place of uncertain situation, but no doubt some eminence in the same neighbourhood, which overlooked the broad plain of Ḥauran, and guarded the approach from the direction of Damascus.‖ It seems that the ancestors of the Israelites and the Syrians are here conceived as fixing the border between the territories occupied afterwards by their respective descendants, which was often, especially during the period of the Syrian wars, matter of bloody dispute between them.

The 'long game of well-matched wits' is thus ended; and Laban returns to Ḥaran (31^{55}), while Jacob travels on towards Canaan. As he journeys, the 'angels of God' meet him, as if to welcome and congratulate him on his auspicious return; and from this circumstance the name Maḥanaim is explained ('the double camp').* Maḥanaim became afterwards an important place (2 S $2^{8. 12. 29}$ the capital of Ishbosheth's kingdom; see also $17^{24. 27}$, 1 K 4^{14}); but its situation is not known: from the sequel of the present narrative, it must, however, have been N. of the Jabbok (now the Zerḳâ), though not much N., and within sight of the Jordan (v.^{10}): in Jos $13^{26. 30}$ it is mentioned as a place on the border between Gad and Manasseh.†

A fresh danger now threatens Jacob, the prospect of meeting again his brother Esau, who might be supposed to have still not forgotten old grudges. Jacob sends (32^{3-5}) a conciliatory message to him, but learns in reply that he is coming to meet him with 400 men. He is greatly alarmed; but his powers of resource do not desert him. He divides his party into two 'camps,' in the hope that if one should be smitten by Esau, the other at least might escape; and besides this worldly precaution, he invokes in prayer the aid of God, reminding Him that it was He who had bidden him (31^{3}) return to his native land, and pleading before Him the blessings which He had already bestowed upon him (v.^{10}), and the promises which He had given him (v.^{12}).‡ (In vv.$^{7. 8}$, it is to be observed, there is clearly a second explanation, parallel to the one in v.^{2}, of the name Maḥanaim §). If vv.$^{13b-21}$ be the original sequel to vv.$^{3-13a}$, the passage will describe a further precaution taken by Jacob, viz. a present of cattle, consisting of 580 head, and divided into separate droves for the purpose of making a favourable impression upon Esau, who, as drove upon drove came up, would be at once gratified and surprised to learn that each was intended for himself. But the passage from v.^{13b} to v.^{21} appears to proceed from the other narrator E;‖ so that the account of the present may be a parallel, and not a sequel, to the division into two 'camps' in vv.$^{7. 8}$.

There follows the account of Jacob's wrestling with the angel. His party had crossed the Jabboḳ (the Wādy Zerḳâ); and he himself was left behind 'alone,'—it is difficult to say, on which side of the stream.¶ It was the eve of the greatest crisis of his life. His future welfare hung in the balance. Long ago he had taken cruel advantage of his brother: he had had to flee before his threatened vengeance; now Esau was on his way to meet him with a large retinue of attendants; and what would the issue be? In the solitude and darkness a 'strange and nameless dread' came over him: the terrible thought that God was his antagonist took possession of him; and so vividly did he realize it, that he seemed to himself to be engaged in an actual struggle with a living man.[*] The struggle continued till the approach of daybreak.[†] But Jacob wrestled bravely: his mysterious antagonist saw that he could not prevail against him by the means which a wrestler would naturally employ; so, in order to escape before daylight, and at the same time to show that he was superior to Jacob, he sprained Jacob's thigh. But Jacob, though he can no longer wrestle with his antagonist, can still hold him: he perceives that he is more than an ordinary mortal; so he seizes the opportunity to win a blessing for himself, 'I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.' The blessing takes the form of a change of name. 'Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel; for thou hast persevered with God and with men, and hast prevailed.' The name 'Israel,' meaning (on the analogy of other names similarly formed) 'God persists (or perseveres),'[‡] is interpreted as suggesting the meaning 'Perseverer with God.'[§] Jacob's persevering struggle with God is just ended: of men, he has persevered against both Laban and Esau; his struggle with Laban was concluded previously; that with Esau is not yet concluded, but 'hast prevailed' is a word full of hope for the future. At the same time, as the name was to the Hebrews the symbol or expression of the nature, the change of name is significant of a moral change in the patriarch himself: he is to be no longer the Supplanter, the Crafty one, the Overreacher, but the Perseverer with God, who is worthy also to prevail.[‖] The incident serves to explain further the name Penuel, 'Face of God'; 'for,' said Jacob, 'I have seen God face to face, and yet my life is preserved.'[¶] The narrator deduces also from this incident the custom of not eating in animals the muscle corresponding to the one which had been strained in Jacob's thigh: it was treated as sacred through the touch of God. The site of Penuel is uncertain; but it must have been near both the Jabboḳ and the Jordan. As Jacob journeys from Penuel to Succoth, so Gideon, pursuing the Midianites in the contrary direction, comes first to Succoth, and afterwards 'goes up' to Penuel (Jg $8^{5.8}$); it may therefore be conjectured that it was some elevated or projecting spot, near where the Jabboḳ descends from the uplands into the Jordan Valley: Merrill suggests Tulūl eḍ-Ḍahab, conical hills, with ruins at their top, which rise from the Jabboḳ Valley, with the stream flowing between them, to a height of 250 ft.[]

* Notice the frequency with which God (אֱלֹהִים), not Jahweh, occurs in this narrative (vv.$^{9. 11. 16. 24. 42}$).

† The mark of amity and reconciliation, as is still the case among the Arabs. V.^{54} speaks of a sacrifice as well.

‡ Wellh. and Dillm. assign vv.$^{46-50}$ to J, and vv.$^{45. 51-54}$ to E, treating 'Behold, this heap, and' in v.^{51}, 'This heap be witness, and,' and 'and this pillar' in v.^{52}, as glosses due to the redactor. However, יָרָה (v.^{51}) is not the word that we should expect to be used of a מַצֵּבָה: perhaps (cf. LXX here and v.^{45}) we should restore, with Ball, הֲרִיכֹתִי. Kautzsch and Socin assign vv.$^{51. 52}$ to J, treating the three references to the 'pillar' in these verses as glosses. The precise determination of the analysis is not important; for, in any case, the passage describes two distinct transactions (as explained above in the text).

§ Cf. Ewald, Hist. i. 347 f., 356, who thinks even that the real meaning of the tradition is that the mountain-range of Gilead itself is the 'heap,' piled up by Laban and Jacob as a boundary between the two nationalities. So also Wellh. Hist. 325 f.

‖ It may be doubted whether the present Kal'at er-Rabad, a height just on the N. of the Wādy 'Ajlun, with a commanding prospect (Merrill, Buhl, Geogr. 262), is sufficiently far to the north. It is also uncertain whether this 'Mizpah' is identical with the רָמַת הַמִּצְפֶּה of Jos 13^{26} (on the N. frontier of Gad). The abrupt way in which Mizpah is here introduced leads most critics to regard the notice respecting it as a gloss.

* The word rendered 'host' in 32^{2}, and 'company' in $32^{7. 8. 10. 21}$ 33^{8}, properly means camp, and is usually so rendered. It is a pity that a different rendering has been adopted here.

‡ With v.^{12} compare $28^{14. 15}$ (the phrasing, as 22^{17} 16^{10}).

§ Vv.$^{1. 2}$ belong to E; vv.$^{3-13a}$ to J.

‖ Notice that at v.^{21b} the narrative is at exactly the same point that it had reached at v.^{13a}.

¶ V.^{22} implies that Jacob had crossed it, v.^{23} that he had not. The two verses clearly belong to different sources. If, as most critics agree, vv.$^{22. 24-32}$ belong to J, the scene of the wrestling will have been S. of the Jabbok.

The dreaded meeting with Esau passes off happily (33^{1-17}). Jacob prepares for the worst (vv.$^{1-3}$); but Esau shows a generous and magnanimous spirit: he receives his brother with all friendliness, and inquires with interest after his children (vv.$^{4-7}$). He at first refuses Jacob's present; but Jacob by pressure induces him to accept it, no doubt hoping thereby to purchase the continuance of his good-will in the future (vv.$^{8-11}$).[*] Esau afterwards offers Jacob his protection for the rest of the journey, or at least some of his people as an escort; but Jacob declines both these offers; he will lay himself under no obligation to his brother, nor will he incur any risk of a rupture in the cordial relations now established between them (vv.$^{12-16}$). Esau accordingly returns to Edom; while Jacob moves on to Succoth (the name of which is explained from the booths [סֻכּוֹת] built by him there for his cattle). The site of Succoth is not more certainly known than that of Penuel: it was on the E. of Jordan (Jg $8^{4.5}$), in the valley, perhaps (Dillm.) near the ford of ed-Dâmiyeh (on the road from es-Salṭ to Nâblus), a little S. of the point where the Jabboḳ enters the Jordan.[†] After crossing the Jordan, Jacob advanced into the heart of the country, to Shechem. There he encamped in front of the city, and bought the plot of ground on which his tent rested, of the native Shechemites for 100 ḳesîṭahs.[‡] The purchase of this land is mentioned on account of the sequel: it was the place in which the bones of Joseph ultimately reposed (Jos 24^{32}); and it had the same interest and significance for the N. kingdom which the cave of Machpelah at Hebron (ch. 23) had for the kingdom of Judah.[§]

We come (ch. 34) to the somewhat remarkable narrative of the dealings of Jacob with Shechem. The chapter is plainly composite; but the criteria are in some cases ambiguous, so that critics are not fully agreed in their results. The main characteristics of the two narratives of which it is composed are, however, sufficiently clear. According to J,[‖] Shechem, son of Ḥamor, having seduced Jacob's daughter, Dinah, desires to obtain her from her father and brothers in marriage: they agree, only imposing a condition the nature of which in the existing text of J is not specified, but which Ḥamor at once accedes to (vv.$^{11.12.19}$); afterwards, however, Simeon and Levi, resenting keenly Ḥamor's treatment of their sister, fall upon him, without their brothers' knowledge, slay him and his father, and rescue Dinah; their father blames them severely for making him and his family unpopular among the native Canaanites, and endangering their lives; they reply that the honour of their tribe is above all such considerations: 'Should he deal with our sister as with an harlot?' Here the transaction has a personal character: only Shechem is involved; and his aim is the personal one of securing Dinah as his wife. According to the rest of the narrative,[¶] Shechem equally desires to obtain Dinah as his wife, but much wider interests are involved: the transaction assumes a national significance: Ḥamor proposes what is virtually an amalgamation of the two communities, with full reciprocal rights of trade and inter-marriage (vv.$^{8-10.\ 21-23}$): the sons of Jacob generally (not merely Simeon and Levi) speak on their sister's behalf: they impose the condition (which is here circumcision) not on Shechem only, but on the whole people (vv.$^{13-18}$); and the entire city experiences their vengeance (vv.$^{25\ \mathit{end.}\ 27-29}$). On the possible significance of this narrative, see p. 535.

[*] In the sense of the tradition, the contest, as Dillm. remarks, is plainly an external and physical one.

[†] In the rare word נֶאֱבַק for wrestle, vv.$^{24.25}$, there is a play on the name Jabboḳ (יַבֹּק), if not an explanation of its origin, as though it meant Wrestling (-stream).

[‡] Sayce's derivation (EHH 73, and elsewhere) from yāshar, 'to be upright,' 'to direct' (!), has nothing to recommend it.

[§] Cf. Arab. shariya, to persist, or persevere; conj. iii. (expressing the idea of rivalry) to persist or persevere against another (viz. in contention or wrangling). The same root is contained in Seraiah, 'Jah persists.' (The root means 'to strive' (RVm) only in the sense of to exert oneself, not in that of to contend. It has no connexion with sar, 'prince,' from sārar).

[‖] J from this point prefers, though not (in our existing texts) quite uniformly, Israel to Jacob as the designation of the patriarch.

[¶] With allusion to the often expressed belief that no one could 'see God and live' (Ex 19^{21} 33^{20}, Jg $6^{22f.}$ 13^{22}). Notice the adversative force of the Wāw consecutive (Ges. § 111*e*).

[] See Moore, Judges, 220 f., 223; G. A. Smith, HGHL 585 f. There was a Phœnician headland called θεοῦ πρόσωπον; and 'Penuel' may really, like this headland, have derived its name from some physical feature presented by it.

[*] V.^{10} 'forasmuch as I have seen thy face, as when one seeth the face of God' (i.e. I have found it as favourable), is manifestly, as Wellh. remarks, another explanation of the name Penuel. 'To see the face' is the phrase used of one admitted to the presence-chamber of a monarch, or other ruler (Gn $43^{3.5}$, 2 S $14^{24.28}$, 2 K 25^{19}; of God, Ps 11^{7}, Job 33^{26}), and, it is implied, viewed by his superior favourably. Jacob, by using this expression, pays Esau a high compliment. 'Beiden Wendungen der Sage liegt zu Grund, dass man in Peniel den unfreundlichen Gott als freundlichen erfährt' (Dillm.).

[‡] A piece of money (or metal) of uncertain value. It is mentioned besides only in Jos 24^{32}, Job 42^{11}.

[§] As Dinah, who (31^{41} comp. with 30^{21}) must have been quite an infant when Jacob left Ḥaran, appears of marriageable age in ch. 34, Jacob (if the narrative is to be treated as consistent) must be supposed to have passed some years at Succoth (or at Shechem, before the events mentioned in ch. 34 occurred); cf. Dillm. on $30^{25f.}$ 33^{17} 34^{1}.

[‖] Vv.$^{2b.3.5.7.11.12.19.25}$ ('two of the sons of Jacob, Simeon and Levi, Dinah's brethren, took each man his sword') $^{26.30.31}$. This narrative is naturally not quite complete, parts having been omitted when it was combined with the other narrative.

[¶] P; or (Wellh., Cornill, Holzinger) E, amplified in parts by a writer of the school of P.

From Shechem Jacob proceeds on his way to Bethel (about 20 miles S. of Shechem), a panic terror (35^{5}) restraining the natives of the neighbourhood from pursuing him. Bethel was the spot, which, when he was starting for Ḥaran some 20 years (31^{41}) previously, had been consecrated for him by his great dream (28$^{11-22}$); and now, in anticipation of visiting it again, he bade his household and retainers put away all 'foreign gods' from among them: the 'God of Bethel' (31^{13}) had proved Himself true to His promise (28^{15}); He had led His servant safely through many trials and anxieties; and at Bethel, in fulfilment of his vow (28^{22}), he would now build an altar to Him. Later generations pointed to the terebinth at Shechem (cf. Jos 24^{26}) as marking the spot at which the idols brought from Ḥaran (cf. Gn 31^{19}, Jos 24$^{2.\ 14.\ 23}$), and the amulets,* were buried by Jacob. The erection of the altar is narrated in 35^{7} (E, as also vv.$^{1-5.\ 8}$). P (35$^{9-13.\ 15}$) describes at this point a theophany, with a renewed promise to Jacob of a numerous and royal posterity, and of the gift of the land (vv.$^{11.\ 12}$); † to the same occasion he also assigns (v.^{10}) the change of name from Jacob to Israel, which J has narrated already at Penuel (32^{28}), and the origin of the name of Bethel, which J had connected with Jacob's former visit to the place (28^{19}). The relation of the 'pillar,' which, according to v.^{14} (probably J), Jacob set up, and upon which he is said also to have poured a drink-offering and oil, to the one mentioned previously in 28^{18} (E), is not clear; the verse may relate to a different 'pillar,' it may give a different version of the origin of the same 'pillar.' ‡

Leaving Bethel, Jacob continued his journey to the South. Shortly before reaching Ephrath, Rachel died in childbirth: she herself, so tradition told, called her son Ben-oni 'son of my sorrow,' but his father preferred a name of better omen, and called him Ben-jamin, 'son of the right hand.' § On the site of her grave, Jacob erected a 'pillar,' which still bore her name in the narrator's day (35^{20}). In 1 S 10^{2} Rachel's grave is distinctly stated to have been on the (Northern) border of Benjamin, not far from Bethel (cf. v.^{3}; and see also Jer 31^{15}): unless therefore there were different traditions respecting its site, the gloss 'the same is Beth-lehem' (in spite of its repetition in 48^{7}, and in spite also of its being in agreement with other statements, as Ru 4^{11}, Mic 5^{2}) is incorrect, and there were more localities than one called Ephrath. Still pursuing his way, Jacob next rested beyond the 'tower of Eder' (or 'of the flock'),—a place, of which (in spite of Mic 4^{8}) the situation is quite uncertain. P (35^{22b-29}) brings Jacob on to Hebron (v.^{27}; cf. 37^{14} JE). There Isaac (who was last mentioned as being at Beersheba *) dies; and (according to the same source, P) Jacob and Esau meet once more for the purpose of burying him (v.^{29}; cf. 25^{9}).

The active period of Jacob's life is now over: the rest of his days is passed in quietude; and Joseph becomes the moving spirit in the patriarchal family. Joseph was his father's favourite son; his brethren envied him; his dreams of future exaltation increased their jealousy; but his father fondly wondered what these dreams might signify (37^{12}). Jacob is still at Hebron, but his flocks are at Shechem,† tended by his other sons, and he sends Joseph thither to inquire after his brethren's welfare (37$^{12-14}$). Deceived in his old age by his sons, as he had in his youth deceived his own aged father, he receives with inconsolable grief the evidence, as it seems to him, of Joseph's cruel death (37$^{31-35}$). As the famine grows severe in Canaan, he sends his sons, but without Benjamin, who now naturally takes Joseph's place as his father's favourite, to buy corn in Egypt (42$^{1-4}$): upon their inauspicious return, his distress and grief find bitter expression in the reproachful words (42^{36}), 'Me have ye bereaved of my children: Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away; upon me are all these things come.' In the end, he is obliged to let Benjamin go back with his brethren into Egypt, but with characteristic prudence he sends with them a present calculated to win the favour of the great man of the land (43$^{11-13}$). The dénoûment soon follows; and ch. 45 recounts the delight with which he hears that his son is still alive, and receives the message to come and join him in Egypt (vv.$^{25-28}$). He sets forth from Hebron, journeys to Beersheba, the home of Isaac and of his own former days (27. 28^{10}), and there, when on the point of leaving for a second time the land of promise, and taking up his abode in the land of Egypt, receives a word of encouragement and promise suitable to the occasion (46$^{3.\ 4}$; cf. previously, at Bethel, 28$^{13-15}$). Israel thus 'went down into Egypt'; and a new and momentous epoch in the history of the nation was inaugurated. The list of Jacob's sons and grandchildren who accompanied him into Egypt is given by P (46$^{6-27}$).‡ Jacob meets his son Joseph in Goshen, and the wish of his heart is accomplished (46$^{29f.}$). Afterwards he is honourably received by the Pharaoh, and assigned, with his sons, a residence in the pastoral district of Goshen (47$^{1-4.\ 6b}$ [from 'in the land'] J; 47$^{5.\ 6a.\ 7-11}$ P). §

As the time drew near for Jacob to die, he made Joseph promise not to bury him in Egypt, but to lay him in the tomb of his fathers in Canaan

* This is the meaning of the 'rings' of 35^{4}.

† With v.^{11} cf. the passages cited p. 527 note ‡; and add 17^{6} ('kings').

‡ Cornill conjectures that this verse originally (without 'in the place where he spake with him') stood in close connexion with v.^{8}: in this case the 'pillar' would be a sepulchral stele (cf. v.^{20}), and the libations would be poured out as offerings to the dead (ZATW, 1891, p. 15 ff.; cf. Holzinger, Comm. p. 217).

§ Whether this is the true explanation of the name, must remain an open question. Sayce (EHH 79) agrees here with Stade (Gesch. i. 161) in thinking that the name (the 'Southerner') has really reference to the position of the territory of Benjamin on the S. of Ephraim.

* 28^{10} compared with 27$^{42-45}$: according to P (35^{28} compared with 25^{26} 26^{34}) eighty years previously, Jacob being now 120 years old! (According to JE, Jacob was but 20 years in Mesopotamia, 31^{41}; cf. p. 532^{b}).

† The author of this passage must have pictured Jacob's flocks as roaming pretty freely over the country (cf. v.^{17}, Dothan being about 15 miles N. of Shechem), if he himself was at Hebron. In view of ch. 34, the mention of their being at Shechem is remarkable; but the writer, it is possible, pictured the inhabitants of the neighbourhood as deterred by fear (cf. 35^{5}) from interfering with Jacob's possessions.

‡ On difficulties connected with the enumeration, esp. in vv.$^{26.\ 27}$, see the Commentaries.—An interesting illustration of Jacob's descent into Egypt is afforded by the representation, on a tomb at Beni-Hassan, of 37 Asiatics (Âmu), bringing a present of eye-paint, and two live ibexes, to Usertesen II., of the 12th dynasty, in his 6th year (c. B.C. 2600, Petrie). The procession is a remarkable one: it comprises men, women, and children, and two asses: the men wear long richly-coloured tunics, or in some cases coloured loin-cloths, and one is playing with a plectrum on a lyre of six strings. See Wilkinson-Birch, Anc. Egyp. 1878, i. 480; Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, 468–470; or Petrie, Hist. of Egypt, i. 172–174; also Hommel, AHT 52f.

§ The sequence in vv.$^{5.\ 6}$ is better in the LXX; see the Comms., or LOT pp. 10, 16 (^{6} 11, 17) n. The situation of Goshen, fixed approximately by tradition, has been determined definitely by the researches of M. Naville; it was the district lying between the three modern villages of Saft, Belbeis, and Tel el-Kebir, about 40 miles N.E. of Cairo.

(47^{29-31}). Ch. 48 narrates (1) how he adopted Joseph's two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, placing them on the same level with his own children (vv.$^{3-7}$ P); and (2) how he blessed them, giving at the same time the first place to the younger, Ephraim, in view of the future pre-eminence of the tribe descended from him (vv.$^{1-2.\ 8-20}$ JE). There follows a special promise and gift, made to Joseph (vv.$^{21.\ 22}$ E). The terms of v.^{22} are remarkable, 'And I give thee one shoulder * (shĕkhem) above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite with my sword and with my bow.' There is manifestly here an allusion to Shechem, afterwards an important and central place in the territory of Ephraim (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL 332–334), where also Joseph was buried (Jos 24^{32}); but nothing is said elsewhere of a conquest of Shechem by Jacob: it is evident that there is preserved here a version of Jacob's dealings with Shechem different from any which we find elsewhere.†

49^{2-27} contains the more elaborate poetical Blessing, which Jacob is said to have addressed to all his sons before his death. Throughout this Blessing what the poet really has in view are the tribes; as so often elsewhere in Genesis, the tribe is conceived as impersonated in its ancestor, and the ancestor foreshadows the character of the tribe. The poet passes the tribes in review: he singles out in each some striking feature of moral character, political state, or geographical position, for poetical amplification; and on each he pronounces some word of praise or blame, according to its deserts. The moral instability of Reuben, the disorganized social condition of Simeon and Levi, the ideal sovereignty and vine-clad territory of Judah, the maritime advantages enjoyed by Zebulun, the ignoble indifference which led Issachar to prefer ease to independence, the quick and effective attack of Dan, the warlike bravery of Gad, the richness of Asher's soil,‡ the blessings of populousness, military efficiency, climate, and soil, which, in spite of envious assailants, are showered upon Joseph, the martial skill and success of Benjamin, —these, briefly, are the features which the poet selects, and develops one after another, in varied and effective imagery. The historical and geographical conditions reflected in the poem are those of the period of the Judges, Samuel, and David; and this is the age in which the ancient tradition of the patriarch's Blessing must have received its present poetical form.

After this, we read, Jacob charged his sons to bury him in the family grave at Machpelah (49^{29-32} P: 47^{29-31} is parallel in JE), and then died (v.^{33} P). His body was embalmed, according to the Egyptian custom (50^{1-3}): a great funeral procession was organized, such as was usual in Egypt (50^{1-9}); § and he was buried in the land of Canaan, in the cave at Hebron ($50^{12.\ 13}$).‖

The chronology of Jacob's life presents serious difficulties: it is evident that the traditions (or theories) about it are inconsistent. (1) P's chronology, as often elsewhere in Gn, is entirely irreconcilable with that of JE. In ch. 27 (JE) Isaac is to all appearance upon his deathbed (cf. v.^{2}); yet according to P (25^{26} 26^{34} 35^{28}) he survived for eighty years, dying at the age of 180. Ussher, Keil, and others, arguing back from the dates given in 47^{9} 45^{6} 41^{46} 31^{41}, infer that Jacob's flight to Ḥaran took place in his 77th year: this reduces the 80 years to 43 years, though that is almost equally incredible; but it involves the fresh incongruity of supposing that thirty-seven years elapsed between Esau's marrying his Hittite wives (26^{34}), and Rebekah's expressing her fear (27^{46}) that Jacob, then aged seventy-seven, should follow his brother's example! Nor is it natural to picture Jacob seeking a wife in Ḥaran, and tending Laban's sheep, as a man 77 years old. (2) It may be doubted whether even the chronology of JE is perfectly consistent. (a) The supposition made p. 530 note § is required, as there explained, for consistency; but an unspecified sojourn of some years at either Succoth or Shechem is hardly consonant with the general tenor of the narrative of Jacob's return (31^{3}) from Ḥaran. It is true, in 37^{2} Joseph is said to be 17 years of age; but the years of Joseph's boyhood would be placed more naturally between 35^{22} and 37^{2} than at 33^{17} or 33^{19}. (b) Joseph is called (37^{3}) a son of Jacob's 'old age,' as though he were appreciably younger than his brethren: yet Zebulun and Dinah could not have been more than a year or two older (30^{20-24}); for all Jacob's children (except Benjamin) must have been born, at least according to E (see 31^{41}), between the 7th and the 16–17th years of his service with Laban (leaving, say, 4–3 years for the events narrated in 30^{25-43}). However, 37^{3} belongs very probably to the other source, J, which may have represented Joseph as born later. In P he is born when Jacob is about 90 (Gn 41^{46} [47 45^{6} E] 47^{9}).

Allusions to Jacob in subsequent parts of Scripture.—The most important are in Hosea, who already applies his history didactically:—

(1) Hos $12^{2-4\ (3-5)}$:—

[3] In the womb he supplanted his brother;
And in his strength he persisted with God:
[4] Yea, he persisted [וַיָּשַׂר] with the angel, and prevailed;
He wept, and made supplication unto him;
At Bethel he found him, and there he spake with him.*

The allusions to the incidents recorded in Gn 25^{26} 32^{28} 28^{13-15} are palpable. Ephraim is lax, indifferent, and frivolous: the ambition shown by its ancestor Jacob to secure pre-eminence even in the womb, the persistence with which afterwards he exerted himself to win the blessing, and the tears with which he sought it,† are held up as examples for its imitation.

(2) Hos $12^{12f.\ (13f.)}$:—

[12] And Jacob fled into the field of Aram,
And Israel served for a wife,
And for a wife he kept (sheep):
[13] But by a prophet did Jehovah bring Israel up out of Egypt,
And by a prophet was he kept (preserved).

For the allusions in v.^{12}, see Gn 27^{43} (cf. $35^{1.\ 7}$); $29^{18.\ 20.\ 30}$ 31^{41}. The flight, the penury, the hardships (cf. Gn 31^{38-41}) undergone by Jacob are contrasted with the deliverance of his descendants under the honourable guidance of a prophet.

In Dt 26^{5} 'An Aramæan ready to perish‡ was my father, and he went down into Egypt, and sojourned there, few in number; and he became there a nation, great, mighty, and populous,' the allusion is to Jacob's Aramæan connexions, and to his hard and perilous life as a shepherd in Aram-naharaim. Jacob is also most probably meant by 'thy first father' in Is 43^{27}. In Mal $1^{2.\ 3}$ (cited Ro 9^{13}) the reference is really national: see Gore in Studia Biblica, iii. 37 ff.; Sanday-Headlam, Romans, 245 ff.

The Character of Jacob.—Of all the characters which are sketched in any fulness in the OT, that of Jacob is the most mixed. On the one hand, he is by nature the 'supplanter': 'is he not,' exclaims Esau, 'rightly named Jacob, for he hath supplanted me these two times'? Twice he takes a mean advantage of his brother; he deceives his aged father; even where he does not directly overreach, prudence and expediency are the determining motives of his life; his thoughts centre in himself; he is ever striving to turn circumstances to his own profit, to make the most out of every opportunity. He is a striking contrast to his brother: Esau is frank, straightforward, and generous; Jacob is scheming, ambitious, and self-seeking; by fair means or foul, he sets himself to compass his ends. On the other hand, Jacob is not destitute of good qualities. He has a deeper and more stable character than Esau: Esau is governed by the impulses of the moment, is heedless of the future, has no thought for any but present and material goods: Jacob, if he is the 'Overreacher,' is also the 'Perseverer' ('Israel'); he possesses steadiness and consistency of purpose; he does not flinch from toil and exertion,—even Laban admits that he has served him well (30^{27}); he can labour and deny himself in order to attain a far-distant goal; he has cleverness, versatility, and diplomatic ability: he thus possesses qualities which, though they may be misdirected, are nevertheless adapted to form the foundation of a sound and genuine character. And one aim of the history of Jacob, as written in the Book of Genesis, is to show how, through the discipline and spiritual experiences of life, the better elements of a character may in the end prevail, and become its determining and predominant principles.

† In the parts of ch. 34 which belong to J, two of Jacob's sons wreak their vengeance on individual Shechemites; but Jacob himself repudiates their deed. The present passage shows that a version must have been current according to which Jacob (i.e. Israel as a whole) conquered and took possession of Shechem. This version is allied to, and perhaps underlies, the other narrative in ch. 34, according to which the sons of Jacob (and not Simeon and Levi alone) massacred the inhabitants of Shechem; but it is not said, or even implied, in this narrative that they retained the city as their own possession. (The statement in 33^{19} that Jacob purchased a piece of land outside the city, is of course not inconsistent with his forcible conquest of the city itself afterwards). ‡ Or, lost; the word is often used of a lost sheep, as Ezk $34^{4.\ 16}$

It may be asked how a character exhibiting so many doubtful qualities should have been selected by Providence as its chosen agent, and be represented as receiving so constantly the marks of God's care and approval (28^{13-15} $31^{12b.\ 13.\ 24}$ 32^{1} etc.). The answer, no doubt, is to be found in the fact that Providence does not judge by present appearances; and that Jacob possessed qualities which, in spite of the faults, and even the grave faults, by which they were accompanied, were qualities which, when purified, and elevated, and freed from purely personal aims, could be consecrated to the service of God, and made subservient to carrying out His purposes. The turning-point in his life is the struggle at Penuel. In all his dealings hitherto, whether with Esau or Laban, he has been true to his name, he has been the Supplanter or Overreacher. His treatment of Esau was without excuse: in his dealings with Laban, craft was matched against craft; though, in judging Jacob here, it is only right to remember that Laban not only takes the first dishonest step, but is throughout the chief offender. Had Laban treated Jacob honestly and generously, there is no reason to suppose that he would have sought to overreach him. But since Laban seeks, not once only, to profit at his expense, Jacob retaliates,—and, so far as material gains are concerned, wins. But, as has just been pointed out, Jacob's character includes inconsistent elements; and the struggle at Penuel marks the triumph of the higher over the lower elements in his character. It is the critical moment of his life. He is at the point of re-entering the land which he left twenty (31^{41}) years before; he is about to meet his brother whom he had wronged and deceived; memories of the past return upon him; his conscience smites him, and he is 'greatly afraid.' But God is his real antagonist, not Esau; it is God whom his sins have offended, and who here comes to contest His right. These thoughts and fears are, as it were, materialized in his dream. He struggles with his mysterious antagonist, and, as in his struggles with Esau and Laban, strives to win: he struggles bravely: nor can his antagonist overcome him, until by a divine touch He paralyzes his natural strength. Even then Jacob's tenacity of purpose remains unimpaired; he is conscious that he has a heavenly visitant in his embrace; and he will not let Him go until he has received from Him a blessing. The moment marks a spiritual change in Jacob's character. His carnal weapons are lamed and useless,—they fail him in his contest with God; as the result of his struggle his natural self is left behind, he rises from it an altered man. A new truth is vividly brought home to him,—the valuelessness before God of the weapons in which he has hitherto trusted. The lameness which he carries away with him is, as it were, a palpable memento of the fact. And his new name symbolizes his new nature. It is true, even before this, he has not been represented as destitute of religious feeling; his prayer in 32^{10} evinces humility, thankfulness, and a sense of dependence upon God. Indeed this prayer may be said to prepare psychologically for the spiritual struggle which follows. But it is the result of this struggle that henceforth the better and higher elements in his character assert themselves more strongly than they had done before. In his dealings with Esau in ch. 33 he is politic, and makes the best of the situation; but he cannot be said to treat his brother dishonourably. His rebuke of Simeon and Levi in 34^{30}, however, shows timidity and weakness, and is not prompted by any motive higher than expediency. In his old age domestic trials overtake him: he loses Rachel; for many years he is bereaved of his favourite son; the dread of losing another son weighs heavily upon him (42^{38} 43^{14}): his character is mellowed and softened; and the picture of his closing days is that of a just and God-fearing typical Israelite, strong in faith (48^{21}), and grateful for the Providence which had 'shepherded' him through his long course of anxieties and vicissitudes, and 'redeemed him from all evil' ($48^{15f.}$).

There remains the question, how far, and in what sense, the narratives relating to Jacob are historical. In approaching this question there are some important things to be borne in mind. (1) Upon any view of the Book of Genesis, it was not committed to writing for many centuries after the events described in it occurred: we thus possess no guarantee whatever that it contains a literally exact record of the acts and sayings of the patriarchs; for it does not satisfy the primary canon of sound historical criticism, that only narratives contemporary, or nearly so, with the events narrated, and, moreover, consistent with themselves, can claim such a character. (2) It is remarkable how, in Gn, individuals and tribes seem to be placed on the same level, and to be spoken of in the same terms, and how, further, individuals seem frequently to be the impersonation of homonymous tribes. Thus Bethuel is mentioned as an individual (22^{23} 24^{15} al.), but his brothers Uẓ and Buz are tribes ($22^{21f.}$). Ḳeṭurah, again, is described as an individual (25^{1}); but her sons and grandsons are tribes (25^{2-4}). In Gn 10 nations are quite manifestly represented as individuals; and one of them, Cush, has, conversely, an individual for his son (10^{8}). So elsewhere: Machir, in Gn 50^{23} an individual, in Nu 26^{29} 'begets' (the country) Gilead; in Jg 11^{1} Gilead 'begets' Jephthah.† Again, Canaan, Japheth, and Shem, in Noah's blessing (Gn 9^{25-27}), clearly represent three groups of nations: Ishmael (16^{12}) is in character the personification of the desert tribes whose descent is traced to him (25^{13-15}): Esau 'is Edom' (25^{30} $36^{1.8.19}$; cf. Jer 49^{10})), and Edom is the name of a people. More than this, 'Jacob' and 'Israel' are themselves national names, the latter a standing one, the former a poetical synonym (Gn 49^{7}, even in Jacob's own mouth; Nu $23^{21.23}$, Dt 32^{9} 33^{28}, Hos 10^{11} 12^{2}, Am $7^{2.5}$, and frequently). Heredity is undoubtedly a true principle: children inherit the qualities of their parents; they also often experience, for good or for ill, as the case may be, the consequences of their parents' acts; but it would be extending the principle altogether unduly to suppose that the character and political condition of an entire group of peoples were really determined by a father's curse upon their ancestor (Gn 9^{25}), or to imagine that the whole subsequent history of two of the Israelitish tribes was fixed in reality (49^{5-7}) by an act of their ancestors, in which, after all, they were merely maintaining, by means consistent with the manners of the age, the honour of a sister. In cases such as these, we can surely have only the explanations devised either by popular imagination, or by a poet interpreting the mind of his people, for the purpose of accounting for national character, and national conditions, as they existed at a later age.

* At least according to J (30^{31-43}). According to E ($31^{4-16.\ 26-43}$), Laban arbitrarily and unfairly changes Jacob's wages; but Jacob's gains are not due to his own artifices, but to the dispositions of Providence (31^{8-12}). As the two narratives are thus derived from different sources, it follows that $31^{5b.\ 7-9.\ 12.\ 24.\ 29}$ do not express, or imply, divine approval of the artifices described in 30^{31-42}.

* AV, RV, entirely losing the metaphor, 'fed.'

† Comp. the curious notice of 'Ephraim' in 1 Ch 7^{20-24} (see art. BERIAH).

Admitting, however, that these principles are true, how far may they be adopted in explanation of the patriarchal narratives? Are Jacob and his twelve sons, Esau, and Laban simply the personifications of corresponding peoples, Israel and the 12 tribes, Edom, and Syria (like Hellen, with his sons, Dorus and Æolus, and his grandsons, Achæus and Ion, among the Greeks), the characteristic features of each being reflections of the circumstances and relations of the age which gave them birth (cf. Wellh. Hist. 318–325)?* An unsubstantial figure, like Canaan, might be an example of such personification; but the abundance of personal incident and detail makes such a view improbable in the case, at least, of the principal patriarchal characters. May they then represent tribes and sub-tribes? in other words, may the movements, and mutual relations, of tribes and sub-tribes have been expressed in a personal and individual form? This is Ewald's view. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob represent the successive migratory movements of Hebrew tribes from the original common home of the Hebrew and Aramæan nationalities in Aram-naharaim across the Euphrates. Jacob's father was a Hebrew already settled in Canaan: his mother was an Aramæan (Gn 25^{20}); he marries two Aramæan wives: after a long contest with his uncle (and father-in-law) Laban, 'the Aramæan' (25^{20} 28^{5} $31^{20.24}$), he ultimately comes to terms with him, returns to Canaan with great wealth, and finally gives his name to the people settled there: this means that a new and energetic branch of the Hebrew race migrated from its original home in Aram-naharaim, pushed forward into Canaan, amalgamated there with the Hebrews ('Isaac') already on the spot (becoming thereby Isaac's 'son'), and, in virtue of the superior practical abilities displayed by it, acquired ultimately supremacy over all its kin: the contest with Laban 'represents the struggle which continued, probably for centuries, between the crafty Hebrews on the opposite banks of the Euphrates, showing how in the end the southern Hebrews gained the upper hand and the northern were driven off in derision': Edom was a branch ('son') of the tribe represented by 'Isaac'; 'Jacob,' becoming fused with this tribe, is Esau's 'brother,' but at the same time his younger brother, as arriving later in Canaan,—though, as he became afterwards the more powerful nation, he is described as having wrested from him his birthright: similarly, Jacob's wives and sons represent the existence of different elements in the original community, and the growth of tribal distinctions within it.* Ewald, however, holds at the same time that Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph are historical characters, prominent leaders of the nation at successive stages of its history (pp. 301, 305 f., 340, 342, 345, 382).† Again, the amount of personal incident and detail in the patriarchal narratives seems to constitute an objection to this explanation of their meaning: would the movements of tribes be represented in this veiled manner on such a large scale as would be the case if this explanation were the true one? No doubt, there are elements of truth in both these explanations: each will account reasonably for some traits in the patriarchal narratives: the question is, whether they will account for all.

The view which on the whole may be said best to satisfy the circumstances of the case is the view that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are historical persons, and that the accounts which we have of them are in outline historically true, but that their characters are idealized, and their biographies in many respects coloured by the feelings and associations of a later age. 'J,' says Mr. Ottley,‡ and his remarks are equally true of E, 'describes the age of the patriarchs as in some essential respects so closely similar to later periods, that it can only be regarded as a picture of primitive life and religion drawn in the light of a subsequent age. We have here to do with the earliest form of history—traditional folk-lore about primitive personages and events, worked up according to some preconceived design by a devout literary artist.' The basis of the narratives in Genesis is in fact popular oral tradition; and that being so, we may expect them to display the characteristics which popular oral tradition does in other cases. They may well include a substantial historical nucleus: but details may be due to the involuntary action of popular invention or imagination, operating during a long period of time; characteristic anecdotes, reflecting the feelings, and explaining the relations, of a later age may thus have become attached to the patriarchs; phraseology and expression will nearly always be ascribed rightly to the narrators who cast these traditions into their present literary shape. One very conspicuous interest in these narratives is the explanation of existing facts and institutions—the fact, for instance, that Edom, though an older nation than Israel (36^{31}), was nevertheless politically its inferior, the sanctity of Bethel and its famous monolith, the names borne both by Israel itself and by its twelve tribes, the origin of the great border-cairn on Gilead, the names of places, as Bethel, Maḥanaim, Penuel, Succoth, Allon-bachuth, Abel-mizraim, the custom of not eating of a particular muscle (32^{32}), the ethnological relations subsisting between Israel and its neighbours (Ishmaelite tribes, 25$^{12-17}$; Edom, and the racial affinities of its inhabitants, ch. 36), the characteristics of the different tribes (48^{19}; ch. 49). It may be doubted whether in all these cases we have the real historical explanations of the facts in question, and not rather explanations due to popular imagination, or suggested by current etymologies: in some cases, it will be remembered, we find duplicate and inconsistent traditions respecting the same occurrences. Wellhausen may be wrong in not allowing a more substantial historical substratum for the patriarchal narratives; but his general characterization of them is just.[*] † Dillmann's view is substantially that of Ewald: recollections of tribal movements are preserved in the family histories of Genesis; Isaac and Jacob, like Lot, Ishmael, Esau, and their sons, being 'ideal personal names,' derived either from subdivisions of the nation as it existed at a later time, or from historical stages of its growth, Jacob representing a new Hebrew immigration from Mesopotamia; Abraham, however, being the personal leader of the first band of immigrants, who, according to all the Pentateuchal narrators, was the spiritual father of the entire nation (Gen.^{6} 218, 219, 316 [Eng. tr. vol. ii. pp. 1–5, 190]; AT Theol. 77 f., 79–81). (Dillmann's remarks on these narratives of Genesis contain much that is suggestive and excellent, and deserve to be read in their entirety). The view of Kittel (Gesch. i. 153 [Eng. tr. i. 168 ff.]) is similar, except that he treats the patriarchs more distinctly as personal tribal chiefs, who afterwards gave their names to the tribes led by them.

‡ Bampton Lectures, p. 109.

It must further be allowed that the characters of the patriarchs are coloured religiously by the feelings and beliefs of a later age. In the days of the patriarchs, religion must have been in a rudimentary stage: there are traces of this in the idea, for instance, of the revelations of deity being confined to particular spots, and in the reverence paid to sacred trees or pillars; but at the same time the patriarchs often express themselves in terms suggesting much riper spiritual capacities and experiences. Here we cannot but trace the hands of the narrators, who were men penetrated by definite moral and religious ideas, and who, writing with a didactic aim, idealized to a certain extent the characters of the patriarchs, and, while not stripping them of the distinctive features with which they were traditionally invested, so filled in the outlines supplied by tradition as to present the great figures of Hebrew antiquity as spiritual types, examples, for imitation or warning, as the case might be, for successive generations.

The patriarchs are, thirdly, idealized in another direction, in common with many of the other patriarchal figures in Genesis, by being invested with the characteristics which afterwards marked the tribes descended, or reputed to be descended, from them:[†] indeed it is possible that sometimes even episodes of tribal life are referred back to them in the form of incidents occurring within the limits of their own families. Ishmael, for instance, in 16^{12} may be the personal son of Abraham; but if he is this, he is also something more: he impersonates the Bedawîn of the desert. So Jacob and Esau, in their contest for supremacy, are more than the twin sons of a man named Isaac: they impersonate two nations; and the later relations subsisting between these two nations plainly colour parts of the narrator's representation (esp. the terms of the Blessings). Jacob, keeping Laban's sheep, may be an individual; but when he and Laban are fixing the boundary which neither is to pass, they plainly represent two peoples. The story of Shechem and Dinah is one in which especially it may be suspected that this explanation is the correct one. Jg 9 shows how, after the conquest, Israelites and Canaanites lived in Shechem side by side; the almost complete identity of expression between Gn 33^{19} 'the sons of Ḥamor, the father of Shechem,' and Jg 9^{28} 'the men of Ḥamor, the father of Shechem' (where Shechem is clearly the place),[‡] raises a legitimate doubt whether in the former passage 'Shechem' does not mean the place as well, and whether therefore in ch. 34 the same name is not a personification of the inhabitants of the place: if this view be correct, ch. 34 will mean that an Israelite clan (Dinah) had gained a footing in Shechem, and was in danger of being absorbed by the native Canaanites (the Benê Ḥamor): Simeon and Levi interposed to prevent this;[*] but their action was not supported by the Israelites at large ('Jacob,' 34^{30}); cf. 49$^{5.6}$. Gn 49^{7}, it has even been conjectured, contains an allusion to the result: the Canaanites retaliated with such effect that these two tribes were broken up, and never afterwards recovered from the blow.[†] See art. SIMEON (TRIBE).

But, however that may be, it is impossible not to be impressed by the remarkable manner in which Jacob, both in the brighter and in the darker aspects of his character, is the prototype of his descendants. His doubtful qualities exactly recall that remarkable faculty of acquiring wealth and influence which the Jew possesses in such an extraordinary degree, and which, as must be admitted by his best friends, he is unfortunately apt to exercise with an exaggerated regard to self-interest. 'By Jacob's peculiar discipline of exile and suffering, a true counterpart is produced of the special faults and special gifts, known to us chiefly through his persecuted descendants in the Middle Ages. Professor Blunt has, with much ingenuity, pointed out how Jacob seems to have "learned, like maltreated animals, to have the fear of man habitually before his eyes."[‡] In Jacob we see the same timid, cautious watchfulness that we know so well, though under darker colours, through our great masters of fiction, in Shylock of Venice, and Isaac of York. But no less, in the nobler side of his career, do we have the germs of the unbroken endurance, the undying resolution, which keeps the nation alive still even in its present outcast condition, and which was the basis, in its brighter days, of the heroic zeal, long-suffering, and hope of Moses, of David, of Jeremiah, of the Maccabees, of the twelve Jewish apostles, and the first martyr, Stephen.'[§]

JACOB'S WELL.—The ancient records contain no account of Jacob having dug a well. The earliest mention of it occurs in Jn 4^{6} (πηγὴ τοῦ Ἰακώβ). There, however, it is taken as matter of common belief that the well by which our Saviour conversed with the woman of Samaria was made by the patriarch. The traditions of Jew, Moslem, and Christian concur in identifying this well with that now universally known by the name Bîr Ya'ḳûb, or 'Jacob's well.' The Samaritans, who have dwelt in the locality for about 2300 years, have never wavered in their conviction that this was the work of Jacob. The circumstances connected with the founding of their community would lead them to make the most of all traditional associations which their neighbourhood afforded, with the fathers of Israel. That they were tempted in some cases to invent such associations, seems all too likely; but there are elements which go to confirm this tradition. It is in itself a strong presumption in favour of this site, that the Jewish belief coincides with that of the Samaritans. Considering the strenuous opposition offered to other identifications supported by the Samaritans, we may be sure this would not have escaped had there been any ground on which to attack it. The agreement indicated in the narrative between the Jews and Samaritans in the 1st cent. may be taken to prove the existence of a tradition inherited by both from a time anterior to the great quarrel. But the tradition also afforded a reasonable explanation of the presence of the well in this particular spot, in such close proximity to plentiful streams from perennial sources. These were naturally in the hands of the people of Shechem. When Jacob pitched his camp in the plain near by, being a man of peace, he would desire to avoid all occasion for the strifes so often arising from the contentions of rival herdsmen at the springs. By digging this well, he could secure the necessary supplies, make good his own independence, and enjoy an added assurance of peace. Jacob's residence here in such conditions is the one circumstance recorded in history which satisfactorily accounts for the existence of this well.

That it was here Jesus held His memorable interview with the woman of Samaria, seems beyond dispute. Going through Samaria to Galilee, Jesus must needs pass close by this place. As one journeys northward along the base of Mt. Gerizim, skirting the fertile plain of Mukhneh, almost opposite the entrance to the pass between Ebal and Gerizim, the road bifurcates, one branch bending to westward, through the vale to Shechem, and thence by way of Sebastîyeh (Samaria) and Jenîn to Galilee. The other goes northward, across the bay of the plain where it narrows between the mountains, and again divides; one limb passing downwards to Beisân and the Sea of Galilee, the other leading straight to Jenîn. Either of these roads may still be taken. While that past Sebastîyeh is naturally the more frequented to-day, the other is more direct; and it is impossible to say which was the more popular in Christ's time. But as the well in question lies in the fork between the two, it was equally easily accessible to the traveller from either.

The well is described as being close by Sychar, 'near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph' (Gn 48[22]). If, as seems certain, this was the plot spoken of in Gn 33[19], it lay before, i.e. to the east of, the city of Shechem, where, in the plain, the patriarch had chosen his residence. It became, according to St. Stephen (Ac 7[16]), the burying-place of those that went down to Egypt; and here the bones of Joseph were laid to rest (Jos 24[32]). The modern town of Nâblus, representing the old Shechem, lies in the hollow between Ebal and Gerizim, less than 2 miles to the west, and is apparently farther distant than was the ancient city. The traditional tomb of Joseph is seen in the vale close by to the north-east; and just beyond this, to the lower slopes of Mount Ebal clings the village of 'Askar, which probably represents the town of Sychar mentioned in the narrative (see 'The Question of Sychar' in G. A. Smith's HGHL pp. 367–375). Eastward and southward stretches the rich plain which attracted Jacob and his flocks, whose whitening fields arrested the Saviour's eye, and where valuable crops are grown to-day.

Mount Gerizim throws its rugged crags steeply against the sky, immediately to the south, and, crowning the heights, just behind the Moslem Wely seen from the well's mouth, are the ruins of Justinian's fortress and the Samaritan place of sacrifice, enshrined in the sacred memories of millenniums. The dark cliffs seem almost to impend over the spot, so that it would be most natural, standing at the brink of the well, to speak of it as 'this mountain.' In these respects the situation of Bîr Ya'ḳûb exactly meets the requirements of the history.

The mouth of the well is some feet below the present surface, in the midst of a vaulted chamber, about 15 ft. square, the roof of which has fallen in. Major Anderson made a descent into the well in 1866, an account of which he gives in the Recovery of Jerusalem, p. 465. 'The mouth of the well,' he says, 'has a narrow opening, just wide enough to allow the body of a man to pass through with arms uplifted, and this narrow neck, which is about 4 ft. long, opens into the well itself, which is cylindrically shaped, and about 7 ft. 6 in. in diameter. The mouth and upper part of the well is built of masonry, and the well appears to have been sunk through a mixture of alluvial soil and limestone fragments, till a compact bed of mountain limestone was reached, having horizontal strata which could easily be worked; and the interior of the well presents the appearance of having been lined throughout with rough masonry.' The estimates of depth have varied widely, from Arculfus (A.D. 670), who gives it as about 240 ft., to Maundrell (1697), who puts it at 105 ft.; and Major Anderson, who found it to be 75 ft. No doubt it was originally much deeper than it is now. In the decay of the several buildings that have stood over it, much rubbish must have fallen into it, and the habit travellers have of dropping a stone into a pit and watching how long it takes to reach the bottom, that so they may judge of the depth, contributed to the same result. This now, however, is carefully guarded against. Some years ago the well, and ground around it, were acquired by the authorities of the Greek Church in Nâblus. A dry-stone wall surrounds the plot, which has been planted out as an orchard, the keeper being accommodated in a small hovel by the gate. Over the well itself a hut has been built, the key of which is in charge of a neighbouring priest, in whose company the well may be visited.

A succession of churches stood on this spot, as we gather from the narratives of pilgrims. The last appears to have been destroyed after the crushing defeat of the Crusaders in 1187. An excellent account of the ruins of these buildings will be found in the PEF Mem. ii. p. 174, etc. A stone was found in 1881 (see PEFSt, p. 212), which may have been the original cover of the well.

The water now usually lasts until the month of May, and sometimes later. Then it disappears until the return of the rainy season. If the well were cleaned out, doubtless it would last much longer. Maundrell found 15 ft. of water in May 1697. The supply is therefore probably derived from percolation and rainfall; and apparently it has never risen near to the surface—the woman says 'the well is deep.' This possibly suggested to Jesus the phrase 'living water' as descriptive of His truth. For 'living water' is, in the language of the East, that of the fountain or stream as contrasted with that collected in cistern or well. In Jn 4[5] the name used is indeed πηγὴ τοῦ Ἰακώβ, the well or fountain of Jacob; but in vv.[11. 12] the woman uses the strictly accurate term τὸ φρέαρ, the water-tank or cistern. For most purposes, living water is preferred; but where this is very 'hard' or 'heavy,' like that 'gushing from the very bowels of rocky (limestone) Mount Ebal,' the 'light' water that descends from heaven is greatly valued. Thus the water of Jacob's well is highly esteemed by the modern inhabitants of Nâblus and district (see letter from Dr. Bailey, a former missionary in Nâblus, PEFSt, 1897, p. 67; cf. also pp. 149, 196).* If the same were true in our Lord's time, apart altogether from the sacred associations which would lend it special attractions, it would be sufficient to account for the presence of the woman there, even if her home were on the lip of the rushing stream at 'Askar.

The latter verse seems to make him contemporary with Darius the Persian, i.e. Darius III. He is there said to have married Augia, a daughter of Zorzelleus or Barzillai, and to have been called after his name. In Ezr 2^{61}, Neh 7^{63} he is called by his adopted name Barzillai; his original name Jaddus, and the name of his wife Augia, appear only in 1 Es. See BARZILLAI, No. 1.

JADON (יָדוֹן, Εὐαράων, Ἰαερειν, Ἰαρί, Ἰαρίμ, Ἀαρών; ABℵ omit; Neh 3^7).—A Meronothite, who in company with the men of Gibeon and of Mizpah took part in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem. The title Meronothite occurs again 1 Ch 27^{30}, but a place Meronoth is nowhere named. According to Jos. Ant. VIII. viii. 5, ix. 1, J. was the name of the man of God sent from Judah to Jeroboam (1 K 13). This tradition probably rests upon the identification of this prophet with IDDO the seer (which see).

JAEL (יָעֵל 'mountain-goat'; see on the name, Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 90) is remembered on account of one famous episode in her life, of which we have two not altogether consistent accounts—one in prose (Jg 4$^{4-22}$), the other in poetry (Jg 5$^{2-31}$). We shall first examine the latter, as undoubtedly the earlier version, and then consider the additional information supplied by the prose narrative.

From the Song of Deborah we learn that Deborah, a prophetess, and Barak, determined to free their countrymen from the tyranny of the kings of Canaan (5$^{6.19}$), which seems to have been especially felt by the tribe of Issachar (v.^{15}). The leader of these kings was Sisera, and against his army the tribes of Ephraim, Benjamin, Manasseh (v.^{14}), Issachar (v.^{15}), Zebulun, and Naphtali sent troops, the latter two tribes being especially active (v.^{18}). The decisive battle was fought 'in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo' (v.^{19}), where a great storm came on and 'the stars in their courses fought against Sisera' (v.^{20}). The defeated leader escaped, and is described (v.^{25}) as asking for hospitality from Jael, 'the wife of Heber the Kenite' (v.^{24}). She gave the thirsty man to drink of the milk which would naturally be found in the tent of a nomad chieftain, and then 'she put her hand to the peg (יָתֵד), and her right hand to the workmen's hammer; and with the hammer she smote Sisera, she smote through his head, yea, she pierced and struck through his temples. At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay; where he bowed, there he fell down dead' (vv.$^{26.27}$). For this exploit she is described in Deborah's triumphal ode as 'blessed above women.'

The first question to determine is, by what instrument and in what fashion is Jael here represented as having slain Sisera? Most modern critics (Cooke, Moore, Budde, etc.) hold that the words of vv.$^{26.27}$ indicate that Sisera was struck down as he was in the act of drinking, Jael dealing him a sudden blow, much as Saladin slew the treacherous knight in Scott's Talisman. And some identify the 'peg' with the handle of the 'workmen's hammer' mentioned in the parallel clause of v.^{26}. Thus W. R. Smith held that Jael's act was 'not the murder of a sleeping man, but the use of a daring stratagem. But the word "peg" suggested a tent-peg, and so the later prose story took it, and thereby misunderstood the whole thing' (OTJC^{2} 132). But it is extremely doubtful whether יָתֵד can mean anything but a 'tent-pin' (Ex 27^{19}) or 'peg' (Is 22^{25}, Ezk 15^3); and, further, the meaning of the verbs מָחַק (ἅπ. λεγ.) and חָלַף (see Job 20^{24}) is too uncertain to entitle us to assert that there is here no hint of piercing, as contrasted with crushing, Sisera's skull. The truth is that vv.$^{26.27}$ of ch. 5 are too obscure to admit of dogmatism as to their meaning; and it is by no means clear that they were misunderstood by the writer of the later prose narrative (4^{22}), whose account is: 'Jael took a tent-pin (יָתֵד), and took an hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the pin into his temples, and it pierced through into the ground; for he was in a deep sleep: so he swooned and died.'

The prose narrative, then, is not necessarily in contradiction with the Ode as to the manner of Sisera's death, though undoubtedly, if we had only the Ode to guide us, we should not be able to reproduce the scene described in 4^{21}. The prose narrator seems to have had independent information, oral or otherwise.

There are other points of difference between chs. 4 and 5 which make it probable that the later writer has made free use of sources other than the Song. (a) As we have seen, 5$^{14.15.18}$ describes the uprising of many tribes; but in 4^{10} Barak collects 10,000 men from Zebulun and Naphtali only. It cannot, however, be denied that these are the tribes whose prowess is most prominent in the Song (5^{18}). (b) In the poem, kings of Canaan are mentioned, of whom Sisera is the leader; in 4^2 Sisera is the general of Jabin, king of Canaan (or [4^{17}] of Hazor), under whose tyranny the people of Israel had been 'mightily oppressed' for twenty years (4^3). (c) The connexion of Jabin with the Jael-Sisera story is not clear. Jabin takes no part in the action; and it is possible that he has been introduced here through a reminiscence of Jabin, king of Hazor, the head of a Canaanite confederacy, whose army Joshua defeated at the Waters of Merom (Jos 11$^{1-11}$). (d) Jabin's city, Hazor, was in Galilee, far distant from the Kishon Valley; and Kedesh is north of Hazor. Here (4^{11}) were Heber's tents,* to which Sisera fled after his defeat, having first (4^{15}) abandoned his chariot with the view of escaping his pursuing enemy. But (α) it is curious that Sisera should have passed by Jabin's stronghold when seeking shelter;† and (β) it is difficult to reconcile the geographical data of the prose version with the implication that Jael's tent was not far from the battlefield.

To return to the episode of Sisera's death at the hands of Jael. The prose version makes the case against Jael blacker than the song does; for (a) in 4^{18} she invites Sisera to her tent, (b) in 4^{20} his trustful reliance on her loyalty is shown by his charge to her to stand at the tent door and deny, if asked, that any one lay concealed within; and (c) in 4^{21} she kills him when asleep. But, on either story, her act seems one of black and inexcusable treachery; and difficulty has been felt in reconciling the words of approval in 5^{24} with the verdict of conscience. Various expedients have been devised to evade the difficulty. It has been supposed that Jael was granted a revelation from God (cf. Jg 4^{9}) bidding her slay Sisera, and that her action is to be compared to Joshua's alleged pitiless extermination of the aboriginal inhabitants of Canaan, in accordance with the command recorded in Dt $7^{1.2}$. But this is to read something into the narrative for which there is no scriptural warrant; Jael seems to have acted entirely on her own initiative. Mozley* gave a more plausible explanation. When Sisera was in Jael's power, he urges, she was in a dilemma; she must be treacherous to him or disloyal to Israel, for, if he got away safely, no one could tell how soon he might raise another army. Now she looked on him as an outlaw, as one who had no right to life or fair dealing, for the divine command had gone forth for the destruction of him and his host; and the idea of human personality, of the individual's private rights, was little developed in that primitive age. And thus she was justified, relatively to the morality of her time, in killing Sisera; and the commendation of 5^{24} is to be interpreted in like manner as expressing the natural feelings of a semi-barbarous people. This explanation, though valuable as laying stress on the rude condition of the Hebrew conscience in the early stages of Hebrew history, is not altogether satisfactory. For Jael's act was not in accordance with contemporary morality.† It was a violation of the duty of hospitality, conspicuously sacred among her countrymen and in her age. To such a degree did Lot regard it that he was willing to purchase the safety of his guests by the honour of his daughters (Gn 19^{8}). And, according to the prose narrative, Sisera was not Jael's enemy: 'There was peace between Jabin, king of Hazor, and the house of Heber the Kenite' (Jg 4^{17}). Thus she must have been in danger from the advance of Barak's army, flushed with victory, in whose track her tent lay, unless she could devise some plan for propitiating the conqueror. Self-preservation suggested the way of escape, and she adopted it. 'Come and I will show thee the man whom thou seekest,' she said to Barak (4^{22}).

* The letter is quoted in HGHL^{3} p. 676.

* In Jg 1^{16} it is recorded that 'the children of the Kenite, Moses' brother-in-law,' accompanied the tribe of Judah to the north of Palestine after the conquest of the country. After some unspecified time, Heber, seemingly an important person among them, moved northward to the territory of Naphtali, and 'pitched his tent as far as the oak in Zaanannim, which is by Kedesh' (4^{11}). While living there, he seems, according to 4^{17}, to have formed an alliance with Jabin.

† It might be urged that Sisera may have thought the tent of the women a more secure haven than Jabin's city; a defeated and discredited general might well fear to return to his master.

But whether her motive was patriotic or selfish, the 'moral difficulty' of the narrative is serious only to those who do not recognize the gradual education of mankind. Jael's act was not moral according even to her own standard, and thus to compare her with Judith or with Charlotte Corday is not quite apt. The approval of Deborah's Song must be ranked with those passages in the imprecatory Psalms which breathe at times the cruel and vengeful spirit of man, rather than the Spirit of God. See DEBORAH, HEBER, JABIN, SISERA.

JAGUR (יָגוּר).—A town in the extreme south of Judah, Jos 15^{21}. The site is unknown.

JAH (יָהּ).—An abbreviated form of Jahweh (יַהְוֶה), found chiefly in proper names, but occasionally also besides. The form of the abbreviation is in accordance with analogy: the apocopation of the last syllable gave rise to yahw, and this, by the principles of the Massoretic vocalization, became yāhū (cf. tṓhū from tohw, and, what is even a closer parallel, yishtaḥăweh, shortened after the wāw consecutive into yishtáḥū, in pause yishtā́ḥū, through an intermediate form, not recognized by the Massoretes, yishtaḥw); and yāhū (יָהוּ) was afterwards shortened to yāh (יָהּ—with mappiq), and ultimately (in proper names) to yāʰ (יָה).

(1) Proper names, of which the second element is yāh, are very numerous in Hebrew: Mr. Gray (Studies in Heb. Proper Names, p. 284 ff.) enumerates 127 (e.g. Abijah, Uriah, Isaiah, etc.). The reader who is not conversant with Hebrew ought, however, to know that in the original the form in very many of these proper names is yā́hū: on the whole, it may be said that the earlier form is yā́hū, and the later form yāh (the h 'quiescing'); but there are exceptions to this rule, and sometimes both forms occur side by side in the same context.

Thus, to take a few examples (the names, in their earlier parts are written generally in their English form), we have in 1 K 1–2 Adoniyāhū, except in $1^{5.7.18}$ 2^{28} where we have Adoniyāh; Ahazyāhū occurs regularly in both K and Ch, except in 2 K 1^{3} $9^{16.23.27.29}$ 11^{2}, 2 Ch 20^{35} Aḥazyāh; the same is the case with Eliyāhū (Eliyāh 2 K $1^{3.4.8.12}$, Mal 3^{23}, and, not of the prophet, 1 Ch 8^{27}, Ezr $10^{21.26}$), Amazyāhū (Amazyāh 2 K 12^{22} 13^{12} 14^{8} 15^{1}, Am $7^{10.12.14}$, 1 Ch 4^{34} 6^{30}), Benayāhū (Benayāh 2 S 20^{23}, 1 Ch 4^{36} $11^{22.31}$ 27^{14}, 2 Ch 20^{14}, Ezk 11^{13} [v.^{1} Benayāhū], Ezr $10^{25.30.35.43}$), Yirmĕyāhū (the prophet), except 27^{1} $28^{5.6.10.11.12.12.15}$ 29^{1}, Dn 9^{2}, Ezr 1^{1}; Yesha'yāhū (the prophet Isaiah) uniformly (including 2 Ch 26^{22} $32^{20.32}$); Uzziyāhū (the king), except 2 K $15^{13.30}$, Hos 1^{1}, Am 1^{1}, Zec 14^{5}; Gedalyāhū (in 2 K 25, Jer 39–43) uniformly, except Jer $40^{5.6.8}$ 41^{16}; Hizkiyāhū (the king Hezekiah) uniformly, except 2 K $18^{1.10.13.14.15.16}$, Hos 1^{1}, Mic 1^{1}, Pr 25^{1}; 'Athalyāhū (the queen), both K and Ch, except 2 K $11^{1.3.13.14}$, 2 Ch 22^{12}; etc.: on the other hand, Uriyāh occurs everywhere, except Jer $26^{20.21.23}$ (Uriyāhū); Aḥiyāh is more common than Aḥiyāhū (only 1 K $14^{4.5.6.18}$, 2 Ch 9^{29}), occurring already in 1 S $14^{3.18}$, Malchiyāh than Malchiyāhū (Jer 38^{6}), Micah in Jg 17–18 than Micāyᵉhū ($17^{1.4}$), Neriyāh (Baruch's father) in Jer than Neriyāhū ($36^{14.32}$ 43^{6}), Nethanyāh in Jer 40–41 than Nethanyāhū (40^{8} 41^{9}). In Ezr-Neh proper names compounded with -yah are very numerous; but the form -yāhū occurs but once (Ezr 10^{41} Shelemyāhū): on the other hand, in the parts of Ch added by the compiler many of the names of Levites and others are written with -yāhū (see, e.g., 1 Ch $15^{18.21.22.24}$ $24^{21\text{-}26}$ $25^{12\text{ff.}}$ $26^{2.11.14}$ $27^{16\text{ff.}}$, 2 Ch 17^{8} $29^{12\text{f.}}$).*

(2) Outside proper names, Jah occurs only in poetry (mostly in late liturgical poetry), viz. Ex 15^{2} 'My strength and a song is Jah' (cited Is 12^{2}, Ps 118^{14}), Ex 17^{16} (if the text be sound) in a poetically-worded passage of E (see RVm), Is 26^{4} 'In Jah Jahweh is a rock of ages,' $38^{11.11}$ (Hezekiah's song), Ps $68^{4.18}$ 77^{11} 89^{8} $94^{7.12}$ 102^{18} $115^{17.18}$ $118^{5a.17.18.19}$ 122^{4} 130^{3} $135^{3.4}$ 150^{6a}; in three passages in which the Massoretes treat it (questionably) as part of a compound word, Jer 2^{31} (text dub.), Ca 8^{6}, Ps 118^{5b} (read prob. as RV); and in 'Hallelujah' (written in MT as one word, הַלְלוּיָהּ) 23 times (see HALLELUJAH) between Ps 104^{35} and 150^{6b} (always as a liturgical formula at the beginning or end of a Psalm).† It would be natural to think of the abbreviated form as first arising in connexion with proper names; but it is difficult to reconcile this view with Ex 15^{2} 17^{18}, supposing the text of these passages to be sound, and the passages really early. The great majority of the occurrences of the word are indisputably late.

It was argued by Friedr. Delitzsch in 1881 (Paradies, pp. 158–166), in opposition to the generally accepted view, that Yah or Yahu was the original name of the God of Israel, and continued always to be the popular name; Yahweh was a later modification of Yahu, designed for the purpose of establishing a connexion with hāwāh, to be (or come to be), and so of making the name the expression of a theological truth (above, p. 199^{b}). The principal grounds alleged for this opinion were the occurrence of the shorter form in all proper names, and the supposed traces of the name among Semitic nations (other than the Hebrews), who did not use the verb hāwāh, and could not consequently have formed a name from it. The same opinion has been adopted by Hommel (AHT 113 f., 115 f., 144, 145, 226), who follows Mr. Pinches* in thinking, in particular, that Yah is identical with Aï or Ya, found in an Arabian name Aï-kalabu on a contract-tablet of c. B.C. 2300, and in various Assyrian names (as Abu-Aï, Ashur-Aï, Samas-Aï) of 9–8 cent. B.C., and who, inferring from these indications the antiquity of the form, concludes that Yahweh is a later Mosaic modification of Yah, introduced for the purpose of imparting to it a new significance. Delitzsch's theory was criticized at the time by Philippi:† in view of the fact that Jahweh is the standing form of the name in the OT, and is attested independently for c. B.C. 850 by Mesha, while Jah, as shown above, is exceptional and mostly late, it is exceedingly difficult to think that the latter can be really the more original form; while its occurrence in proper names is sufficiently accounted for by the tendency to abbreviation which would there be natural. The opinions of Pinches and Hommel have not hitherto (so far as the writer is aware) been endorsed by other Assyriologists.‡

* When yahw forms the first element of a proper name, it becomes—through an intermediate yĕhaw (cf. גְּבַר from גֶּבֶר)—yĕhō, yō (as Jehoram, Joram); see Gray, p. 281 ff., who enumerates 29 names of this type; cf. p. 300 (El-yᵉho-'enai, 'Unto Yah are my eyes').

Among the Jewish names occurring on the cuneiform tablets of the Persian period, found recently by the Pennsylvanian Expedition at Nippur, are many of the form Gadalyāma (or -yāwa), Igdalyāma (or -yāwa), Mattanyāma (or -yāwa), i.e. Gedaliah, Igdaliah, Mattaniah, etc.§ Mr. Pinches had noted before, from the same age (PSBA, l.c. p. 14 f.), Gamaryāma (or -wa), i.e. Gemariah; Natanayāma (or -wa), i.e. Nethaniah; Shubunuyāma (or -wa), i.e. Shebaniah; and others. These forms would seem to show that in the Persian age the divine element in such names was pronounced as a dissyllable; it is strange, therefore, to find them in the books Ezr-Neh (as remarked above) all but uniformly written with -yāh. Perhaps further investigation may explain the discrepancy. S. R. DRIVER.

JAHATH (יַחַת, perh. for יַחְתֶּה 'he [God] will snatch up').—1. A grandson of Judah, 1 Ch 4^{2}. 2. A great-grandson of Levi, 1 Ch $6^{20.\,43}$. 3. A son of Shimei, 1 Ch 23^{10}. 4. One of the 'sons' of Shelomoth, 1 Ch 24^{22}. 5. A Merarite Levite in the time of Josiah, 2 Ch 34^{12}. See GENEALOGY.

JAHAZ (יַהַץ Is 15^{4}, Jer 48^{34}; paus. and ה locale יָהְצָה Nu 21^{23}, Dt 2^{32} [cf. בְּיַהְצָה Jg 11^{20}]; in Jos 13^{18} called יַהְצָה; in 1 Ch 6^{78}, Jer 48^{21} יַהְצָה, RV Jahzah. The LXX renderings are:—Εἴσσα B Nu 21^{23}; Ἰάσσα B^{a}AF Nu 21^{23}; B Dt 2^{32}, A Jos 13^{18}, Ἰάσα Jg 11^{20} where A has Ἰηλ, Βάσαν B Jos 13^{18}. The variations and omissions in Jos 21^{36}, 1 Ch 6^{78}, Is 15^{4}, Jer $48^{21.\,34}$ are too complicated for reproduction).—A town at which Sihon was defeated by Israel (Nu 21^{23}, Dt 2^{32}, Jg 11^{20}). According to Tristram and Palmer, it was south of the Arnon on a site marked in maps as Muhatel el-Haj. But as Jahaz is counted among the cities of Reuben, whose southern boundary was the Arnon, a situation to the north of that river seems required. After the crossing of the Arnon, messengers were sent to Sihon from the 'wilderness of Kedemoth,' Dt 2^{26}, and he 'went out against Israel into the wilderness and came to Jahaz,' Nu 21^{23}. Jahaz is mentioned in connexion with Kedemoth, Jos 13^{18} 21^{36}. These passages indicate a position for Jahaz in the S.E. portion of Sihon's territory. Eusebius in the Onomasticon (264. 94, Lagarde, p. 267) describes Jahaz as existing in his time between Medeba and Dibon (Δηβοῦς). This assigns a more central position to Jahaz, and implies that Israel, before encountering the forces of Sihon, disregarding his refusal, had advanced some distance into his land. If for Δηβοῦς we read Ἐσβοῦς, as Reland (Pal. tom. 2, p. 825) suggests, the position of Jahaz will be farther north. Jahaz was one of the Levite cities of Reuben belonging to the children of Merari, Jos 13^{18} 21^{36} (see note in RVm), 1 Ch 6^{78}. According to the Moabite Stone (ll. 18–20), the king of Israel dwelt at Jahaz while at war with king Mesha, but was driven out, and the town was taken and added to Moabite territory. Isaiah (15^{4}) and Jeremiah ($48^{21.\,34}$) refer to it as in the possession of Moab. The site has not yet been identified. See SEP Mem. p. 279 note, and G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 559 and note.

JAHAZIEL (יַחֲזִיאֵל, 'El sees').—1. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12^{4}. 2. One of the two priests who, according to 1 Ch 16^{6}, blew trumpets before the ark when it was brought by David to Jerusalem. 3. A Kohathite Levite, 1 Ch 23^{19} 24^{23}. 4. An Asaphite Levite who is said to have encouraged Jehoshaphat and his army against an invading host, 2 Ch 20^{14}. 5. The ancestor of a family of exiles who returned, Ezr 8^{5}, called in 1 Es 8^{32} Jezalus. On the emendation which should probably be made on the MT, see Ryle, Ezr-Neh, ad loc., and art. JAHDAI (the vocalization and meaning are both doubtful; Baer points יָהְדַּי, others יָהְדָּי; cf. Kittel in SBOT. JAHDIEL (יַחְדִּיאֵל 'El giveth joy').—A Manassite chief, 1 Ch 5^{24}. See GENEALOGY, VII^{a}. 8.

Jastrow's arguments against Pinches are forcible, though his own theory that the ya in the Assyr. names (as well as in many Heb. names) is an 'afformative' rests upon insufficient grounds. Delitzsch and others explain the Assyr. ia simply as the suffix of the first person (Clay, l.c. pp. 197–199).

JAIR (יָאִיר 'he enlightens' or 'one giving light').—1. A son of Manasseh and contemporary of Moses, Nu 32^{41}, Dt 3^{14}, Jos 13^{30}, 1 K 4^{13}, 1 Ch 2$^{22f.}$. 2. One of the judges, Jg 10$^{3ff.}$. According to another tradition he was the same as 1. A very ancient, probably the original, account of the conquest of Gilead is contained in Nu 32$^{39.\,41f.}$. There can be little doubt that it describes a conquest made after the main body of Israelites were settled west of the Jordan. It has, however, got mixed up with the story of the Mosaic conquest of the lands east of Jordan. Even if there was a Jair contemporary with Moses, he could not have been literally the 'son' of Manasseh (see Driver on Dt 3^{14}), hence 'son' must in any case be interpreted in the sense of descendant. Attempts have been made unsuccessfully by Keil and others to distinguish the Jair of the Hexateuch from the Jair of Jg, as well as to harmonize the somewhat conflicting notices about the 'tent-villages' (ḥavvoth-Jair). In Jg 10$^{3f.}$ Jair is said to have had 30 sons that rode on 30 ass colts, and to have 'judged' Israel 22 years. The 'tent-villages' are there given as 30, whereas in 1 Ch 2^{23}, which possibly reflects post-exilic relations (Moore), they are 23 in number. See, further, the Comm. of Dillm., Driver, and Moore on the above-cited passages, and the article HAVVOTH-JAIR. 3. The father of Mordecai, Est 2^{5}. 4. (יָעִיר Ḳerê,* יָעוּר Kethibh) Father of Elhanan, 1 Ch 20^{5}. By a scribal error this Jair is called in 2 S 21^{19} Jaare-oregim (wh. see, and cf. Driver, Text of Sam., and Budde, SBOT, ad loc.).

JAIRITE, THE (הַיָּאִרִי; B ὁ Ἰαρεὶν, A ὁ Ἰαειρεί; Jairites), i.e. of the family of Jair, the son of Manasseh, whose descendants lived in Gilead (Nu 32^{41} etc.). The gentilic adjective occurs only in connexion with IRA (wh. see), who is further described as 'priest unto David' (2 S 20^{26}). Many scholars, however, consider that 'Jattirite' (הַיִּתְרִי) should be read for 'Jairite' in this passage. If this reading be adopted (cf. Pesh. ܕܡܢ ܝܬܝܪ) Ira might possibly be of the tribe of Levi, since Jattir was a priestly city in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15^{48} 21^{14}, cf. 1 S 30^{27}).

JAIRUS (Ἰάειρος, the Gr. form of OT JAIR).—1. The father of Mordecai (Ad. Est 11^{2}), called in Est 2^{5} Jair. 2. Eponym of a family of 'temple servants' (1 Es 5^{31}) (AV Airus, RVm Reaiah). 3. The ruler of the synagogue whose daughter was restored to life by Jesus (Mk 5^{22}, Lk 8^{41}). See next article.

JAIRUS (RV Jaïrus, Ἰάειρος, probably a transcription of OT name יָאִיר), a ruler of the synagogue, who dwelt at or near Capernaum. After Jesus had returned from Gergesa (Gadara) he was approached by Jairus, a suppliant on behalf of his daughter, aged twelve, who was lying at home at the point of death, Mk 5$^{21f.}$ = Lk 8$^{40f.}$ = Mt 9$^{18f.}$. Jesus at once set out for the house of Jairus, followed by a crowd; on the way another message came, announcing the death of the child. Having arrived, Jesus entered, taking with him Peter, James, and John, and tried to quell the noisy mourning with the words 'She is not dead, but sleepeth.' This assurance being misunderstood and ridiculed, Jesus expelled the mourners; with the parents and the three disciples went into the chamber of death; took the child's hand, and restored her with the words Talitha cumi (ταλιθὰ κούμ ܛܠܝܬܐ ܩܘܡܝ = 'maiden, arise'). So substantially the Synoptists. According, however, to Mt, Jairus comes while Jesus is at Matthew's feast, pleading for his daughter already dead; Mt does not give the name 'Jairus,' and calls him simply ἄρχων (of course = ἀρχισυνάγωγος). All three insert into the above narrative the incident of the woman with the Issue of Blood, which took place on the way to the house of Jairus.

JAMBRES.—See JANNES AND JAMBRES.

JAMBRI.—Soon after the death of Judas Maccabæus (B.C. 161), Jonathan and his adherents sent their personal property, which was no longer safe in the wilderness of Judæa, to the friendly country of the Nabatæans. The convoy, which was under the charge of John, a brother of Jonathan, was attacked and captured by a robber tribe, the sons of Jambri, near Medaba, on the E. of Jordan, and John himself slain. To avenge his death, Jonathan and Simon crossed the Jordan and waylaid a large wedding party belonging to this tribe. Many were slain, and the survivors fled to the mountains (1 Mac 9$^{35-42}$, Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 2–4).

There is some uncertainty as to the true reading of the proper name, which does not occur elsewhere. Ἰαμβρεὶν A, Ἰαμβρί ℵ*, Ἀμβρί ℵ^{c} cursives; Syr. has ܐܡܒܪܝ ('Ambri), Josephus οἱ Ἀμαραίου παῖδες. 'Ambri is probably the orig. form: some have conjectured that this represents Amorites (so Grimm, Michaelis). H. A. WHITE.

JAMES.—This name is our Eng. equivalent for the Ἰάκωβος of the Gr. Test., from which it is derived through the Italian Giacomo. It is used in NT of three different persons.

(1) James the son of Zebedee, sometimes called the Great.

(2) James the son of Alphæus.

(3) James the brother of the Lord.

1. JAMES THE SON OF ZEBEDEE.—In Mk 1^{19} (Mt 4^{21}) he and his brother John are represented as mending their nets in their boat on the Sea of Galilee, and at the call of Christ leaving the boat to their father and the hired servants. They were partners with Simon and Andrew (Lk 5^{10}), who were fishing near them and were called at the same time in the words, 'Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men.' This was after John the Baptist had been cast into prison by Herod. We learn from Jn $1^{35ff.}$ that Andrew and his brother, and probably John also, were disciples of the Baptist, and had already been taught by him to see in Jesus 'the Lamb of God.' The call recorded by St. Luke (5^{1-11}) is regarded by many commentators as merely another account of the call narrated by St. Mark, but there is a great difference in the circumstances. Even the words addressed to Simon, which form the chief point of contact in the two, ἀπὸ τοῦ νῦν ἀνθρώπους ἔσῃ ζωγρῶν, seem to be not so much another version of the words used by St. Mark, ποιήσω ὑμᾶς γενέσθαι ἁλιεῖς ἀνθρώπων, as a more urgent command based upon them; and there is a corresponding difference between the ἀφέντες τὰ δίκτυα, ἀφέντες τὸν πατέρα of St. Mark and the ἀφέντες τὰ πάντα of St. Luke.

* 'So LXX, Pesh. (Jerome 'filius saltus,' i.e. יַעַר, without the plena scriptio).'—Driver, Text of Sam. 272 n 1.

The last call was that to the apostleship (Mt 10^{2}, Mk 3^{14}, Lk 6^{13}, Ac 1^{13}). In all four lists of the apostles, Peter, Andrew, James, and John form the first group; in Mk and Ac, James and John follow Peter; and throughout the history, especially at the Transfiguration and the Agony, we find these three preferred before the others. The fact that James always precedes John (except in Lk 9^{28}), and that John is sometimes described as the brother of James (Mk 5^{37}, Mt 17^{1}), suggests that James was the elder of the two. In Ac 12^{2} James is described as brother of John, to distinguish him from his greater namesake, the brother of the Lord. It is remarkable that he is never mentioned in the Fourth Gospel.

St. Mark tells us (3^{17}) that Jesus surnamed the two brothers Boanerges (Sons of Thunder), alluding, perhaps, to the vehemence shown in their demand that their Master should call down fire from heaven to consume the Samaritans, who refused to receive him because he was going up to Jerusalem (Lk 9^{53}); and again in their request that they might sit on his right hand and on his left hand in his kingdom (Mk 10^{37}), to which our Lord replied by the prophecy that they should drink of his cup and be baptized with his baptism.

The wife of Zebedee was Salome, as we learn from a comparison of Mt 27^{56} and Mk 15^{40}, who appears to have been a sister of the Lord's mother (see Jn 19^{25} and the article on BRETHREN OF THE LORD). James and John would thus be first cousins of Jesus, which may have been one reason why their mother urged their claim to the highest position in his kingdom. We learn from Mk 15^{41} (cf. Lk 8^{3}) that Salome was one of the women who followed Jesus in Galilee, and ministered to him of their substance. Combined with the mention of hired servants, and with St. John's intimacy with Caiaphas the high priest, this fact makes it probable that the family of Zebedee were comparatively well off.

We hear nothing of James, as distinguished from the other apostles, for some 14 years after the Crucifixion. The fact, however, that he was the first of the Twelve to suffer martyrdom, shows that he must have attracted the attention of the Jews and of Herod Agrippa by his bold uncompromising character. This Herod was son of Aristobulus, and grandson of Herod the Great and Mariamne. Herodias, who was the cause of the murder of John the Baptist, was his sister. After reigning in splendour for three years over a kingdom larger than that of his grandfather, Agrippa sought to increase his popularity still further by putting down the new Christian heresy. Shortly before the Passover of 44, he killed James with the sword, and threw Peter into prison (Ac $12^{1f.}$). The sacred writer records in the same chapter the punishment which followed (v.$^{21ff.}$, cf. Jos. Ant. XIX. viii. 2).

Eusebius (HE ii. 9) gives a quotation from the 7th book of the lost Hypotyposes of Clemens Alexandrinus, in which the latter mentions a tradition that the accuser of St. James was so much moved by his confession, that he declared himself to be a Christian, and was carried off with him to execution. On the way thither he asked forgiveness of the apostle, who, after a moment's hesitation, kissed him, saying, 'Peace be unto thee.' The same story is given in the Apostolica Historia of pseudo-Abdias (ap. Fabr. Cod. Apoc. NT), who also narrates the conversion of the magicians Hermogenes and Philetus by St. James.

The legend of Saint Iago, the patron saint of Spain, is given in Mrs. Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art, vol. i. pp. 230-241. According to this, the gospel was first preached in Spain by St. James the Great, who afterwards returned to Judæa, and, after performing many miracles there, was finally put to death by Herod. His body was placed on board ship at Joppa and transported to Iria in the north-west of Spain under angelic guidance. The surrounding heathen were converted by the prodigies which witnessed to the power of the saint, and a church was built over his tomb. During the barbarian invasions all memory of the hallowed spot was lost till it was revealed by vision in the year 800. The body was then moved by order of Alphonso II. to the place now called Compostella (abbreviated from Jacomo Postolo), which became famous as a place of pilgrimage throughout Europe. The saint was believed to have appeared on many occasions mounted on a white horse, leading the Spanish armies to victory against their infidel foes.

The impossibilities of the story have been pointed out by Roman Catholic scholars. (1) It was a tradition of the early Church that the apostles, in accordance with a command of our Lord, did not leave Jerus. for twelve years after the Ascension (cf. the Κήρυγμα Πέτρου in Clem. Al. Strom. vi. p. 762; Apollonius in Euseb. HE v. 18 ad fin.). This is supported by what we read in Ac 8^{1}, that the apostles were still at Jerus. during the persecution in which Stephen was martyred. (2) St. Paul mentions his desire to visit Spain (Ro 15^{24}) just after he had spoken of his rule not to preach the gospel on another man's foundation. The probable date of Ro is 58 [Turner, 55-56], long after the martyrdom of St. James. (3) There is no certain mention of St. James in connexion with Spain till the 9th cent., when Notker, a monk of St. Gall, wrote: 'hujus Apostoli sacratissima ossa ad Hispanias translata in ultimis earum finibus condita celeberrima illarum gentium veneratione coluntur. Nec immerito, quia ejus corporali præsentia et doctrina atque signorum efficacia eidem populi ad Christi fidem conversi referuntur' (Martyrol. ad diem 25 Jul.). On the other hand, Innocent I. (d. 417) states that the Churches of Italy, Gaul, and Spain had all been founded by those who owed their authority to St. Peter (Ep. 25 ad Decantium); and Vincentius Fortunatus (fl. A.D. 600), speaking of the saints of different countries, makes Vincentius the chief glory of Spain ('Vincenti Hispana surgit ab arce decus,' Carm. vii. 3), as Alban of Britain, Hilary and Martin of Gaul, while the Jacobi are assigned to the Holy Land. (See the art. on JAMES by F. Meyrick in Smith, DB^{2}, and by R. Sinker in the Dict. of Chr. Antiq.; the Acta Sanctorum for July 25; Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccl. sæcl. i. § 15; Forbes, Handbook of Spain, ch. on Santiago).

2. JAMES THE SON OF ALPHÆUS.—In the four lists of the apostles we find James, son of Alphæus, standing at the head of the 3rd group, of which the other members are Thaddæus (Mk 3^{18}), also called Lebbæus (Mt 10^{3} cod. D and AV) or Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου (Lk 6^{16}, Ac 1^{13}); Simon Zelotes (Lk 6^{15}, Ac 1^{13}), also called Σ. Καναναῖος (Mt 10^{4}, Mk 3^{18}), and Judas Iscariot. By St. Luke he is coupled with Simon, by St. Matthew and St. Mark with Thaddæus. Nothing else is told us about this James in the NT, but it is probable that he was a brother of Levi or Matthew, who is also called son of Alphæus (Mk 2^{14}). The phrase Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου means almost certainly 'the son,' not the 'brother of James.' He is usually identified with James the Little (AV 'the Less'), the brother of Joses and son of Mary, who is mentioned in Mk 15^{40}, Mt 27^{56}. This Mary is apparently called ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ in Jn 19^{25}, words which some have interpreted 'the wife of Clopas,' and have in consequence identified Clopas with Alphæus. They have also understood the clause which precedes (ἡ ἀδελφὴ τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ) of this Mary, instead of understanding it of Salome, and thus have identified James, son of Alphæus, with James the brother of the Lord. The extreme improbability of this hypothesis is pointed out in the art. on the BRETHREN OF THE LORD. Hegesippus (ap. Euseb. HE iii. 11) speaks of a Clopas who was brother of Joseph; if Mary was his wife, she would be aunt of the sons of Joseph, the brethren of the Lord. (The evidence as to the festival of James, son of Alphæus, being distinct from that of the brother of the Lord, is given in Sinker's article under this head in the Dict. of Chr. Antiq.).

3. JAMES THE BROTHER OF THE LORD.—See the article on the BRETHREN OF THE LORD for the proof that this James was the son of Joseph and Mary, not one of the Twelve, nor even a believer until after the Resurrection. His conversion seems to have been connected with a special appearance of the Risen Lord (1 Co 15^{7}). Of his subsequent history we gather from the Acts and the Epistles of St. Paul, that, after the Ascension, he with his brothers remained at Jerusalem in the company of the eleven apostles and Mary and the other women, waiting for the descent of the Spirit (Ac 1^{14}), and that within ten years from this time he became the head of the Church at Jerusalem. Thus in Gal $1^{18.\,19}$ St. Paul says that three years after his conversion, probably about A.D. 38, he went up to Jerus. and stayed with Peter fifteen days, seeing no other apostle, but only James the Lord's brother,—a statement which is quite in accordance with Ac 12^{17}, where Peter on his escape from prison (A.D. 44) is said to have gone to the house of Mary the mother of Mark, and desired that news of his escape might be sent to James and the brethren. In Gal $2^{1\text{-}10}$ St. Paul describes a later visit to Jerus. after an interval of fourteen years, i.e. about A.D. 51. In this visit the leaders of the Church, James, Peter, and John (Gal 2^{9}), after hearing his report of his first missionary journey, signified their approval of his work, and 'gave right hands of fellowship,' agreeing that Paul and Barnabas should preach to the Gentiles and they themselves to the circumcision. In vv.$^{11\text{-}14}$ Peter's inconsistency in regard to eating with the Gentiles at Antioch is explained by the arrival of 'certain from James.' St. Paul's second visit to Jerus. is more fully described in Ac $15^{4\text{-}29}$, where James appears as president of the Council held to consider how far the Gentile Christians should be required to conform to the customs of the Jews. It is James who sums up the discussion and proposes the resolution which is carried, in the words ἐγὼ κρίνω μὴ παρενοχλεῖν τοῖς ἀπὸ τῶν ἐθνῶν ἐπιστρέφουσιν ἐπὶ τὸν θεόν, κ.τ.λ. James is seen in the same position of authority in Ac 21^{18}, when St. Paul presents himself before him on his return from his third missionary journey (A.D. 58). After joining in praise to God for the success which had attended his labours, James and the elders who are with him warn St. Paul of the strong feeling against him, which had been excited among the 'myriads of Jewish believers who were all zealous for the law,' by the report that he had taught the Jews of the Dispersion to abandon circumcision and their other customs. To counteract this impression, they recommended him to join in a Nazirite vow, which had been undertaken by four members of their community, as a proof that the report was unfounded, and that he himself walked according to the law. From 1 Co 9^{5} μὴ οὐκ ἔχομεν ἐξουσίαν ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα περιάγειν ὡς καὶ οἱ λοιποὶ ἀπόστολοι καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ τοῦ Κυρίου, it has been inferred that St. James was a married man. On his authorship of the Epistle which goes by his name, see next article.

Further particulars are supplied by Josephus, Hegesippus, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, and other apocryphal books, including in these the Clementine Homilies and Recognitions.

The Gospel according to the Hebrews, which Lightfoot speaks of as one of the earliest and most respectable of the apocryphal narratives (Gal. p. 274), is quoted by Jerome (de Vir. ill. 2) to the following effect: 'The Lord after his resurrection appeared to James, who had sworn that he would not eat bread from the hour in which he had drunk the cup of the Lord till he saw him risen from the dead. Jesus, therefore, took bread and blessed and brake it, and gave it to James the Just, and said to him, My brother, eat thy bread, for the Son of Man has risen from the dead.' There are other versions of the same story, in which the vow is dated, not from the Last Supper, but from the Crucifixion (see Nicholson's ed. of the Gospel, p. 62 f., and the Introduction to Mayor's St. James, p. xxxvii n.). Possibly, the reference to the Last Supper may have arisen from the fact that St. James shaped his vow after the Lord's words spoken at the Supper, 'I will not drink henceforth of the fruit of the vine till the kingdom of God shall come.'

Hegesippus (c. A.D. 160) is quoted by Eusebius (HE ii. 23) to the following effect: 'The charge of the Church after the Ascension devolved on James the brother of the Lord in concert with the apostles. He is distinguished from others of the same name by the title "Just," which has been applied to him from the first. He was holy from his mother's womb, drank no wine or strong drink, nor ate animal food: no razor came on his head, nor did he anoint himself with oil nor use the bath. To him only was it permitted to enter the Holy of Holies. . . . His knees became hard like a camel's, because he was always kneeling in the temple, asking forgiveness for the people. Through his exceeding righteousness he was called "Oblias," which, being interpreted, is "the defence of the people," and "Righteousness," as the prophet declared of him. Some of the seven sects of the Jews inquired of him, "What is the door of Jesus?" And he said that he was the Saviour; whereupon some believed that Jesus is the Christ. . . . Hence arose a disturbance among the Jews, fearing that all the people would look to Jesus as the Christ. They came, therefore, and . . . set James on the pinnacle of the temple and cried to him, "O thou just one to whom we all are bound to listen, tell us what is the door of Jesus." And he answered with a loud voice, "Why do ye ask me concerning Jesus the Son of Man? He is both seated in heaven on the right hand of Power, and he will come again on the clouds of heaven." And when many were convinced and gave glory at the witness of James, the same scribes and Pharisees said to each other, "We have done ill in bringing forward such a testimony to Jesus; let us go up and cast him down, that they may fear to believe him." And they cried out saying, "Alas! even the just has gone astray." And they fulfilled that which is written in Isaiah, "Let us take away the just, for he is not for our purpose." So they cast down James the Just, and they began to stone him, since he was not killed by the fall; but he kneeled down, saying, "O Lord God, my Father, I beseech thee forgive them, for they know not what they do." While they were thus stoning him, one of the priests of the sons of Rechab, of whom Jeremiah the prophet testifies, cried out, "Stop! what do ye? The just is praying for you." But one of them, who was a fuller, smote the head of the just one with his club. And so he bore his witness. And they buried him on the spot, and his monument still stands by the side of the temple with the inscription, "He hath been a true witness both to Jews and Greeks that Jesus is the Christ." And immediately Vespasian commenced the siege.'

Lightfoot has pointed out the many improbabilities in this narrative, and conjectures that it may have been taken by Hegesippus from the Ebionite Ἀναβαθμοὶ Ἰακώβου, of which we find traces in the Clementine Recognitions. In the Recognitions, as in Hegesippus, we read that James refuted the Jewish sects, and that he was hurled down from the temple by his persecutors. Lightfoot thinks that there may be truth in the statement that James was an ascetic and a Nazirite, and, we may add, in the respect entertained for him even by his unbelieving countrymen. The account of the death, however, which is given by Jos. (Ant. XX. ix. 1) is far more likely to be historical. 'During the interval between the death of Festus (prob. in the year 62) and the arrival of his successor Albinus, the high priest Ananus the younger, being of a rash and daring spirit, and inclined like the Sadducees in general to severity in punishing, brought to trial James the brother of Jesus, who is called the Christ, and some others before the court of the Sanhedrin, and, having charged them with breaking the laws, delivered them over to be stoned. The better class of citizens and those who were versed in the laws were indignant at this, and made complaints both to king Agrippa and to Albinus, on the ground that Ananus had no right to summon the Sanhedrin without the consent of the procurator; and Agrippa in consequence removed him from the high priesthood.' Origen (Cels. i. c. 47) and Euseb. (HE ii. 23) also cite Josephus as ascribing the miseries of the siege to the divine vengeance for the murder of James; but this does not occur in his extant writings.

Clement of Alexandria (ap. Euseb. HE ii. 1) says that Peter and James and John, who were most honoured by the Lord, chose James the Just to be bishop of Jerus. after the Ascension, and that the Lord imparted his esoteric teaching (τὴν γνῶσιν) to James the Just and Peter and John after his resurrection, and again that this was imparted by them to the other apostles, and by the latter to the Seventy.

In the Clementine Homilies (written early in the 3rd cent.) James is represented, in the letter addressed to him by Clement, as the chief ruler of the Church at large, Κλήμης Ἰακώβῳ τῷ κυρίῳ καὶ ἐπισκόπων ἐπισκόπῳ, διέποντι δὲ τὴν <ἐν> Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἁγίαν Ἑβραίων ἐκκλησίαν καὶ τὰς πανταχῇ θεοῦ προνοίᾳ ἱδρυθείσας, κ.τ.λ.

Eusebius (HE vii. 19) reports that his episcopal chair was still shown at Jerus. at the time when he wrote.

Besides the canonical Epistle of St. James, his name is attached to the apocr. Protevangelium Jacobi and the so-called Liturgy of St. James. See Dict. Chr. Antiq. p. 1019 f., art. 'Liturgy,' and Dict. of Chr. Biog. under 'Gospels, Apocryphal,' p. 701 f. J. B. MAYOR.

JAMES, THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF.—i. AUTHORSHIP.—The writer describes himself (1^1) as 'James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ.' As the name was very common, and the description one which is applicable to all Christians, it is evident that he must have been distinguished from others who bore the same name by position or otherwise, so as to justify him in addressing the Twelve Tribes of the Dispersion with the tone of authority which is so marked a feature of the Epistle. This inference receives support from the Ep. of Jude, the writer of which styles himself 'brother of James,' evidently assuming that his brother's name would carry weight with those to whom he writes.

The Epistle itself is strongly contrasted, not only with Ro and Gal, against which some have supposed it to be directed, but also with 1 P, which, in some points, it closely resembles. In style it reminds one now of Pr, now of the stern denunciations of the prophets, now of the parables in the Gospels. It has scarcely any direct reference to Christ, who is indeed named only twice. In commending the duty of patience (5^{7-11}) the writer refers to the example of the husbandman, and to Job and the prophets of the OT: if he alludes to our Lord at all, he does so only obscurely in the words 'ye killed the just; he doth not resist you'; while St. Peter, on the contrary, dwells exclusively on the example of Christ (1 P 2^{19-24} 4^{12-14}). In urging the duty of prayer, reference is made, not (as in He 5^7) to the promises or prayers of Christ, but to the prayer of Elijah; the exhortation to kindness, and the warning against evil-speaking in ch. 3, are based, not on the example of Christ and the thought of our common brotherhood in him (as in 1 P 2^{23}, Ro 12^5, Eph 4^{25}), but on the parables of nature, on the fact that man was created in the image of God, and on general reasoning; and again (in 4^{11}) speaking evil of a brother is condemned as putting a slight on the law, not as causing pain to Christ. No mention is made of the crucifixion or resurrection, or of the doctrines of the incarnation and atonement. To a careless reader the tone seems scarcely to rise above that of the OT; Christian ideas are still clothed in Jewish forms. Thus the law, called for the sake of distinction 'the law of liberty' or 'the royal law,' seems to stand in place of the gospel, or even of Christ himself (2^{8-13} 4^{11}); the love of the world is condemned in the language of the OT as adultery against God. This contrast rises to its highest pitch in treating of the relation between faith and works (2^{14-26}). While St. Paul writes (Ro 3^{28}) 'We reckon, therefore, that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law,' the language of St. James is (2^{24}) 'Ye see then that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.' And while the case of Abraham is cited in Ro $4^{3.\ 13.\ 16}$ in proof of the doctrine of justification by faith, and the case of Rahab is cited for the same purpose in He 11^{31}, St. James makes use of both to prove that man is justified by works (2^{25}). Speaking generally, we may say that this Epistle has a more Jewish cast than any other writing of the NT, and that the author must have been one who would be more in sympathy with the Judaizing party, and more likely to exercise an influence over them, than any of the three great leaders, Peter, Paul, or John.

works of law
works of faith

Comparing what is said of James the brother of the Lord in the preceding article, we find in him one who exactly fulfils the conditions required in the writer of the Epistle; and if we examine the speech attributed to him in Ac 15 and the circular letter there given, which was probably drawn up by him, we find in these a remarkable similarity to the language of the Epistle. That St. Luke has recorded the actual words of the speaker, either in the original language or in a translation, seems probable from his use of the form 'Symeon' (v.^{14}), which is not found elsewhere in Ac, as well as from the resemblances, noticed by Alford (vol. iv. Prologomena), between 1 P and the speeches ascribed to him in the Ac. It is surely a remarkable coincidence that, out of 230 words contained in the speech and circular, so many should reappear in our Epistle, written on a totally different subject.

They are as follows: (1) the epistolary salutation χαίρειν (Ja 1^1, Ac 15^{23}) found in only one other passage of the NT, the letter of Lysias to Felix (Ac 23^{26}); (2) the curious phrase, borrowed from the LXX, which occurs in NT only in Ac 15^{17} ἐφ' οὓς ἐπικέκληται τὸ ὄνομά μου ἐπ' αὐτούς, and Ja 2^7 τὸ καλὸν ὄνομα τὸ ἐπικληθὲν ἐφ' ὑμᾶς; (3) ἀκούσατε ἀδελφοί μου found in Ja 2^5 alone in the Epistles, compared with ἄνδρες ἀδελφοὶ ἀκούσατέ μου in Ac 15^{13}; (4) ἐπισκέπτεσθαι Ja 1^{27}, Ac 15^{14}; (5) ἐπιστρέφειν Ja $5^{19.\ 20}$, Ac 15^{19}; (6) τηρεῖν and διατηρεῖν, Ja 1^{27} ἄσπιλον ἑαυτὸν τηρεῖν ἀπὸ τοῦ κόσμου, Ac 15^{29} ἐξ ὧν διατηροῦντες ἑαυτοὺς εὖ πράξετε; (7) ἀγαπητός occurs in Ac only in 15^{25} σὺν τοῖς ἀγαπητοῖς Βαρνάβᾳ καὶ Παύλῳ, while ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοί is found three times in our Epistle; (8) the pregnant use of the word ὄνομα in Ja 5^{10} ἐλάλησαν ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι Κυρίου, v.^{14} ἀλείψαντες ἐλαίῳ ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι, 2^7 τὸ καλὸν ὄνομα, and in Ac 15^{14} λαβεῖν ἐξ ἐθνῶν λαὸν τῷ ὀνόματι αὐτοῦ, v.^{26} ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος τοῦ Κυρίου ἡμῶν 'I. X.; (9) perhaps we may compare also the use of δαπανάω in Ac 21^{24}, probably spoken by St. James (δαπάνησον ἐπ' αὐτοῖς), with our Epistle 4^3 ἵνα ἐν ταῖς ἡδοναῖς ὑμῶν δαπανήσητε, and the occurrence of ἁγνίζω in the same verse with its occurrence in Ja 4^8.

An objection may be raised to the identification of the writer of the Epistle with the brother of our Lord on the ground that no claim is made to this title in either of the Epistles which go by the name of the brothers James and Jude. If they were really brothers of the Lord, would they not have laid stress on the authority derived from this relationship, just as St. Paul lays stress on his apostleship? But what was Christ's own teaching on the matter? When his mother and brothers sought on one occasion to use the authority which they assumed that their kinship gave them, they were met by the words, 'Who is my mother or my brethren?' And he stretched out his hands to his disciples and said, 'Behold my mother and my brethren.' St. Paul expresses the same idea of the disappearance of the earthly relationship in the higher spiritual union by which all the members of the body are joined to the Head, in the words 'though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now know we him so no more' (2 Co 5^{16}). Surely it is only what was to be expected that James and Jude would shrink from claiming another name than that of 'servant' to express the relation in which they stood to their risen Lord, after having failed to acknowledge him as their Master in the days of his humiliation.

So far the evidence seems to show that the writer of the Epistle was James the Just, the brother of the Lord. Let us see what further light this fact, if it be one, will throw upon the Epistle. The word 'just,' which is also used of his father Joseph, implies one who not only observes but loves the law; and we may be sure that the reverence for the law, which is so marked a feature of the Epistle, was learnt in the well-ordered home of Nazareth. There, too, he may have acquired, with the full sanction of his parents (who would gladly devote the eldest-born of Joseph in such marked way to the future service of the Messiah), those strict ascetic habits which tradition ascribes to him. But the constant intercourse with him who was full of grace and truth in childhood as in manhood, must have prepared James to find in the Ten Commandments no mere outward regulations, but an inner law of liberty and love written in the heart. That deep interest in the mysteries of the kingdom, that earnest search after truth which led the child Jesus to remain behind in the temple, must surely have had its effect upon his brother. Whatever means of instruction were within reach of the home at Nazareth would, we may feel sure, have been eagerly taken advantage of by all its inmates. While, therefore, accepting the view which seems to be best supported, that Jesus and his brothers usually spoke Aramaic, we are not bound to suppose that, with towns like Sepphoris and Tiberias in their immediate vicinity, with Ptolemais, Scythopolis, and Gadara at no great distance, they remained ignorant of Greek. In the eyes of the scribes they might 'never have learnt letters,' since they had not attended the rabbinical schools of Jerusalem; but the ordinary education of Jewish children, and the Sabbath readings in the synagogue, would give a sufficient start to enable any intelligent boy to carry on his studies for himself; while the example of Solomon and the teaching of the 'sapiential' books, with which the writer of the Epistle was intimately acquainted, held up the pursuit of knowledge and wisdom as the highest duty of man.

There are other characteristics of our Epistle which find their best explanation in the supposition that the writer was the son of Joseph and Mary. The use of parables was common among Jewish teachers, and especially common in Galilee (cf. Neubauer in Studia Biblica, i. p. 52); but it was carried to an unusual length by our Lord, both in his preaching to the multitude, of which it is said 'without a parable spake he not unto them,' and in his ordinary conversation, which constantly ran into a parabolic or figurative form to the great bewilderment of his disciples, as when he bid them 'Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees.' One distinctive feature of our Lord's use of parables is that there is nothing forced either in the figure or in the application: natural phenomena and the varied circumstances of human life are watched with an observant eye and a sympathetic and loving heart, and the spiritual analogies which they suggest are seen to flow naturally from them. Such a habit of mind could not have been acquired after manhood. The love of nature, the sympathy in all human interests, the readiness to find 'sermons in stones and good in everything,' must have characterized the child Jesus, and coloured all his intercourse with his fellows from his earliest years. It is interesting therefore to find the same fondness for figurative speech in the Epistles of his two brothers, St. James and St. Jude.

Another marked feature of our Epistle is the close connexion between it and the Sermon on the Mount, in which our Lord laid down the principles of the kingdom which he came to establish upon earth. It must suffice to refer here to the general harmony between the two as to the spiritual view of the law (Ja 1^{25} $2^{8.\ 12.\ 13}$, Mt 5^{17-44}), the blessings of adversity (Ja $1^{2.\ 3}$ 2^{5} $5^{7.\ 8.\ 11}$, Mt 5^{3-12}), the dangers and the uncertainty of wealth (Ja $1^{10.\ 11}$ $2^{6.\ 7}$ $4^{4.\ 6.\ 13-16}$ 5^{1-6}, Mt $6^{19-21.\ 24-34}$), the futility of a mere profession of religion (Ja $1^{26.\ 27}$, Mt 6^{1-7}), the contrast between saying and doing (Ja 1^{22-25} 2^{14-26} $3^{13.\ 18}$, Mt 7^{15-27}), the true nature of prayer (Ja 1^{5-8} 4^{3} $5^{13.\ 18}$, Mt 6^{6-13}), the incompatibility between the love of the world and the love of God (Ja 2^{5} 3^{6} 4^{4-8}, Mt 6^{24}), the need to forgive others if we would be forgiven ourselves (Ja $2^{12.\ 13}$, Mt $6^{14.\ 15}$), the tree known by its fruits (Ja $3^{11.\ 12}$, Mt 7^{16-20}), the interdiction of oaths (Ja 5^{12}, Mt 5^{34-37}) and of censoriousness (Ja $4^{11.\ 12}$, Mt 7^{1-5}), the praise of singleness of aim (Ja 1^{8} 4^{8}, Mt $6^{22.\ 23}$). Nor are these reminiscences confined to the Sermon on the Mount, or to our Lord's words as reported by St. Matthew; there is much to remind us both of St. Luke and St. John. It is worthy of note that, close as is the connexion of sentiment and even of language in many of these passages, it never amounts to actual quotation, but is rather the reminiscence of thoughts often uttered by the original speaker and sinking into the heart of the hearer, who reproduces them in his own manner.

It may be asked, if St. James was thus deeply influenced by his Brother's teaching, how are we to explain the fact that at one period of his life 'he did not believe on him'? Perhaps we may gather from the Epistle that the writer would have found a difficulty in some of the sayings of Christ. 'Before Abraham was, I am'; 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you,'—these must have been 'hard sayings' to the brother of Jesus even more than to strangers. This state of mind was doubtless combined with an intense love and reverence for the elder Brother, and was perhaps not incompatible with the belief in Christ's mission as a preacher of righteousness, and a willingness to accept him as the anointed King of the Jewish people; but it might easily lead to an anxious solicitude as to his sanity and the prudence of the measures which he took for extending the number of his adherents. (See the subject more fully treated in Mayor's Introduction to St. James, ch. i. on the Author, ch. iv. on its relation to other Books of NT).

ii. CANONICITY. — Eusebius in a well-known passage (HE iii. 25) distinguishes between the disputed and the undisputed books which made up the NT, and were publicly read in the church at the time when he wrote (l.c. iii. 31), i.e. in A.D. 314 (see Lightfoot in Dict. of Chr. Biog. ii. p. 323). Together they contain all the books included in our present Canon and no others; those which were disputed, though generally known, being the Epistle which goes under the name of James and that of Jude, as well as the 2nd of Peter and the so-called 2nd and 3rd of John. The Apoc. he had before doubtfully classed among the undisputed, but questions whether it should not rather be classed with the spurious, like the Revelation of Peter. Elsewhere he says (ii. 23), 'The first of the Epistles styled Catholic is said to be by James the Lord's brother, which is held by some to be spurious. Certainly not many old writers have mentioned it, as neither have they the Epistle of Jude.' His own practice, however, betrays no suspicion of its genuineness, as in one passage he quotes James as Scripture (Comm. in Psalm. p. 648, Montf.), and in another quotes Ja 5^{13} as spoken by the holy apostle (ib. p. 247).

The same doubt as to the canonicity of the Epistle is shown by its omission from some of the early versions and catalogues of sacred books, e.g. the Muratorian Fragment (of which Westcott says that it may be regarded as 'a summary of the opinion of the Western Church on the Canon shortly after the middle of the 2nd cent.'), and the Cheltenham list, which is supposed to have been written in Africa about the year 359. On the other hand, it was generally recognized in the East, being included in the Peshitta, which omits 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, Jude, and Rev. The Pesh. used to be ascribed to the 2nd cent., and is probably not later than the 3rd, but the date is still in dispute. Ja is also found in the lists given by Origen (Hom. in Jos. vii. 1), Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, Gregory of Nazianzus, and others, and was finally ratified by the Third Council of Carthage in 397. Its late reception in the West may probably be explained by the fact that it was addressed to Jews of the Eastern (?) Dispersion, that it did not profess to be written by an apostle, and that it appeared to contradict the teaching of the great Apostle to the Gentiles.

Origen (d. 253) is apparently the first who cites the Epistle as Scripture, and as written by St. James; see Comm. in Joh. xix. 6; in Rom. iv. 1, 8, ix. 24; Hom. in. Ex. iii. 3, viii. 4; in Lv. ii. 4, xiii. 3; Sel. in Ps. 31. 5, 37. 24, 118. 153; Comm. in Prov. (Mai, Nov. Bibl. vii. 51); but Clement of Alexandria (d. 220) is said by Eusebius (HE vi. 14) to have included in his Outlines (ἐν ταῖς Ὑποτυπώσεσι) short explanations of all the sacred books, μηδὲ τὰς ἀντιλεγομένας παρελθών, τὴν Ἰούδα λέγω καὶ τὰς λοιπὰς καθολικὰς ἐπιστολὰς τήν τε Βαρνάβα καὶ τὴν Πέτρου λεγομένην ἀποκάλυψιν. Cassiodorus (Inst. div. lit. 8) limits this by saying that Clement commented on the canonical Epistles, i.e. on 1 P, 1 and 2 Jn, and Ja. The notes on the first three, and on Jude, but not on Ja, are still extant in a Latin translation, and some have doubted whether the reading in Cassiodorus should not be altered accordingly; see, however, Zahn, Neutest. Kan. i. 322, Forschungen, iii. 153; Sanday in Stud. Bibl. iii. 248.

iii. DATE.—If we are right in our view of the authorship of the Epistle, it must have been written not later than A.D. 62. This view, however, although approved by the great majority of scholars and divines up to the end of last century, is regarded with suspicion by some modern scholars. We will give briefly their conclusions, and then state the reasons for believing that it was written between A.D. 40 and 50. Von Soden, in the Introduction to his Handkommentar (1890), allows that in thought and expression there is considerable resemblance between our Epistle and the writings of Clement of Rome, and especially of Hermas, but considers that there is no reason to suppose any literary connexion. They resemble one another simply because they were produced under the same conditions. No trace of our Epistle is to be found in the 2nd cent. Nothing in the letter suggests Jewish readers. The title may be genuine because Christians had learnt to regard themselves as strangers and pilgrims. It was probably written for Christians generally, in the reign of Domitian. W. Brückner, in his Chronolog. Reihenfolge d. N.T. Briefe (Haarlem, 1890), considers that it cannot be assigned to an earlier date than A.D. 150, as it borrows from 1 P, which was written during the persecution of Trajan. The Judaizing tone implies a late stage of doctrinal development, inasmuch as it attacks Paulinism as the seed of an existing Gnosticism. The true address reveals itself in the phrase 'your synagogue' (2[2]), by which we are to understand a little conventicle of Essene Christians at Rome. The phrase 'Diaspora' denotes similar scattered conventicles, in which alone the true Israel, the poor, are to be found. By 'the rich' is meant Christians outside the conventicle. Pfleiderer, in his Urchristenthum (1887), regards the Epistle as representing the catholicized Paulinism of the latter half of the 2nd cent. He thinks it is an abbreviation of the Shepherd of Hermas. The polemic is not directed against St. Paul, but against the later Gnostics who appealed to his authority. There is nothing Judaistic in the writer's tone; he simply enforces the truths of practical Christianity as understood by the Catholic Church. The latest writer on the subject is F. Spitta (Zur Geschichte u. Litteratur des Urchristenthums, vol. ii. 1896), who, while allowing the references to our Epistle in St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, avoids the reproach of coming to a commonplace conclusion by starting the theory that it is a Christian adaptation of a Jewish book, written before the Christian era.* He draws this conclusion from the considerations stated in the earlier part of this article, and explains away the resemblance to the Sermon on the Mount by quoting parallels from the Apocrypha and other Jewish writings.

There is certainly much more to be said for this theory than for those which have been just described. Postponing its examination for the present, we proceed to state the grounds (independently of what has been already said under the head of authorship and canonicity) for believing that the Epistle was written before A.D. 50. In the present writer's Introduction to St. James, ch. ii., will be found proof that it was known to Irenæus, Theophilus, Justin Martyr, the writer of the Ep. to Diognetus, Ignatius, Polycarp, and, above all, Hermas, in the 2nd cent.; that it was known to Clement of Rome, to Barnabas, to the authors of the Didaché and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs during the 1st cent. We can, however, afford to dispense with these witnesses, if it can be proved that it was known to more than one of the writers of the NT; and if we are not mistaken, it has been shown in the above Introduction (ch. iv.) that traces of its influence may be seen in the Epistles of St. John, in the Ep. to the Hebrews, in those to Timothy, above all in the 1st Epistle of St. Peter, and in St. Paul's Epistles to the Romans and Galatians.

Our space will not allow us to deal with more than the last two, merely premising (1) that if the Epistle of James was written by the Lord's brother, it must probably have been written before the year 51 [Turner, 49], the date of the Apostolic Council, as otherwise it must have contained some reference to the question, which was then agitating the Diaspora, as to the admission of Gentiles into the Church; (2) that if such an Epistle were in existence, containing phrases which could be turned against the doctrine of justification by faith, it was likely to be eagerly made use of by Judaizers, and would thus be brought under St. Paul's notice. It has been remarked that the words 'whosoever shall keep the law and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all' (Ja 2[10]), might easily be twisted so as to represent St. James as insisting on the observance of the whole Mosaic code, and that this may possibly be alluded to in the words (Ac 15[24]), 'We have heard that certain which went out from us troubled you, saying, Ye must be circumcised and keep the law, to whom we gave no such commandment.' On the other hand, there is less likelihood of St. Paul's Epistles, addressed to distant Churches, and dealing so much with personal questions, having been brought under the notice of St. James.

The main points of connexion between the Epistles are Ro 2^{13} οὐ γὰρ οἱ ἀκροαταὶ νόμου δίκαιοι παρὰ τῷ θεῷ, ἀλλ' οἱ ποιηταὶ νόμου δικαιωθήσονται, compared with Ja 1^{22} γίνεσθε ποιηταὶ λόγου καὶ μὴ ἀκροαταὶ μόνον, and Ja 4^{11} ποιητὴς νόμου (the only other place in NT where this phrase occurs); the phrase παραβάτης νόμου, occurring only in Ro $2^{25.\,27}$ and Ja 2^{11}; Ro 7^{23} βλέπω ἕτερον νόμον ἐν τοῖς μέλεσίν μου ἀντιστρατευόμενον τῷ νόμῳ τοῦ νοός μου, compared with Ja 4^{1} πόθεν πόλεμοι; οὐκ ἐντεῦθεν ἐκ τῶν ἡδονῶν ὑμῶν τῶν στρατευομένων ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν ὑμῶν; Ro 14^{4} σὺ τίς εἶ ὁ κρίνων ἀλλότριον οἰκέτην; τῷ ἰδίῳ κυρίῳ στήκει ἢ πίπτει, compared with Ja 4^{11} εἷς ἔστιν νομοθέτης καὶ κριτής, σὺ δὲ τίς εἶ ὁ κρίνων τὸν πλησίον; Ro $5^{3\text{-}5}$ καύχωμεθα ἐν ταῖς θλίψεσιν, εἰδότες ὅτι ἡ θλίψις ὑπομονὴν κατεργάζεται, ἡ δὲ ὑπομονὴ δοκιμήν, ἡ δὲ δοκιμὴ ἐλπίδα, ἡ δὲ ἐλπὶς οὐ καταισχύνει, ὅτι ἡ ἀγάπη τοῦ θεοῦ ἐκκέχυται, compared with Ja $1^{2\text{-}4}$ πᾶσαν χαρὰν ἡγήσασθε ὅταν πειρασμοῖς περιπέσητε ποικίλοις, γινώσκοντες ὅτι τὸ δοκίμιον ὑμῶν τῆς πίστεως κατεργάζεται ὑπομονήν, ἡ δὲ ὑπομονὴ ἔργον τέλειον ἐχέτω ἵνα ἦτε τέλειοι; v.^{9} καυχάσθω δὲ ὁ ἀδελφὸς ὁ ταπεινός, κ.τ.λ. In these and other cases of resemblance it is easier to suppose that St. Paul works up a hint received from St. James, than that St. James omits points of interest and value which he found ready to his hand.

The crucial test, however, of the relation between the two is to be found in the controversy as to faith and works. St. James had said over and over again that 'faith without works is dead' (2^{17} etc.), his intention being (as is plain from v.^{14}, and the illustration in vv.$^{15.\,16}$ of a philanthropy which is limited to words, as well as from the whole tone and argument of the Epistle), not to depreciate faith, which is with him, not less than with St. Paul, the very foundation of the Christian life (see $1^{3.\,6}$ 2^{1} 5^{15}), but to insist that faith, like love, is valueless if it has no effect on the life. St. Paul himself does the same in 1 Th 1^{3}, Gal 5^{6}, 1 Co 13^{2}, Ro $2^{6\text{-}20}$ and elsewhere; but in arguing against his Judaizing antagonists, who denied salvation to the Gentiles unless they were circumcised, and in all other respects 'performed the works of the law,' he had maintained that it was impossible for men to be justified by these works, and that it was by faith alone that even the Jews and Abraham himself must be justified. He is therefore compelled to challenge the phrase of St. James, ἡ πίστις χωρὶς τῶν ἔργων ἀργή ἐστιν, νεκρά ἐστιν, by a direct contradiction, λογιζόμεθα γὰρ δικαιοῦσθαι πίστει ἄνθρωπον χωρὶς ἔργων νόμου, in support of which he appeals to the confession of the Psalmist (Ps 14. 143^{2}; see Ro $3^{10\text{-}20}$, Gal 3^{10}) that 'by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.' If St. James wrote after St. Paul, must he not, with these passages before him, have either attempted to meet the arguments, if he dissented; or if he agreed with them (as he certainly does in $2^{10.\,11}$ 3^{2}), would he not have avoided the use of phrases such as χωρὶς τῶν ἔργων, which were liable to be misunderstood alike by the followers and the opponents of the Apostle to the Gentiles?

St. Paul goes on to argue that the blessings promised to Abraham and all the families of the earth in him, and the covenant made with Abraham and his seed, are anterior to, and irrespective of, the law; that the Scripture expressly attributes to Abraham a righteousness, not of works, but of faith, and states generally that 'the just shall live by faith.' To these arguments no reference is made by St. James, except to the familiar quotation, ἐπίστευσεν Ἀβραὰμ τῷ θεῷ καὶ ἐλογίσθη αὐτῷ εἰς δικαιοσύνην ($2^{21.\,22}$), which was probably in common use among the Jews, to prove that orthodoxy of doctrine sufficed for salvation. His answer to the text so used is that Abraham's faith proved itself by action when he offered Isaac on the altar: if he had not acted thus, he would not have been accounted righteous, or called the friend of God. It is interesting to observe how St. Paul deals with this statement, to which he distinctly refers in Ro 4^{2}. St. James had said, Ἀβραὰμ ὁ πατὴρ ἡμῶν οὐκ ἐξ ἔργων ἐδικαιώθη; St. Paul replies, εἰ γὰρ ἐξ ἔργων ἐδικαιώθη, ἔχει καύχημα; but this, as he proceeds to show, is inconsistent with the phrase 'reckoned for righteousness,' which implies an act of free grace on the part of God, not a strict legal obligation of wages earned for work done. His second answer is to replace the quotation in its original context (Ro $4^{16\text{-}22}$) as spoken of the birth, not the sacrifice of Isaac. Abraham's faith in the promised birth was a settled trust in God, a long-continued hoping against hope; it was this posture of mind, not any immediate action consequent upon it, which was reckoned to him for righteousness. All this is most apposite in reference to the argument of St. James, and the use which might be made of it by Judaizers. But put the case the other way: suppose St. James to have written after St. Paul; and how inconceivable is it that he should have made no attempt to guard his position against such an extremely formidable attack! Again, if St. James was really opposed to St. Paul, and desired to maintain that man was saved, not by grace, but by obedience to the law of Moses, which was incumbent alike on Gentile and on Jew, why has he never uttered a syllable on the subject, but confined himself to the task of proving that a faith which bears no fruit is a dead faith? See this more fully developed by Spitta, l.c. 202-225.

We have seen, then, (1) that the resemblance between the two Epistles is such that it can only be explained by supposing one of them to have been written with a knowledge of the other; (2) that a close comparison shows that, where there is a resemblance, the statement in St. James is in general more elementary, less exact and developed, than that in St. Paul; (3) that, in the controversy on faith and works in particular, St. Paul is evidently anxious to guard against misunderstanding by carefully defining terms which are used by St. James in a vague general sense: thus, while the latter uses πίστις indefinitely, at one time of genuine Christian trust ($1^{3.\,6}$ $2^{1.\,5}$ etc.), at another of an empty profession ($2^{14\text{-}26}$), St. Paul begins his discussion by twice defining it as 'faith in Christ' (Ro $3^{22.\,26}$); while St. James had used the ambiguous word ἔργον with similar vagueness, St. Paul distinguishes between the ἔργα νόμου (Ro $3^{20.\,28}$ 9^{32}) and the ἔργον πίστεως (1 Th 1^{3}, 2 Th 1^{11}), 'faith working through love' (Gal 5^{6}). There is a still more careful limitation in Gal 2^{16}, where St. James' declaration, ἐξ ἔργων δικαιοῦται ἄνθρωπος καὶ οὐκ ἐκ πίστεως μόνον, is qualified, not merely as to the principal terms ἔργον and πίστις, but also as to the extent of opposition, by the use of the hypothetical ἐὰν μή, and as to the kind of causation attributed to faith, διά being substituted for ἐκ in the words οὐ δικαιοῦται ἄνθρωπος ἐξ ἔργων νόμου, ἐὰν μὴ διὰ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ; (4) that, whereas the argument of St. James has no reference to St. Paul or to the arguments used by him, St. Paul turns aside, in the most skilful and delicate way, whatever in the argument of St. James might be made use of by Judaizers, while at the same time he reaffirms in more guarded language the truths which both apostles held in common. Nothing could be more courteous and nothing more effective. On the other hand, if we imagine St. James to be answering St. Paul, we should have to charge him with discourtesy in addition to an entire misapprehension of the situation.

It remains now to show, in opposition to Spitta, that our Epistle was written after A.D. 40. If it was written by the brother of the Lord, this is about the earliest date which would allow time for his authority to establish itself, as it evidently had done when the letter was written, and also for the growth of a Church of the Diaspora with the experiences described. The hypothesis, however, which we have to meet is that it is a Jewish writing of the 1st cent. B.C., interpolated and adopted by a Christian, in the same way as the Didaché, the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Sibylline Books, and the Fourth Book of Ezra were interpolated. All that is required to restore it to its original form is, to omit the words τοῦ Κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ in 1^{1}, and ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ in 2^{1}, a change which greatly simplifies the construction of τῆς δόξης in the latter passages, leaving the familiar phrase τὴν πίστιν τοῦ Κυρίου τῆς δόξης, examples of which are quoted from the Bk. of Enoch (Spitta, p. iv).

The first thing which strikes us is that a Christian editor would not have been satisfied with such a slight revision. We may possibly explain the absence of any reference to Christ among the examples of patience given in $5^{10.\,11}$, on the ground that, before the existence of our Gospels, the Jews of the Dispersion would be less familiar with the story of our Lord, than they were with the OT Scriptures which were 'read in the synagogues every Sabbath day.' But this consideration was hardly likely to occur to a Christian (of the 1st cent.? No date is suggested by Spitta) who was desirous to adapt a Jewish book for the service of the Church. (2) We must remember that the general Judaic tone is explained and indeed required by the hypothesis that the author is the brother of the Lord, which is commended to us on so many other grounds. It is his office to interpret Christianity to the Jews. He represents and he addresses the many thousands who believe and are zealous for the law. He is the authority whom St. Paul's opponents profess to follow. Tradition even goes so far as to describe the unbelieving Jews as still doubting at the end of his life, whether they might not look to him for a declaration against Christianity (see quotation from Hegesippus in the art. on JAMES). (3) There is the fact of the resemblance of the language of the Epistle to that used by St. James in the Acts. (4) There is the fact of the extraordinary resemblance between the Epistle and our Lord's discourses, especially the Sermon on the Mount. Spitta labours to show that both borrow from older Jewish writings. Even if this were so, it would be far more probable that one of the two borrowed indirectly, taking these sayings straight from the other, than that they should both have collected them independently from a variety of obscure sources. But it is mere perversity to put forward such vague parallels as are adduced from rabbinical writings on the subject of oaths, for instance, or the perishable treasures of earth, by way of accounting for the exact resemblance existing between Ja 5^{12} and Mt $5^{34\text{-}37}$, Ja $5^{2.\,3}$ and Mt 6^{19}. Indeed this is true of almost all the resemblances which have been pointed out by the commentators. (5) The Epistle contains many phrases which bear a recognized Christian stamp, even though it may be possible to find some approach to them in pre-Christian documents. Such are ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοί ($1^{16.\,19}$ 2^{5}), ἡ παρουσία τοῦ κυρίου ($5^{7.\,8}$), τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους τῆς ἐκκλησίας (5^{14}), προσευξάσθωσαν ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἀλείψαντες ἐλαίῳ ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι (5^{14}), κληρονόμους τῆς βασιλείας ἧς ἐπηγγείλατο (2^{5}), βουληθεὶς ἀπεκύησεν ἡμᾶς λόγῳ ἀληθείας, εἰς τὸ εἶναι ἡμᾶς ἀπαρχήν τινα τῶν αὐτοῦ κτισμάτων (1^{18}), νόμον τέλειον τὸν τῆς ἐλευθερίας (1^{25}), suggesting a contrasted law of bondage, of the letter as opposed to the spirit. (6) But the characteristic quality, after all, is to be found, not in particular phrases or occasional reminiscences of our Lord's teaching, but in the identity of spirit between our Epistle and the Sermon on the Mount, which is so striking as to warrant the assertion that, if the former is not Christian, then neither is the latter. (7) Spitta does not suggest that the name 'James' is an addition by the supposed Christian editor. We have seen how exactly the Epistle agrees with all that we know of James the brother of the Lord; but if this is to be considered a part of the original pre-Christian document, where is the author to be found who combines in himself so many remarkable characteristics? We arrive at the same result by comparing it with the Jewish Apoc. writings, such as Ps-Sol. Where do we find an approach in any of these to the teaching of our Epistle as summed up in the section on its contents which follows?

iv. CONTENTS.—The design of the Epistle is on the one hand to encourage the believing Jews of the Dispersion, to whom it is addressed, to bear their trials patiently, and on the other hand to warn them against certain errors of doctrine and practice.

i. Of Trial ($1^{1\text{-}18}$).—(a) Trial is sent to perfect the Christian character. That it may have this effect wisdom is needed; and this wisdom is given in answer to believing prayer ($1^{2\text{-}6}$). A warning against doublemindedness. The believer should recognize the greatness of his calling, and not allow himself to be either elated or depressed by outward circumstances ($1^{7\text{-}11}$). (b) Patient endurance of trial leads to the crown of life promised to all that love God (1^{12}). (c) Though outward trial is appointed by God for our good, we must not imagine that the inner weakness which is brought to light by trial is from God. God is perfect goodness, and only sends what is good. The disposition to misuse God's appointments comes from man's own lusts, which, if yielded to, lead to death as their natural consequence ($1^{13\text{-}15}$). (d) So far from God's tempting man to evil, it is only by his will, through the regenerating power of his word, that we are raised to that new and higher life which shall eventually penetrate and renew the whole creation ($1^{16\text{-}18}$).

ii. How we should receive the Word ($1^{19\text{-}27}$).—(a) As humble listeners, not as excited speakers ($1^{19\text{-}21}$). (b) Nor is it enough to listen to the word; we must carry it out in action ($1^{22\text{-}24}$). (c) Blessing comes to him alone who patiently studies the word, and frames his life in accordance with the law of liberty embodied therein (1^{25}). (d) Ritual observance is of no avail unless it helps us to rule the tongue, and practise brotherly kindness and unworldliness ($1^{26\text{-}27}$).

iii. Warning against Respect of Persons ($2^{1\text{-}13}$).—(a) Courtesy to the rich, if combined with discourtesy to the poor, is a sign of weakness of faith, and proves that we are not whole-hearted in the service of him who is the sole glory of believers ($2^{1\text{-}4}$). (b) The poor have more title to our respect than the rich, since they are more often rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom; while it is the rich who maltreat the brethren, and blaspheme the name of Christ ($2^{5\text{-}7}$). (c) If it is from obedience to the royal law of love that we show courtesy to the rich, it is well; but if we do this only from respect of persons, it is a breach of the law, and a defiance of the Lawgiver, no less than murder and adultery ($2^{8\text{-}11}$). (d) Remember that we shall all be tried by the law of liberty, which looks to the heart, and not to the outward action only. It is the merciful who obtain mercy ($2^{12.\,13}$).

iv. Belief and Practice ($2^{14\text{-}26}$).—(a) A mere profession of faith without corresponding action is of no avail (2^{14}). As may be seen in the parallel case of benevolence, when it does not go beyond words ($2^{15\text{-}17}$). Without action we have no evidence of the existence of faith (2^{18}). The orthodox belief of the Jew is shared by the demons, and only increases their misery (2^{19}). (b) True faith, such as that of Abraham and Rahab, necessarily embodies itself in action ($2^{20\text{-}26}$).

v. Warnings with respect to the use of the Tongue ($3^{1\text{-}12}$).—(a) Great responsibility of the office of teacher (3^{1}). (b) Difficulty and importance of controlling the tongue ($3^{2\text{-}8}$). (c) Inconsistency of supposing that we can offer acceptable praise to God as long as we speak evil of man, who is made in the image of God ($3^{9\text{-}12}$).

vi. True and false Wisdom ($3^{13\text{-}18}$).—(a) The wisdom which comes from God is simple and straightforward, full of kindness and all good fruits ($3^{13.\,17.\,18}$). (b) If there is a wisdom which does not conduce to peace, but is accompanied by bitterness and jealousy, it is not from above, but is earthly, carnal, devilish ($3^{14\text{-}16}$).

vii. Warning against Quarrelsomeness and Worldliness ($4^{1\text{-}17}$).—(a) The cause of quarrels is that each man seeks to gratify his own selfish impulses, and to snatch his neighbour's portion of worldly good ($4^{1.\,2}$). (b) No satisfaction can be thus obtained. Even our prayers can give us no satisfaction if they are infected with this worldly spirit (4^{3}). (c) God demands the service of the whole heart, and will reveal himself to none but those who yield up their wills to his (4^{1-6}). (d) Therefore resist the devil, who is the prince of this world, and turn to God in humble repentance (4^{7-10}). (e) Cease to find fault with others. Those who condemn their neighbours condemn the law itself, and usurp the office of him, the Lord of life and death, who alone has the power and right to judge ($4^{11.\ 12}$). (f) Worldliness is also shown in the confident laying-out of plans of life without reference to God (4^{13-17}).

viii. Denunciations and Encouragements (5^{1-11}).—(a) Woe to those who have been heaping up money and living in luxury on the very eve of judgment. Woe especially to those who have ground down the poor and murdered the innocent (5^{1-6}). (b) Let the brethren bear their sufferings patiently, knowing that the Lord is at hand, and that he will make all things turn out for their good. Let them imitate Job and the prophets, and so inherit the blessings pronounced on those who endure (5^{6-11}).

ix. Miscellaneous Precepts (5^{12-20}).—(a) Swear not (5^{12}). (b) Let all your feelings of joy and sorrow be sanctified and controlled by religion (5^{13}). (c) In sickness let the elders be called in to pray and anoint the sick with a view to his recovery ($5^{14.\ 15}$). (d) Confess your sins to one another, and pray for one another with all earnestness (5^{16-18}). (e) The blessing on one who wins back a sinner from the error of his ways ($5^{19.\ 20}$).

The doctrinal basis of St. James' practical teaching may perhaps be stated as follows:—Man was created in the image of God (3^{9}), the All-good ($1^{13.\ 17}$); but he has fallen into sin by yielding to his lower impulses against his sense of right ($1^{14.\ 15}$ $4^{1-3.\ 17}$), and the natural consequence of sin is death, bodily and spiritual (1^{15} $5^{3.\ 5.\ 20}$). Not only is man liable to sin, but as a matter of fact we all sin, and that frequently (3^{2}). God of his free bounty has provided a means by which we may conquer sin; he has begotten us anew through his word sown in our hearts ($1^{18.\ 21}$). Our salvation depends on the way in which we receive the word (1^{21}). If we have a steadfast faith in God's goodness ($1^{5.\ 7.\ 13}$ 2^{1}); if we read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the word, so as to make it the guiding principle of our life, the law of liberty by which all our words and actions are regulated (1^{25} 2^{12}), bearing its natural fruit in compassion and love towards our fellow-men (1^{27} $2^{8.\ 15.\ 16}$), then our souls are saved from death, we are made inheritors of the kingdom promised to those who love God ($1^{12.\ 25}$ 2^{5}). But the training by which we are prepared for this crown of life is not pleasant to the natural man. It involves trial and endurance ($1^{2-4.\ 12}$); it involves constant watchfulness and self-control and prayer for heavenly wisdom, in order that we may resist the temptations of the world, the flesh, and the devil (1^{26} $3^{2-8.\ 15}$). Thus faith is exercised; we are enabled to see things as God sees them ($2^{1.\ 5}$), to rise above the temporal to the eternal (1^{9-11}), to be not simply patient, but to rejoice in affliction (1^{2} $5^{7.\ 8.\ 10.\ 11}$) and exult in the hope set before us ($1^{9.\ 12}$), until at last we grow up to the full stature of a Christian (1^{4} 3^{2}), wise with that wisdom which comes from above, the wisdom which is steadfast, unpretending, gentle, considerate, affectionate, full of mercy and good fruits, the parent of righteousness and peace ($3^{17.\ 18}$). But there are many who choose the friendship of the world instead of the friendship of God, so vexing his Holy Spirit and yielding themselves to the power of the devil; yet even then he does not leave them to themselves, but gives more grace, hedging in their ways in the present and warning them of judgment to come (4^{4-6} 5^{1-8}). If they humble themselves under his hand, and repent truly of their sins, he will lift them up; if they draw nigh to him, he will draw nigh to them (4^{7-10}). Here, too, we may be helpful to one another by mutual confession and by prayer for one another. Great is the power of prayer prompted by the Spirit of God (5^{15-20}).

JAMIN (יָמִין).—1. A son of Simeon, Gn 46^{10}, Ex 6^{15}, Nu 26^{12}, 1 Ch 4^{24}. The gentilic name Jaminites (הַיָּמִינִי) occurs in Nu 26^{12}. See GENEALOGY, II. 1. 2. A Judahite, 1 Ch 2^{27}. See GENEALOGY, IV. 7. 3. A priest (?, or Levite) who took part in the promulgating of the law, Neh 8^{7}.

Jamnites (οἱ Ἰαμνῖται, Jamnitæ), gentilic name, 2 Mac 12^{9}; cf. οἱ ἐν Ἰαμνίᾳ, 12^{8}.

JANAI (יַעְנַי, perhaps for יַעֲנֶה 'J" answers').—A Gadite chief, 1 Ch 5^{12}, AV Jaanai.

JANGLING.—In 1 Ti 1^{6} ματαιολογία is tr^{d} in AV 'vain jangling,' after Tind. and most VSS; RV 'vain talking,' which is near the Rhem. NT 'vaine talke.' This is the only occurrence of the word in bibl. Greek, but ματαιολόγος occurs in Tit 1^{10}, EV 'vain talker.' The Eng. word 'jangle' (of Low Germ. origin; Skeat compares Lat. gannire, to yelp) was occasionally used in 1611 in the sense (still common) of 'quarrel,' but more frequently in the sense of 'chatter,' and that is its meaning here. Chaucer (Persones Tale) says, 'Jangling is whan man speketh to moche before folk, and clappeth as a mille, and taketh no kepe what he seith'; and in the same Tale, 'A philosophre seyde, whan men axed him how that men sholde plese the peple; and he answerde, "do many gode werkes, and speke few jangles."' J. HASTINGS.

JANIM (יָנִים Kethibh; AV Janum, following Ḳerê יָנוּם).—A town in the mountains of Hebron, near Beth-tappuah, Jos 15^{53}. The site is uncertain.

JANNAI (AV Janna, TR Ἰαννά; Lach., Tisch., Treg., WH Ἰανναί).—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3^{24}.

JANNES AND JAMBRES (Ἰαννῆς καὶ Ἰαμβρῆς).—The traditional names of the two Egyp. magicians, who by their enchantments imitated the signs which Moses showed before Pharaoh. In Scripture the names occur only in 2 Ti 3^{8} 'As Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses, so do these also withstand the truth.' The allusions to them elsewhere are numerous and widespread, though full of anachronisms and contradictions. J. and J. are said to have been the sons of Balaam (Sohar 90. 2) or his young men (Jerus. Targ. Nu 22^{22}); and yet they were in the court of Pharaoh, and so interpreted a dream of the king as to forebode the birth of Moses, and cause the oppression (ib. Ex 1^{15}). They are mentioned by name as opposing Moses (ib. Ex 7^{11}), but were so awed by Moses' later signs as to become proselytes, and leave Egypt with 'the mixed multitude' (Yalkut Reubeni 81. 2). They instigated Aaron to make the golden calf (Tikkunim 106. 4), and yet came with Balaam from Pethor when he visited the camp of Balak (Jerus. Targ. Nu 22^{22}). As to their death, there are diverse accounts. They were drowned in the Red Sea, or put to death after the incident of the golden calf, or during the slaughter of Phinehas. Their names occur also in the Gospel of Nicodemus (ch. 5), where Nicodemus warns Pilate by the example of J. and J. not to condemn Jesus; in the Acts of Paul and Peter, where Paul makes use of J. and J., to warn Nero against Simon's deceptions (Lipsius, Apocr. Apostelgesch. ii. 302), and in Constitut. Apostol. viii. 1, where J. and J. are paralleled with Annas and Caiaphas; while Palladius (c. A.D. 420) narrates that Macarius visited their tomb (Schürer, HJP II. iii. 150). In Gentile circles we find the Roman writers Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxx. 2) and Apuleius (Apolog. c. 90) mentioning Moses and Jannes among the famous magicians of antiquity; and a Gr. philosopher Numenius (2nd cent. A.D.), quoted by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ix. 8), speaks of J. and J. as Egyp. ἱερογραμματεῖς. The early date of the tradition and its wide spread prove Levy in error in contending that J. and J. are John the Baptist and Jesus (Chald. Wört. 337).

In 2 Ti 3^{8} there is a various reading Μαμβρῆς; and it is interesting to find Mamre, מַמְרֵי or מַמְרֵא, in Jewish circles also. The spelling יוֹחָנֵי וּמַמְרֵא is found in Midrash Vayyosha' (i.e. from Ex 14^{30}), and also in Yalkut Shimeoni and the Talmudic tractate Menachoth 85*a* (quoted in Aruch).

It is probable that Jannes, otherwise spelt יונוס or יוֹחָנֵי, is a corruption of Ἰωάννης = יוֹחָנָן: with a side allusion, however, to Aram. יֹנֵי 'he who misleads'; and that Jambres is from יַמְרֵי, ptcp. מַמְרֵי 'he who opposes.' The insertion of β into the Yamre and Mamre recalls Μαμβρῆ (Gn 13[18]) and Ἀμβράμ (Ex 6[18]) in LXX. Schöttgen gives other spellings of the names in Jewish writings.

LITERATURE.—Schöttgen (Hor. Heb.) and Wetstein (Nov. Test.) on 2 Ti 3[8]; Schürer HJP II. iii. 149 ff.; Buxtorf, Chald. Lex. s. יוֹחָנָא, and the Bible Lexicons. J. T. MARSHALL.

JANNES AND JAMBRES, BOOK OF.—An apocryphon not yet discovered. It is twice mentioned by Origen. On Mt 27[8] Origen says that St. Paul, in 2 Ti 3[8], does not quote 'from public writings, but from a sacred book, which is entitled The Book of Jannes and Mambres.' (The form Mambres is found in Codd. F G and Itala of 2 Ti 3[8], and in many Latin authors. The Jews also knew the form מַמְרֵי). On Mt 23[37] Origen adduces 2 Ti 3[8] as an instance in which an apocr. writing is quoted in Scripture. The same work is probably intended in the Decretum Gelasii, under the title Pœnitentia Jamnis et Mambræ. Whether St. Paul really read the work, or, as Theodoret opines, gathered his information from the unwritten teaching of the Jews, we can but conjecture. There are two points slightly in favour of Origen—(1) The fact that the Gentiles, Pliny, Apuleius, and Numenius knew of J. and J., seems to point to a written source; and since Pliny died A.D. 79, the work was probably in existence before 2 Ti was written. (2) The fact that Pal. Targ. gives the Gr. form of the names ינים וימברים, seems to imply that here, as in the case of Eldad and Modad (which see), the Targumist is quoting from a written source. It is probable, then, that we have here to do, not with an oral tradition, but with a definite apocryphal work.

LITERATURE.—Schürer, HJP II. iii. 149 ff.; Zöckler, Apokr. d. AT, 424; Fabricius, Codex pseudepigr. VT, i. 813-825.

JANOAH.—1. (יָנוֹחַ). A town in the northern mountains of Naphtali, near Kedesh, 2 K 15[29]. It is the modern Yanûh. See SWP vol. i. sheet ii. 2. (יָנוֹחָה, AV Janohah). A place on the border of Ephraim, east of Taanath-shiloh, Jos 16[6. 7]. In the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s.v. 'Jano') it was known as lying in Akrabattine (the region of 'Akrabeh in the hills east of Shechem), 12 Roman miles east of Neapolis (Shechem), or where the present Yânûn now stands, with the supposed tomb of Nun. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xii. (cf. Robinson, BRP iii. 297; Guérin, Samarie, ii. 6; Buhl, GAP 178). C. R. CONDER.

JAPHETH (יֶפֶת, Ἰάφεθ).—The name of one of the sons of Noah, and the ancestor of a number of tribes (esp. Gn 10[2-4]).

1. In the article HAM we have seen reasons for adopting the opinion according to which the three sons of Noah originally represented a division of the inhabitants of Palestine, but which part of the population was represented by Japheth is not clear: Wellhausen (JDTh xxi. 403) conjectured the Philistines; Budde (Urgesch. 338 ff.), the Phœnicians; but the words in the blessing of Noah (Gn 9[27]), 'God make room (so perhaps literally) for Japheth to dwell in the tents of Shem,' would seem to imply a closer relationship than that of neighbouring nations, and one more resembling that of castes of tribes forming a single state, like the Ramnes and Tities in Rome, or the Brahmins and Kshattriyas of Hindustan. Of the name 'Japheth,' however, with any such denotation there is no trace. The text of Gn offers no etymology for the name, but only an assonance with Aram. פתה 'to be wide'; and though a name derived from this root would perhaps have a parallel in the Nabatæan אפתח, there are other Semitic roots from which the name could with equal probability be derived; the etymology which has found most favour is from the Hebrew יפה 'to be beautiful,' whence the Arabic-speaking Jews make it the equivalent of 'Al-Hasan'; and this, though not free from grammatical difficulty, is accepted by some modern authorities.

2. As the name of one of the founders of the human race, it is natural to compare Japheth with Iapetos, a personage who appears in Homer (Il. viii. 479) as a giant, and in Hesiod as the father of Prometheus; while in a passage of Berosus, quoted on the very questionable authority of Moses of Chorene (ed. Florival, i. 30), a Chaldæan cosmogony makes an Iapetos joint founder of the human family with two others whom Moses not unnaturally identifies with Ham and Shem.* The only value of this notice is that we learn from it who first compared the Greek and Hebrew legends. The identification is etymologically possible (Lagarde, Gesammelte Abhandlungen, 256), but not certainly correct, since the Greek language offers a sufficiently good derivation for the name of the giant Iapetos (Ebeling, Lexicon Homericum, s.v.), and the original import of the biblical Japheth is not obviously connected with the giant: if the two names are in reality traceable to the same source, the latter is more probably Semitic than Greek, but it may very well be neither.

3. Many attempts have been made, both in ancient (Jos. Ant. I. vi. 1; Talm. Bab., Yoma, f. 10*a*; Talm. Jer., Megillah, p. 19; for other Rabbinic references see Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. 421 ff.) and in modern times (see Lagarde, l.c., and esp. Lenormant, Orig. de l'Hist.[2] 1882) to identify the tribes derived from Japheth, of which Madai or Media, Javan or Ionia, and of Javan's sons Citium and Tarshish are familiar, and perhaps Meshech and Tubal may be said to be known; while the remaining names occur either in this table only (Tiras, Riphath) or chiefly besides in Ezk (esp. chs. 27. 38) and Jer (Ashkenaz). The omission of the name of Persia, which is known to Ezekiel (27[10] 38[5]), seems to give us a terminus ad quem for the composition of the list, while the fact that Magog occupies the second place shows that it can be little earlier than Ezekiel's time. The names of the grandsons may represent the results of more extended knowledge than that expressed in the names of the sons; but it is unlikely that the table in any form was derived from an official source; the names which it contains belong to distant nations, known to the Israelites of Ezekiel's time chiefly by hearsay, though several of them had by that date acquired some political importance. The writer who made them descendants of Japheth would seem to have already adopted the interpretation of Gn 9[27] which appears in the Targ. Onk., and Talm. Bab. l.c., according to which it is God, not Japheth, who is to dwell in the tents of Shem. The first clause, 'God make room for Japheth,' when the room was no longer confined to Palestine, would be a ground for counting among Japheth's descendants the barbarians who peopled the unknown north and the islands of the unexplored sea.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

JAPHETH (Ἰάφεθ).—A region whose identity is uncertain, mentioned in Jth 2[25]. Holofernes 'came unto the borders of Japheth, which were toward the south, over against Arabia.'

JAPHIA (יָפִיעַ; B Ἰεφθά, A, Luc. Ἰαφαλε;

---

* The modern Armenian poet Pakratuni (Haig, i. p. 17) rather ingeniously tbinks of 'earthly' and 'heavenly' names. The Armenian form of the name in Moses is Japetosthé, whereon Pictet (Origines Indo-Européennes, i. 627) based some inferences, accepted by Lenormant, l.c. II. i. 191.

Japhia).—1. King of Lachish, who, together with the kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, and Eglon, joined Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, in attacking the Gibeonites after the latter had made a treaty with the Israelites. The five 'kings of the Amorites' were routed by Joshua at Beth-horon, and fled to the cave at Makkedah, where they were slain at Joshua's command (Jos $10^{3ff.}$).

2. (B Ἰεφιες, Ἰανοῦε, Ἰανουού; A Ἀφιε, Ἰαφιε; Luc. Νάφεθ, Ἀχικάμ, Ἰαβέγ) One of David's sons born at Jerusalem; the list is given three times (2 S 5^{14b-16}, 1 Ch 3^{5-8} 14^{4-7}). J. F. STENNING.

JAPHIA (יָפִיעַ).—A town on the south border of Zebulun, Jos 19^{12}. It is probably the modern Yâfa, near the foot of the Nazareth hills. See SWP vol. i. sheet v. (cf. Robinson, *BRP*² ii. 343 f.).

JAPHLET (יַפְלֵט).—The eponym of an Asherite family, 1 Ch $7^{32f.}$. See GENEALOGY.

JAPHLETITES (יַפְלֵטִי).—The name of an unidentified tribe mentioned in stating the boundaries of the children of Joseph, Jos 16^{3} (see Dillmann's note).

JARAH (יַעְרָה).—A descendant of Saul, 1 Ch 9^{42}. In 8^{36} he is called Jehoaddah, and Kittel (in SBOT) would substitute יַעְדָּה for יַעְרָה (so Siegfried-Stade and [doubtfully] Oxf. Heb. Lex.; and Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 283, n. 14).

JAREB (יָרֵב, Ἰαρείμ, Ἰαρείβ) is twice employed by Hosea (5^{13} 10^{6}) as a designation of the king of Assyria. Various opinions have been expressed as to whether it is a proper name or a descriptive epithet. AV, which, like RV, has 'king J.' in the text, offers in the marg. the alternative renderings 'the king of J.' or 'the king that should plead,' while RVm gives 'a king that should contend.' Sayce (HCM 417) conjectures that J. may have been the natal name of the usurper who seized the throne of Assyria after the death of Shalmaneser IV. in Dec. B.C. 723, and who is known to history as Sargon II. It was natural that he should assume the name of one of the most illustrious of the early Bab. monarchs (Sargon I.), just as his two predecessors, who were also usurpers, exchanged their original names (Pul and Ululâ) for those of earlier Assyr. kings (Tiglath-pileser and Shalmaneser). What appears to be a fatal objection to Sayce's theory, is that we seem compelled by internal evidence of the strongest character to assign the whole of Hos 4–14 to a date prior even to the deportation of the inhabitants of Gilead by Tiglath-pileser (734), whereas, if J. is to be identified with Sargon, we should have to bring down the date of some at least of these chaps. to about B.C. 722, the year when Samaria fell. Others (like AVm, RVm), connecting J. (יָרֵב) with רִיב=strive, render, e.g., 'the warlike king' (W. R. Smith), 'a hostile king' (Gesenius), 'king Combat' (Farrar), 'Kampfhahn' (Guthe in Kautzsch's AT). Reuss, deriving J. from the same root רִיב, makes it=Lat. patronus, a title which he holds to be fairly applicable to a king whose assistance had been invoked by Ephraim and Judah (2 K 15^{19} 16^{7}). Schrader's identification of 'the combatant king' with Assurdân (c. 755) lacks probability, as is pointed out by Whitehouse, who agrees with Nowack that J. is Tiglath-pileser III. (745–728). A very attractive explanation of the name is offered by McCurdy, who considers that J. is a participial adjective from the root רבב meaning 'to be great.' Jareb would thus answer to the familiar title of Assyr. monarchs, 'the great king' (Hist. Proph. and Mon. i. 415). W. Max Müller (ZATW, 1897, p. 334) obtains the same meaning by dividing the words מלכי רב instead of מלך ירב. So also Cheyne (Expositor, Nov. 1897, p. 364; cf. Expos. Times, ix. [1898] pp. 364, 428). See further, Nowack, Kl. Proph. ad loc.; Neubauer, Zeitschr. f. Assyr. iii. 103; Hommel, Gesch. Bab.-Assyr. 680; Schrader, *COT*² ii. 136. J. A. SELBIE.

JARED (יֶרֶד, pausal form יָרֶד, LXX Ἰάρεδ, NT Ἰάρετ).—The father of Enoch, Gn $5^{15. 16. 18. 19. 20}$, 1 Ch 1^{2}, Lk 3^{37}. See further, JERED.

JARHA (יַרְחָע).—An Egyptian slave who married the daughter of his master Sheshan, 1 Ch $2^{34f.}$ See GENEALOGY.

JARIB (יָרִיב).—1. The eponym of a Simeonite family, 1 Ch 4^{24}=Jachin of Gn 46^{10}, Ex 6^{15}, Nu 26^{12}. 2. One of the 'chief men' who were sent by Ezra to Casiphia in search of Levites, Ezr 8^{16}. He is called in 1 Es 8^{44} Joribus. 3. A priest who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{18}. He is called in 1 Es 9^{19} Joribus.

JARIMOTH (A Ἰαριμώθ, B -ει-), 1 Es 9^{28}.—In Ezr 10^{27} JEREMOTH.

JARMUTH (יַרְמוּת).—1. A town in the W. of Judah. In Jos 10 (JE) its king, Piram, joined the Canaanite league against the Gibeonites, and suffered death along with his confederates at Makkedah—all of which argues a place of considerable importance. (Cf. Jos 12^{11} D²). According to Jos 15^{35} (P) it was situated in the Shephelah, and belonged to the tribe of Judah, which tribe on its return re-peopled the town (Neh 11^{29}).

The site is upon the present Jebel Yarmuk, a hill, the slopes of which still show the marks of old retaining walls, and are covered with the ruins of buildings. The summit is crowned by the foundations of a wall, the early acropolis of the place. Guérin (Judée, ii. 371 ff.) states that the ruins lie 'three good hours from Beit Djibrin, the ancient Eleutheropolis, on the road to Jerusalem.' The town will then be identical with the Ἰερμοῦς or Jermus of the Onomasticon, which Eusebius and Jerome agree in placing 10 miles from Eleutheropolis on the way to Jerusalem. And the Ἰαβεῖς or Jarimuth of the Onom. may be the same place, repeated with an error in the text (see Guérin, ad loc.). Though the site is not within the Shephelah, it immediately commands it.

2. A city in Issachar, belonging to the Gershonite Levites (Jos 21^{29}). Probably we should read רֶמֶת Remeth: for (1) in the duplicate list (1 Ch 6^{73}) the name is Ramoth, in the tribal list of cities (Jos 19^{21}) Remeth appears; (2) in Jos 21^{29} the LXX reads Ῥεμμάθ B, Ἰερμώθ A; and in 19^{21} Ῥέμμας B, Ῥαμάθ A.

The place has not been identified. Guérin (Galilée, i. 129 ff.) conjectures Kaukab el-Haoua, a height between Scythopolis and Tiberias, which the Crusaders named Belvoir. The only reason is that Ramah or Remeth means height (!). Conder (PEF Mem. 1881, p. 201) suggests Rameh N. of Samaria, near which tradition places Issachar's grave. A. C. WELCH.

JAROAH (יָרוֹחַ).—A Gadite chief, 1 Ch 5^{14}. The text is doubtful (cf. Kittel in SBOT).

JASAELUS (Ἀσάηλος, AV Jasael), 1 Es 9^{30}.—In Ezr 10^{29} SHEAL.

JASHAR, BOOK OF (AV Jasher, סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר; LXX 2 S 1^{18} βιβλίου τοῦ εὐθοῦς; Vulg. libro justorum; Syr. Jos 10^{13} 'book of hymns or praises,' ܠܬܫܒܚܬܐ, 2 S 1^{18} 'book of Ashir,' ܐܫܝܪ; Targ. סִפְרָא דְאוֹרָיְתָא,

'book of the law').—According to MT, this document was the source of the lines,

> 'Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon ;
> And thou, Moon, in the valley of Aijalon.
> And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed,
> Until the nation had avenged themselves of their enemies'
> (Jos $10^{12.\,13}$) ;

and of David's Lament over Saul and Jonathan, 2 S 1^{17-27}. LXX of Jos omits the reference to the Bk. of Jashar. But probably the original text of 1 K $8^{12.\,13}$ stated that the lines,

> 'J" hath said that he would dwell in the thick darkness.
> I have surely built thee an house of habitation,
> A place for thee to dwell in for ever,' were taken from this book. LXX makes our 1 K $8^{12.\,13}$ the close of 8^{53}, apparently following a somewhat different text, and adds οὐκ ἰδοὺ αὕτη γέγραπται ἐν βιβλίῳ τῆς ᾠδῆς. The last three words represent סֵפֶר הַשִּׁיר, which is probably a corruption, by the transposition of two letters, of סֵפֶר הַיָּשָׁר.

Nothing further is known of this document. Syr. of Jos and S, and LXX of 1 K 8^{53}, suggest that ישר in Jos and S may be a corruption of שיר 'song'; but this view has met with little if any support. The data are too scanty and obscure to determine either the character of the book or the meaning of its title. As the passages quoted are ancient poems on great events, especially battles, probably the book was a collection of such poems. Some other OT poems may be from this collection. The Targ. 'book of the law' represents a rabbinical theory that the Bk. of Jashar was the Pentateuch or part of it. Donaldson, in his Jashar: fragmenta archetypa carminum Hebraicorum, published at London in 1854, attempted a reconstruction of the book, and assigned to it a large number of passages from OT; but his views met with no acceptance.

The date of the collection is obviously later than the time of David, and probably older than B.C. 800—the references to Jashar are assigned to J^1 (Budde, Samuel, etc.).

MT points ישר as the ordinary יָשָׁר 'upright,' and it is so understood by LXX, Vulg. etc. If so, it may be taken as 'hero,' or collectively 'heroes,' courage and warlike prowess being the virtues most admired in primitive times; Ilgen notices the title Hamasa, 'warlike virtue,' 'valour,' given to a section of an Arabic anthology, containing poems in praise of heroic deeds. Or 'the hero' may be Israel, whose name is based on a root similar to ישר, and who is sometimes called יְשֻׁרוּן Jeshurun (which see), Dt 32^{15} $33^{5.\,26}$, Is 44^{2}. Or ישר may be the initial word of the book, possibly to be read as yāshîr 'sang,' as in אָז יָשִׁיר Ex 15^{1}, Nu 21^{17}.

There are two rabbinical works with the title 'Book of Jashar,' a moral treatise by R. Shabbatai Carmuz Levita, A.D. 1394, contained in a MS in the Vatican; and a treatise on the laws of the Jews by R. Thom, d. 1171, first printed in Italy A.D. 1544. There is also an anonymous historical narrative, with the same title, containing the Pent., Jg., and Jos with additions; accepted by some Jews as the Bk. of Jashar; probably the work of a Spanish Jew of the 13th cent. It is said to have first appeared at Naples, and was first printed at Venice in 1625. In 1674 a German version of this work, with additions, was published at Frankfort-on-Main by R. Jacob. In 1751 a Bristol type-founder published a forgery professing to be an English translation of the Bk. of Jashar, with a preface by Alcuin. It was reprinted in 1827 with a forged attestation by Wyclif.

JASHEN (יָשֵׁן, Ἀσάν, Jasen).—The sons of Jashen (בְּנֵי יָשֵׁן) are mentioned in the list of David's heroes given in 2 S 23^{32}. In the parallel list (1 Ch 11^{34}) they appear as the sons of Hashem (הָשֵׁם), who is further described as the Gizonite (הַגִּזוֹנִי) (wh. see). The name Gizon, however, does not occur elsewhere, and it seems probable that the true form of the gentilic adjective has been preserved by Lucian (2 S Ἰεσσαὶ ὁ Γουνύ; 1 Ch Εἰρασαὶ ὁ Γουνί), viz. 'the Gunite' (הַגּוּנִי), or member of the Naphtalite family of Guni (Nu 26^{48}); so Driver, Budde, Klostermann. It is further generally admitted by most scholars that the word בְּנֵי ('sons of') has crept into the text both of 2 S and 1 Ch by dittography from the preceding הַשַּׁעַלְבֹנִי ('the Shaalbonite'): Lucian omits it in both passages. Hashem (1 Ch), though supported by the LXX (2 S Ἀσάν; 1 Ch A υἱοὶ Ἀσάμ ὁ Γωυνί), must, in view of Lucian's text, be rejected in favour of Jashen. For 'the sons of Jashen' (2 S 23^{32}) we should therefore read 'Jashen the Gunite.' See further, Driver, Notes on the Books of Sam. p. 283.

J. F. STENNING.

JASHOBEAM (יָשָׁבְעָם).—One of David's mighty men, 1 Ch 11^{11} 12^{6} 27^{2}. There is reason to believe that his real name was Ishbosheth, i.e. Eshbaal. See JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH.

JASHUB (יָשׁוּב 'he returns').—1. Issachar's fourth son, Nu 26^{24} P, 1 Ch 7^{1}, called in Gn 46^{13} Iob (wh. see): patron. Jashubites, Nu 26^{24}. 2. A returned exile who married a foreigner, Ezr 10^{29}.

JASHUBI-LEHEM (יָשֻׁבִי לָחֶם).—The eponym of a Judahite family, 1 Ch 4^{22}. The text is manifestly corrupt. LXX gives καὶ ἀπέστρεψεν αὐτούς, Luc. καὶ ἐπέστρεψαν ἑαυτοῖς. Kittel (in SBOT) reads וַיָּשֻׁבוּ בֵית לָחֶם 'and they returned to Bethlehem,' remarking that the LXX and Vulg. (et qui reversi sunt in Lahem) rightly recognize the verb שׁוב. לחם must stand for בֵּית לֹ׳, and the last two letters of MT ישבו may be a trace of the בית. Even so, the meaning of the passage is obscure.

JASON (Ἰάσων).—A common Gr. name, not unfrequently used by Hel. Jews, or by Palestinians who were favourable to Hellenizing influences. In some cases it was adopted as the equivalent of Joshua or Jesus (Ἰησοῦς); cf. Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1.

1. J. THE SON OF ELEAZAR, one of the envoys sent by Judas Maccabæus to conclude a treaty with Rome (B.C. 161). The Greek name suggests that he belonged to the more liberal party among the Jews (Stanley), 1 Mac 8^{17}, Jos. Ant. XII. x. 6.

2. J. THE FATHER OF ANTIPATER, who was sent as an ambassador by Jonathan, in B.C. 144, to renew the former treaty with the Romans (1 Mac 12^{16} 14^{22}, Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 8). This Jason is perhaps the same as No. 1.

3. J. OF CYRENE, a Jewish writer, who composed five books on the history of the Maccabees and the wars of the Jews against Antiochus Epiphanes and his successor Eupator. Of this work our Second Book of the Maccabees is an abridgment (ἐπιτομή), and from the epitomizer's preface our whole knowledge of J. is derived. The date at which he lived can be determined only by internal evidence. Comparing the epitome with 1 Mac, which deals in the main with the same period of history, we find numerous discrepancies not only in important details, but sometimes even in the order of events; and it cannot be doubted that on the whole the simpler narrative of 1 Mac is to be preferred. At the same time 2 Mac supplies us with many additional particulars, which there is no reason to doubt. The writer seems to have been specially well informed upon the earlier troubles which led to the Maccabæan rising. J. clearly had at his disposal valuable contemporary information; but if this was not written but oral, and frequently not received at first hand, it is easy to account for the numerous inaccuracies and legendary additions which are to be found in his work. The narrative of 2 Mac extends to B.C. 160; and J. probably wrote not long after that date. His name and place of residence imply that he was a Hellenist; the ornate and rhetorical style of the work is characteristic of the later Gr. writers; and from internal evidence it seems clear that the orig. work of J. was written in Greek. Cf. Schürer, HJP II. iii. 211–215; Zöckler on 2 Mac, Einl. 2.

4. J. THE HIGH PRIEST, the son of Simon II., and brother of Onias III., was the leader of the Hellenizing party among the Jews. His orig. name was Jesus or Joshua (Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1). On the accession of Antiochus Epiphanes, he induced the king, by means of a large present of money, to expel Onias from the high priesthood, and to confer the office upon himself (2 Mac 4^{7-17}, 4 Mac 4^{15-20}. Josephus, l.c., seems to be mistaken when he asserts that J. became high priest on the death of his brother, and also when he states that the next pretender, Menelaus, was a brother of J.). J. further procured from Antiochus permission to erect a gymnasium and 'ephebeion' in Jerus., and obtained for the inhabitants the title and privileges of 'citizens of Antioch.' Through J.'s influence Gr. customs were largely adopted among all classes of the Jews; and to the sacred games, which were celebrated at Tyre every four years in honour of Hercules, he sent a Jewish deputation with a large sum of money. This money, however, at the request of the envoys themselves, was expended on building galleys and not on sacrifices (2 Mac 4^{18-20}). For three years (B.C. 174–171) J. continued in power, then he was supplanted by his own envoy to Antiochus, Menelaus, who gained the office of high priest by offering a still larger bribe (ib. 4^{23-26}). J. took refuge among the Ammonites; but the next year, on the occasion of a false report of the death of Antiochus in Egypt, he suddenly attacked Jerus. with a large force, and, becoming master of the city, drove his rival to take refuge in the citadel. On the advance of Antiochus, J. fled once more to the Ammonites, and subsequently to Egypt. Afterwards, relying on the fabled connexion between the Spartans and Jews (cf. 1 Mac 12^{7}), he retired to Sparta, and there died 'in a strange land,' 'nor had he any funeral at all, or place in the sepulchre of his fathers' (2 Mac 5^{1-10}).

JASON (Ἰάσων).—During St. Paul's visit to Thessalonica, he was the guest of one Jason. When the Jews caused a disturbance, they attacked Jason's house, and, failing to find the apostle, they took Jason and the brethren before the politarchs. The magistrates received security (τὸ ἱκανόν) from Jason and the others, and then dismissed them. The brethren immediately sent Paul and Silas away to Berœa (Ac $17^{5ff.}$). The nature of the security is not mentioned. According to Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 231), it was a security to prevent the cause of the disturbance, Paul, from coming to Thessalonica. This put a chasm between the apostles and the Thessalonians, and hence he speaks (1 Th 2^{18}) of Satan hindering him (διότι ἠθελήσαμεν ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, ἐγὼ μὲν Παῦλος καὶ ἅπαξ καὶ δίς, καὶ ἐνέκοψεν ἡμᾶς ὁ Σατανᾶς). This explanation is ingenious, but will perhaps hardly explain the ἅπαξ καὶ δίς.

In Ro 16^{21} the apostle sends greetings from Timothy, Lucius, Jason, and Sosipater, his kinsmen. This was very probably the same as the Jason of Thessalonica,—an identification made rather more probable by the possibility of Sosipater being the Sopater of Berœa (Ac 20^{4}). He would then be a Jew (οἱ συγγενεῖς μου). It was natural that St. Paul should lodge with a fellow-countryman, and Jason was a favourite name for Jews to assume whose Hebrew name was Joshua (Jesus); cf. Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1: ὁ μὲν οὖν Ἰησοῦς Ἰάσονα ἑαυτὸν μετωνόμασεν· ὁ δὲ Ὀνίας ἐκλήθη Μενέλαος. Jason did not apparently accompany St. Paul to Jerusalem (Ac 20^{4}), and therefore presumably remained at Thessalonica. JATTIR (יַתִּיר and יַתִּר).—A town of Judah in the southern mountains, noticed with Socoh and Debir, a Levitical city, Jos 15^{48} 21^{14}, 1 Ch 6^{42} [Eng.^{57}]. It was one of the cities to whose elders David sent of the spoil from Ziklag, 1 S 30^{27}. It appears to have been far south, since it is noticed in the latter passage with Aroer. The most probable site is the ruin 'Attîr, N.E. of Beersheba, on a hill spur close to the southern desert.

JAVAN (יָוָן, Ἰωυάν, Ἑλλάς, Ἕλληνες, Javan, Græcia, Græci).—A son of Japheth and father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim (the last a textual error for Rodanim, i.e. Rhodes) (Gn $10^{2.4}$). In Is 66^{19} (cf. Jl 3^{6}) Javan is associated with the Gr. islands, and in Ezk 27^{13} with the traders of Tubal and Meshech, while in Dn 8^{21} 10^{20} 11^{2} it denotes the Macedonian empire. J., in fact, is the Greek Ἰάων, 'Ionian,' and its position in Gn 10^{2} shows that it must there mean Cyprus (in which Kition [Kittim] was situated), called mat Yavnâ, Yânan, and Yânana, 'the land of the Ionians,' in the inscriptions of Sargon and Sennacherib. In the Bab. transcripts of the inscriptions of Darius Hystaspis, Yâvanu represents the Ionians of Asia Minor; and when, in B.C. 711, the people of Ashdod revolted from Assyria and deposed their lawful king, they put on the throne in his place a certain Yavanu or 'Greek.' Gaza was also called Iônê, and the sea between Philistia and Egypt was known as 'Ionian' (Steph. Byz. s.v. Ἰόνιον). In the Egyp. hieroglyphs Ha-nibu or Ui-nivu is rendered by Uinin or 'Ionians' in demotic, and the Mediterranean is termed the 'circle of the Ha-nibu' as early as the pyramid-texts of the 6th dynasty. One of the Tel el-Amarna tablets (B.C. 1400) speaks of a Yivana or 'Ionian' in the land of Tyre, and W. Max Müller (Asien und Europa, p. 370) has pointed out that the name of one of the allies of the Hittites in their struggle with Ramses II. must be read Yevana, 'Ionians.' A. H. SAYCE.

JAVAN (יָוָן), mentioned by Ezekiel (27^{19}) among places that traded with Tyre, but distinct from Javan = Ionia, which occurs in v.^{13}. See preceding article. The verse in which it is found commences וְדָן וְיָוָן מְאוּזָּל, and the third of these words is probably to be interpreted 'from Uzal,' a place in Arabia (Gn 10^{27}); but it is not clear whether Uzal is to be regarded as the factory whence 'Wĕdān and Jāvān' exported goods to Tyre, or whether 'from Uzal' is an epithet of 'Javan' intended to distinguish this Javan from the other. Of the modern authorities who regard the consonants of the text as correct, Smend thinks Javan may be the name of an Arab tribe, or of a locality in the neighbourhood of Uzal (Ṣan'ā); while Glaser (Skizze, ii. 428-436) is inclined to interpret יָוָן as 'Greeks,' supposing a Greek colony in Arabia to be signified, but seems to prefer to identify it with Yayn, a place mentioned by Hamdāni (ed. Müller, p. 171, l. 10) as belonging together with Waddān to the territory of Juhaynah, and indeed immediately after Ḥarrat an-Nār in the neighbourhood of Medinah (see Doughty's map). The situation of this Yayn can be fixed with some accuracy from the notice in Al-Bekri (ed. Wüstenfeld, p. 859, etc.); but although the LXX rendering (οἶνον) would seem to favour the reading יֵין in Ezk, and the proximity of Waddān seems to support Glaser's identification, the fact that there is no evidence of this Yayn having ever been a place of importance, or connected with the trade in iron and spices, or connected with Uzal, renders it impossible to attach any scientific value to the identification.

The majority of modern critics regard the consonants as corrupt (Stade, Briggs, Cornill; cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex. s. וְדָן); and in Cornill's edition וארנבן is substituted for the consonants of the text, on the authority of a wine-list of Nebuchadnezzar (Delitzsch, Assyrische Lesestücke, 1875, p. 63), in which a country of that name (A-ra-na-ba-nun) is mentioned with two others which bear some resemblances to places named in v.^{18} as sending wine to Tyre. Though striking parallels to Ezekiel are found in the cuneiform inscriptions (D. H. Müller, Ezechiel-studien, 1895, pp. 56-62), the legitimacy of such a correction seems questionable.

JAZER (יַעְזֵר, יַעְזֵיר, Ἰαζήρ; AV of Nu 21^{32} 32^{35} Jaazer; meaning of name uncertain).—A town E. of the Jordan, in Gilead, and belonging to the tribe of Gad (Jos 13^{25}, 1 Ch 26^{31}).* The indications given in the Onomasticon by Eusebius and Jerome, viz. 10 (or 8) miles W. of Philadelphia and 15 N. of Heshbon, are approximately correct. It was a Levitical city (Jos 21^{39}), was evidently a place of more than usual importance, and is mentioned in various connexions. The 'villages' or daughter towns of J. are spoken of in Nu 21^{32}, showing that the district was thickly inhabited, and that neighbouring places were grouped about it as their political head. It was chosen as one of the stations of David's census officers (2 S 24^{5}), and, seven centuries after the conquest of the country under Moses, it was famous for its vineyards and fruitful fields (Is 16^{8-10}, Jer 48^{32}).† Jazer is mentioned also in connexion with the wars of the Maccabees, having been, according to Josephus (Ant. XII. viii. 1), captured and burnt by Judas Maccabæus, after the latter had inflicted a crushing defeat upon the Ammonites under Timotheus.

When the Hebrews reached Heshbon, they discovered, lying not far to the north of it, an extensive and fertile region which they speak of as 'the land of Jazer' (Nu 32^{1}). Against this a special expedition (Nu 21^{32}) was fitted out by Moses (1) because of its own importance, and (2) because it lay in the line of march to the conquest of Bashan. This region at once attracted the attention of the Hebrews, and the contrast between its broad and fertile expanse and the desert which they had left made them feel that they had reached a paradise. 'It is not to be wondered at that the two and a half tribes were perfectly willing to stay on this side of the Jordan. Judæa has no land to compare with it, neither has Samaria, except in very limited portions. The surface of the country is slightly rolling and comparatively free from stone. Here common Arab trails broaden out into fine roads. Here are wide pasture lands and luxuriant fields of wheat and barley, and the ignorant Bedawin who own the soil point with pride to the green acres that are spread out beneath the sun.'

Jazer, now called Khurbet Sar, has extensive remains of antiquity, but those above ground are chiefly of the Roman period. It possesses a curious tower formed of massive blocks of unhewn stone, which could have been put into position only at the cost of immense labour. Sar is about three thousand four hundred feet above the sea-level, and in the wide view to the W. and S. the Dead Sea is embraced. On the south, Wady esh-Shita begins to descend rapidly towards the Jordan Valley, and in the opposite direction not far from the ruins are two large ponds, near to but entirely distinct from each other, peculiar and attractive objects in the landscape. The great plateau about this ancient ruin has for generations been the battle-ground of the Arab tribes in that region, and quantities of skulls are piled under the fallen arches of a once magnificent building (Merrill, East of the Jordan, pp. 405, 485).

JE.—The symbol used by biblical critics for the combination in one whole of the Jahwistic and Elohistic documents. See HEXATEUCH.

JEALOUSY.—There is no more striking example of the anthropomorphic way of speaking of God characteristic of OT than the frequent ascription to Him of jealousy, associated as that idea is in our minds with an evil meaning. 'I am a jealous God' (אֵל קַנָּא Ex 20^{5} 34^{14}, Dt 4^{24} 5^{9}, Jos 24^{19}, Nah 1^{2}). Two things may help to remove the feeling of strangeness. The phrase is probably taken from the marriage relation which is so often used in OT to describe the relation between J″ and the people of Israel (Is 54^{5} 62^{5}, Hos 2^{19} etc.). Again, although the word is now generally used in a bad sense, it has a good side, as in the case of the marriage relation in question; and it is only in this sense, of course, that it is used in the present connexion. Just as jealousy in husband or wife is the energetic assertion of an exclusive right, so God asserts and vindicates His claim on those who belong to Him alone. The use of the figure is much bolder and more picturesque than the bare assertion of right would be. If God is the husband and Israel the wife, then idolatry and wickedness of every kind are spiritual adultery. Israel is often represented as thus provoking God to jealousy (Dt 32^{16}, 1 K 14^{22} etc.). The phraseology occurs with special frequency in Ezk (5^{13} $16^{38.42}$ 23^{25} $36^{5.6}$ 38^{19} 39^{25}); but it is found in other prophets also (Is passim, Jl 2^{18}, Zeph 1^{18}, Zec 1^{14} 8^{2}, Hos $2^{2.16}$).

On the other hand, the term is used to denote passionate concern in man for God's honour, as in the case of Phinehas (Nu $25^{11.13}$), Elijah (1 K 19^{10}), Jehu (2 K 10^{16}; cf. Ps 119^{139}). So Jn 2^{17} 'The zeal (ζῆλος) of thine house' (Ps 69^{9}); 'a zeal for God' (Ro 10^{2}); 'I am jealous . . . with a godly jealousy' (2 Co 11^{2}). Cf. ὁ καναναῖος = ὁ ζηλωτής, Lk 6^{15}.

The law of the jealousy offering is found in Nu 5^{11-31}. The rite was in the nature of an appeal to God, who was called upon to decide the question of the innocence or guilt of the suspected person. The subsequent practice of ordeals in the West was based on the OT institution.

* In Nu 21^{24} Dillm. and others read יַעְזֵר instead of MT עַז, and tr. 'the border of the children of Ammon was Jazer.'

† In Jer 48^{32} 'they reached even unto the sea of Jazer,' יָם 'sea' is a textual error, due to an accidental repetition of the יָם of the preceding clause (so Graf, Grätz, Cheyne, Giesebrecht).

The words ζηλοῦν and ζῆλος are also used in a bad sense, esp. in NT; ζῆλος is coupled with φθόνος (1 Mac 8^{16}), ἔρις (Ro 13^{13}, 1 Co 3^{3}), and ἐριθία (2 Co 12^{20}, Gal 5^{20}, Ja 3$^{14. 16}$); cf. Ac 7^{9}, 1 Co 13^{4}, Ja 4^{2}.

JEBERECHIAH (יְבֶרֶכְיָהוּ 'J″ blesseth,' generally abbreviated בֶּרֶכְיָה or בֶּרֶכְיָהוּ, Berechiah, which see).—The father of Zechariah, a friend of Isaiah, Is 8^{2}.

JEBUS, JEBUSI, JEBUSITE (יְבוּס, Ιεβους; יְבוּסִי, יְבֻסִי, Ιεβουσαῖος -οι, Ιεβουσαι Jos 18^{16}, Ιεβουσειν Jg 19^{11b}).—Jĕbūs occurs only in Jg 19^{10} ('Jebus, the same is Jerusalem'), v.^{11}, and in 1 Ch 11$^{4. 5}$, a passage which the Chronicler has so expanded from 2 S 5^{6} as to introduce the name into it twice (in v.^{4} adding, 'the same is Jebus,' and in v.^{5} 'the inhabitants of Jebus'), each time, obviously, as an intentional archaism. On the strength of these passages, it used commonly to be said that Jebus was the old name of Jerusalem; but the Tel el-Amarna tablets have shown this view to be erroneous; the city is there called regularly *Urusalim. It seems that, the inhabitants being known as 'Jebusites,' it was inferred incorrectly that 'Jebus' was the name of their city; but more usually, even in early times, it is spoken of as 'Jerusalem' (Jg 1$^{7. 21}$, Jos 15^{63}, 2 S 5^{6}).

Jebusite † was the name of the local tribe which, in the first centuries of Israel's occupation of Canaan, held Jerusalem, until its citadel, 'the stronghold of Zion,' was captured under David, being called afterwards, from this circumstance, 'the city of David' (2 S 5$^{6-9}$; cf. 1 K 2^{10} 11^{43} etc.). Allusions to the Israelites' inability to expel the Jebusites from their stronghold are found in Jos 15^{63}, Jg 1^{21}; and in Jg 19$^{10-12}$ it is described as a city of 'foreigners.' Zion was the S. part of the easternmost ‡ of the two hills, on which Jerusalem was situated; and this accordingly was the site of the old Jebusite fortress. From its position it admitted of being strongly fortified: on the E. it overhung the Kidron valley, the bottom of which was some 700–800 ft. below; on the S. its sides sloped down more gradually to even a greater depth; on the W. the Tyropœon valley—not, as now, filled up with débris—was some 300 ft. below it; only on the N. was the approach easier, though even here, according to Guthe's excavations, there was a natural barrier, consisting of a depression in the rock, some 30–50 yards wide, and 12 deep. The area thus indicated would include, moreover, the one natural spring in Jerusalem, Gihon.§ The situation of this stronghold thus readily explains its long resistance to the Israelites. In the end, however, in spite of the taunting words in which its inhabitants defied their assailants to enter it, it was taken by David (2 S 5$^{6-9}$),—if an addition found only in the text of 1 Ch 11^{6} is to be trusted, through the prowess of Joab; and received the name which perpetuated to after-ages the memory of the monarch's success. The position of the Jebusite stronghold is further alluded to in Jos 15^{8} 18^{16}, where it is said that the (North) border of Judah and the (South) border of Benjamin passed along the valley of the son of Hinnom (whether this be the valley on the S. or the S.E. of Zion) to the south shoulder—i.e. the projecting mountain-side—of the Jebusite,—in exact agreement with the situation as defined above; it lay thus, according to these passages (P), just within the territory of Benjamin. This position of Jerusalem, so close to the border-line separating the two tribes, explains the variation observable between Jos 15^{63} ('the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah in Jerusalem to this day') and Jg 1^{21} ('the Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem to this day'); see Jerusalem. Of the earlier history of Jerusalem, it will be sufficient here to say that its king, Adoni-zedek, is described as being defeated and slain by the Israelites (Jos 10$^{23. 26}$; cf. 12^{10}); but nothing is said here about the city being taken: the statement in Jg 1^{8} that the children of Judah took it and burnt it, can be reconciled with v.^{21} (Jos 15^{63}) only by very artificial suppositions; and the verse is in all probability a gloss, due to a misunderstanding of v.^{7b} (see Moore, ad loc.).

The only Jebusite mentioned expressly by name is Araunah, the owner of the threshing-floor on the top of 'Zion,' which was bought by David for the purpose of building an altar to J″ (2 S 24$^{16. 18. 25}$; cf. 1 Ch 21$^{15. 18. 26. 28}$ 22^{1}, 2 Ch 3^{1}); but it is reasonable to suppose that Adoni-zedek (Jos 10^{1} etc.), if not Adoni-bezek as well (Jg 1^{5}; see v.$^{7\,end}$, and cf. Moore), was Jebusite likewise. How, or when, the Jebusites obtained possession of their stronghold, we do not know: in the Tel el-Amarna letters (c. B.C. 1400), Abdichêba is ruler of 'the land (or district) of the city of Jerusalem'; but, though allusion is made to the political action taken by the 'city' and 'country' governed by Abdichêba, the name of the inhabitants is not stated. Nor do our data enable us to determine with certainty the racial affinities of the Jebusites; though their position, and the Semitic name Adoni-zedek ('Zedek is my lord'), would lead naturally to the inference that they were a sub-tribe of the Canaanites. In Jos 10^{5} (cf. vv.$^{1. 3. 12}$) Adoni-zedek is called a 'king of the Amorites'; but, in view of the manner in which 'Amorite' is used in E (like 'Canaanite' in J) as a general designation of the pre-Israelitish inhabitants of Canaan, no conclusion can be drawn from the statement as to the distinctive nationality of his subjects: there were at least no Amorites S. of Phœnicia in the age of the Tel el-Amarna letters.*

The Jebusites are frequently mentioned in the rhetorical enumerations of the nations of Canaan, whom the Israelites were to dispossess (or had dispossessed), as Gn 15^{21}, Ex 3$^{8. 17}$ 13^{5}, Jos 11^{3} (cf. Nu 13^{29}); in these lists, perhaps on account of their being numerically the smallest, they hold nearly always the last place. The buildings of David on the 'Millo' (2 S 5^{9}), and still more the temple and palaces constructed by Solomon, must have greatly altered the appearance of Zion; and few of its former Jebusite possessors can have remained there. The narrative of 2 S 24 shows, however, that David treated his conquered foes with consideration. According to 1 K 9$^{20f.}$, the Jebusites, with other Canaanite races, were reduced by Solomon to serfdom, and made liable to forced service (הֶעֱלָם לְמַס עֹבֵד). In Zec 9^{7}, where the future incorporation of the Philistines in the kingdom of God is promised, either (Wellh., Now.) Jebusite is an archaistic expression for Jerusalemite, or (Ew.) the allusion is to the Jebusites of old, who were incorporated into Judah by David,—'and he also shall be a remnant for our God, and he shall be as a clan-leader [or, a clan, אַלֻּף] in Judah, and Ekron as a Jebusite.' S. JEDIDAH (יְדִידָה 'darling'; B Ἰεδεία, A Ἐδιδά).—Daughter of Adaiah of Bozkath, and mother of Josiah, king of Judah (2 K 22^{1}).

JEDIDIAH (יְדִידְיָהּ 'beloved of J″'; cf. Sab. ודדאל; B Ἰδεδεί, A Εἰεδιδιά).—The name given to Solomon by the prophet Nathan, 2 S 12^{25} 'for the LORD's sake' (בַּעֲבוּר יהוה). See SOLOMON.

JEDUTHUN (יְדוּתוּן, יְדֻתוּן [in Kethîbh of Ps 39^{1} 77^{1}, Neh 11^{17}, 1 Ch 16^{38} יְדִיתוּן], LXX Ἰδιθούν, Ἰδιθώμ, etc.).—The eponym of one of the three guilds which, acc. to the Chronicler, conducted the musical service of the temple from the time of David downwards. The name does not occur in the books of Sam. or Kings or in any pre-exilic document. Not only so, but the earliest of the post-exilic writers know of only the Asaphites as singers (Neh 7^{44}, Ezr 2^{41}). There is indeed mention in Neh 11^{17} of descendants of J. who discharged this function, but in this passage we have not the original memoirs of Nehemiah, and the reference is wanting in the LXX. The Chronicler makes J. like Asaph, a contemporary of David, and gives him the title of 'the king's seer' (2 Ch 35^{15}). While in 1 Ch 16$^{41\text{f.}}$ 25$^{1\text{f.}}$ etc. the three guilds of temple musicians are named after Heman, Asaph, and Jeduthun, there are other passages where the third name in the list is Ethan (1 Ch 6^{44} 15^{17} etc.). The two names are often assumed to be alternative designations of one and the same singer. It may be so, but there are circumstances which render this explanation less satisfactory than it appears at first sight. Reasonable doubts have even been expressed whether J. was originally a proper name at all. The word occurs in the title of three psalms (39. 62. 77). In the first of these (unless לְ be a scribal error for עַל) לִידוּתוּן may be in apposition with לַמְנַצֵּחַ (giving the sense of 'to the chief musician, namely to J.'), but in Ps 62 and 77 the reading is עַל־יְדוּתוּן (LXX ὑπὲρ Ἰδιθούν) 'upon J.' (which, after the analogy of similar expressions in the headings of the Pss, most probably means 'upon an instrument named J.'), or as in RV 'after the manner of J.' (where the last word would be the name of a tune or the opening word of a song). The whole subject of Heb. musical terms is so involved in obscurity that it is impossible to reach any certain conclusion. Seeing that the Sept. translators found many of these terms unintelligible, there is nothing improbable in the supposition that the Chronicler writing about the same date (c. B.C. 250) adopted an interpretation which took J. for a proper name, and that he transformed it, like the more familiar Heman and Ethan (which see), into the eponym of a Levitical choir. JEHOADDAH (יְהוֹעַדָּה, possibly ‘J″ hath deposed or hath numbered’).—A descendant of Saul, 1 Ch 8^{36}. See Jarah.

JEHOADDAN (יְהוֹעַדָּן 2 Chr 25^{1} and, as vocalized, 2 K 14^{2}. The consonants of the text in 2 K 14^{2} give the form Jehoaddin [so RV] יהועדין).—A lady of Jerusalem, mother of Amaziah king of Judah.

JEHOAHAZ (יְהוֹאָחָז, or Joahaz יוֹאָחָז 2 K 14^{1}, 2 Ch 34^{8} 36$^{2.4}$ ‘J″ hath grasped’).—1. King of Israel, son of Jehu. His reign of seventeen years necessitates in 2 K 13^{1} the reading ‘one and twentieth’ (Jos. Ant. IX. viii. 5), or in v.^{10} ‘thirty-ninth’ (Aldine LXX, and Thenius). The inroads of Hazael of Damascus, which Jehu could not resist (2 K 10^{32}), crushed Jehoahaz. The straits to which he was reduced by the Syrians (2 K 13$^{7.22}$ 14$^{26.27}$) led by the young prince Benhadad (13$^{3.24}$) imply that the terrible anticipations of Elisha (2 K 8^{12}) were being realized. These calamities were accompanied by a revival of the Asherah worship of Ahab (13^{6}, cf. 1 K 16^{33}). Nevertheless, at the king's prayer, J″ promised Israel ‘a saviour’ (cf. Jg 3^{9} etc.), a promise not fulfilled in this reign (as Jos. Ant. IX. viii. 5, see v.^{22}), but in the victories of Joash and Jeroboam II. (2 K 13^{25} 14^{27}), unless we suppose an allusion to the Assyrian king Rammân-nirâri who captured and plundered Damascus about this time (see Schrader, COT i. 207).

2. King of Judah (Joachaz or Jeconias, 1 Es 1^{34}; Zarakes, 1 Es 1^{38}, see QPB). The name Shallum, found in Jer 22^{11}, 1 Ch 3^{15}, may possibly be significant, ‘to whom it is requited’ (Keil), or may contain an allusion to the unfortunate king of Israel, 2 K 15^{13} (Bertheau), but more probably it was his original name, exchanged on his accession for one of better omen. He was the third son of Josiah (2 K 23$^{31.36}$ 24^{18}), his position in 1 Ch 3^{15} being due to his insignificance. Although a bad man, ἀσεβὴς καὶ μιαρὸς τὸν τρόπον, ‘impious and impure’ (Jos. Ant. X. v. 2), he must have been a popular prince, since the people made him king in preference to his elder brother. He was anointed—a ceremony specified only in the case of a new dynasty or a disputed succession. Even the prophets Jeremiah (22$^{10-12}$) and Ezekiel (19$^{2-4}$) speak of him with sympathy and regret. After his victory at Megiddo it is likely that Necho resumed his march on the Euphrates, and sent a detachment to Jerusalem to bring J. to Riblah, whence he was carried a prisoner to Egypt when Necho returned, after having reduced Syria west of the Euphrates. 2 Ch 36^{3} might imply that Necho visited Jerusalem in person when deposing Jehoahaz. This is unlikely; but he probably did so on his return journey (see Rawlinson's note on Herodotus, ii. 159).

3. = Ahaziah of Judah, 2 Ch 21^{17} 25^{23}.

JEHOASH or JOASH (יְהוֹאָשׁ, יוֹאָשׁ, יֹאָשׁ 2 Ch 24^{1} ‘J″ is strong,’ or ‘J″ hath bestowed’*).—1. King of Judah (2 K 11. 12, 2 Ch 22^{10}–24). A year-old infant when hidden by his aunt in a lumber-room of the palace (RVm, Jos. Ant. IX. vii. 1) from his unnatural grandmother, J. was but seven when placed on the throne of his ancestors (see Athaliah and Jehoiada). It is sufficient here to observe that the significance of his coronation, as the revival of David's line, was emphasized, not only by the employment of David's dedicated armoury, but by a ceremonial of which there is no previous record, the investiture of the king with the royal insignia, ‘the crown and the bracelets’ (so Wellh. reading הצעדות instead of העדות ‘testimony,’ cf. 2 S 1^{10}; Jerome [Qu. Heb. on 2 Ch 23^{11}] says ‘phylacteries are meant, on which were written the ten commandments’). The covenant was renewed, not only between God and the nation, but between the people and the king (Ch omits), and, moreover, Jehoiada took steps to secure the continuance of the Davidic stock (2 Ch 24^{3}). The death of Athaliah was followed by a reaction against the Baal worship which she had fostered; and the temple, which had been ‘broken up’ during her reign (2 Ch 24^{7}), naturally became the object of the young king's pious care. The account in Kings of the raising of money for this purpose seems to have presented great difficulties to the Chronicler. At this period the commutation of sacrifices by a money payment appears to have been common (2 K 12^{16}), and the money was paid to the priests directly, to each man by his patrons (‘acquaintance’). The king directed that the priests should see to the necessary repairs, and should devote to this purpose (α) the money paid for the redemption of personal vows (Lv 27^{2}), and (β) all voluntary offerings in coin. [Ch substitutes the half shekel tax of Ex 30$^{13-16}$, while AV and RVm of 2 K 12^{4}, supported by Targ., Rashi, etc., imply that this was a third source of revenue]. The priests [Ch ‘Levites’], however, with Jehoiada at their head, ignored the king's order; possibly from poverty, as the temple was then only one of many sanctuaries (2 K 12^{3}). At last, in the 23rd year of the reign, the business was, with their consent, taken out of their hands. Jehoiada [Ch ‘the king’] placed a money chest ‘beside the altar’ (so Josephus) [Ch ‘without at the gate’], into which the priests that kept the door (cf. 22^{4} 25^{18}) [Ch ‘all the princes and all the people’] cast the proper monies. The money was counted by the king's scribe and the high priest [Ch ‘chief priest's officer’], and according to Kings was devoted solely to the repair of the fabric, whereas Ch asserts that ‘of the rest were made vessels for the house of the Lord,’ thus directly contradicting 2 K 12^{13}. The Chronicler now records the criminal weakness of J. in yielding to the idolatrous tendencies of the princes, and his base ingratitude as shown in the murder of Zechariah, the son of those to whom he owed his life and crown. There is nothing of this in Kings. There is indeed in 2 K 12^{2} a hint at a deterioration in J.'s character after the death of Jehoiada (denied by Ewald, who renders ‘wherein’ ‘because,’ HI iv. 137 n. 1); but, on the other hand, he is ranked in 2 K with Amaziah (14^{3}), Uzziah (15^{3}), and Jotham (15^{34}) as one who ‘did right in the eyes of the Lord, yet not like David’; the shortcoming in each case being apparently that ‘the high places were not taken away.’ However, the reference to the murder of Zechariah in Mt 23^{35}, Lk 11^{51}, seems to guarantee that the story is not inserted merely to give a moral reason for the calamities of Jehoash. The Syrian invasion which followed [Ch immediately] is naturally represented in Ch as a special judgment on J. and the guilty princes, whereas in Kings it is implied that Hazael (not mentioned in Ch) did not actually take Jerusalem, but was bought off by an immense bribe. In any case the invasion was a severe national humiliation, which must have caused much discontent, and this found vent in the murder of J. by two of his servants in the fortress on Mt. Zion. The Chronicler heightens the infamy of his end by adding that he was ‘in great diseases,' that they 'slew him on his bed,' that he was not buried in the royal sepulchres, and that the mothers of the assassins were of the two accursed nations of Moab and Ammon (see Dt 23^{3}). Jerome (Qu. Heb., ad loc.) notes that 'this is said to emphasize the wickedness of the Israelites who were unwilling to avenge God's priest.'

* See on this name and on ‘Josiah’ a paper by Hommel in Expos. Times, viii. (1897) p. 562.

2. King of Israel, son of Jehoahaz. The brief epitome of his reign (2 K 13$^{10-13}$) merely adds to the inevitable condemnation of his national worship an allusion to his defeat of Judah. But we derive a much more favourable impression of him from the close of the Acts of Elisha (2 K 13$^{14-25}$), and from the history of Amaziah of Judah, 2 K 14$^{8-16}$ (=2 Ch 25$^{17-24}$), where the formula of conclusion is repeated from 13$^{12.13}$. In J. was partially fulfilled (13^{25}) the promise (13$^{4.5}$) of a saviour from Syria, a promise repeated in the double symbolical prophecy of Elisha to the somewhat irresponsive king (13^{18}); and when we remember the abject condition into which Israel had fallen in the previous reign, it will be evident that J. must have been one of the greatest rulers of the northern kingdom. The hiring by Amaziah of Judah of 100,000 soldiers of Israel, during this reign (2 Ch 25^{6}), would indicate that all fear of Syria had been taken away. 'His might' was shown also in the thoroughness with which he followed up his victory at Bethshemesh, by breaking down the wall of Jerusalem on the weakest side. His natural disposition seems to have been good (so Jos. Ant. IX. viii. 6). There was a wholeheartedness in the burst of grief over the dying prophet; there was a pious recognition of the true source of Israel's strength in the words (13^{14}) which reechoed Elisha's own apostrophe to the ascending Elijah (2^{12}); and even the sarcastic fable in which he replied to Amaziah's gratuitous challenge was dictated not more by pride than by magnanimity.

JEHOHANAN (יְהוֹחָנָן 'J″ hath been gracious').—1. 1 Ch 26^{3} a Korahite doorkeeper in David's time. 2. 2 Ch 17^{15} one of Jehoshaphat's five captains. Possibly father of Ishmael, who held a similar post at the accession of Jehoash, 2 Ch 23^{1}. 3. Ezr 10^{6} (JONAS, 1 Es 9^{1}; JOHANAN, Neh 12$^{22.23}$; JONATHAN, Neh 12^{11}) high priest. He is called son of Eliashib Ezr 10^{6}, Neh 12^{23}, but was probably his grandson, Joiada being his father (Neh 12$^{11.22}$). His high priesthood is noted as an epoch until which the heads of the Levitical families were registered in 'the book of the Chronicles' (Neh 12^{23}); hence presumably down to the close of the 5th cent. B.C. (H. E. Ryle, in loc.). 4. Ezr 10^{28} (=JOANNES, 1 Es 9^{29}) an Israelite, one of those who 'had taken strange wives.' 5. Neh 6^{18}, son of Tobiah the Ammonite, Nehemiah's adversary. 6. Neh 12^{13} a priest, representative of the course of Amariah, in the days of Joiakim. 7. Neh 12^{42} a priest present at the dedication of the walls.

JEHOIACHIN (יְהוֹיָכִין 8 times, יְהוֹיָכִן Jer 52^{31}, יוֹיָכִין Ezk 1^{2}; Jeconiah יְכָנְיָה 5 times, יְכוֹנְיָה Jer 27^{20} [Kethîbh], יְכָנְיָהוּ Jer 24^{1}; Coniah כָּנְיָהוּ Jer 22$^{24.28}$ 37^{1}; 'J″ appointeth'; called Joakim, 1 Es 1^{43}; Jechonias, Bar 1$^{3.9}$; Jechoniah, Mt 1$^{11.12}$).—King of Judah, son of Jehoiakim. Ewald conjectures that his original name was Coniah, exchanged for Jehoiachin on his accession; Keil more probably ascribes the variation to 'popular twisting and contracting of the longer name.' He reigned three months; the additional 10 days given in 2 Ch 36^{9} 1 Es 1^{44} being probably due to the accidental shifting in the text of 'ten' from his age at accession, which in Ch is eight instead of eighteen. Both readings are found in 1 Es 1^{43}. Upon J., as upon Louis XVI. of France, descended the full force of the divine vengeance incurred by previous generations. In another age he might have been 'the signet upon J″'s right hand' (Jer 22^{24}). He was scarcely on the throne when the Chaldæan forces, which had been ravaging Judæa, were joined by Nebuchadnezzar himself, and closed around Jerusalem, and J. surrendered at discretion. Jos. (Ant. X. vii. 1) asserts that Nebuchadnezzar had made J. king, after slaying his father; and that almost immediately afterwards, fearing that he might prove disloyal, he returned to depose him. This is both intrinsically unlikely, and is quite unsupported by the biblical narrative. From the prominent position given to the queen-mother Nehushta in 2 K 24^{8}, Jer 13^{18} 22^{26} 29^{2}, it is reasonable to infer that she exercised more than ordinary influence, and it was possibly at her suggestion that J. capitulated. Jos. (Ant. X. vii. 1) attributes it to 'his gentle and just disposition; he did not desire to see the city endangered on his account' (cf. Ant. X. xi. 2); and in BJ VI. ii. 1 he describes how at the last siege he himself appealed to John of Giscala to 'follow the example of J. who . . . did undergo a voluntary captivity . . . that he might not deliver up this sanctuary to the enemy, and see the house of God in flames; wherefore among all the Jews a sacred discourse celebrates him, and memory for ever flowing fresh hands him down immortal to posterity.' Among moderns, Ewald also takes a favourable view of his character, influenced by the theory that J. is the royal exile of Ps 84^{9}, and therefore author of that Ps, as well as of Pss 42. 43. But such a view seems irreconcilable with the tone of Jer 22$^{24-30}$, as well as with the unqualified condemnation in 2 K 24^{9}, 2 Ch 36^{9}, 1 Es 1^{44}. The favourable language of Jer 24$^{5-7}$ refers to the captives generally. On the other hand, in Ezk 19$^{5-9}$ the life of Jehoiakim and the fate of his son are fused into one ideal picture; and justly, for J. had no distinct political existence. The arm of Babylon raised to strike his father fell on him, and fulfilled the prophecy against Jehoiakim (Jer 36^{30}), 'He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David.' Conversely in Mt 1^{11} the two reigns are included under 'Jechoniah,' the less important name being chosen as marking more distinctly the epoch of the Captivity (cf. 1 Ch 3^{16}, 2 Ch 36^{10}, where Zedekiah is brother of J.). It is not merely a confusion arising from the identification of the names in LXX and Josephus.

With the fall of Jerusalem, B.C. 597, the Captivity began. Captives had been taken from the country before this, Jer 13^{19}, and possibly still earlier (Dn 1^{3}, Berosus in Jos. c. Apion, i. 19), but this marks an epoch, and from it Ezekiel dates his prophecies ('our captivity,' Ezk 40^{1}). The flower of the nation and the treasures of the temple were carried off to Babylon. By a comparison of 2 K 24$^{14-16}$ with Jer 52^{28} (LXX om. Jer 52$^{28-30}$) we may infer that the captives included 7000 'men of might,' 3023 of the upper classes (Jos. Ant. X. vi. 3), and 1000 craftsmen. The king himself is styled emphatically 'the captive' (1 Ch 3^{17} RV), and seems to have been kept in rigorous imprisonment for 37 years. Evil-Merodach began his reign with an act of gracious clemency by releasing J., now about 55 years old. The historian (2 K 25$^{27-30}$, Jer 52$^{31-34}$) dwells with evident pleasure on the marks of respect thenceforth shown to the captive prince, in whose person the Jewish exiles felt their nation honoured. The long imprisonment of J. proves, if that were necessary, the unhistorical character of the notices of him in Bar 1$^{3ff.}$ and in the History of Susanna, assuming that Hippolytus and others are right in identifying him with Joakim, Susanna's husband.

Needless difficulty has been raised over the question of J.'s children (implied 1 Ch 3^{17}, Bar 1^{4}, Mt 1^{12}). Whatever be the truth as to the parentage of Shealtiel, the very prophecy which is alleged to prove his childlessness (Jer 22^{28-30}) mentions his seed twice. Like Ezk 21^{26}, it is a declaration of the abrogation of the temporal power of David's line. It explains in what sense he was to be 'childless' (LXX ἐκκήρυκτον, 'proscribed'), 'for no man of his seed shall prosper,' words surely unmeaning if he had no seed at all. According to the Mishna (Middôth 2), one of the 13 gates of the court of the priests, on the north side, was called the gate of Jeconiah, because he went out by it when going into captivity.

JEHOIADA (יְהוֹיָדָע 'J″ knoweth').—1. Father of the famous Benaiah, captain of David's bodyguard, who is scarcely ever mentioned without the addition of his father's name. J. was a native of Kabzeel (2 S 23^{20}, 1 Ch 11^{22}), 'a town of Judah in the South' (Jos 15^{21}). In 1 Ch 27^{5} AV we read: 'Benaiah the son of J., a chief priest.' Stanley (Jewish Ch. Lect. 36) deduces from this that in David's time there were three rival high priests, namely, Zadok, Abiathar, and J. However, in RV ('the priest, chief') 'chief' refers to Benaiah (so Targ.) as in v.^{8}, and 'the priest' may be referred directly to Benaiah (so LXX, Vulg., Jos. Ant. VII. xii. 4, B. ὁ ἱερεὺς τῷ γένει) or to J. (so Targ.). The latter is supported by 1 Ch 12^{27}, where, among those who came to David to Hebron, is 'J. the leader of the house of Aaron' (tribe of Levi, Jos. Ant. VII. ii. 2). It is not a serious objection that Kabzeel is not reckoned among the priestly cities in Jos 21. RVm of 1 Ch 27^{5} 'chief minister' is certainly wrong, being based on the Chronicler's alterations of the text in 2 S 8^{18} 20^{26}, where the term כֹּהֵן is applied to persons who, in his estimation, were not qualified to exercise priestly functions. In 1 Ch 27^{34} among David's counsellors is reckoned 'J. son of Benaiah,' but we should probably read with Bertheau and Graf, 'Benaiah son of J.' 2. High priest (the first who is so styled 2 K 12^{10}) in the reigns of Ahaziah, Athaliah, and Jehoash. His marriage with the princess Jehosheba—the only recorded instance of such a union—possibly conferred on J. a status which enabled him the better to carry out his designs. The careful way in which the deposition of Athaliah was planned, and the promptitude and thoroughness with which it was carried out, coupled with the historical importance of the revolution thus effected, mark J. as perhaps the most eminent of Aaron's successors, not excepting Eli. Like Eli he was virtually king, for his influence, which was necessarily paramount during the minority of Jehoash, was naturally exercised (2 K 12^{2}, 2 Ch 24^{2}) until his death, which must have been quite late in the reign (2 K 12^{6}). In the time of the Captivity (Jer 29^{26}) he is alluded to as the model of a zealous ecclesiastical ruler. One circumstance there is which may seem to modify this conception of him. He was not as eager about the restoration of the temple fabric as was the king; in fact he received a rebuke for his slackness (2 K 12^{7}, 2 Ch 24^{6}). Josephus (Ant. IX. viii. 2) attributes the high priest's supineness to his consciousness of the unpopularity of the proposed tax, but more probably it was due to the impossibility of reforming a close corporation, such as that of the temple priests, even by such a chief as J.; especially when the numerous local sanctuaries, still thought legal, diminished their revenues. Acc. to 2 Ch $24^{15.\ 16}$ J. lived to the age of 130, and received the unique distinction of burial in the royal sepulchres, 'because he had done good in Israel, both toward God and toward his house.' See ATHALIAH, JEHOASH. N. J. D. WHITE.

JEHOIAKIM (יְהוֹיָקִים, יוֹיָקִים, יוֹקִים 'J″ raiseth up'; Joakim, 1 Es $1^{37.\ 38.\ 39}$. See QPB, Bar 1^{3}). — King of Judah, second son of Josiah (1 Ch 3^{15}). The circumstances under which this prince succeeded to the throne were the first and most significant indication of the long period of ignominious subjection ushered in by the defeat of Josiah by Necho at Megiddo, B.C. 609 or 610. Necho emphasized the new condition of things by deposing the popular Jehoahaz in favour of his elder brother, at the same time imposing on the latter a new name, Jehoiakim, in place of Eliakim. The substitution of the sacred title Jah for the ambiguous El was probably suggested by the young prince himself; yet the change of name was, none the less, a token of vassalage (cf. 2 K 24^{17}). The direct history of this reign is briefly summed up in 2 K 23^{34}–25^{7}, 2 Ch 36^{4-8}; but considerable light is thrown upon it by the writings of the contemporary prophets Jeremiah and Habakkuk (see Jer 7–9. 10^{17-25} 14–17^{18} 18–20. 22^{13-19} 25. 26. 35. 36. 45–46^{12} 47. 49).

At no previous epoch was Judah in a more helpless condition of religious and moral decay. The one visible result of Josiah's reformation was that the temple and the Law were regarded as a palladium, and that the Levitical worship was accurately observed (Jer $7^{4.\ 21}$ 8^{8} 18^{18}). But with the death of the good king all the old abominable idolatries returned in full force, and under the highest patronage, both of the king and the princes, who from this time forward take a large share of the government. Baal and Ashtoreth were worshipped in the very precincts of the temple; the valley of Hinnom was again hideous with the infant sacrifices to Molech; and from the city-roofs incense went up to all the host of heaven. Cruelty, corruption, and oppression flourished unchecked, for the people had 'in their viciousness grown hard.' They felt and averred 'there is no hope.' Of such a nation Jehoiakim was the representative man. In the terrible denunciation (Jer 22^{13-19}) he is charged with covetousness, the shedding of innocent blood, oppression, and violence. All that is recorded of him bears this out. He erected by forced labour (cf. Hab 2^{9-11}) a spacious palace 'cieled with cedar and painted with vermilion,' thus (Jer 22^{15}) vying with Ahaz (Bℵ, cf. 2 K 16^{11}) or Ahab (A, cf. 1 K 22^{39}). He relentlessly pursued and murdered, with marks of indignity, the prophet Uriah who had denounced him (Jer 26^{20}). A similar fate was well-nigh shared by Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36^{26}). He cut and burnt with his own hands a roll of divine words, similar to that the recitation of which caused Josiah to rend his garments (Jer 36^{22}); and, as an instance of his covetousness, 2 K 23^{35} specially notes that he satisfied the demands of his suzerain (LXX, v.^{33}, 100 talents of gold, Syriac and Arabic 10 [so also certain Greek cursives and the Complutensian]) by a general taxation of his subjects, not, as had been customary, from the treasuries of the palace or the temple. Jos. (Ant. X. v. 2) well sums up his character as 'unjust and malignant; neither holy towards God nor forbearing towards man.' Ezk 19^{5-9}, in which the career of Jehoiakim and the fate of his son seem combined in an ideal picture, has no reference to his moral qualities, unless we adopt the RVm of v.^{7}, which implies a charge of lasciviousness, irrelevant here, though probably true in fact.

Two matters in connexion with this reign require special mention—(a) the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, and (b) the end of Jehoiakim.

(a) The pretensions of Egypt to the empire of Syria were finally crushed by Nebuchadnezzar at the battle of Carchemish, B.C. 605 (2 K 24^{7}). This battle took place in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (Jer 25^{1} 46^{2}), and opened up Syria to the Chaldæans. However, they had not yet attacked Judæa in Jehoiakim's fifth year (Jer $36^{9.\ 29}$

'eighth' Bℵ, 'fifth' AQ). The fast then proclaimed by the whole nation in the 9th month was possibly in view of their approach, which yet was not so certain that one could safely predict it. Carchemish is on the Euphrates, and there were many important places, e.g. Tyre, to be reduced before the Chaldæans could reach Jerusalem. This being so, it is evident that there was no siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in Jehoiakim's third year as stated in Dn 1^{1}. (Seder Olam 25 understands this of the third year of his rebellion.) The date assigned in Daniel is due to a mistaken impression (Dn 9^{2}) that Jeremiah had predicted a 70 years' duration for the captivity of Judah (2 Ch 36$^{21.\,22}$=Ezr 1^{1} follows Daniel); but the 70 years of Jer 25^{11} 29^{10} RV refer to the duration of Babylonian supremacy, beginning from the victory at Carchemish. Moreover, Ezekiel (1^{2} 40^{1}) reckons the captivity of Judah to begin with that of Jehoiachin, B.C. 597. When Nebuchadnezzar at last appeared before Jerusalem, it is likely enough that he carried off some captives (Berosus in Jos. Ant. X. xi. 1; Dn 1^{3}) and some of the temple vessels (2 Ch 36^{7}, Dn 1^{2}). It is certain that J. submitted to him, but rebelled after three years, incited by the Egyptians (Josephus). Jer 47^{1} possibly refers to this. Nebuchadnezzar, who had returned to Babylon, did not at first think it necessary to quell this revolt in person, but sent (2 K 24^{2}, cf. Jer 49^{1}, Ezk 25$^{3\text{-}6}$, Zeph 2^{8}) some of his own troops, assisted by bands of the surrounding nations, to harry Judæa, not arriving himself until after the accession of Jehoiachin (2 K 24^{11}). To this interval Jer 35 probably belongs. Now J. reigned eleven years, and at least a year must be allowed to elapse between his revolt and his death, so that the first Chaldæan invasion may be dated in his 6th or 7th year. Jos. (Ant. X. vi. 1) places it in the 8th year of J., thus making Judæa independent of Egypt and Babylon alike for four years; but this is at variance with his authority Berosus, and leaves no time for the events of 2 K 24^{2}.

(b) The death of Jehoiakim is veiled in obscurity. According to the prophecy (Jer 22$^{18.\,19}$ 36^{30}), his dead body lay unburied outside the walls of Jerusalem; and this is confirmed by 2 K 24^{6}, which is silent as to his burial. Jos. (Ant. X. vi. 3) says that Nebuchadnezzar, when admitted without resistance into Jerusalem by J., slew him, and 'commanded him to be thrown before the walls without any burial,' and took 3000 captives, including Ezekiel (cf. Jer 52^{28}); but Nebuchadnezzar did not arrive until after J.'s death. We may conjecture that J. was killed in a sally (Keil), or more probably assassinated by his indignant subjects. The LXX of 2 Ch 36^{8}, which is here very strange, says that he was buried in the garden of Uzza (cf. 2 K 21$^{18.\,26}$). The idea that he was brought captive to Babylon rests on 2 Ch 36^{6}, which is either a false inference from Dn 1^{2}, or refers to an unfulfilled intention of Nebuchadnezzar's on his first invasion, or to Ezk 19$^{8.\,9}$, which, as we have seen, refers to Jehoiachin, although the preceding details refer to his father. Jerome (Qu. Heb. 2 Ch 36^{8}) explains 'that which was found in him' (1 Es 1^{42} 'his uncleanness and impiety') to refer to heathenish marks (forbidden Lv 19^{28}) discovered on his dead body. See CUTTINGS IN THE FLESH, vol. i. p. 538^{b}. The legend mentioned by Thenius on 2 K 24^{1} (Stanley, Jewish Ch. 40), that the name of the demon Chodonazer was found on his skin, is merely due to a MS confusion of this note with that on 2 Ch 36^{10}, where Jerome explains the name Nabu-chodonosor. JEHOIARIB (יְהוֹיָרִיב 1 Ch 9^{10} 24^{7}, elsewhere Joiarib, יוֹיָרִיב 'J" pleadeth'; called in 1 Mac 2^{1} Joarib [which see]).—The name of one of the twenty-four courses of priests; first in David's time (1 Ch 24^{7}), but seventeenth in the time of Zerubbabel (Neh 12^{6}) and of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12^{19}). The name is omitted, probably by accident, in the list of the priests that 'sealed to the covenant' (Neh 10). The clan is mentioned among those that dwelt in Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (11^{10}), where read 'Jedaiah and Joiarib' as in the corresponding list 1 Ch 9^{10} (so Cappellus and H. E. Ryle). The Maccabees belonged to this clan (1 Mac 2^{1}; Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1), and also Josephus (Life 1). The Babylonian Talmud substitutes 'Joiarib' for 'Harim' in Ezr 2^{39}=Neh 7^{42}.

JEHONADAB (יְהוֹנָדָב or Jonadab יוֹנָדָב 'he whom J" has impelled'; cf. Nedabiah and Nadab).—1. Son of Shimeah, David's brother, and the friend of Amnon the son of David. He is described as 'a very subtil man' (אִישׁ חָכָם מְאֹד), and he employed his ingenuity in aiding Amnon to carry out his intrigue against his half-sister Tamar (2 S 13$^{3\text{ff.}}$). When, at the assassination of Amnon, an exaggerated report reached the ear of David to the effect that Absalom had slain all the king's sons, Jonadab was the first to grasp the true state of affairs, and to allay the king's distress by his prompt report of the safety of the royal princes (2 S 13$^{30\text{ff.}}$). Both AV and RV give his name uniformly as Jonadab, although in v.^{5} the MT has יְהוֹנָדָב Jehonadab. 2. Son of Rechab, of the clan of the Kenites (1 Ch 2^{55}), and formulator of the rules which bound his descendants, the Rechabites, to retain a nomadic life, living in tents and abstaining from the pursuit of agriculture, and especially from the cultivation of the vine and the use of its produce (Jer 35; see RECHABITES). Jehonadab flourished at the time when Jehu, having seized the throne of the Northern Kingdom, was undertaking the extirpation from Israel of the foreign worship of Ba'al-melkart. He appears to have been thoroughly in sympathy with the measures adopted by Jehu for the vindication of the religion of J", and he exhibited his sympathy by giving his hand to the new king, and accompanying him in his chariot to witness the final destruction of the family of Ahab at Samaria, and the ruse by which the worshippers of Ba'al were entrapped and put to death (2 K 10$^{15.\,23}$). Both AV and RV have Jonadab in all the passages of Jer, although that is the reading of MT (יוֹנָדָב) only in 35$^{6.\,10.\,19}$.

JEHONATHAN (יְהוֹנָתָן 'J" has given').—A more exact rendering of the name usually represented in English as Jonathan. In RV this form occurs twice. 1. 2 Ch 17^{8}. One of the Levites sent out by Jehoshaphat with the book of the law to teach the people in the cities of Judah. 2. Neh 12^{18}. The head of the priestly family of Shemaiah in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua. Here the longer form serves to distinguish this name from the shorter Jonathan=יוֹנָתָן in vv.$^{11.\,14}$. In AV Jehonathan is found also in 1 Ch 27^{25} of the son of Uzziah, who was over certain treasuries or storehouses in the time of David (RV Jonathan). H. A. WHITE.

JEHORAM or JORAM (יְהוֹרָם, יוֹרָם 'J" is exalted'). RV retains Joram for Jehoram, 2 K 9$^{15\text{-}24}$.

1. King of Israel. He was second son of Ahab, and succeeded his brother Ahaziah, 2 K 3^{1} (on the interpolated date in 2 K 1^{17} see AHAZIAH, No. 1). The compiler of Kings evidently intended to refer to him all the notices of the king of Israel which occur in the Acts of Elisha; but as Elisha survived J. 43 years, it is possible that in some cases at least other kings were originally intended (so Ewald, HI iv. 87). Terrified probably by his brother's fate, he began his reign by putting away the pillar of Baal that Ahab had made; but it is evident from 2 K 9^{22} 10^{18-27} that the foreign cult was still continued in the country, through the influence of Jezebel, and with the connivance of J. himself, whose secret disloyalty is severely exposed by Elisha (2 K $3^{13.\ 14}$). Consistently with this, a tone of profane sarcasm, and of scarcely veiled antagonism, may be detected in his use of the sacred name J″ (2 K $3^{10.\ 13}$ $6^{27.\ 33}$, where read with Ewald 'king' מלך for 'messenger' מלאך), a tone re-echoed by his courtiers (7^{2}). Immediately on his accession J. took steps to suppress the revolt of Mesha, which was now a matter of two years' standing. He obtained the aid of his father's ally, the compliant Jehoshaphat, who may have desired to chastise Moab for their invasion of Judah (2 Ch 20). J. was entertained at Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. IX. iii. 1). The route chosen at the suggestion of the king of Judah, though not the most direct from Samaria, had the triple advantage of securing the co-operation and loyalty of Edom, avoiding the hostile Syrian and Ammonite territory, and attacking Moab from an unexpected quarter. The expedition was barren of result. Before Moab was reached, the army would have perished from thirst but for the miracle wrought through Elisha in deference to Jehoshaphat. The Moabites were routed, but were not subdued. The desperate man who 'gave his firstborn for his transgression' on the wall of Kirhareseth succeeded thereby in disheartening the besiegers, who, it is obscurely hinted, felt that the wrath of God was roused against themselves, the indirect authors of so unnatural a deed, and the allies retired, having failed to realize any lasting advantage. Assuming that 2 K 4–8^{15} belong to this reign, the following matters of public importance may be gleaned from them. Elisha claims to have interest with the king and the captain of the host (4^{13}). He gives information to the king of the secret plans of the Syrians (6^{9-12}). A Syrian army penetrates to Dothan, and is led by Elisha to Samaria. He dissuades the king from an ungenerous impulse to kill them, and so procures a temporary cessation of the Syrian incursions (6^{13-23}). Benhadad in person besieges Samaria; the inhabitants are reduced to the horrible straits foretold Lv 26^{29}, Dt 28^{53}, and a second time the power of J″ is vindicated by Elisha and the siege raised (6^{24}-7). This invasion may have occurred during the seven years' famine foretold by Elisha 8^{1} (alluded to 4^{38}). The visit of Naaman (5^{5-8}) should probably be placed after this (compare 5^{27} 8^{4}). Notwithstanding these constant attacks from Syria, J. seems to have been a vigorous monarch (δραστήριος, Jos. Ant. IX. ii. 2). On the death of Benhadad he deemed the opportunity a favourable one to renew the attempt to recover Ramoth-gilead at which Ahab had fallen. Ahaziah of Judah helped him ($8^{28.\ 29}$), and the town was taken (9^{14}), but in the attack J. received arrow wounds (Jos.) which necessitated his return to Jezreel, the army remaining to hold the town (9^{1-14}). No long time elapsed when Jehu was seen approaching Jezreel. The mysterious non-return of his messengers excited the curiosity of the sick man. With all his mother's vigour he roused himself, and sallied forth eager to hear what strange news the captain of the host might be bringing. The brutal reply of Jehu to his inquiry left no doubt as to his intentions, and the king had barely time to warn his royal kinsman of his danger when he fell, pierced by the arrow of Jehu, on the fatal field of Naboth. The curse of Elijah (1 K 21^{19}) was beginning to find fulfilment.

2. King of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat. The history of his reign is contained in 2 K 8^{16-24}, 2 Ch 21. It opens with a chronological difficulty. He is said in 2 K 8^{16} to have begun to reign in the fifth year of Jehoram of Israel. A comparison of 1 K 22^{42} and 2 K 3^{1} implies that this would be two years before the death of Jehoshaphat. This accounts for the insertion 'Jehoshaphat being then king of Judah,' the spuriousness of which is strongly vouched (see QPB). The interpolation in 2 K 1^{17} is discussed under AHAZIAH i. Those who maintain the genuineness of these notes of time are obliged to suppose that he was twice made viceroy by Jehoshaphat, i.e. in the 17th and 23rd years of that king's reign. The marriage of J. with the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel had probably seemed to Jehoshaphat a masterly stroke of conciliatory policy. In the event, however, it had the most disastrous effect on Judah. The strong character of Athaliah easily influenced for evil both her husband and son (2 K $8^{18.\ 27}$), and, as before in the case of Abijam (1 K 15^{4}), nothing but the divine promise to David saved the favoured tribe from the ruin naturally consequent on corruption and idolatry. The most important event in this reign, and the only one recorded in Kings, is the fulfilment of Gn 27^{40} in the final revolt of Edom, which had been, more or less, a dependency of Judah since David's time (2 S 8^{14}). The narrative (8^{21}) of Jehoram's attempt to recover Edom is obscure and probably corrupt. For 'to Zair' צעיר, which is otherwise unknown, Vulg. has 'to Seir,' Seira=שׂעיר (B Σειώρ, A om.). Grätz conjectured 'Zoar' צער, but Zoar is in Moab. 2 Ch 21^{9} substitutes 'with his captains' עם־שׂריו. The rest of the verse seems to imply that J. was surrounded by the Edomites by night, and cut his way through, but with loss and discomfiture (see QPB). At the same time, in a different quarter, the South-West, Libnah revolted, possibly in connexion with the Philistine invasion (2 Ch $21^{16.\ 17}$). The Chronicler, mindful of the fact that Libnah was a priestly city (Jos 21^{13}), assigns as the cause 'because he had forsaken the Lord, the God of his fathers.' The town was not permanently lost (see 2 K 19^{8}). We learn from 2 Ch 21^{2-4} that on his accession J. put to death amongst others his six brethren, to whom their father had given great gifts and fenced cities (cf. 2 Ch 11^{23}). The defection to idolatry, which is implied in Kings, is detailed in 2 Ch 21^{11}, where he appears as a religious persecutor. This is followed by a denunciatory letter from Elijah vv.$^{12-15}$, a joint invasion by the Philistines and Arabians, who, if they did not actually capture Jerusalem (so Keil), sacked the palace, and carried off all his sons but one, vv.$^{16.\ 17}$. The narrative concludes with his miserable and unregretted death, dishonourable burial, and exclusion from the royal sepulchres (contrast 2 K 8^{24}). A serious chronological difficulty is involved in the mention of Elijah's letter to Jehoram. But for this statement, one would naturally infer that Elijah's translation had taken place in the reign of Jehoshaphat. (a) It is narrated immediately after the death of Ahaziah, and so Seder Olam, xvii. 45, places it in the second year of Ahaziah of Israel. (b) Elisha began to exercise prophetical functions under Jehoshaphat, 2 K 3. He does not seem to have done so before his master's departure, 2 K $2^{9.\ 15}$. (c) 2 K 3^{11} obviously means that Elijah was no longer on earth. In reply it may be urged that there is no note of time in 2 K 2, and that it is placed in its present position merely to complete the history of Elijah. This seems more plausible than the suggestion of Kimchi, adopted by Keil, that the Lord had revealed to Elijah, before his translation, J.'s wickedness, and that then Elijah wrote this letter, which was to be sent to the king at the proper time; just as Elijah himself anointed Hazael and Jehu by Elisha's instrumentality (see AVm). Kennicott cuts the knot by conjecturing 'Elisha' for 'Elijah' in 2 Ch 21^{12}.

3. A priest, one of the commission appointed by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law, 2 Ch 17^{8}.

JEHOSHABEATH.—See JEHOSHEBA.

JEHOSHAPHAT (יְהוֹשָׁפָט 'J″ hath judged'). 1. King of Judah, son of Asa. This reign marks a new departure in the mutual relations of Judah and Israel. Hitherto there had been a standing feud between the two kingdoms (1 K 14^{30} $15^{7.16}$), but 'J. made peace with the king of Israel' (1 K 22^{44}). The immediate object of this policy was doubtless to enable the whole Hebrew race, hitherto weakened by internecine wars, to co-operate against their common enemies. Possibly, also, J. cherished a hope that the marriage of his heir Jehoram with Athaliah the daughter of Ahab, by which the political alliance was now cemented, might, in the future, lead to a peaceful re-establishment of the kingdom of David and Solomon. The actual result, however, of this alliance with the house of Omri brought to J. little credit in his relations with foreign powers; while at home, in the following reigns, it led to a recrudescence of Baal worship, and indirectly to the almost total extinction of the royal family of Judah (2 K 11^{1}, cf. 2 Ch $21^{4.17}$). There is little told directly of J. in Kings (1 K 22^{41-50}). He completed the extirpation of the Canaanitish abominations begun by Asa, 1 K 15^{12}. Edom was so completely subject to him that although it had a king (2 K 3 passim), yet he was merely a nominee ('deputy' נִצָּב) of the king of Judah. Hence, when Edom revolted in the next reign (2 K 8^{20}), it is significantly said they 'made a king over themselves.' Edom being thus a vassal state, J. had access to the seaport of Ezion-geber, and attempted to revive Solomon's trade with Ophir (cf. 1 K 9^{28}); but the fleet was wrecked when starting on the first voyage, and J. was so disheartened that he declined to enter into partnership with Ahaziah of Israel in order to renew the attempt. In 2 Ch $20^{35\text{ff.}}$ the good king's misfortune is represented as a punishment for his having made a commercial alliance with Ahaziah; and the destination of the ships is not Ophir, but Tarshish. Both here and in 2 Ch 9^{21} the Chronicler misunderstands the term 'ships of Tarshish.' Whatever else we know from Kings about J. is found in the history of Israel. To the strong-willed monarchs of Omri's line J. serves as a foil. They profited by the alliance with Judah. When Ahab desires to recover Ramoth-gilead, or Jehoram Moab, J. is ready with his set formula of acquiescence (1 K 22^{4}, 2 K 3^{7}). He is extremely scrupulous to inquire of a prophet of J″, and is not satisfied with an oracle which purports to come from Adonai (1 K 22^{5-7}, 2 K 3^{11}); yet he seems quite unaffected when his ally is denounced, whether by Micaiah or Elisha. He is even persuaded to risk his own life to save that of Ahab (1 K 22^{30}). From the Chronicler (2 Ch 17–20) we learn much more respecting J.'s internal administration of Judah. J. begins his reign with defensive measures against Israel ($17^{1.2}$). His early piety is rewarded, like that of David (1 Ch 29^{28}) and Solomon (2 Ch 1^{12}), with 'riches and honour in abundance' (17^{5} 18^{1}). He then sends a commission, consisting of princes, Levites, and priests, to teach 'the book of the law of the Lord' in the cities of Judah. Godliness at home is followed by peace abroad. The Philistines and Arabians, so troublesome to Jehoram (21^{16}), bring tribute. J. raises a standing army, twice as large as that of Asa (2 Ch 14^{8}), of over 1,160,000 men (17^{14-18}). Ewald thinks that this incredible number refers to the entire male population, but see 17^{19}. The Chronicler then (ch. 18), contrary to the plan of his work, gives a long extract from the history of Israel—Ahab's expedition to Ramoth-gilead—because of the share J. took in it. There are few variations of any interest except the needless addition in v.^{31} 'and the Lord helped,' etc. It was surely by J.'s accent, when he 'cried out,' that the Syrian captains 'saw that he was not the king of Israel.' On his return, J. is rebuked for 'helping the wicked' by the prophet Jehu (cf. 2 Ch 15^{2} 16^{7}). He then provides for the better administration of justice by appointing local judges in every fenced city (19^{5}), and two courts of appeal, ecclesiastical and civil, in Jerusalem, v.^{8}, consisting of Levites, priests, and leading nobles, presided over respectively by the high priest and 'the ruler of the house of Judah' (cf. Dt 1^{17} 16^{18} 17^{8}). The Chronicler does not relate J.'s campaign with Jehoram of Israel against Moab (2 K 3, see JEHORAM 1), but he gives in ch. 20 an account of a more complete deliverance from Moab, Edom, and Ammon. In this story there are two difficulties. (a) The inhabitants of Mt. Seir, vv.$^{10.22}$ (in v.^{1} read with Targ. 'Edomites' for 'Ammonites,' see RVm), are here joined with Moab against Judah, whereas in 2 K 3 they not only join their suzerain J. in his attack on Moab, but are the bitterest enemies of that people (2 K 3^{26}). (b) The abject terror of J. at this crisis (see esp. vv.$^{3.12}$) is quite unaccountable, if he really possessed a tithe of the army described in $17^{14\text{ff.}}$. On the other hand, Ewald (HI iv. 56 n. 2) fairly argues that 'the valley of Jehoshaphat' (Jl $3^{2.12}$), which he identifies with the Wady Bereikut (=Beracah), implies some great victory of that king. He dates this event at the beginning of J.'s reign, and thereby accounts for the complete subjugation of Edom, implied in Kings. The prayer of J. on this occasion has a remarkable reference to Solomon's prayer 1 K $8^{33.37}$, and to Dt $2^{4.9.19}$, just as the speech of Jahaziel has to Ex $14^{13.14}$. 2. The recorder or chronicler in the reigns of David (2 S 8^{16} 20^{24}, 1 Ch 18^{15}) and Solomon (1 K 4^{3}). 3. One of Solomon's twelve commissariat officers, 1 K 4^{17}. 4. Father of Jehu king of Israel, 2 K $9^{2.14}$.

JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF (עֵמֶק יְהוֹשָׁפָט, κοιλὰς Ἰωσαφάτ, Vallis Josaphat).—This valley ('ēmeḳ)* is mentioned under the name of 'Jehoshaphat' only by the prophet Joel (3 [Heb. 4]$^{2.12}$). The circumstances related by the prophet concerning the 'day of the LORD' are matters of theological controversy which it would be outside the scope of this article to enter into, but the imagery rests upon a geographical basis whatever may be the symbolical import.

Some commentators have supposed that the name is only an imaginary one due to its significance, 'J″ judgeth' (Orelli in Strack u. Zöckler, Kgf. Komm. on Joel, l.c.; Michaelis, Bibel für Ungelehrten, Remarks on Joel). The name may have been used with reference to the remarkable victory of king Jehoshaphat over the united forces of the heathen of several nations (2 Ch $20^{16\text{f.}}$), children of Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir, which resulted to him in a bloodless victory over his enemies, and his triumphant return from the valley of Blessing.

There is no record in the Bible or Josephus as to the valley separating the temple mount from Olivet being called the valley of Jehoshaphat; but early in the 4th cent. it is called so, and the name has continued among Christians, Jews, and subsequently Moslems, up to the present day. The unknown Pilgrim of Bordeaux (A.D. 333) says, 'For one going to the gate which is on the east, that he may ascend the Mount of Olives, there is the valley which is called Jehoshaphat' (Itin. Hieros.). Eusebius and Jerome (A.D. 330–400) give the same account (OS^{2} 272. 89; 145. 13). Eucherius (427–440) says, 'Near the wall of Jerusalem, or of the temple, on the east, is Geennon or the valley of Jehoshaphat' (Ant. Mart. xvii.; see also Reland, Pal. p. 356). Theodorus (c. 530), speaking of Jerusalem, says, 'There is the valley of Josaphat. There the Lord will judge the just and the sinful.' Arculf (c. 680) speaks of the brook Cedron in the valley of Jehoshaphat (Early Travels, p. 4). Willibald (721), Bernard (867), Saewulf (1102), Maundeville (1322), and Maundrell (1697) all mention the valley of Jehoshaphat as lying between Jerusalem and Olivet (Early Travels, p. 469). Theodoricus (1172) states that 'torrens Cedron et vallis Josaphat' lies between Moriah and Olivet. John of Würzburg (c. 1213) says, 'Prope juxta Jerusalem, sub Salamonis regia in accubitu in valle Josaphat natatoria Siloam.' The author of Citez de Jherusalem (1187) states that the valley of Josaphat is to the east, between Olivet and Mount Zion. See further, art. KIDRON (THE BROOK).

* On the possibility that this term could be applied to the valley of the Kidron (elsewhere always called naḥal, 'torrent-valley,' 'wady'), see Driver's note on Jl 3^{2}.

According to modern Jewish tradition, the valley between the temple mount and Olivet is the valley of Jehoshaphat, and the dearest wish of the Jew is to find a grave there (Briggs, Heathen and Holy Lands, p. 290). Benjamin of Tudela (A.D. 1170) calls this valley Jehosaphat. Some of the Rabbins have taught that it is necessary to be buried in the Holy Land to obtain a share in the resurrection preceding the Messiah's reign on earth, and that the bodies of the righteous, wherever else buried, have to roll back again under ground to Palestine (J. Nicholaus, de Sepult. Heb.).

The 'Aven Shetyeh appears to have been a portion of rock projecting three fingers' breadth above the floor of the Holy of Holies, covering a cavity which was regarded as the mouth of the 'abyss,' reverenced as the centre and foundation of the world, and having the ineffable name of God inscribed upon it. Rabbi Schwartz (Das Heilige Land) identifies this stone with the Sakhrah. It is impossible not to suspect that these Jewish traditions are the origin of the sacredness which the Mohammedans have attached to the Sakhrah (PEFSt, 1875–76).

In the tract Middôth, Rabbi Elieser ben-Jacob said concerning the Water-gate, 'Through it the water proceeded out, and in future it will issue from under the threshold.' The Talmud teaches that there was a canal which brought water to the sanctuary from the fountain of Etam (Jerus. Yoma, iii. fol. 41 at Maim Baith Hammukdash, v. 15). Rashi thinks Etam may have been the same as Nephtoah (Jos 15^9). The Moslems have a description of 'the day of the Lord' which was probably given by Mohammed as one of the first of his revelations, from which the following verses are extracted (Koran, 81):—

'In the name of the all-merciful God a day shall come when the sun shall be shrouded and the stars shall fall from the heavens.

'When the water of the ocean shall boil, and the souls of the dead again be united to their bodies.

'When the heavens will pass away like a scroll, and hell will burn fiercely, and the joys of paradise will be made manifest.

'On that day shall every soul make known that which it hath performed.'

The day of resurrection will be preceded by signs and portents in heaven and earth, wars and tumults, a universal decay of faith, the advent of Antichrist, the issuing forth of Gog and Magog to desolate the world. Every human being will then be put upon his trial as to the manner in which he has employed his faculties, and the good and evil actions of his life. The whole assembled multitude will have to follow Mohammed across the bridge al-Sirât, as fine as the edge of a scimitar, which crosses the gulf of Jehennam or hell. Jehennam is a region fraught with all kinds of horrors (W. Irving, Life of Mahomet). The bridge al-Sirât that will be extended on the day of judgment between heaven and hell is to start from Jerusalem, and the pilgrim is shown a column, built horizontally into the wall [of the Ḥaram esh-Sherîf], which is to form its first pier. The holy rock [of the Ḥ. esh-Sherîf] is one of the rocks of paradise; it stands on a palm tree, beneath which flows one of the rivers of paradise. The Sakhrah is the centre of the world, and on the day of resurrection the angel Israfîl will stand upon it to blow the last trump; beneath it is the source of every drop of sweet water that flows on the face of the earth (Besant and Palmer, Jerusalem). The column called et-Tarik (de Saulcy) or al-Sirât (Ali Bey, Merj ed-Dîn, BFS part ii.) juts out from the east wall of the Haram esh-Sherîf, overhanging the valley of the Kîdron (Gehennam, Jehoshaphat), and on it may be seen devout Moslems in the early morning practising the first step into paradise.

The Moslem names for the valley between the Ḥaram esh-Sherîf and Mount Olivet are Wâdy Jahannum, W. Sitti Maryam (from 'the tomb of the Virgin'), W. Jûshafat or Shafat (Seetzen), W. Jehôshâfât (Robinson), W. el-Jos.

In addition to this valley parting Jerusalem from Olivet being called Jehoshaphat, the name also occurs in or adjacent to the valley. In the time of Arculf (c. 680) the tower of Jehoshaphat was shown in the valley near the church of St. Mary. In the time of Maundrell (c. 1697) the present so-called tomb of Jehoshaphat went by the same name (Early Travels, p. 468). In Citez de Jherusalem (c. 1187) there is the street of Josafas, leading through the Josafas gate (present St. Stephen's gate) into the valley of Jehoshaphat. John of Würzburg (c. 1213) also speaks of the gates of Josafat leading into the valley of Jehoshaphat, and of the monument of king Josaphat 'from which the valley was named.'

JEHOSHEBA (יְהוֹשֶׁבַע 2 K 11^2, Jehoshabeath, יְהוֹשַׁבְעַת 2 Ch 22^{11} 'J" is an oath.' Stanley, Jewish Ch., Lect. 35, compares the variants Elisheba and Ἐλισαβέτ).—She was daughter of Jehoram of Judah, but not of Athaliah, according to Jos. (Ant. IX. vii. 1; Jerome, Qu. Heb. on 2 Ch 21^{17}). On the death of her half-brother Ahaziah, she was instrumental in preserving the Davidic stock by concealing the infant Jehoash in a lumber-room of the palace (RVm). She seems to have had apartments in 'the house of the Lord,' i.e. in the temple precincts; and, according to the Chronicler, was wife of Jehoiada. This is the only recorded instance of the intermarriage of a high priest with a princess of the royal house, but probably it was no very extraordinary distinction (cf. 1 K 4$^{11.15}$). See ATHALIAH, JEHOASH, JEHOIADA.

JEHOSHUA, JEHOSHUAH.—The AV has followed the Geneva Bible in spelling Joshua's name once (Nu 13^{16}) Jehoshua. In 1 Ch 7^{27} the translators of AV have again followed the Gen. Bible, but have added an h by inadvertence, giving the unique and wrong form Jehoshuah. RV has restored Joshua in both places.

JEHOVAH.—See GOD, p. 199^a.

JEHOVAH-JIREH (יהוה יִרְאֶה).—In Gn 22^{14} the name given to the place at which Abraham sacrificed the ram instead of his son. The name means 'J″ seeth,' i.e. (cf. 16^{12} 'Thou art a God of seeing'; also Ex 3^7, Ps 35^{22} etc.) sees the needs of His servants, and relieves them accordingly; but there is, no doubt, an allusion at the same time to the sense which the same verb has in v.^{8} 'God will see for himself (i.e. look out, provide; so 1 S $16^{1. 17}$) the lamb for a burnt-offering.' A difficulty, however, arises in connexion with the following explanatory clause, which is partly ambiguous, and partly does not correspond, as it would be expected to do, with the name to which it is attached: 'so that it is said to-day, בְּהַר יהוה יֵרָאֶה "in the mount of J″ יֵרָאֶה."' The 'mount of J″' is a designation of the Temple-hill (Is 2^3 30^{29}, Ps 24^3), and the tense of 'is said' shows that the reference is to something that was said habitually (cf. Gn 10^{9b}), so that there is little doubt that the clause preserves some proverb in connexion with the Temple. If the clause stood by itself, it would be most naturally rendered 'In the mount of J″ one is seen (appears),' i.e. men, people, appear,—the reference being to the custom of visiting the Temple at pilgrimages ('appear,' as Ex 23^{17}, 1 S 1^{22}, Ps 84^7); but this rendering could only be adopted upon the supposition that the connexion with the preceding clause was of a purely verbal nature. Other renderings are 'in the mount of J″ it is seen'* (i.e. provided), or 'he [J″] is seen (appears),' or (Ew., Del., Keil, Dillm., Kautzsch-Socin) 'in the mount (where) J″ appears' (the sentence in this case being incomplete, as 10^{9b}).† It is objected to the first of these renderings that the Niph. of רָאָה does not occur in the sense of 'be provided'; but if 'see' can be used absolutely (41^{33}) in the sense of 'look out,' it does not seem impossible that 'be seen' might be used similarly; still, it is true that, if the proverb had once an independent existence, this would not be a natural or obvious sense for the verb to have. In the two other renderings, the connexion of the proverb with the name 'Jehovah-jireh' depends upon the double sense of the word 'see': J″ 'sees' the needs of those who come to worship before Him on Zion, and then 'is seen,' i.e. reveals Himself to them by answering their prayers, and supplying their wants: His 'seeing,' in other words, takes practical effect in a 'being seen.'‡ On the whole, unless the first suggestion made above be adopted, this may be said to be the best explanation of the passage.

With changes of the punctuation, other renderings become possible, though the general sense remains the same: as 'In the mountain (בָּהָר) J″ appeareth'§ (cf. LXX, ἐν τῷ ὄρει Κύριος ὤφθη); 'In the mountain J″ seeth or will see' (בָּהָר י׳ יִרְאֶה: so Pesh. and Vulg., assimilating the verb to that in clause a). The two clauses might also be assimilated by vocalizing the second element of the name yērā'eh, 'is seen' (appeareth), in place of yir'eh, 'seeth' (so Strack). S. R. DRIVER.

JEHOVAH-NISSI (יהוה נִסִּי 'J″ is my banner').—The name given by Moses to the altar he erected after the defeat of Amalek, Ex 17^{15} (E). The LXX (Κύριος καταφυγή μου) implies a derivation of the name from the root נוס 'flee,' the Vulg. (Dominus exaltatio mea) from נָשָׂא 'lift up.' Onkelos paraphrases, 'he prayed before God who had done miracles (נִיסִין) before him'; Rashi, 'God has done us here a miracle' (נֵס). There can be little doubt, however, that נֵס here = 'banner,' God being considered the centre or rallying-point of the army of Israel, and the name of God as their battle-cry (cf. Ps $20^{7f.}$). The interpretation of v.^{16} (כִּי־יָד עַל־כֵּס יָהּ) is somewhat doubtful. Many critics read נֵס for כֵּס (= כִּסֵּא 'throne'), but this appears neither to be necessary nor to yield a suitable sense. The meaning is probably either 'J″ hath sworn' (EV), or 'I (Moses) swear' (with hand uplifted to J″s throne). See Dillmann and Kalisch, ad loc.

J. A. SELBIE.

JEHOVAH-SHALOM (יהוה שָׁלוֹם; LXX εἰρήνη Κυρίου and Vulg. Domini pax imply Heb. reading שְׁלוֹם יהוה).—The name given by Gideon to the altar he erected in Ophrah, Jg 6^{24}. The name means 'J″ is peace' (i.e. well-disposed), in allusion to J″s words in v.^{23} 'Peace be unto thee.' There appears to be no necessity to take the second noun as genitive '(altar of) J″ of peace,' as in יהוה צְבָאוֹת. Rather is the name 'Jehovah-shalom' to be compared with such names as 'Jehovah-jireh,' 'Jehovah-nissi,' 'Jehovah-shammah,' in all of which J″ is the subject. See Moore, Judges, ad loc. J. A. SELBIE.

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH (יהוה שָׁמָּה 'J″ is there'; Κύριος ἐκεῖ).—The name to be given to the restored and glorified Jerusalem, Ezk 48^{35} (cf. Is 60^{14-22} 62^2, Rev $21^{2f.}$). 'The prophet beheld the LORD forsake His temple (ch. 11), and he beheld Him again enter it (ch. 43); now He abides in it among His people for ever. The covenant ran that He should be their God and they His people; this is perfectly fulfilled in His presence among them. The end in view from the beginning has been reached' (Davidson). J. A. SELBIE.

JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU (יהוה צִדְקֵנוּ 'J″ is our righteousness,' or 'J″ our righteousness,' Jer 23^6 33^{16}).—In both passages (which are in fact the same prophecy repeated, the latter being not found in LXX, and perhaps the insertion of a reviser) it is the title of the Branch, the perfectly Righteous King, who is to rule over the people on their return from the Captivity. If Jer 33^{14-26} is genuine, 33^{17} implies that the prophet has in his mind not one single king, but a succession of kings, who would fulfil the theocratic idea. If the first tr. of the words given above is right, this will mean that under the rule of the Branch men will fully realize the righteousness of J″; if the second, the title of J″ must be understood as applied to the king as God's vicegerent upon earth (cf. Is 9^6). To suppose that either passage definitely predicts the God Incarnate is to credit the prophets with the kind of foresight which our knowledge of their writings otherwise does not justify (cf. Driver, Sermons on OT, 204 ff.). F. H. WOODS.

JEHOZABAD (יְהוֹזָבָד 'J″ hath bestowed,' cf. זְבַדְיָה and זְבַדִּיאֵל).—1. One of the servants of king Joash who conspired against his master and joined in his assassination, 2 K 12^{21} = 2 Ch 24^{26}. 2. A Benjamite chief, one of Jehoshaphat's 'men of war,' 2 Ch 17^{18}. 3. The eponym of a Levitical family, 1 Ch 26^4. See GENEALOGY.

* The tense (as in 'J″ seeth') expressing what is habitual. The futures of AV, RV are (as often) misleading.

† This last rend., though of course possible formally (Ges.-K. § 155 l; Dav. § 25), is not, perhaps, in view of the order יהוה יראה, very probable (בהר יראה יהוה is what would be expected): see, however, though only after עֵת—which is often used without a rel., and may thus have more readily expressed the sense of 'the time (when)'—Ps 4^8, Mic 5^2.

‡ Cf. Delitzsch: 'Er sah drein, in dem er sich zu sehn gab d.i. thatsächlich eingriff.'

§ So Stade, Gesch. i. 450, who supposes the proverb to have been framed originally with reference to mountains in general, as the places where J″ was anciently worshipped, and which were often marked by theophanies.

JEHOZADAK (יְהוֹצָדָק 'J" is righteous,' cf. Zedekiah צִדְקִיָּהוּ), the father of Joshua the high priest (1 Ch $6^{14.\,15}$ [Heb. $5^{40.\,41}$], also in RV of Hag $1^{1.\,12.\,14}$ $2^{2.\,4}$, Zec 6^{11}, where LXX has Ἰωσεδέκ and AV Josedech). The name is shortened to Jozadak (יוֹצָדָק) in Ezr $3^{2.\,8}$ 5^{2} 10^{18}, Neh 12^{26}. It appears as Josedek (AV Josedec) in 1 Es $5^{5.\,48.\,56}$ 6^{2} 9^{19}, Sir 49^{12}. See GENEALOGY. H. A. WHITE.

JEHU (for form and meaning of the name see next article).—1. A prophet of the Northern Kingdom who predicted the downfall and destruction of the dynasty of Baasha (1 K $16^{1-7.\,12}$). The Chronicler introduces him as denouncing Jehoshaphat for his alliance with Ahab (2 Ch 19^{2}; cf. the way in which Jehu's father Hanani reproves Asa, 2 Ch 16^{7}). 'The words of Jehu the son of Hanani, which are taken up into the Book of the Kings of Israel' is cited by the Chronicler (2 Ch 20^{34}) as an authority for the reign of Jehoshaphat. See art. CHRONICLES, vol. i. p. 394^{a} f. 2. The king of Israel who destroyed the dynasty of Omri. See next article. 3. A Judahite, the son of Obed (1 Ch 2^{38}). 4. A Simeonite prince (1 Ch 4^{35}). While A of the LXX and Luc. have Ἰηού, B must have [mis ?] read הוּא instead of יֵהוּא, for it has οὗτος. 5. One of David's heroes (1 Ch 12^{3}).

JEHU (Heb. יֵהוּא, Assyr. Ja-u-a, Syriac ܝܗܘ, Arab. Jâhû, LXX B Εἰού, A often Ἰηού, Luc. Ἰού. The derivation is very uncertain. Some would regard it as an abbreviation of יְהוֹהוּא 'Jahweh is he,' just as יֵשׁוּעַ = יְהוֹשׁוּעַ. As a parallel, comp. [א]אֱלִיהוּ).—Jehu was son of Jehoshaphat, son of Nimshi, but he is not infrequently designated simply ben-Nimshi. From his own testimony (2 K $9^{25.\,26}$) we learn that he witnessed, in company with Bidkar, the judicial murder of Naboth. He evidently held, in conjunction with Bidkar, an important position in Ahab's bodyguard,[*] and the sentence of doom pronounced by Elijah on the house of Ahab must on that memorable occasion have been carefully treasured in his memory. This raises an interesting question. Was Jehu personally known to Elijah? This seems to be suggested by 1 K 19^{16}. But it is quite evident that the Elijah narrative in this chapter proceeds from a different hand from that which recorded the episodes in 2 K 8. 9, and the redactor has omitted from the Elijah section the fulfilment of the divine commands (1 K 19^{15-18}), though the injunctions themselves still remain. On this subject see Thenius' remarks at the end of his commentary on 1 K 19; Stade, Gesch. p. 540, footnote; and Kittel, Gesch. der Heb. ii. 184 [Eng. tr. ii. 214].

It is not, however, our purpose to enter into the complex features of the narrative dealing with the reign of Jehu (2 K 9. 10), since this department belongs to the literary features of 1 K and 2 K (see art. KINGS (BOOKS OF)). This subject has been ably investigated by Stade in ZATW, 1885, p. 275 ff. It is acknowledged by critics that the section 2 K 9^{1}–10^{27} descriptive of Jehu's revolution comes from the same hand as 1 K 20. 22, 2 K 3 (Cornill), to which may be added 6^{24}–7^{20} (Driver, LOT^{6} p. 195; Kittel, Gesch. ii. p. 186 [Eng. tr. ii. 216]). Kittel also agrees with Stade in attributing 10^{12-16} to a later source, a view which appears to the present writer well founded. Wellhausen further endeavours to disintegrate 10^{19-27} on the ground of inconsistencies (Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch^{2}. p. 77, footnote), but his arguments are not convincing.

Jehu ben-Nimshi rose to power on the crest of a wave of insurrectionary feeling fomented in the prophetic circles by the great personal influence of Elisha. Indeed it may even be true that he had already been designated as the earthly instrument of divine vengeance on the house of Omri by Elijah, and that Elisha had been commissioned by his illustrious predecessor to carry out the divine behest of 1 K 19^{16}. The vivid and dramatic narrative in chs. 9. 10 makes it clear that the causes which led to the popular discontent against the house of Omri were not so much connected with the introduction of the Phœnician Baal and Ashtoreth worship, but rather with the high-handed judicial murder of Naboth (see AHAB, JEZEBEL, and NABOTH). Towards Phœnicia Israel had for centuries felt a traditional friendship. It began with the days of David and Solomon. In language the two were closely akin. They exchanged their commodities, and the bond which linked them was called by the 8th cent. prophet Amos 'a covenant of brethren' (Am 1^{9}, but see Driver's note, ad loc.), a fact well illustrated by the beautiful episode of Elijah and the widow of the Phœnician town of Zarephath (1 K 17^{9-24}).

Jehu was the commanding officer in the army of Jehoram, which was conducting operations against the Syrian army under Hazael at the important fortress of Ramoth-gilead, a bone of contention since the days of Ahab, and now held by Israel. The severe wounds sustained by king Jehoram necessitated his retirement to Jezreel. This was the opportunity of which Elisha and the party of insurrection availed themselves. One of the 'sons of the prophets' was despatched by Elisha to Ramoth-gilead with a flask of oil and a commission to take Jehu from the group of officers which surrounded him into an inner chamber, anoint him there, and instantly withdraw in flight. These instructions were faithfully carried out. On Jehu's return to the officers' quarters, he was eagerly interrogated as to the meaning of this mysterious visit from the frenzied[] prophetic messenger. On learning the truth, his fellow-officers tore their mantles from their shoulders and spread them as a carpet for their commander on the bare steps,[†] and proclaimed him as king with a loud flourish of trumpets. The lightning rapidity of the following movements of Jehu, and the murderous energy with which he crushed every opposition, overwhelm the reader. He immediately proceeded to Jezreel at the head of a picked cavalcade, riding with Bidkar in his chariot. The invalided king Jehoram was at that time receiving a visit from his kinsman Ahaziah king of Judah, at his royal residence. The cavalcade is descried at a distance by the watchman near the palace gates, who informs the king (cf. 2 S 18^{24}). At the command of Jehoram, who feels uneasy at the news, a horseman is sent to make the inquiry, 'Is it peace?' The question was purposely ambiguous, and might be regarded as an inquiry respecting the progress of the campaign at the seat of war. But Jehu, with brutal frankness, at once makes his purpose clear, and compels the king's emissary to join his retinue. This strange proceeding is observed in Jezreel, and arouses suspicion. Both the kings at once proceed in their chariots, accompanied by their military staff, to confront the bold insurgent. The two cavalcades met at the ill-omened spot—the field of Naboth, ever associated with Ahab's high-handed injustice consummated by treachery and murder. Jehu was quick to seize the advantage afforded him by these familiar recollections, and, as Jehoram's heart failed him and he turned, immediately discharged an arrow [] with his full strength, that laid the king of Israel low. As he beheld the fallen son of Ahab, he recalled the words uttered by Elijah on that memorable spot many years before. With characteristic energy Jehu did not allow the opportunity of striking down a possible foe to escape him, and Ahaziah of Judah, who had fled at the sight of his kinsman's terrible fate, was immediately pursued on the road which he took to Beth-haggan. At a place called the Ascent of Gûr,[†] near Ible'am, he was overtaken and mortally wounded, and ultimately escaped to die at Megiddo.

[*] Bidkar and Jehu rode in a chariot along with others in pairs. So the Hebrew (רֹכְבִים צְמָדִים) should be interpreted. There was something exceptional in this. Usually three rode in a Hebrew chariot, as we find among the Hittites. See article CHARIOT by the present writer in Black's Bible Encyclopædia.

[*] The familiar ancient association of prophecy and madness is indicated in the Heb. מְשֻׁגָּע (cf. Jer 29^{26}), but it would be an error to regard it as a scornful epithet on the basis of Hos 9^{7} (cf. 1 S $21^{14\text{ff.}}$). In classical Arabic the verb is employed of speech or writing in the special form of prophetic rhythmic prose.

[†] גֶּרֶם הַמַּעֲלוֹת probably means the bare steps (or, perhaps, the midst of the flight of steps). The idiomatic phrase גֶּרֶם puzzled the LXX, who simply transliterate it (B γαρέμ, A γὰρ' ἵνα. Luc. combines the two, ἐφ' ἓν τῶν γαρέμ, ἐπὶ μίαν τῶν ἀναβαθμίδων).

As Jehu entered Jezreel at the head of his retinue, he was greeted by Jezebel as she sat with her attendants at the window in the stately queen's apartment in the upper storey of the royal palace. The splendid courage of the queen-dowager did not forsake her in that terrible hour of doom. Surrounded by Phœnician luxury, with elaborate head-dress and eyelids painted with stibium, she hurled her angry defiance at the victorious insurgent. To Jehu's previous reminiscence of a well-known episode she retorts with another, as she flings the taunt, 'Is it peace, O Zimri, his master's murderer?' meaning, 'Is there to be peace between me and such a traitor as you with your brief tenancy of power?' The narrator who portrays the lurid facts sheds no ray of chivalry on Jehu's relentless ferocity. The queen at his bidding is flung by the attendant eunuchs from the lofty upper window into the courtyard below, close to his chariot wheels, and suffers instant death. Jehu feasts within the palace in cold-blooded indifference until the thought of the yet unburied queen prompts the command that the 'accursed' (הָאֲרוּרָה) should receive the rights of sepulture due to her dignity and rank. This, however, the carrion kites and scavenger dogs had by this time rendered superfluous.

But the career of assassination was not yet ended, and, without Macbeth's remorse, Jehu felt himself 'young in deed,' and could say without compunction—

> 'I am in blood
> Stepped in so far that should I wade no more
> Returning were as tedious as go o'er.'—Macbeth, III. iv. 137.

The seventy sons and grandsons of the royal harem of Ahab still inhabited Samaria, and they undoubtedly constituted a possible source of danger and disaffection. An artfully worded despatch to the elders in Samaria [?],[‡] challenging them to set up one of these royal princes as a rival king, produced the desired effect. The palace-commander, the commander of the city, and the guardians of the sons of Ahab trembled for their own lives, and complied with Jehu's second request. They procured the death of all the royal princes, and sent their heads in baskets to Jezreel. This work of destruction was supplemented according to the section (vv.$^{12-16}$) by a still further holocaust of 42 princes of the line of David, kinsmen of Ahaziah.[*] This pendant to the narrative probably belongs to a later source. Yet the following verse (v.^{17}) clearly shows that further deeds of blood were perpetrated.

The final scene of butchery was enacted in the great temple of the Phœnician Baal, erected by Ahab in Samaria, where, under pretext of zeal for the worship of the god, a large crowd of his devotees were gathered together and then slaughtered by an armed band of eighty men who were posted at the entrance to guard the exit. The Baal 'pillars' (maẓẓēbôth) were brought forth and destroyed by fire (2 K 10^{26}).

It is not quite clear what was the religious significance of this destruction of the Baal temple in Samaria and of its devotees. Doubtless Wellhausen is right in saying (Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch.^{2} p. 77) that Jehu was essentially a soldier, and his aims were political rather than religious. Yet he posed as a religious zealot, and some meaning must have been ascribed to his destruction of the Baal worshippers. It is more difficult to ascertain the precise significance of this act when we remember that Jehoram, Ahab's son (note that the name of Jahweh is expressed in this royal name), is distinctly stated to have withdrawn the specific Tyrian Baal worship from Samaria, which had been instituted by Ahab under the influence of Jezebel (2 K 3^2). Yet it is quite obvious that this act of Jehoram did not touch the old local Canaanitish Baal worship which still prevailed in the high places of Israel, and too much stress should certainly not be placed on this act of suppression, which appears to have been only temporary or partial in character. This is the view taken by Prof. Peake, the writer of the article BAAL in the first volume of this Dictionary. Accordingly, we may regard the murderous policy of Jehu as simply directed to a drastic suppression of the Phœnician form of Baal worship. This view is supported by the following considerations: (1) The annihilation of Baal worship by Jehu took place in Samaria, the capital and residence of the Omri dynasty, where the Phœnician Baal had his special shrine (1 K 16^{32}). We nowhere read of the suppression of Baal cults generally in the high places. (2) The extinction of Canaanitish Baal worship, if it had ever taken place, could not have been effectual or permanent, since in the 8th cent. the writings of the prophet Hosea reveal the wide prevalence of local Baal cults in the Northern Kingdom. (3) The worship of the golden calf of Jeroboam I. still survived, as we infer from 2 K 10^{29}. This verse and the language of v.^{31} lead us to the conclusion that the words, 'And Jehu destroyed the Baal from Israel' (v.^{28}), can refer only to the specific cult introduced by Jezebel perhaps characterized by gross licentiousness. (4) That Jehu wrought no real religious reformation is shown by the neutral tone of the writer of chs. 9. 10, while the strong reprobation of Hos 1^4 faithfully reflects not only the prophetic but the popular verdict on the character and career of this monarch.

The policy pursued by Jehu towards the dynasty of Omri, and the murder of the Phœnician queen as well as the overthrow of the Phœnician worship, at once shattered the close bonds of an alliance which the dynasty of Omri had found of considerable value to Israel, and which it had taken the utmost pains to consolidate. Ahab, as we have already seen (art. AHAB), had abandoned the friendship of Syria after the disastrous battle of Ḳarkar (854). He had formed a pretty shrewd estimate of the rising power of the Assyrian empire under Shalmaneser II., and thought it wiser to have its ruler as his friend rather than his foe. The further attacks made by the Assyrians upon the Aramæan kingdom of Benhadad (Dadidri) in the years 849, 846, and 842 only made this policy of friendship with Assyria more necessary for Israel; and Jehu, weakened by his break with Phœnicia and by the hostility of Judah, was driven by the force of events to adopt the same policy of subservience to the Assyrian monarch. The black obelisk of Shalmaneser, in a brief statement that runs in clearly legible characters of cuneiform between the graphic figures of its reliefs, records the important statement: 'Tribute of Jehu, son of Omri—objects of silver and gold—bars of silver, bars of gold, a golden bowl, a golden ladle, golden goblets, golden pitchers, bars of lead—a staff for the hand of a king, shafts of spears . . . these I received.'*

Another inscription (COT^{2} p. 200; III. Rawl. 5, No. 6, 40–65) places this event in a clearer light. We there learn that the Tyrians and Sidonians followed the same policy as Jehu. Jehu was forced to adopt this attitude at the commencement of his reign (842 B.C.), because in that year Shalmaneser II. made another invasion of Syria and attacked Hazael of Damascus. It was terribly disastrous for the young Syrian king. He lost 16,000 men and more than 1000 chariots. To save his life he fled to Damascus, whither he was pursued and then besieged. The Assyrians ravaged and laid his territory waste as far as the Haurân range and even the frontiers of Lebanon. This terrible overthrow of the year 842 was followed by another invasion three years later, in which Syria made little resistance. This at any rate is the inference which may be drawn from the long annalistic inscription taken from the obelisk of Nimrud,† lines 102–104: 'In the 21st year of my reign (i.e. 839) I crossed the Euphrates for the 21st time and marched against the towns [maḥazâni) of Hazael of Damascus. Four of his towns I conquered, and received the tribute of the Tyrians, Sidonians, and Byblians.'

While the humiliations inflicted by Assyria upon the Aramæan kingdom continued, the policy of vassalage to Nineveh pursued by Jehu brought him security, and Israel was safe from aggression from his powerful northern foe, Syria. But the tide was soon to turn. After 839 B.C. we read of no more attacks upon the Syrian kingdom from the shores of the Euphrates for more than 30 years. Meanwhile Syria, with wonderful inherent energy and recuperative power, began once more to show itself able to take the offensive. We learn this from the brief notice which closes the biblical record of Jehu's reign (2 K 10^{32}): 'During that time J" began to cut off (the territories of) Israel, and Hazael smote them in all the borders of Israel,' and in the following verse this is explained as meaning that Israel suffered severe losses of territory along the whole of his eastern dominion on the other side of Jordan. Probably Hazael annexed these territories to his own—the harbinger of further humiliations in store for the dynasty of Jehu, until the tide again turned in favour of Israel under Jeroboam II.‡

JEHUBBAH (יְחֻבָּה Kethîbh, but Ḳerê וְחֻבָּה = 'and Hubbah' is to be preferred [LXX B Ὠβάβ, A Ὀβά, Vulg. Haba]).—An Asherite, 1 Ch 7^{34}. See GENEALOGY, XII. 5.

JEHUCAL (יְהוּכַל 'J. is able').—A courtier sent by king Zedekiah, during the siege of Jerus., to entreat for the prayers of Jeremiah (Jer $37^{3f.}$). He is called in Jer 38^1 Jucal.

JEHUD (יְהֻד, LXX B Ἀζώρ, A Ἰούθ, Luc. Ἰούδ).—A town of Dan, named between Baalath and Bene-berak, Jos 19^{45}. It is probably the modern el-Yehûdîyeh, 8 miles E. of Joppa. See Dillm. Jos., ad loc.; Robinson, BRP^{2}, ii. 242; Guérin, Judée, i. 322; Buhl, GAP 197; SWP vol. ii. sheet iii.

JEHUDI (יְהוּדִי).—A word which generally = a Jew, but appears to be a proper name in Jer $36^{14.\,21.\,23}$. J. was an officer of Jehoiakim, at whose summons Baruch read to the princes of Judah the roll of Jeremiah's prophecies. J. was afterwards himself employed to read the roll to the king, but he had not proceeded far when Jehoiakim cut it in pieces and cast it into the fire.

JEHUDIJAH (1 Ch 4^{18} AV).—See HAJEHUDIJAH.

JEHUEL (יְחוּאֵל Kethîbh, יְחִיאֵל Ḳerê).—A Hemanite in Hezekiah's reign, 2 Ch 29^{14}. See GENEALOGY.

JEIEL (יְעִיאֵל).—1. A Reubenite, 1 Ch 5^7. 2. An ancestor of Saul, 1 Ch 8^{29} (supplied in RV from 9^{35}). 3. One of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{44}. 4. 5. The name of two Levite families: (a) 1 Ch $15^{18.\,21}$ $16^{5.\,5}$, 2 Ch 20^{14}; (b) 2 Ch 35^9. 6. A scribe in the reign of Uzziah, 2 Ch 26^{11}. 7. One of those who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10^{43}. In 2. 3. 6 Kethîbh has יְעוּאֵל, Jeuel. See GENEALOGY.

JEKABZEEL, Neh 11^{25}.—See KABZEEL.

JEKAMEAM (יְקַמְעָם).—1. A Levite, 1 Ch 23^{19} 24^{23}. In the former of these passages LXX has Ἰκεμιάς, in the latter Ἰοκόμ (B) or Ἰκεμιά (A). Gray (Heb. Prop. Names, 46 n.) points out that these LXX readings suggest an original יקמיה, but that the other versions on the whole support the MT.

JEKAMIAH (יְקַמְיָה 'may J" strengthen').—1. A Judahite, the son of Shallum, 1 Ch 2^{41}. 2. A son of king Jeconiah, 1 Ch 3^{18}.

JEKUTHIEL (יְקוּתִיאֵל, perh. 'preservation of God,' possibly same as יְקַתְאֵל, see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v., and Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 307 n 8).—A man of Judah, 1 Ch 4^{18}. See GENEALOGY.

JEMIMAH (יְמִימָה).—The eldest of Job's daughters born to him after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42^{14}). The LXX and Vulg. render as if from יום day; most moderns connect with Arab. jemâma = dove (see, however, Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, p. 108).

JEMNAAN, Jth 2^{28}.—See JABNEEL.

JEMUEL (יְמוּאֵל).—A son of Simeon, Gn 46^{10}, Ex 6^{15} = Nemuel of Nu 26^{12}, 1 Ch 4^{24}. The LXX also exhibits both forms, having in Gn Ἰεμουήλ, in Ex Ἰεμιήλ (B), in Nu and 1 Ch Ναμουήλ.

JEOPARD, JEOPARDY.—The verb to 'jeopard,' that is, hazard, is derived from the subst. 'jeopardy,' peril, hazard; and that is a corruption of the Old French jeu parti, lit. a divided game (Low Lat. jocus partitus), i.e. a game in which the chances are even. Chaucer (Troilus, ii. 465) has—

‡ Here again the success of Israel was cheaply earned through the intervention of the Assyrian arms. The terrible disaster inflicted by Rammân-nirâri III. in 803 on the Aramæan kingdom was a blow from which it never recovered. Rammân-nirâri III. is the 'deliverer' referred to in 2 K 13^5, and this is a chronological datum of considerable value. See the present writer's remarks in Schrader, COT^{2} ii. p. 324.

> And eek myn emes [=uncle's] lyf lyth in balaunce';

and (ii. 772)—

> 'Sholde I now love and putte in jupartye
> My sikernesse, and thrallen libertee?'

Tindale in Prol. to Leviticus says, 'They that be dead, yf they dyed in the faith which that sacrament preacheth, they be saffe and are past all jeopardye,' where the word has assumed its modern spelling. The verb occurs often in Tindale and other writers of that time, as Knox, Works, iii. 213, 'Why will ye jeoparde to loise eternall life?'; Tind. Works, i. 173, 'Whosoever casteth not this aforehand, I must jeopard life, goods, honour, worship (and all that there is, for Christ's sake), deceiveth himself'; Elyot, Governour, ii. 263, 'I name that Audacitie whiche is an excessife and inordinate truste to escape all daungers, and causeth a man to do suche actes as are nat to be jeoparded': and Dn 3^{28} Cov. 'that have altered the kynges commaundement and joperde their bodies therupon.'

Jeopardy occurs in AV, 2 S 23^{17} 'is not this the blood of the men that went in jeopardy of their lives?' (הַהֹלְכִים בְּנַפְשׁוֹתָם, lit., as RVm, 'that went with their lives'; but the ב is [as Driver] the Beth pretii, 'at the cost or risk of their lives'; W. R. Smith [RS^{2} 230], 'the blood of the men that fetched it in jeopardy of their lives'); 1 Ch $11^{19\ bis}$ 'Shall I drink the blood of these men that have put their lives in jeopardy? for with the jeopardy of their lives they brought it' (AVm and RVm 'with their lives'); 12^{19} 'He will fall to his master Saul to the jeopardy of our heads' (בְּרָאשֵׁינוּ, AVm 'on our heads,' but it is the Beth pretii, as before); 1 Mac 6^{44} 'Eleazar also . . . put himself in jeopardy, to the end he might deliver his people' (ἔδωκεν ἑαυτόν, RV 'gave himself'); Lk 8^{23} 'there came down a storm of wind on the lake; and they were filled with water and were in jeopardy' (ἐκινδύνευον); 1 Co 15^{30} 'And why stand we in jeopardy every hour?' (κινδυνεύομεν); and in the Preface to AV 1611, 'Yea, why did the Catholicks (meaning Popish Romanists) alwayes go in jeopardie for refusing to go to heare it [the English translation of the Bible]?'

The verb is rarer, Jg 5^{18} 'Zebulun and Naphtali were a people that jeoparded their lives unto the death in the high places of the field' (חֵרֵף נַפְשׁוֹ לָמוּת, lit. 'that despised its life to death,' AVm 'exposed to reproach,' Moore, 'that recklessly exposed itself to death'); [*] 2 Mac 11^{7} 'Then Maccabeus himself first of all took weapons, exhorting the other that they would jeopard themselves together with him to help their brethren' (διακινδυνεύοντας); 14^{38} 'he [Razis] did boldly jeopard his body and life with all vehemency for the religion of the Jews' (παραβεβλημένος).

JEPHTHAH (יִפְתָּח 'he,' i.e. prob. J″, 'will open'; cf. פְּתַחְיָה Ezr 10^{23} etc., יִפְתַּחְאֵל town in Zebulun, Jos 19^{14}; יִפְתָּח also name of a town in Judah, Jos 15^{43}; Ἰεφθά).—Judge, and conqueror of the Ammonites (Jg 10^{6}–12^{7}; cf. 1 S 12^{11}). The narrative has an unusually long introduction 10^{6-18} (cf. 2^{11}–$3^{6.\ 7-10}$ 6^{7-10} [D^{2}]); it is based, however, on what was probably a shorter introduction in the manner of E (vv.$^{6b.\ 8.\ 15.\ 16}$). The particulars in $10^{17.\ 18}$ are derived from ch. 11 (cf. 8^{33-35} from ch. 9), and come from D^{2}. Apparently, this long introduction was intended to include the Philistine as well as the Ammonite oppression (10^{7}). The main interest of the story of Jephthah clearly lies, not in his personal history or defeat of the Ammonites, but in his vow and its fulfilment, and the origin of an Israelite custom.

Of the antecedents of Jephthah little is known beyond the fact that he was a Gileadite warrior, the son of a harlot. He was driven out of his home by the 'elders of Gilead' (11^{7}), and became the captain of a band of freebooters in the land of Tob in E. Syria (cf. 1 S $22^{1f.}$, 2 S $10^{6.\ 8}$).[*] The Ammonite invasion made it necessary for the Israelites east of Jordan to find a leader; and there was nothing for it but to appeal to the outlawed Jephthah to come to the rescue. The elders of Gilead begged him to be their leader; and, after expressing surprise that such a request should be made to him, Jephthah agreed, on the condition that he should become their chief when the Ammonites were defeated. A solemn compact was made accordingly, and Jephthah was appointed leader by popular acclamation (11^{4-11a}). At this moment, it would seem, when Jephthah was at Mizpah of Gilead, he went to the holy place or altar, and there, 'before J″,' registered a vow to sacrifice whomsoever should be the first to meet him when he returned victorious (vv.$^{31.\ 11b}$).[†] That he had a human victim in his mind is clear from the language which he used.[‡]

The long account of the negotiations between Jephthah and the king of the Ammonites (11^{12-28}) with regard to Israel's rights of possession in Gilead, is regarded by most critics as a late interpolation, compiled from JE's narrative in Nu 20. 21, in some places word for word; cf. vv.$^{17-22.\ 26}$ with Nu $20^{14.\ 17}$ $21^{4.\ 13.\ 21-24.\ 25}$. The remarkable thing about this section is, that although Jephthah is arguing with Ammonites, yet the language which he is made to use refers entirely to Moabites. The Ammonites complain that Israel had seized their land between Arnon and Jabbok; Jephthah replies that the district was taken from Sihon king of the Amorites, and not from Moab (!). Moab never fought against Israel (but see Jos 24^{9}), why should Ammon? Even Chemosh, god of the Moabites, is referred to as having given the Ammonites their territory. An extraordinary misunderstanding thus runs through the whole passage.[§]

A brief description of the defeat of the Ammonites is all that is given (v.$^{32f.}$). The course of the battle cannot be determined exactly, but it probably went in a direction E. of Rabbah (see Jos 13^{25} Aroer), into the territory of the Ammonites.[‖] Jephthah returns in triumph to his home at Mizpah; the first person who comes to meet him is his only daughter, accompanied by a chorus of women (cf. Ex $15^{20f.}$, 1 S $18^{6f.}$). The overwhelming grief of the father, the noble self-surrender of the daughter, and her courageous resignation to her fate, are told with admirable skill and reserve. 'He did to her what he had vowed to do.' It became henceforth a custom in Israel to celebrate the tragedy of Jephthah's daughter by four days' mourning every year.[*]

[*] See Moore in loc. for reff. to the use of the verb; and G. A. Smith in Expos. 4th Ser. vii. 168, and in HGHL 422, for illustration of the character described.

[*] $11^{1b.\ 2}$ are not part of the original story. V.^{1b} is modelled on the genealogical forms of P and Ch; v.^{2} is best explained as due to a misunderstanding of v.^{7}.

[†] The sequel of v.^{31} is ^{11b}; the text has been disordered by the long interpolation, $^{12-28}$.

[‡] 'Whosoever cometh forth,' 'from the doors of my house,' 'I will offer him up': these expressions are inapplicable to an animal.

[§] Perhaps the interpolation was made at some moment when the Israelites wanted to assert their title to Gilead. Moore suggests such an occasion as the intrusion of the Ammonites at the beginning of the 6th cent. (Jer 49^{1-5}).

[‖] V.^{29} mentions various movements, the reason for which is not clear. Jephthah's object could not have been to raise the tribes; for the people are all assembled in v.^{11a}. In ^{11b} Jephthah is still at Mizpah; he is still there in ^{30}, and thence sets out in due course in ^{32}. V.^{29} is, in fact, an attempt to pick up the thread of the narrative after the long interpolation, $^{12-28}$ (Moore).

That such sacrifices were possible in Israel may be gathered from 1 S 14$^{24f. 45}$ 15^{33}, 2 S 21$^{6. 9}$; cf. Ezk 20^{28} with Ex 22^{28}, Mic 6^{7}. In times of desperation or religious degradation they became more frequent (Jer 7^{31}, 2 K 16^{3} 17^{17} 21^{6}, Ps 106$^{37f.}$ etc. See Schultz, OT Theol. i. 191; Dillmann, Genesis^{6}, 289 f.; Nowack, Heb. Arch. ii. 205 f.; Ottley, BL, 1897, 176 f.).

The narrative goes on to describe a severe conflict between Jephthah and the tribe of Ephraim, who, with characteristic arrogance (8$^{1f.}$), complained that they had not been invited to take part in the war. After expostulating with them, Jephthah collected his Gileadite forces, which had been dispersed when the war was ended, and went to battle. He held the Jordan fords against them; every fugitive who attempted to cross was required to pronounce the test-word Shibboleth ('flood'); and if he betrayed his Ephraimite origin by pronouncing it Sibboleth, he was put to death.[†]

The historical character of this narrative has been questioned by Wellh. (Composition, 229), who treats it as a mere replica of 8$^{1-3}$. His arguments, however, are not conclusive; the episode at the Jordan fords is too original to be imaginary; and the majority of modern critics support the genuineness of these verses. It is probable that the numbers in v.^{8} are exaggerated; but this does not condemn the whole story.[‡] The narrative of Jephthah is brought to a close with the formula which is used of the minor judges (10$^{2-5}$ 12$^{10. 12. 15}$).[§]

The account of Jephthah's home and settled life at Mizpah (11$^{34ff.}$) does not seem to agree with his outlawry in 11$^{3ff.}$. The confusion of the Ammonites and Moabites in 11$^{12-28}$ is also remarkable. Accordingly, Budde (Commentary on Judges, 1897), following an unpublished treatise by Holzinger, attempts to work out a double narrative, as in the case of Gideon. He postulates a Moabite document, and assigns it to E, and an Ammonite document, J. The suggestion is ingenious, but the data are hardly distinctive enough. The contradictions in the accounts of Jephthah's antecedents are not irreconcilable; while, with regard to the interpolation (11$^{12-28}$), the explanation above satisfies the case.

JEPHUNNEH (יְפֻנֶּה).—1. The father of Caleb (Nu 13^{6}). 2. A son of Jether an Asherite (1 Ch 7^{38}).

JERAH (יֶרַח), son of Joktan, Gn 10^{28} (1 Ch 1^{20}). The Arabic geographers knew of places named Yurākh and Yarāḥ in Yemen and Ḥijaz respectively (Yāḳūt and Hamdāni); and the geographer Yāḳūt quotes from Al-Ṣulaiḥi (a usurper who obtained control of Yemen in the 11th cent., and was well versed in S. Arabian geography), a verse in which Warākh is mentioned as a place of importance: 'What excuse have I, now I am lord of Warākh, for failing to meet the foe?' There are several references to Warākh in Hamdāni's 'Description of Arabia,' from which its site can be accurately fixed. It is possible that the name may be ancient, and that the Jerah of Gn may refer to it. Most commentators, however, have preferred to regard Jerah (Heb. 'moon' or 'month') as a translation of some Arabic name; but the conjectures based on this supposition by Bochart, J. D. Michaelis, and more recently Glaser (Skizze, ii. 425), seem devoid of probability.

According to 1 Ch 2^{9} the firstborn son of Hezron, the son of Perez, the son of Judah. His descendants, of whom a list is given (vv.$^{25-33}$), lived on the extreme S. border of Judah in what was technically called 'the Negeb of the Jerahmeelites' (1 S 27^{10} 30^{29}; see Driver, in loc., and G. A. Smith, HGHL pp. 278–286). They appear to have been an Amalekite or Edomite clan, which was afterwards absorbed by Judah.

2. The son of Kish, a Merarite Levite of the house of Mahli. Jerahmeel appears as the only representative of this branch of the house of Merari at the time when David is said to have organized the temple service (1 Ch 23^{21} 24^{29}).

3. The king's son (RV, AVm; 'the son of Hammelech' AV, RVm) i.e. of the royal blood, who together with two other officers was commanded by king Jehoiakim 'to take Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet' after the burning of the roll (Jer 36^{26}).

JERED (יֶרֶד. It is the same name which is given in Gn 5$^{15. 18. 18. 20}$, 1 Ch 1^{2} as Jared).—A Judahite, the 'father' of Gedor, 1 Ch 4^{18}.

JEREMAI (יְרֵמַי).—A Jew of the family of Hashum who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10^{33}).

JEREMIAH.—Seven or eight men of this name besides the prophet (see next art.) are mentioned in OT. The Heb. is always יִרְמְיָה or יִרְמְיָהוּ. 1. A warrior of the tribe of Gad, fifth in reputation (1 Ch 12^{10}) of those who joined David in 'the hold in the wilderness' in the neighbourhood either of Adullam or of En-gedi, most probably of the latter. 2. The tenth in reputation (1 Ch 12^{13}) of the same Gadite band. 3. A bowman and slinger of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 12^{4}), who joined David during his occupation of the frontier city of Ziklag. 4. The head of a family in the eastern section of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Ch 5^{24}). He was probably one of the Jews carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser, and settled by him on the Armenian frontier (1 Ch 5^{26}, 2 K 15^{29}). 5. A Jew of Libnah, whose daughter, Hamutal or Hamital, was one of the wives of Josiah, and mother of Jehoahaz (2 K 23^{31}) and Zedekiah (2 K 24^{18}, Jer 52^{1}). In the last two passages the mother's name is given as Hamital, חמיטל; but a textual error is more probable than that Josiah married two sisters, both daughters of Jeremiah. The latter's place of residence (Jos 21^{13}, 1 Ch 6^{57}), and his relations with the king, as well as the respectful way in which he is in each instance referred to as a well-known man, make it likely that he was a priest of great influence, and possibly also one of the principal instigators or agents of Josiah in the ritual restoration of his reign. 6. The son of Habazziniah and father of Jaazaniah, who appears to have been the head of the Rechabites (Jer 35^{3}) in the time of the prophet Jeremiah.

[†] Two historical parallels are quoted by the commentators: the 'Sicilian Vespers,' Mar. 31, 1282, when the French were made to betray themselves by their pronunciation of ceci e ciceri; and again, during the revolt against the French in Flanders, May 25, 1302, when no one was allowed to pass out of the gates who could not pronounce scilt ende friend?

[‡] In 12^{2a} a verb must be supplied after וּבְנֵי עַמּוֹן, LXX (A) ἐταπείνουν με, i.e. עִנּוּנִי 'afflicted me.' In v.^{4} the sentence from כִּי אָמְרוּ 'because they said' to the end does not make sense. The words, 'because they said, Ye are fugitives of Ephraim,' must come from v.^{5}; the rest of the sentence is a gloss. The entire half-verse is om. in some MSS of LXX; in Syro-Hex. it is asterisked.

[§] The closing words of 12^{7} cannot be right. LXX (A) ἐν τῇ πόλει αὐτοῦ Γαλαάδ, Vulg. in civitate sua Galaad. Studer conjectures בְּמִצְפֵּה גִלְעָד 11^{29}, suggested by ἐν τῇ πόλει αὐτοῦ ἐν Σεφὲ Γ', the reading of some cursive MSS; cf. Moore, ad loc.

7. A priest who in B.C. 536 came back to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh 12^{1}). His name was given to one of the twenty-two courses or 'fathers'-houses,' into which were divided the four families of priests (Ezr 2$^{36-39}$, Neh 7$^{39-42}$) that returned on that occasion. It is not possible to say with certainty to which of these families Jeremiah belonged; but if the lists are parallel, he may have been a member of that of Jedaiah, with which also the high priest Jeshua was connected. The course is mentioned again (Neh 12^{13}) in the priesthood (B.C. 499–463) of Joiakim, Jeshua's son and successor, when its head is said to have been Hananiah. 8. A priest who in the name of his course, with other princes and representatives of the people, sealed in B.C. 444 Nehemiah's great covenant (Neh 10^{2}). He (or his course) was also appointed to join the right-hand procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12^{34}). It is possible that in both of these cases the name is used to denote the official head of a priestly course rather than an individual in his own person. In the former, fifteen of the twenty-one names are identical with those in the lists of Neh 12$^{2-7}$ and Neh 12$^{11-20}$; and hence there is ground for the assumption that the name is used in this instance as the official designation of a class. But in the latter the forms of expression are slightly in favour of the opposite conclusion, Neh 12^{35} referring specifically to the priests' sons, whilst there is an antecedent probability that the procession would consist of selected representatives only. That, moreover, the name of Jeremiah should recur in different generations of the same family, is not forbidden by known Jewish usage. In the days of Joiakim, Hananiah was the head of the course of Jeremiah (Neh 12^{12}); but Joiakim died some sixteen years before the dedication of the wall, and in the interval it is not unlikely that the headship of the course of Jeremiah had passed into the hands of a man who bore the great family name. And if this Jeremiah was a person and not a class, lapse of time is fatal to his assumed identification with the previous one (No. 7). R. W. MOSS.

i. LIFE OF THE PROPHET.—Jeremiah (יִרְמְיָהוּ, shorter form יִרְמְיָה 'whom J″ casts,' i.e. possibly, as Ges. suggests, 'appoints' Dn 7^{9}, Ἰερεμίας, Jeremias) was born of a priestly family in Anathoth, now 'Anâta, a small town, an hour or an hour and a quarter N.E. of Jerusalem (Is 10^{30}), and prophesied from the 13th year of Josiah till after the Captivity, a period of more than 40 years (B.C. 626–586). Though he had spoken as a prophet for five years when Josiah promulgated the Book of the Law and introduced his Reform, Jeremiah appears to have had no hand in these transactions; but from the death of Josiah till his own death in Egypt he was a prominent figure in all the history of that tragic period. Almost alone he had to expose the immoralities, the self-deception founded on superficial reforms, and the fanatical confidence in the protection of J″ who dwelt in His temple, by which all classes were carried away. His conviction, constantly declared, that the Lord had determined to destroy the temple and nation, exposed him to cruel insults from the temple priests (20^{2}, cf. 37^{13}); and he was on many occasions in danger of his life, from his townsmen of Anathoth (11^{21}), the priests and prophets of the temple (26$^{8.\,9}$), the arbitrary and vindictive king Jehoiakim (36$^{19.\,26}$), and the military of the day (38^{4}). The strife in which he was involved, so alien to his nature, wearied him: he longed for a lodge in the wilderness (9^{2}), mourned the perpetual conflicts in which his life was passed (15^{10}), cursed in despair the day of his birth (20^{14}), and vowed to have done with the word of the Lord, which isolated him from all that was human,—but in vain: His word was in his heart like a fire shut up in his bones, and he must declare it (20^{9}). Yet even in that degenerate day his life extorted a certain homage: the better conscience of men was on his side (26$^{17-19}$); the Ethiopian slave was moved with pity for his distress (38^{7}); king Zedekiah heard him gladly, and did what he could to mitigate his sufferings (37$^{20f.}$ 38^{10}); the Chaldæans treated him with consideration (40$^{1ff.}$), and even the wretched exiles insisted on dragging him with them as a kind of fetish to Egypt (43$^{5ff.}$).

Jeremiah appears to have been called to the prophetic office young, though the word 'child' (נַעַר 1^{6}), which he employs of himself, may chiefly express his sense of insufficiency for the task set before him. There is no reason to suppose his father Hilkiah identical with the chief priest of that name who discovered the Book of the Law in the temple (2 K 22^{8}). His father may rather have been a descendant of Abiathar, whom Solomon banished to Anathoth (1 K 2^{26}); and if so, traditions of the days of David and the early monarchy, and the great part their ancestor then played, would be cherished in the family and give it a sense of dignity even in its decline, and they would be the food on which the mind of the child Jeremiah was nourished. The family owned land in Anathoth (32^{8}), and though, in later times at least, living mainly in Jerusalem, the prophet continued to frequent his native village (11$^{18ff.}$ 37$^{11ff.}$, cf. 29^{27} where he is contemptuously called 'the Anathothite'). His prophetic ministry was probably begun here. As he was not consulted by Josiah and the priests regarding the newly-found Book of the Law (2 K 22$^{12ff.}$), he may have been little known in the capital, unless indeed we suppose that owing to the violence of his denunciations the authorities preferred to seek the advice of some more moderate counsellors. There is no ground for supposing the dialogue 1$^{4-10}$ coloured by the prophet's subsequent experience. No man became a prophet suddenly; the decisive event, named his 'call,' was but the climax of many prior movements of mind leading up to it. Jeremiah felt himself 'predestinated' to be a prophet (1$^{4f.}$). The idea may cover much belonging to the past, the godly house out of which he came with its traditions, many movements in his own mind little attended to at the time but remembered now, and the nation's whole history of which he was the child. It is no denial of the reality of the divine voice speaking to him when we look at the dialogue as a conflict in his own mind, in which thought was invalidated by opposite thought, and suggestion and resolution met by counter suggestion and irresolution. The conflict already reveals the duality in his consciousness characteristic of his whole life. God and man wrestle within him no less than they do in St. Paul. The impulses to stand forth as a prophet, awakened by the signs of the times, he calls God; the reluctances and all the considerations that support them are himself. And when the impulses prove the stronger, it is a victory of God and a defeat of himself—'O Lord, thou didst induce me, and I was induced; thou art stronger than I' (20^{7}).

The words, 'See, I have set thee over the nations,' indicate a change of view from that of the earlier prophets, though Jeremiah was perhaps not conscious of the change ($28^{7ff.}$). Israel is no more to be a people that dwells alone (Nu 23^{9}), the stream of its history is to flow into and colour that of the history of the nations. If prophecy now begins to concern itself with the nations, it is because J″ concerns Himself with them. The consciousness of one God has created the consciousness of one world and one mankind. Jeremiah's presentiments at this time are expressed in the two symbols 1^{11-19}: First, the symbol of the almond tree, meaning that J″ is 'wakeful' in regard to His word and purposes, and will speedily execute them; and second, the seething caldron with its mouth towards the south, indicating that the North is about to pour its desolating forces over the land. The substance of his prophetic speeches under Josiah is given in chs. 2–6. These chs. reflect chiefly his teaching before the Reform, but contain allusions to the people's mind later, and his judgment on it (2^{35} $3^{4.5}$ $4^{3f.}$). The two main thoughts running through the chs. are, first, his verdict on the people's history; it has been one long course of unfaithfulness to J″ (2^{1}–4^{4}); and, secondly, his unchangeable conviction that the issue of such a history must be the destruction of the nation (4^{5}–6^{30}). His thoughts run greatly on the same lines with those of Hosea. Israel was true to J″ in the wilderness,—and with a sorrowful reminiscence J″ recalls the time, 'I remember the kindness of thy youth, thy bridal love, how thou didst follow me in the wilderness' (2^{2}),—but apostatized and became unfaithful on entering Canaan; and this unfaithfulness has continued and become aggravated. Under the name of 'whoredom' Jeremiah includes not only the service of deities nominally different from J″, but the debased service of J″ at the high places, with images and other Canaanite usages. This judgment of Jeremiah has not only ideal or absolute truth, to the effect that the popular worship showed no consciousness of the true being of J″, it has historical truth also; for no doubt the Canaanites absorbed into Israel carried over much of their religious practice as well as their places of worship into the nation. Even the Arabs were conscious that images were a later innovation in their religion. How profound Jeremiah's conception of the true religion of J″ was, and how absolute he felt the contrast between it and the popular religion to be, appears from the figure in which he describes the one and the other: 'They have forsaken the fountain of living water, to hew out for themselves broken cisterns that can hold no water.'

The circumstances of Jeremiah's ministry at this time are not told, but some things give us a glimpse into them. The people reclaim against his judgment on their religion, saying that it is not true, and that, if there was any truth in it, the evil had been amended. That is, they claim that their service is in their intention a service of J″, 'How canst thou say, I have not gone after the baals?' (2^{23}); and that such evils as the 'high places' had been done away (2^{35} $3^{4.5}$). Their claim that they meant to serve J″ was no doubt just; it was their conception of Him that was at fault, and the modes of giving this conception expression. But both the conception and the modes of expressing it had been inherited by them, and they were unable to see that the prophet's charges were just. As to the other point, Josiah's removal of the 'high places' must have seemed good to Jeremiah, and possibly he hoped something from the Reform at first, but even in Josiah's days he had ceased to cherish any illusions in regard to it. The worship was altered, the Being worshipped remained the same; men had changed their customs, they were unchanged in their mind. The work was superficial, a casting of seed into the old field rank with thorns; they must plough deeper—'Circumcise the foreskins of your heart' ($4^{3.4}$). Jeremiah is not mentioned in connexion with Josiah's reform, nor indeed is he once named in the Book of Kings, but some scholars interpret Jer 11^{1-8} as meaning that he undertook an itinerant mission round 'the cities of Judah' to recommend acceptance of the Book of Deuteronomy. The idea is most improbable. The prophet's 'amen' (v.^{5}) expresses acquiescence in the words of J″, 'Cursed be the man that heareth not the words of this covenant,' not obedience to a command (vv.$^{2.6}$; cf. 28^{6}). Jeremiah may have sought to impress on men the general idea of Dt, that of the covenant between J″ and Israel, for this was his own idea in another form, but a formal championship of Dt would have been very unlike him. The expression 'cities of Judah and streets of Jerusalem' is not to be pressed to imply a circuit of the cities any more than of the streets. When Jeremiah spoke anywhere, he spoke in the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem, for his words went out to all the land (26^{2}), just as when he spoke in Tahpanhes he addressed the dwellers in Pathros, or Upper Egypt (44^{15} etc.). The phrase 'cities of Judah and streets of Jerusalem' means the country and the capital (7^{34} 11^{13}; cf. 4^{5}). The other feeling prominent in the prophet's mind at this time is the imminent destruction of the people by a foe from the north (4^{5}–6^{30}). This 'foe' might be a creation of his moral presentiment, and assigned to the 'north' as the cloudy region of mystery where storms gather and descend upon the world of men, but such descriptions as that in $5^{15ff.}$ seem to imply an actual people known to the time. It is usually thought that the Scythians are meant. The pathos and depth of these chs. (2–6) are not surpassed by anything in Scripture. Two things in them may be referred to—first, the prophet's profound sense of the national sin, and his presentiment of the desolations which moral evil must work in the earth. In a strange passage ($4^{23ff.}$) he fancies himself to have outlived the judgment, and to be treading on the ashes of the extinct world. He is the last man, alone amidst the silence of death: 'I beheld the earth, and, lo, it was waste and void; and the heavens, and they had no light. I beheld, and, lo, there was no man, and all the birds of the heavens were fled.' And second, his agitation at the thought of the doom hanging over his people: 'My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my heart; my heart is disquieted in me; I cannot hold my peace, because my soul hath heard the sound of the trumpet, the alarm of war' ($4^{19ff.}$). Other passages reveal his compassion for the people, as 4^{31} 6^{22-26} $10^{19ff.}$.

Thirteen years after his reform Josiah ventured to oppose Necho the king of Egypt, and fell at Megiddo. His servants carried his body in a chariot to Jerusalem, where he was buried, and the people of the land raised his son Jehoahaz to the throne. The prince, induced or compelled to repair to Necho's headquarters at Riblah, was thrown into fetters, and after a reign of three months carried to Egypt, where he died. Jeremiah makes a pathetic reference to his father Josiah and him: 'Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan him; but weep sore for him that goeth away: for he shall return no more, nor see his native land' (22^{10}). In another passage he contrasts Josiah with Jehoiakim ($22^{13ff.}$), but he makes no other reference to the pious king; the statement of 2 Ch 35^{25} that Jeremiah 'lamented for Josiah' seems founded on the tradition that he was the author of Lamentations. Jehoiakim, whom Necho raised to the throne, was the ideal of a bad ruler. Frivolous and superficial in regard to the highest things of life, despotic in temper, and brutal in the measures he used to rid himself of those who crossed his humours (Jer 26^{20-24}), he became the detestation of all serious-minded men. Jeremiah probably reflects the common sentiment regarding him when he says, 'They shall not lament him, saying, Ah my brother! Ah lord! or, Ah his glory! He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, dragged and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem' ($22^{18.19}$). It was easy to be a prophet under Josiah, but in Jehoiakim Manasseh had come to life again. The early years of this reign were the period of the prophet's conflicts. The conflict was twofold: external persecution, from the priests and prophets because of his threats against the temple, for to blaspheme the temple was to blaspheme Him that dwelt therein, and was worthy of death (chs. 7. 26); from his townsmen of Anathoth ($11^{18ff.}$); from the people (18^{18}); and from Pashhur the overseer of the temple, who struck Jeremiah and put him in the stocks (ch. 20). But these external trials reflected themselves in a tumult of contending emotions in his own breast, forming one of the strangest episodes in religious history (11^{1}–12^{6} 14–20).

Meanwhile the hand of 'God who hideth himself' was operating in the north in unexpected events, which seemed again to bring the prophet's early anticipations near. These anticipations indeed seemed to have failed. The wind from the desert which was to wither up the land, whose hot breath he had already felt upon his face (4^{11}), appeared to have been arrested. The storm-cloud of Scythian invasion, like other storms, followed the line of the sea, leaving Jerusalem unscathed, and was dissipated on the borders of Egypt. But in 607 Nineveh fell, and Babylon became heir of all the countries washed by the Mediterranean, the realm which had just been added by Necho to his dominions. A conflict between the rivals could not long be deferred. In 605–4 the two armies met near Carchemish, where Nebuchadnezzar inflicted a decisive defeat on Necho, and Judah exchanged the yoke of Egypt for that of Babylon. Carchemish was an epoch in Jeremiah's life. It was his justification in the eyes of others, for his foe from the north was seen to be no spectre; perhaps it made him feel more deeply himself than ever he had felt before how truly his prophetic presentiments were of God. God had set His seal on his past, and it was this reinvigorated assurance that his prophecies were the word of God that made him commit them to writing and lay them before the people, as is told in ch. 36. Carchemish was to Jeremiah what the appeal of Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser was to Isaiah: like a flash of lightning in the darkness, it lighted up to him the whole line of God's purposes on to the end. He foresaw his past anticipations passing into history. The conviction seized his mind that it was the will of J″ that all nations should serve the king of Babylon; to refuse his yoke, whether for Israel or another people, was to resist the decree of God. But the strangest and most unaccountable of all his presentiments or certainties was his reading beforehand the line of God's government of the world for two generations (ch. 25).

Jehoiakim observed his oath of allegiance to Nebuchadnezzar for three years, when he refused his yearly tribute, an act equivalent to a declaration of independence. By and by the Babylonian armies were put in motion, but, by the time they sat before Jerusalem, Jehoiakim had been removed by death, and his successor Jehoiachin, after a reign of 100 days, was compelled to surrender. He was carried to Babylon, where he lay in prison seven and thirty years, till he was released by the son of Nebuchadnezzar (2 K $25^{27ff.}$) His fate awoke the liveliest sorrow in his people's minds (Jer 28^{4}), and the prophet had to crush their hopes of his return in the most peremptory manner ($22^{24ff.}$ 13^{18}). Zedekiah, who succeeded him on the throne, was a prince of good intentions, but weak and irresolute. He frequently consulted Jeremiah, and would have listened to his counsels had not terror of the stronger wills around him deterred him. With the first captivity under Jehoiachin and the accession of Zedekiah the period of Jeremiah's conflicts was over. God had conquered him, and he acquiesced in His will. He no more intercedes for the people, but bends his whole energies to induce them to yield to the decree of God, and subject themselves to the king of Babylon. This was his attitude both before the siege (chs. 27–29) and during it (21^{1-10} 37. 38). This attitude exposed him to many hardships—he was arrested, beaten, and flung into a dungeon and left to die; but the hardships no more, as in the days of Jehoiakim, reflect themselves in a conflict in his own heart. Like one whose vital energies have exhausted themselves in a struggle with sickness, he lies in quietness, calmly awaiting the end. He awaits it with the more composure that he sees beyond the end (chs. 30–33). After a siege of a year and a half the city fell, and the Chaldæans appointed Gedaliah as their viceroy over the people whom they left in the land. Jeremiah had been found in the city and doomed along with the rest of the inhabitants to deportation, and in company of a band of exiles had been carried north to Ramah. The part he had played in the siege, however, became known to the Chaldæans, and orders came from the highest quarters to show him consideration, and allow him his choice to go to Babylon or remain at home. He chose to remain in the land, and repaired to Gedaliah at Mizpah. When, after a rule of no more than two months, the governor was assassinated, the men of war, with Johanan, son of Kareah, at their head, resolved to flee to Egypt to escape the dreaded vengeance of the Chaldæans. Jeremiah earnestly sought to dissuade them from their purpose, but in vain, and he and Baruch were carried down with them. It was the last and the bitterest cup he had to drink. Failure was written over his life. He had preached repentance to his people, and they would not repent. He counselled submission to Babylon, and they refused to submit. He besought them to abide in the land, and become the seed of a new nation serving the Lord, and they answered by dragging him with them to Egypt. Over the people and their history, and over his hopes, the inscription might be read, 'A full end.' Nothing is known of the manner of his death, though a tradition says that he died at the hands of his own people.

Like many of the world's greatest children, Jeremiah was little esteemed in his life, but when dead his spirit breathed out upon men, and they felt its beauty and greatness. The oppressed people saw for ages in his sufferings a type of itself, and drew from his constancy courage to endure and be true. Imagery from the scenes of his life and echoes of his words fill many of the psalms, the authors of which were like him in his sorrows, and strove to be like him in his faith. From being of no account as a prophet he came to be considered the greatest of them all, and was spoken of as 'the prophet' (cf. Mt 16^{14}, Jn 1^{21} 6^{14} 7^{40}); and it was told of him how in after-days he appeared in visions to those contending for the faith like an angel from heaven strengthening them (2 Mac $15^{13ff.}$).

ii. The Book of Jeremiah.—In ch. 36 it is stated that in the 4th year of Jehoiakim (605–4), no doubt after the battle of Carchemish in which Egypt was defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, Jeremiah was commanded to write all the words which J″ had spoken to him against Israel and Judah and all the nations from the 13th year of Josiah till that time. He dictated his prophecies to Baruch, who read the roll next year in the temple in the hearing of the people assembled from all parts of the country at a fast. This roll was brought to Jehoiakim, who cut it in pieces and threw it into the grate. Jeremiah dictated the contents of the roll anew to Baruch, and added many like words (or, 'as many words more'). The added words might consist in some measure of new oracles, but in the main would be a fuller recapitulation of former prophecies. Now (1) it is natural to suppose that this second roll forms the earlier part of our present book, though how far into the book it extends is difficult to say. It was, however, only one of the elements out of which the present book was compiled, and it is not certain how far the compiler or redactor of the book maintained the original order of the roll. Some passages may have been transferred in order to unite them with later passages of a similar nature, e.g. $22^{10-12.\ 13ff.}$ with $22^{24ff.}$. Some parts of ch. 25 certainly belonged to the first roll ($25^{9.\ 10}$ with 36^{29}) and also to the second; the passage, however, was removed from its original place (possibly to form an introduction to a series of prophecies against the nations), and is now redactional and greatly glossed. (2) Baruch's statement, that he wrote from the prophet's mouth, need not absolutely exclude the use of some written notes by Jeremiah, though the command to 'write' his prophecies seems to imply that nothing had hitherto been published. Being dictated mainly from memory, prophecies extending over three and twenty years cannot have been reproduced exactly as they were spoken. It was the purpose of the prophet to preserve and lay before the people a compend of his ideas and teaching, his judgment upon the past history of the people and on their present condition, and his convictions regarding the inevitable issues in the future, without much regard to the circumstances in which the ideas had been originally expressed. Hence these early chapters are fragmentary and without connexion; passages in the same chapter may belong to different situations. The headings and dates are editorial, or at least secondary, and were not contained in Baruch's roll. This is evident from the indefiniteness of some of them, e.g. 3^{6} 'in the days of Josiah,' and from the similarity of those in the earlier to those in the later part of the book (cf. the identical forms, 7^{1} 34^{1} 35^{1} 40^{1} 44^{1} and 14^{1} with 46^{1} 47^{1} 49^{34}). Being dictated more than 20 years after they were spoken, the earliest passages may to some extent be coloured by later reflection. On the other hand, as it was the prophet's purpose to give a compend of the principles of his teaching, the fact that some sententious passages stand isolated, e.g. $9^{23.\ 24}$ $16^{19ff.}$ $17^{5ff.}$ $17^{12ff.}$, is no evidence that they are not original. (3) The parts of the book belonging to a date subsequent to the 5th year of Jehoiakim are very confused, and the order in which they stand is in many cases inexplicable. There are passages, e.g. chs. 24. 27, which seem to come from the prophet's own hand, but most of his sayings after this time are enclosed in historical settings. These historical elements are not from the prophet's own hand, though from whose hand they come is uncertain. Naturally, there is no absolute guarantee that the prophet's words enclosed in the historical frames are exact reproductions of the language used by him. Of course Jeremiah may have preserved jottings, or some contemporary, such as Baruch, may have done so, and these may have been at the compiler's disposal; or, in some cases the prophet's words may already have been set in the historical frame when they came into the compiler's hand; and in other instances, as it was obviously his intention to give as complete a biography of Jeremiah as possible, he may have relied on those who were contemporaries of the prophet and preserved in their memories both the scenes and the words spoken by him. There would be a number of such persons alive in the second half of the exile. At all events the histories are well informed and trustworthy, though some obscurities may suggest that they were not written till some time after the events which they describe (26^{8} with 26^{16}), and that they are not all from the same hand ($39^{14ff.}$ with $40^{1ff.}$). In some cases where the narrative begins by speaking of 'Jeremiah the prophet,' and then introduces him speaking directly, there may be room for supposing that the narrator dramatizes the information at his command. The passage 42^{7-22}, both on account of its rather debased style and its other peculiarities, is probably a free construction from the hand of the historian; and in some other passages the accumulation of phrases characteristic of the prophet is in excess of what would be natural from himself, and suggests the work of a compiler very familiar with his peculiarities. Though it is impossible to say when or by whom the histories were composed, or do more than hazard very precarious conjectures in explanation of the place occupied by some of them in the book (e.g. 26. 36. 35), it is generally clear to what situations in the prophet's life they refer and what oracles they illustrate, and thus when they are disposed in their proper places the book may be read with a certain consecutiveness.

1. The reign of Josiah.—To Josiah's reign belong chs. 1–6, mainly to the time before his Reform. The date 1^{2} belongs to ch. 1; 1^{3} is a later insertion, meant probably to apply to the whole book (2 K 25^{8}). Chs. 2–6 are a compend of many oracles, but may be considered as two discourses, 2^{1}–4^{4} and 4^{5}–6^{30}, the first giving the prophet's verdict on the people's history from the beginning, and the second announcing the inevitable issue of such a history. $3^{6ff.}$, where Judah is contrasted with Israel, is rightly assigned to the reign of Josiah, for the idea that such a contrast could be of the date of chs. 30. 31 (Ew., Kuen.) is altogether improbable. 3^{14-18} appear to be later than 3^{6-13}; certainly vv.$^{17.\ 18}$ are so, for v.^{18} implies the exile of Judah. But the reference to Zion while Judah was still there (v.^{14}) is unnatural, and mention of the 'ark' when Israel is spoken to is without meaning, and suggests that ark and temple were no more. The question whether $3^{19ff.}$ be the secution of 3^{1-5} or of 3^{6-13} is difficult. Formally, either connexion is suitable. 3^{1-5} seems the continuation of ch. 2 and refers to 'Israel' as a whole, though Judah may be alluded to in v.$^{4f.}$; but Judah does not seem spoken of under the name 'Israel,' except when the general idea of the whole family is in the prophet's mind. If $3^{19ff.}$ follow 3^{1-5}, the passage continues as in ch. 2 to refer to the whole family of Israel. Some things are in favour of this, e.g. the gracious design of God, v.^{19}, most naturally refers to the whole family; the designation 'the lovely land' more probably describes Canaan as a whole than either half of it; and $4^{1.\ 2}$, if original, recall the promises made to Israel in its unity. On the other hand, 'children of Israel' (v.^{21}) rather suggests Israel of the north, and $4^{3.\ 4}$, which have no connexion with $4^{5ff.}$, might be the natural conclusion to 3^{1-5}. At all events $3^{19ff.}$ are not spoken of Judah alone, but refer either to Israel as a whole or to Israel of the north, continuing 3^{6-13}. The words 'her sister,' vv.$^{7.\ 8.\ 10}$, are wanting in LXX, cf. Ezk 23^{11}. 17^{19-27} on the Sabbath, which might be after the Reform, are usually considered a later insertion.

2. The reign of Jehoiakim.—(1.) In ch. 7 Jeremiah threatens the temple with the fate of Shiloh. The historical commentary ch. 26, itself of later date, refers the discourse to the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign. Indeed it might naturally be placed immediately after the death of Josiah. The people's trust in the temple, which occasioned Jeremiah's threat, implies a feeling of danger, but the danger was over when Jehoiakim was raised by Necho to the throne. Neither is there any allusion to the king in ch. 26, it is the priests who arraign Jeremiah. The story of Uriah ($26^{20ff.}$) is an addition to illustrate the danger of Jeremiah; the incident itself may have been later, though early in the reign of Jehoiakim, for only when Egypt and Israel were friendly would extradition of the prophet have been granted. (2.) The brief oracle on Jehoahaz (Shallum) and Josiah, 22^{10-12}, is of the same period. (3.) 7^{29}–8^{3} is an oracle against Tophet. Ch. 19 probably supplies the historical situation. The incidents, though before the 4th year of Jehoiakim, are later than 7^{1-28}. (4.) Chs. 7–10 as a whole (apart from 10^{1-16}) appear to belong to the same period, though there is much that is obscure in them.

The presentiment of a foe from the north (8^{16} 10^{17-22}), the vision of an invasion and siege ($8^{14\text{ff.}}$), the agitation of the prophet at the prospect of the approaching calamity ($8^{18\text{ff.}}$), and his call to the mourning women to prepare a lamentation ($9^{17\text{ff.}}$), are strange in the early years of Jehoiakim, and recall the situation in chs. 5. 6. Hence some scholars have assigned chs. 7–10 to Josiah's reign; but parts, e.g. $7^{1\text{ff.}}$, are certainly later. The whole at any rate appears earlier than the 4th year of Jehoiakim, for after this Jeremiah always names 'the king of Babylon.' (5.) 11^{1}–12^{6} also appear to be of this period. 11^{1-8} are very obscure. Vv.$^{9-17}$, charging Judah with 'conspiracy,' that is, defection from the Covenant, belong to the time of Jehoiakim, and the commands in vv.$^{6-8}$ are referred by Giesebrecht to the same period, though they have usually been thought to refer to Dt and Josiah's Reform. The plot of the people of Anathoth against Jeremiah's life (11^{18}–12^{6}) would hardly be occasioned by his action in connexion with Josiah's Reform, but be owing to his charge of 'conspiracy' at a later time. His complaints 12^{1-8} also suggest this period of his history. (6.) Chs. 18–20. Ch. 18 appears now connected with the historical passage 19^{1}–20^{8}. Ch. 18 teaches that God's dealing with men is moral, that He treats them as their moral conduct permits Him to do; it is only a secondary inference from this that prophecy is conditional, threats and promises being alike revocable according to men's actions. If ch. 19 gave the situation of 7^{29}–8^{3}, ch. 18 might belong to about the same time. On account of the speech in Tophet, repeated in the temple ($19^{14\text{ff.}}$), Pashhur put Jeremiah for a night in the stocks. If Jeremiah's inability to go to the temple (36^{5}) were due to Pashhur's action, the incidents and oracles 18^{1}–20^{18} would belong to the eve of the 4th year of Jehoiakim, though the narrative was not written till later. In $20^{4\text{ff.}}$, however, Pashhur is threatened with deportation to Babylon, and it would be necessary to assume (Kuen.) that the later narrator had reported Jeremiah's words somewhat generally. (7.) There is little in chs. 14–15, referring to a drought, or in 16^{1}–17^{18} to suggest a date, whether before or after the 4th year of Jehoiakim. Such passages as 15^{10} might suggest that the prophet was free to go about among the people, before he had to go into hiding for fear of arrest (36^{26}), and $16^{1\text{ff.}}$ might seem to reflect an early rather than a late date in his life. The idea that 17^{11} refers to Jehoiakim, and 17^{5-10} to his premeditated revolt (Kuen.), seems far-fetched. (15^{11-14} appear to refer to the people, and are misplaced; $16^{14.\,15}$ though in LXX is an obvious insertion). (8.) According to ch. 36, Baruch wrote a second roll in the 5th year of Jehoiakim containing additions. This roll would thus include chs. 1–6, 7–10 (except 10^{1-16}), 11^{1}–12^{8}, probably 14–15, 16^{1}–17^{18} ($22^{10\text{ff.}}$? $22^{13\text{ff.}}$?), the genuine portions of 25, and probably 45, the short promise to Baruch. Whether 18 and $20^{7\text{ff.}}$ also stood in the roll may be uncertain, as the passages are now enclosed in a historical setting of a later date. (9.) To a later time in the reign of Jehoiakim belong 12^{7-17}, which appear to reflect the situation after his revolt (2 K $24^{1\text{ff.}}$). Ch. 35 also narrates an incident in connexion with the Rechabites probably of the same time. (10.) Ch. 13, describing a symbolical action with Jeremiah's girdle, is usually assigned to the short reign of Jehoiachin, on account of the allusion to him and his mother in v.$^{18\text{f.}}$. There is nothing in the other parts of the chapter to suggest this situation; but if Perath (v.^{4}) be the Euphrates, the date would in any case be later than the 4th year of Jehoiakim and Carchemish.

3. Reign of Zedekiah (597–586).—(1.) To the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah belongs ch. 24, the vision of the two baskets of figs, the good representing the exiles of 597, the bad the people left at home. (2.) Chs. 21–23 contain a collection of fragments belonging to very different dates on the leading classes in Judah, the kings 21^{11}–23^{8}, and the prophets 23^{9-40}. Whether some of these fragments stood in the original roll may be uncertain; the present collection cannot have been made before the time of Zedekiah ($22^{24\text{ff.}}$), probably not before the Exile ($23^{3\text{ff.}}$). (3.) To the 4th year of Zedekiah (28^{1}) belong chs. 27–29 (27^{1} is a mistaken gloss, wanting in LXX), containing the prophet's opposition to the projected confederacy against Babylon (27), his conflict with Hananiah over the duration of the Exile (28), and his letter to the exiles (29). These three chapters have certain peculiarities in common: (1) The LXX text is shorter, particularly in 27; (2) certain differences of spelling appear, e.g. Yirmeyah for Yirmeyahu, and so in similar names, and Nebuchad*n*ezzar (for -*r*ezzar). The peculiarities (2) are lost in Gr.; in LXX the name Nebuch. occurs only once (27^{6}). In explanation of these peculiarities it has been suggested that chs. 27–29 may have circulated separately and been glossed; but as LXX shows that the glosses were introduced after the redaction of the book, it must also be supposed that at a late date the genuine text was collated with one of these glossed rolls of 27–29, and supplemented from it,—an intricate hypothesis. The rest of the book (except 46–51) belongs to the time of the siege and later. (4.) 21^{1-10} the prophet's reply to the message of Zedekiah at the beginning of the siege. The passage has been united to $21^{11\text{ff.}}$, the common subject being the kings of Judah. (5.) Ch. 37, containing Jeremiah's reply to another message from Zedekiah, is later, belonging to the time when the siege was raised by the appearance of the Egyptians. Ch. 34, relating to the manumission of bondservants and their reduction to slavery again, is of the same date. When the siege was raised Jeremiah attempted to go to Anathoth, but was arrested and flung into a dungeon ($37^{15\text{ff.}}$). Zedekiah released him, and placed him in the court of the guard, where he remained till the city fell (38^{28}). In this place it appears he could speak to the people ($38^{1\text{ff.}}$), and persons from the outside had access to him (ch. 32). On account of his disheartening speeches to the people and soldiery, the officers had him let down into a cistern, from which he was liberated by Ebed-melech (ch. 38), who receives the promise $39^{15\text{ff.}}$. To the time after his rescue by Ebed-melech belongs his interview with Zedekiah $38^{14\text{ff.}}$*; but whether the incident of the purchase of the field at Anathoth (ch. 32) took place before or after his rescue is uncertain. To the time of his detention in the court of the guard belongs ch. 33, somewhat later than 32 ('the second time' 33^{1}), and probably chs. 30. 31, referring to the Restoration of Judah and Israel. 33^{14-26} are not yet in LXX, and undoubtedly the chapters are otherwise greatly glossed, though much in ch. 31 is original. Possibly the chs. 30–33 formed a separate collection (30^{2}), and the subject was one that invited expansion. Usually Jeremiah employs the terms 'Israel,' 'Ephraim' (twice house of Jacob 2^{4} 5^{20}); it is only in these chapters that the simple name 'Jacob' occurs ($30^{7.\,10.\,18}$ $31^{7.\,11}$ 33^{26}), for 10^{16} (51^{19}) is not original, and 10^{25} is doubtful. The phrase 'my servant Jacob' $30^{10.\,11}$ ($=46^{27.\,28}$) and much else reflects the language and ideas of Is 40 ff. (6.) 38^{28b} (RV) $39^{3.\,14}$–44 narrate the events subsequent to the fall of the city, and the history of Jeremiah in Egypt ($39^{1.\,2}$ seem out of place, and vv.$^{4-13}$ are wanting in LXX).

(7.) Chs. 46–51, prophecies against the nations. There are three questions connected with these prophecies: (1) their genuineness in whole (Driver, and in the main Kuen.), or in part (Gies., Corn.), or not at all (Stade, Wellh., Smend, Schwally); (2) the time in the prophet's life to which they belong if genuine or partially so; and (3) their original position in the book. (1) Chs. 50. 51 (apart from $51^{59\text{ff.}}$) are almost universally recognized to be of a later date than Jeremiah, and by another writer. With regard to 46–49 it may be urged in favour of their genuineness, in whole or in part, (a) that Jeremiah was conscious of being a prophet to the nations ($1^{5.\,10}$ $18^{9\text{ff.}}$ $27^{2\text{ff.}}$); and (b) that he is commanded to write his prophecies 'against all the nations' (36^{2}). It is doubtful, however, if such language as 36^{2} implies the existence of prophecies formally devoted to particular nations: it might be satisfied by such passages as 1–6 $9^{24\text{f.}}$ 12^{14-17}, and particularly by $25^{9\text{ff.}}$, and the enumeration (so far as original) of nations in 25^{15-26}. Jeremiah's own statement regarding former prophets, that they prophesied against many countries and against great kingdoms (28^{8}), forbids us to press the words of 36^{2}. If a genuine nucleus existed in 46–49 this would explain the later amplification, and how though amplified the prophecies continued to be ascribed to Jeremiah. On the other hand, the figure of giving the nations to drink of the fury of J″, and the enumeration of peoples in $25^{15\text{ff.}}$, might have suggested to some writer or writers the composition of the prophecies to give body to the idea of Jeremiah (cf. the relation of $51^{59\text{ff.}}$ to chs. 50. 51). Such lengthy oracles against peoples which, with the exception of Egypt, had no significance to Jeremiah or to the time, are little probable from him. Ch. 46^{1-12} is later than Carchemish, but such an exercise on a past event is scarcely to be expected from Jeremiah. 46^{13-28} might be a prophecy by Jeremiah in Egypt, though, of course, also it might be an expansion by another writer of some of his incidental threats against that country ($43^{10\text{ff.}}$); v.^{26b} reminds of Ezk, and vv.$^{27.\,28}$ are a repetition of $30^{10.\,11}$. It is wholly improbable that Jeremiah should have excerpted Is 15. 16, as has been done in the prophecy on Moab (48^{29-38}), and equally incredible that he should have copied Obadiah, or, as the case may be, a prophecy which is the basis of Obadiah, as has been done in the prophecy on Edom ($49^{7\text{ff.}}$). If Is 15. 16 were brought down in their present form to the post-exilic time (Duhm), the problem in regard to them would perhaps be the same as that in regard to Obadiah; but such a date has not been established. And it may be said in general that the current impression that Jeremiah is accustomed to cite or use his predecessors has little evidence in its favour. A nucleus of genuine elements in 46–49 is probably the most that can be assumed; whether the expansions be due to one hand or several may be difficult to say. Some peculiarities are common to the chs., e.g. הִפְנָה intrans. or with obj. unexpressed, $46^{5.\,21}$ (parallel to נוס), 47^{3}, 48^{39} (obj. expressed), 49^{24} (parallel to נוס), cf. 49^{8}, but see particularly Nah 2^{9}; the phrase חֶרֶב הַיּוֹנָה 46^{16} 50^{16}, cf. 25^{38} (so read). The purpose of the words, 'Here endeth the judgment of Moab' 48^{47} is obscure, cf. 51^{64} (both passages are wanting in LXX). It is curious that all the promises to the nations of restitution (46^{26} 48^{47} $49^{6.\,39}$) are wanting in LXX. (2) The date of the foreign prophecies, if genuine, would be after Carchemish; whether any parts of them stood in Baruch's roll cannot be ascertained. The prophecy on Elam is assigned to the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah (49^{34}). (3) On the original place of chs. 46–49 in the book see next section (iii.). (8.) Finally, ch. 52 is a historical extract, identical with 2 K 24^{18}–25^{30}, with the omission of 2 K 25^{22-26}. Ch. 52^{28-30} are not yet in LXX.†

iii. HEBREW AND GREEK TEXTS.—The differences between the Heb. and Gr. texts are greater in the Book of Jer than they are in any other book, even Job. (1) The Gr. text is much shorter than the Heb.—according to the calculation of Graf by about 2700 words, or one-eighth of the book. (2) In Heb. the prophecies against the nations stand at the end of the book (chs. 46–51), in the Gr. they are inserted between 25^{13} and 25^{15} (v.^{14} being wanting), and they are given in a different order from the Hebrew. Much in (1) was due to the Heb. MS on which the translator worked, which differed materially from our present Massoretic text. The difference (2) must be spoken of with less certainty: the place given to the prophecies against the nations may have been suggested by the translator's interpretation of 25^{13}, and the order in which they stand may reflect something of the political situation of the time. But (3) a multitude of differences have arisen through the defective work of the translator himself, who was anything but equal to his task. The differences between the two texts were formerly explained by the hypothesis of two recensions—a shorter one, probably from the hand of Jeremiah himself, which circulated in Egypt; and a longer one, the work of Baruch or others, which became the basis of the MT. But the general identity of the two texts, and the fact that some of the latest elements of the book are found in LXX, show that such a hypothesis is both unnecessary and false. Both texts reflect the same archetype; but this archetype underwent a gradual process of expansion, and the process is reflected at an earlier stage (not necessarily an earlier date) in the MS or MSS at the basis of LXX, and at a more advanced stage in those at the basis of the MT.

(1) Comparative value of the texts.—In estimating the relative value of the Heb. and Gr. texts, one must compare them, first, in those parts of the book present in both texts; secondly, in regard to those parts present in Heb. but wanting in Gr.; comparison in regard to a third class of passages, those present in Gr. but wanting in Heb., though it might be interesting, is of less importance. That is, the comparative estimate must be in regard both to quality and quantity. Speaking generally, the MT is qualitatively greatly superior to the Gr.; but, on the other hand, quantitatively the Gr. is nearer the original text. This judgment is general, admitting many exceptions,—that is, cases where the quality of the Gr. text is better, and its readings more original than the Heb., e.g. 2^{20} 4^{28} 11^{15} 16^{7} 23^{33} 41^{9} 46^{22}, and many more; and also cases where, in regard to quantity, Heb. is to be preferred, the omissions in LXX being due to faults in the translator's MS, to his own oversight, or to his tendency to scamp and abridge. Every individual case of difference must be examined before a judgment can be pronounced. In regard to such large passages as 33^{14-26} 39^{4-13}, and even many minor ones, e.g. in chs. 25. 27–29, judgment will readily be given in favour of LXX, in which they are wanting; but there is a multitude of other cases in which a decision is difficult. Of the four synonyms for 'destroy' 1^{10}, LXX has only three; and again in 18^{7}, where three of the synonyms occur, LXX has only two. The exclamation, 'temple of the Lord' 7^{4}, stands in Heb. thrice, in LXX twice; so 'O earth' 22^{29}, only twice in LXX. The words 'of hosts' in the divine name are said to be wanting 56 times (2^{19} 6^{8} etc.), the parenthetical 'saith the Lord' 64 times, and in 'Jeremiah the prophet' the title prophet is usually absent. Now, when it is considered that LXX shows an undoubted tendency to abridgment, while the ideal of later Heb. style was fulness and roundness of phraseology, the two considerations puzzle the judgment and hold it in suspense. The title the prophet is probably in many cases a Heb. addition, the want of the synonym a Gr. abbreviation. It would not be just to charge the LXX translator with arbitrary omission on a large scale. There are over 30 passages which are repeated in the book (some twice), and LXX contains all the repetitions with the exception of 7, and these 7, it is safe to say, were not in the translator's MS. (For list of repeated passages see Driver, p. 276 f.; Kuen. § 58^{11}; and for those wanting in LXX, Kuen. § 58^{12}).

(2) Original place of chs. 46 ff.—It is quite evident that prophecies of the compass of chs. 46–49 as they now exist could not have been contained in Baruch's roll. If only a genuine nucleus of them existed they might have followed ch. 25 in its original form and position, though the amplification of them would be more intelligible if they had existed in a separate form. If the prophecies were extant in their present compass when the book was redacted, we might suppose that, according to the analogy of Is and Ezk, they would be placed in the middle of the book after ch. 25. And this would have been their natural place, following the symbol in $25^{15ff.}$ and the enumeration of nations in 25^{18-26}, the nations named being in the main those to which the prophecies refer. The supposition that this was the original place of 46–49 is at least plausible, if nothing more. When the extensive passage chs. 50. 51 was introduced into the book at a later time, chs. 46 ff. were connected with it and transferred to the end of the book. The place of chs. 46–51 in LXX between 25^{13} and 25^{15} is quite unnatural, for the chapters should certainly have followed and not preceded the enumeration of nations in 25^{15-26} to which they refer. It is probable that 46–51 occupied a place at the end of the book, as in Heb., even in the MS used by the LXX translator. Simultaneously with the reception of chs. 50. 51 or in consequence of it, various glosses were introduced, e.g. 25^{11b-14}, or at least v.$^{12ff.}$ (50^{1b}; cf. 51^{60b}). In 25^{13} 'even all that is written in this book, which Jeremiah prophesied against all the nations,' LXX translator took the last clause to be independent, rendering, That which Jeremiah prophesied against the nations. The words thus became a title, and chs. 46 ff. were transferred from their former place and made to follow it. Neither is the order of the prophecies in LXX original; the order in Heb. corresponds in the main to that of the nations enumerated in 25^{15-26}, and has all the marks of originality.

The translator from Heb. had many difficulties to contend with: the text had no vowels; the letters do not appear to have been divided (in all cases at least) into words; the vowel letters were sparsely written, and thus the plur. and sing. forms of the verb were identical; MSS were badly written, similar letters like d and r being often confused; there were contractions liable to be misunderstood; Heb. was a dead language, the living Shemitic tongue being Aramaic; and much else. The translator of Jer shows the usual faults of the Gr. version in an aggravated form. (a) He divides words wrongly (5^{6} 8^{18} 9^{5} 20^{9} 22^{20} 31^{8} 46^{15}). (b) He vocalizes wrongly ($2^{23.\,34}$ 3^{1} 10^{20} 31^{13}). (c) When letters like d and r are confused in his MS, he has not sufficient knowledge to perceive the error (2^{16} 3^{15} 15^{12} 31^{5} 49^{22}). (d) He renders proper names as appellatives and vice versâ, 8^{7} 21^{13} 31^{21} $46^{16.\,25}$ $49^{13.\,28.\,30}$ 51^{27} (46^{16} 50^{16} חֶרֶב הַיּוֹנָה, μάχαιρα ἑλληνική). (e) His knowledge of the language is very deficient: an archaic suffix puzzles him (כֻּלֹּה is read כָּלָה 8^{6} 15^{10} 20^{7}); much in the Heb. vocabulary is unfamiliar to him (מָגוֹר מִסָּבִיב is rendered differently each time that it occurs, and generally referred to the root gûr, 'to sojourn'); and in syntax he supposes an adj. may stand before its noun (22^{30} 46^{15} ?). (f) He makes arbitrary changes in person and number to a greater extent than usual in LXX (2^{30} $3^{18.\,20}$ 4^{17} 6^{7} 7^{25} 8^{18} etc.). (g) He is loose and hasty and without a sense of responsibility, often thinking it enough to give an average or approximate rendering of the original ($7^{1ff.}$). If he has wrongly put a sense on a word which will not harmonize with the rest of the verse he modifies the other words, or, if they be wholly intractable, omits them (2^{16} $4^{11.\,12}$ 5^{26} 8^{18}). In 29^{25-29} the sense is entirely missed. (h) It is scarcely due to purpose, but rather to his easy-going style of operation, that when a passage is repeated verbatim, his rendering of it in the second instance differs much from that in the first. (i) He shares the curious fancy of LXX translators for rendering by a word similar in sound to the Heb. (9^5 תֹּךְ בְּתוֹךְ (sic) τόκος ἐπὶ τόκῳ, 31^{21} תמרורים τιμωρίαν (48^{31}? 51^{27}?). Whether in 46^{15} חף (נִסְחַף) was rendered Ἆπις is rather uncertain).

iv. Redaction of the Book.—In the absence of all direct information, anything better than a more or less plausible hypothesis concerning the redaction of the book is not attainable. Perhaps three stages in its history can be traced. (1) The second roll of Baruch, belonging to the 5th year of Jehoiakim. There is every reason to suppose that this roll has in the main been preserved in the early part of the book. The contents of the roll were chs. 1–6. 7–10 (except 10^{1-16}), 11^1–12^6, probably 14. 15. 16^1–17^{18}, 25 in its original form, possibly 45; whether 18. $20^{7ff.}$ belonged to the roll may be uncertain; and the same must be said of $22^{10ff.}$ and of any parts of 46–49 that may be supposed genuine. The roll, however, was in some cases broken up, and some parts certainly belonging to it (ch. 25) are now found after elements of a much later date, while elements of a later date appear inserted before or among parts belonging to it ($12^{7ff.}$). The roll was only one of the elements used in the redaction of the book, and it was not regarded as inviolable. We should hardly be right if we regarded our present book as a growth, the roll being the fundamental writing to which other prophecies were added as they successively came into existence, or if we supposed a series of successive redactions (Kautzsch, Abriss, p. 75; cf. Driver, p. 270). The present order of the contents of the book forbids such suppositions, e.g. 21^{11}–23^8 as a collection is later than the fall of the city, while ch. 24 is of the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah; chs. 30–33 as a collection also belongs to the Exile, while ch. 35 is of the reign of Jehoiakim. Such a shuffling of the contents, supposing them to have had originally a historical order, is quite improbable.

(2) The second stage was the actual redaction of the book. At some time, possibly not a great many years after the prophet's death, some person or persons undertook the work of gathering together all the fragments of his oracles and furnishing as complete a biography of him as possible. The biographical interest was perhaps the predominant one. All the available materials, the original roll and other existing sources, were used, and probably the compiler himself, either from his own knowledge or by inquiry, was able also to make considerable contributions. But how much belongs to sources ready to the compiler's hand, and how much is due to himself, it is impossible to discover. As has been already said, Jeremiah may have preserved jottings of his speeches, or some contemporary such as Baruch may have done so, and these may have lain before the editor; or, in a number of cases the prophet's words may already have been set in a historical frame when they came into the compiler's hand. There appears to be something like collections in the book, e.g. chs. 18–20. 21–23. 27–29. 30–33, and the like, and some of these may have arisen at the hands of different persons during the Exile. There is nothing more likely than that a number of the historical passages, with the prophet's words enclosed in them, may be from the hand of Baruch, who continued with the prophet after the fall of the city and accompanied him to Egypt. But some of the narratives are probably due to other persons and some to the compiler. The various headings are from the hand of the compiler, but the inference from the identity of the heading in chs. 34. 35. 40. 44, that these historical passages are also the work of the compiler (Kuen.), is scarcely cogent, for the same heading has been given to chs. 7 ff., which the compiler certainly did not write. From the promiscuous way in which such historical narratives as chs. 26. 36. 35 have been placed in the book, it may perhaps be inferred that these passages came as distinct and complete compositions into the redactor's hand. However much in the book may be due to Baruch, everything shows that he was not the editor. The date of the redaction cannot be strictly fixed. The reverence manifested for the prophet is no criterion of date, for this reverence, beginning after his death, continued to increase. Kuenen has suggested the second half of the Exile. The passage 2 K 25^{23-26} appears to be dependent on the fuller narrative, Jer $40^{7ff.}$, and this fact would imply that the Book of Jer was in existence before the Book of Kings was closed, about the end of the Exile (on the other hand, $39^{1b.\,2.\,4-13}$ taken from 2 K 25 is a later interpolation). There is perhaps nothing in the Book of Jer which necessitates a later date, such passages as 10^{1-16} and chs. 50. 51 having been introduced into the book after its redaction. There is no doubt much in chs. 46–49 that might be of the post-exilic period. The complexion of chs. 30–33 might also imply a lower date than the Exile, but the want of 33^{14-26} in LXX shows that the amplification of these chs. went on after the book had been compiled. The redaction took place in Babylon or Palestine, not in Egypt.

(3) This Book of Jer thus edited is the archetype both of the Heb. and Greek. But this book underwent modifications, some passages being added and some amplifications of the text being introduced. This process of enlargement forms the third stage in the history of the book. (a) Some additions and insertions penetrated into all the MSS, e.g. chs. 50. 51. 52, 10^{1-16} (except vv.$^{6-8.\,10}$), $16^{14.\,15}$ 17^{19-27}, and much more. (b) From others the MSS at the basis of LXX remained free, e.g. 33^{14-26} 39^{4-13}, and much else, particularly in chs. 25. 27–29. This latter fact does not imply with certainty that all the additions in MT are later than LXX translation, because contemporary MSS may have had different histories even in the same country (treatment of MSS being so free), and particularly if circulating in different countries. The differences between the Heb. and Gr. might certainly be easier explained if we could suppose the MS or MSS on which LXX is founded carried early to Egypt. Egyptian Jews would probably occupy themselves less with the original text than those in Babylon or Palestine, and thus the MSS, even if transcribed, would more retain their primitive form. Amplifications of the text and interpolations really reflect the moods of religious life and hope, and this life was fuller in Palestine than in Egypt.

v. Literary Style.—The literary style of Jeremiah can scarcely be spoken of, because, strictly speaking, we have no literature from him. The narrative pieces in the book are not from his own hand; and even when fragments of his speeches are reported in these narratives, they have in many cases passed through the narrator's mind, and may have been somewhat modified. The presence of some or many characteristic phrases of Jeremiah in the reports is not proof of their literal fidelity. And in any case such reports are mere compends, in regard to which the question of style can hardly be raised. The only parts of the book on which a judgment in respect of style can be formed are the chapters dictated to Baruch, chs. 1–17, and any other passages which appear to come directly from Jeremiah's own hand. Even the dictated passages are mere outlines and skeletons; the prophet's object was to preserve and present to others the matter, the religious contents of his oracles,—he was little solicitous about the form. No doubt something of Jeremiah's literary manner will be reflected in these fragments, but they represent very inadequately what he was capable of as a writer. We have no literature from Jeremiah in the sense in which we have literature from Isaiah. The flowers of Jeremiah's diction and thought have reached us only after being cut and pressed; the bloom and fragrance yet remaining with them suggest faintly what they were when fresh. The monotonousness and repetition, both of ideas and language, of which writers complain, are owing in good degree to the fact that, in dictating his outline, it was the prophet's purpose to impress strongly certain great ideas, and the same ideas naturally carry with them the same language, though it will always remain a question how many of the repetitions are due to himself. The literary remains of Jeremiah differ from the writings of Isaiah in being formally less perfect: the poetical rhythm is not so regular, losing itself often in elevated prose. Yet even formally there is much true poetical parallelism, and there are many examples of the Ḳinah or Elegy, artistically beautiful and full of pathos, e.g. $9^{20.\,21}$ $13^{18f.\,20f.}$ $18^{14ff.}$ $22^{6ff.}$. The language of Jeremiah wants the condensed energy of that of the earlier prophets. He belonged to a later literary age, and the progress of language is always towards analysis, gaining in lucidity, but losing in compression. Much of the power of the earlier prophets arises from the fact that their age was a creative one, and they project their religious conceptions with an energy and completeness that can never again be imitated. Jeremiah is their heir, their principles already run in his blood, and what in them was intellectual power is transmuted in him into spiritual life. So far as style can be spoken of in Jeremiah, his style perfectly reflects all the articulations of thought and all the hues of emotion of his mind. He was a nature characterized by simplicity, reality, pathos, tenderness, and a strange piety, but subject to his emotions, which were liable to rise into passions. His mind was set on a minor key, and his temper elegiac. And to all this his language is true. Could sadness be expressed in sadder words than these, 'The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved'? His phrases haunt the ear: 'Before your feet stumble on the dark mountains.' 'Is there no balm in Gilead?' 'A voice was heard in Ramah.' 'If thou hast run with the footmen and they have wearied thee.' 'Surely I have heard Ephraim bemoaning himself.' 'Return, ye backsliding children.' The quaint simplicity of his words to God provokes a smile: 'O Lord, wherefore are all they happy that deal very treacherously?' Usually his address is lofty and touching: 'O the hope of Israel, the saviour thereof in time of trouble, why shouldst thou be as a stranger in the land?' ($14^{8f.}$ 16^{19} $17^{12ff.}$). In sombre realism he has no match among the prophets; witness such terrible passages as $15^{1ff.}$ $4^{23ff.}$ (cf. the symbol $25^{15ff.}$, and such descriptions as $5^{15ff.}$ 9^{17-22}). He was sent to be the prophet of doom and death, and his soul revolted against the task. He gloats over life, its human activities ($32^{43ff.}$), its sounds and mirth and all its music (7^{34} 16^{9}); and he recoils from death, and shudders as he sees the shadow enter in at the windows, and feels the awful silence, when there is no sound of a mill and no shimmer of a candle. There is one peculiarity which gives a charm to his style, a certain unconscious dramatizing, when, after describing a situation, he makes those involved in it speak directly, without the word 'saying,' e.g. 2^{25} 3^{22} $4^{19.\,31}$ $6^{4.\,5.\,24}$ 9^{11-18} 10^{19} 11^{19} $12^{4.\,5}$ 14^{17} 15^{15} 17^{12}.

Jeremiah's language has some marks of the later style: words in -ûth are not infrequent, and be begins to Aramaize; cases occur of vav cop. with perf., and the hê of direction is otiose (1^{13}). Certain phrases and expressions are often repeated: e.g. to break the yoke and burst the bands (2^{20} 5^{5}); to turn the back and not the face (2^{27} 18^{17}); to receive correction (2^{30} 5^{3} 7^{28}); to come into mind (עלה על לֵב 3^{16} 7^{31} 19^{5}); the evil of your doings (4^{4} 21^{12} $23^{2.\,22}$); great destruction (שֶׁבֶר 4^{6} 6^{1} 14^{17}); the refrain, shall I not visit for these things? etc. ($5^{9.\,29}$ 9^{9}); heal the hurt slightly (6^{14} 8^{11}); the phrase, rising up early, and sending, speaking, etc. (הַשְׁכֵּם $7^{13.\,25}$ 26^{5} 29^{19}); to incline the ear ($7^{24.\,26}$ 11^{8} 17^{23}); the voice of mirth and gladness, etc. (7^{34} 16^{9} 25^{10}); at the time that I visit them (6^{15} 8^{12} 11^{23} 23^{12}); terror round about (6^{25} $20^{3.\,10}$); over which my name has been called ($7^{10.\,11.\,14.\,30}$); the sword, the famine, and the pestilence (with a variety of order, 14^{12} 15^{3} 21^{7}); and others. See Driver's full list, p. 275. It is doubtful if to make a full end (כָּלָה עשׂה) ought to be reckoned; it seems extraneous in 4^{27} $5^{10.\,18}$ ($30^{11}=46^{28}$). Neither should the contorted syntax 14^{1} 46^{1} 47^{1} 49^{34} be ascribed to Jeremiah. Peculiar are חָסִיד used of God (3^{12}); נוֹאָשׁ hopeless! in the mouth of the people (2^{25} 18^{12}); קְצוּצֵי פֵאָה shorn on the temples (9^{25} [Eng.^{26}] 25^{23}); יִנְאֲמוּ נְאֻם (23^{31}); חַלְלֵי י׳ slain of J″ (25^{33}); the hiph. of חלם dream (29^{8}); the phrase הִפִּיל תְּחִנָּה present supplication (38^{26} 42^{9}, Qal 36^{7} 37^{20} 42^{2}, cf. Dn 9^{20}).

vi. SOME RELIGIOUS IDEAS.—The Book of Jer does not so much teach religious truths as present a religious personality. Prophecy had already taught its truths, its last effort was to reveal itself in a life. But though the truths in Jeremiah are old, they all appear in him with an impress of personality which gives them novelty. He is not to be read for doctrines in their general form on God and the people, but for the nuances which his mind gives them. Though he might not be aware of it, we can perceive that all his thoughts are coloured by the religious relation to God of which he was himself conscious.

(1) Sin.—In his earliest time it is the sin of the people that occupies his mind, their unfaithfulness to J″. They followed Him in the wilderness, but on entering Canaan they went far away from Him. Every class became untrue to the idea of its relation to Him. It is this change that seems inexplicable to the prophet. He sets it in all possible lights: 'What evil did your fathers find in me?' (2^{5}). He contrasts the fidelity of the nations to their gods, which yet are no gods (2^{11}). At a later time he contrasts the fidelity of men even to the injunctions of their ancestor, such as the Rechabites (35^{14}). The instinct which guides the migrations of the stork is strangely unerring; the instinct of man's heart, which should direct it to God, as strangely errs (8^{7}, cf. 2^{32} $18^{13ff.}$). We understand Jeremiah's wonder at the change only when we hear him say what to his mind God is: 'They have forsaken the fountain of living water.' Isaiah crushed himself and crushed created man to the ground with his awful Ḳadosh; his word was true, but Jeremiah's 'the fountain of living water' seems to come nearer the fulness of truth. The words at any rate suggest the immediateness of the relation of man to God in religion. And it is this that Jeremiah insists upon, as Hosea and Isaiah had done before him. His charge is the unreality of men's religion; it is not with their real selves that they serve J″, and it is not J″ in His true being that they serve. Already in Josiah's days Jeremiah perceived how illusory his Reform was. Indeed it was doubtful if it had not made the condition of things worse. Men thought that when they worshipped at Jerusalem, and multiplied offerings there, they had done what J″ desired. It was a lie which was half a truth, and therefore the harder to fight. It is not certain that Jeremiah thought the lawbook altogether a good. People prided themselves on it, it was wisdom to have it; they thought the possession of it put them right with God ($8^{8. 9}$). Pharisaism and Deuteronomy came into the world the same day. The lawbook little satisfied the prophetic idealism. Jeremiah seeks to draw men's minds away from all that was external—sacrifices, temple, ark, and lawbook—to that which was inward and real. People spoke much of reform; he would have used another word: 'Break up the fallow ground, and sow not among thorns'; 'Circumcise yourselves to the Lord, and take away the foreskins of your heart' (4^{4}); 'O Jerusalem, wash thine heart from wickedness' (4^{14}). Sin is 'the stubbornness of the evil heart' (7^{24} 5^{23}). It is the heart that is good or ill. Man is the heart of man. Jeremiah probably has no general doctrine of human nature or its condition, though he perhaps expresses what is technically called habit when he says, 'The heart is deceitful above all things, and it is desperately sick; who can know it?' (17^{9}). If not from nature, by practice men become incapable of good: 'Can the Ethiopian change his skin? then may ye also do good that are inured to do evil' (13^{23}, cf. 7^{28} $8^{4ff.}$). Momentarily awoke by the prophet's appeals, the people become conscious of their inability, exclaiming, 'It is hopeless' (2^{25} 18^{12}). And more generally, 'It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps' (10^{23}). Sin is individually universal; a man cannot be found in the streets of Jerusalem (5^{1}, cf. $8^{6. 10}$). No providences in God's hand can reform them; the furnace will not purify them; they have been tried, and they are found reprobate silver ($6^{27ff.}$). Only the creative hand of God can change them; He will give them another heart, and put His law in their inward parts (24^{7} $31^{31ff.}$). Though Jeremiah, like Hosea, begins by considering the people as a moral personality, and never loses hold of the idea of the nation ($31^{16. 28. 31-34}$), his thoughts just referred to are virtually individualism.

(2) God.—In his doctrine of God Jeremiah agrees with his predecessors, but with a significant nuance of his own. J″ is God alone, the gods of the nations are no gods (2^{11} $16^{19ff.}$), and the Gentiles shall yet confess it. J″ rules among the nations, giving them all to drink of the wine of His cup, and putting the world and all that dwell in it into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar ($25^{15ff.}$ $27^{14ff.}$). Like all later prophets, Jeremiah sees His power and Godhead manifested in nature: 'Are there any among the vanities of the heathen that can cause rain? or can the heavens give showers?' (14^{22} 5^{24}), particularly in that perpetual wonder the restraint of the raging sea (5^{22}). These are external things. It is in that which He is to His people and His servants that J″ is truly revealed, e.g. in His gracious designs with Israel: 'I thought how I shall put thee among the children! ye shall call me my Father' (3^{19}), and in the joy which His service brings: 'Thy words were found and I did eat them, they were the joy and rejoicing of mine heart' (15^{16}). It is in the passages where Jeremiah intercedes for himself or the people that he realizes most fully what J″ is, $14^{7ff. 19ff.}$ $17^{12ff.}$, or when he gives a definition of what religion is: 'Let him that glorieth glory in this, that he knoweth me, that I am the Lord which exercise loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth, for in these things I delight' (9^{24}). But the conception of God receives a new shade in Jeremiah. His definition of man as the heart of man leads to a corresponding definition of God: J″ is He who trieth the heart and the reins (11^{20} 17^{10} 20^{12}). This definition is just the reflexion of Jeremiah's own experience. He does not infer that J″ searches the heart from any general doctrine he holds of the divine omniscience; he reasons the other way: Because J″ tries the heart, He is omniscient, 'Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him?' ($23^{23. 24}$). Positively, Jeremiah expresses his idea of religion when he says, 'Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, whose hope the Lord is' ($17^{5ff.}$). The principle of religion is faith.

(3) The Future.—Jeremiah's first and continued conviction is that the nation is doomed to destruction. There is something inexplicable to us in this certainty. It might seem mediated by his profound sense of the national sin ($4^{14. 22ff.}$), just as he was assured that his fellow prophets were false because of their ethical shallowness, and their healing the hurt of the people slightly (23^{17} 28^{8}). But then this difference of ethical standard between him and other prophets is equally inexplicable. His judgment, both of the prophets and the people, seems the unconscious reflection of his own religious relation to God. But he does not analyze; he knows his consciousness, and it is given directly by God. In his earliest days Judah seems to him a mass of perdition; a man could not be found in the streets of Jerusalem (5^{1}); the furnace had failed to separate silver from lead—there was no silver ($6^{27ff.}$). Yet it was impossible that God should make a full end of His people (ch. 32); and his hopes seem for the time placed on Israel of the North. Backsliding Israel was justified above treacherous Judah. And in the name of J″ he proclaims to the north, 'Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings' ($3^{14. 22}$); and his prophetic ear catches a voice from the bare heights, the weeping and the supplications of the children of Israel, 'Behold, we come unto thee, thou art the Lord our God' (3^{21}). With the first captivity of 597 the prophet's judgment on Judah seems softened; there was hope for the nation in the captives, and he predicts their restitution: J″ will give them an heart to know Him ($24^{6ff.}$). And, finally, during the last times of the siege, when the destruction of the nation was at hand, he embraces both Judah and Israel in his promise of restoration (chs. 30-33). All antagonisms between him and the people were now over; his human feeling had ceased to struggle against the irrevocable decree of God, and he looked forward with composure to the city's fall. His composure and certainty of the future were but the reflexion of his own experience, as in the case of all OT saints (Job $19^{25ff.}$, Ps $73^{23ff.}$). The relation to God of which he is conscious is indissoluble; it outlives all forms of national existence. Indeed, from Hosea downwards the prophets become more and more indifferent to the form of a state, their ideal is that of a community with a right mind towards God. Jeremiah does not place reliance on the purifying trials of the Exile; his hope is in the creative hand of God, who will give the people a heart to know Him (24^{7}), and write His law in their inward parts (31^{31}). The true shepherd whom He will raise up to lead them shall be called Jehovah Ẓidḳēnu, 'the Lord is our righteousness' ($23^{5ff.}$).

(4) Jeremiah's Piety.—There were pious men before Jeremiah, but the long drawn out struggle of his life revealed piety more than ever before. Very different judgments have been passed on his natural character. The lachrymose nature traditionally ascribed to him is based partly on the idea that he was the writer of the Lamentations, and partly on his own references to his tears. A different view is expressed by Darmesteter (Les Prophètes, 67), who says: 'During his 40 years of prophesying he preaches, he acts, he curses: he weeps little.' The contrasts revealed in his life have been epigrammatically expressed by calling him a figure 'cast in brass, dissolving in tears.' Probably his fundamental human characteristic was weakness. In those passages where he speaks of himself as a wall of brass against his opponents, and where J″ promises him victory over them, we see not a sense of strength but a feeling of weakness. They reflect what he feels he must be, but is conscious he is not, what J″ will do for him, though it is not done. Isaiah was strong in himself; the divine strength came to him unconsciously as he threw himself into action, and was not distinguishable from his own. But Jeremiah was conscious, introspective, distinguishing between himself and God. The strength he had was from without, hence it was fluctuating and convulsive. In moments of conflict he was strong. When dragged before the princes it was given him what to speak (26$^{12ff.}$). He could run with the footmen, or even like Elijah with the chariots, and not be wearied; but when the conflict was passed and he took his life and history with him into hours of stillness and solitude, the tide of divine strength receded, and he was weakness itself.

On the one hand, he had let himself be induced to be a prophet. J″ had revealed His mind to him, His verdict on the people, and His purpose, and he had entered into His mind, and stood on His side. But this looking at people and things, as might be said, from the standpoint of J″ isolated him; he neither borrowed nor lent, married nor was a father, rejoiced with the joyful nor sorrowed with the sorrowing (16$^{1ff.}$). Besides isolating him, it brought persecution upon him. He felt the hardness of J″'s service. Gladly would he have laid his office at His feet. He would have been thankful had he never known the truth. He cursed the day of his birth, because his fellowship with J″ isolated him from all other fellowship, and crushed down all that was human in him. For, on the other hand, he profoundly sympathized with the people. He was an Israelite indeed. Israel in him struggled against its doom. The dumb mind of the people found a voice in him. He interceded for it, and his intercession was just the resistance of his human heart to the idea of the nation's destruction. He palliated its offences, saying it was misled by the prophets (14^{13}). He expressed its better self in the confessions which he put into its mouth (14$^{7-9}$ 14$^{19ff.}$ 10$^{23.\,24}$). He wept over it (9^{1} 13^{17} 14^{17}). He was told, it is enough! He was in the cruellest dilemma. If he pleaded for the people it was to be false to J″, to be false to his own convictions of truth, false to what he knew to be the irrevocable will of God. On the other hand, to threaten, above all to threaten with zeal for God, was treason against his own heart and against his people. Thus both God and men seemed to reject him. But his repulse by men drove him to God, and his repulse by God made him press closer to Him. And thus his life became a fellowship with God, his thoughts and feelings a dialogue between him and God.

A. B. DAVIDSON.

JEREMIAS (Ἰερεμίας), 1 Es 9^{34}.—One of the sons of Baani who put away his 'strange' wife. The name corresponds to Jeremai in Ezr 10^{33}, who is mentioned among the sons of Hashum; it has been inserted out of its right place in 1 Es.

JEREMIEL.—The name of the archangel who is introduced in 2 Es 4^{36} as answering the questions of the righteous dead. AV has Uriel, the same name as that of the angel who was sent to instruct Esdras, 2 Es 4^{1} 5^{20} 10^{28}.

JEREMOTH (יְרֵימוֹת, יְרֵמוֹת).—1. 2. Two Benjamites, 1 Ch 7^{8} 8^{14}. 3. 4. Two Levites, 1 Ch 23^{23} 25^{22}, the latter called in 24^{30} Jerimoth. 5. A Naphtalite, 1 Ch 27^{19}. 6. 7. 8. Three of those who had married foreign wives, Ezr 10$^{26.\,27.\,29}$. In the last instance Ḳerê has וְרָמוֹת 'and Ramoth' (so AV). See GENEALOGY.

JEREMY.—The form in which the name of the prophet Jeremiah appears in both AV and RV of 1 Es 1$^{28.\,32.\,47.\,57}$ 2^{1}, 2 Es 2^{18}, as well as in AV of 2 Mac 2$^{1.\,5.\,7}$, Mt 2^{17} 27^{9}. In the last three passages RV has Jeremiah. The form Jeremy is used also in both AV and RV in the title of the Epistle ascribed to the prophet in Bar 6^{1}.

JEREMY, EPISTLE OF.—A brief apocr. composition purporting to have been written by Jeremiah to the Jews who were about to be led, or had been led (so Syr. and 7 Gr. cursives), into Babylon (cf. Jer 29 [36]^{3}). The author forewarns them that the captivity, which is a visitation for sin, will continue for seven generations; and his serious purpose is to secure that in exile they may not be so impressed by gorgeous idolatrous ceremonial as to fall into apostasy. To effect this, he gives, in popular style, a detailed exposure of the stupidity of idolatry, which is partly an amplification of Jer 10$^{1-16}$, Is 44$^{9-19}$, but which also manifests an intimate acquaintance with many inane and vicious heathen practices.

There is a decided lack of logical sequence in the thoughts, but the vanity of idolatry is emphasized by a sort of refrain, ten times repeated at irregular intervals, and though in every case intentionally varied as to verbal expression, yet always conveying the one meaning. 'This shows that idols are not gods, therefore fear them not.' The thoughts are decidedly forceful, and will perhaps gain in cogency if we arrange them a little more logically, thus:—I. Idols need to be manufactured. They are made by a carpenter, acc. to his wish (^{45}) [verses from RV throughout], covered with gold and silver (^{8}), and decked with garments (^{11}). II. They are devoid of perception. They cannot speak (^{8}), see (^{19}), hear howlings of priests (^{32}), or hear prayer (^{41}). III. They have no powers of self-conservation. They cannot wipe the dust from their face (^{13}) or eyes (^{17}), or the rust from their ornaments (^{24}), nor can they feel the smoke (^{21}). They cannot eat (^{27}). They are powerless against theft from their person ($^{10.\,33.\,57}$), against war ($^{48.\,56}$), and fire (^{55}). They cannot rise when they have fallen, or straighten themselves when awry (^{27}). They cannot save their garments from moths (^{12}), or their wooden interior from decay (^{20}). IV. They are impotent for the discharge of their functions as gods. They bear a sceptre, but cannot rule (^{14}); a sword and axe, but cannot kill (^{15}). They cannot give wealth (^{35}), or rain (^{53}); much less can they show signs (^{67}) and restore the blind (^{37}) or the dumb (^{41}). They cannot set up one king and put down another ($^{34.\,53.\,56.\,66}$), or deliver from injustice and death (^{36}), or even give long life to those who made them (^{46}). V. They are indifferent to ethical qualities. They requite neither good nor evil (^{34}). They punish not the perjurer (^{35}), or even the priest who robs his god to feed his lust (^{11}). They do not redress wrong (^{54}), or show mercy to the widow and the fatherless (^{38}); nay, they sanction systematic prostitution (^{43}). VI. They are thus the least useful of all things. A cup, a door, a pillar has its use (^{59}), and so have the sun and moon (^{60}), lightning and wind (^{61}), clouds (^{62}) and fire (^{63}); 'yea, even the beasts are better than they' (^{68}). Then, with rare irony, the author compares an idol to a 'scarecrow' (^{70}); impotent to protect, but deluding the imagination; and, in conclusion, says, 'Better is the man that is just and has no idols, but (adds Syr.) waits on the Lord God,' than the most sumptuous idolater.

Authorship.—The evidence that it was not written by Jeremiah is threefold. (1) It was manifestly composed in Greek. There are a few Hebraisms, as, e.g., the imitation of infin. absol. in ἀφομοιωθέντες ἀφομοιωθῆτε (v.^{4}), and the repeated use of fut. for pres. freq., but they are such as are inseparable from Hellenistic Greek. (2) The style is quite below that of a prophet of Israel. The mind of the writer is saturated with the Bk. of Jer (cf. Jer 5^{24} with v.^{6}, 10^{3} with v.^{45}, 10^{8} with v.^{4}, 22^{28} with v.^{17}, 48^{37} with v.^{51}), but the style is inferior. As Ewald says, 'He only succeeds in writing like a speaker who proves and exhausts his subject from every point of view; he shows not the remotest movement towards prophetic flight.' (HI v. 479). (3)

The statement that the captivity should continue 'seven generations,' points away from Jeremiah towards one who deplored the long exile, and wished to believe it of divine appointment.

We believe the Ep. to have been written before 2 Mac. We cannot think as do Fritzsche, Schürer, Gifford, and others, that when 2 Mac 2^{2} says that 'Jeremiah charged the exiles not . . . to be led astray in their minds when they saw images of gold and silver and the adornment thereof,' there is no allusion to our Epistle. The further vagaries as to the altar and the ark (2 Mac 2^{4-6}) are not said to be 'in the same writing,' as AV (so Gifford), but ἐν τῇ γραφῇ, i.e. 'in' what the writer considered 'Scripture,' 'the records' of v.^{1}. The most probable supposition is, that the author lived in Egypt in the 1st cent. B.C., and that, deeply concerned lest his brethren should be led astray by the imposing ritual of idolatry, and feeling that additional force would be given to his warnings if he put them into the mouth of Jeremiah, he wrote his diatribe on the idolatry of Egypt as if it were intended for Babylon. He may have lived in Babylon in his youth, and there gained his acquaintance with the deification of prostitution (^{43}), to which Herodotus also testifies as occurring in the temple of Beltis (i. 199); but v.^{19} as clearly corresponds with Hdt.'s description (ii. 62) of the 'feast of lights' at Sais. The slightly inflated style of the Ep. is thoroughly Alexandrian. The fondness for assonance and for long compound words may be illustrated from περιάργυροι, περίχρυσοι, περιελοῦνται, περικείμενοι ($^{56f.}$) and ἐξαποσταλέν, ἄνωθεν, ἐξαναλῶσαι (^{66}).

Canonicity.—Our Ep. is included in the Gr. canon, and is found in all Gr. codices of OT, except the cursives 70, 96, 229. In Syr.-Hex. it follows La, and this claims to have been tr^{d} from Origen's Hexapla. Indeed, Origen (inadvertently, as we think) places it in the list of the Heb. canon (cf. Eusebius, HE vi. 25). The uncials A B Q exhibit the same order as Syr.-Hex., as do also all the patristic lists that refer to it (see BARUCH). In Lat., Syr., and some edd. of LXX, Ep. Jer is found as Bar 6; and this is followed in Luther's Bible and other 16th cent. edd. as well as in AV and RV. Its canonicity was not called in question in the Christian Church before Jerome, who called it ψευδεπίγραφος (Prol. in Jer.). Theodoret passed it by; and also Hilary, though in his Prol. in Ps. 15 he has enumerated it in the Canon; but Tertullian quotes, as from Jer, v.^{4}, about the carrying of gods on men's shoulders (Scorp. c. 8); and Cyprian (On the Lord's Prayer, c. 5) quotes v.^{6} as the suggestion of the Holy Spirit to Jeremiah, 'In the heart, O God, ought we to worship thee.'

The Text and Versions.—The Ep. is found entire in the Gr. uncials A B Q, while Γ contains 7*b*–24*a*. The differences between these MSS are comparatively unimportant. (See Swete, OT in Gr. 379–384; and, for description of MSS, vii.–xi.). There are about 20 Gr. cursives, some of whose various readings are given by Ceriani. Speaking generally, these cursives divide themselves into two classes. One half are thought by Field to represent the Lucianic recension (Origen's Hex., Proleg. c. ix.), the other half are often found in agreement with Q.

The Syriac is a very free rendering of Greek. An arrangement and tr. of the VSS in στίχοι, in parallel columns, discloses that in little more than one-third of the lines does Syr. accurately represent Gr., though the last 12 verses are almost a verbatim tr^{n}. Some of the more important variations are: 'Seventy years' (^{3}) for 'seven generations'; 'An axe in his left' (^{15}); 'As a man condemned by the king, so are their arms extended; [thus Walton, but Lag. 'courts'], 'Their heart is foolish and erring' (^{20}); 'ravens' for 'birds' (^{22}); 'eagerly eat' for ταριχεύουσι (^{28}); 'stones of demons in the mountains' (^{38}); 'before the gate,' in place of τὸν Βῆλον (^{41}); 'They are not like crows which fly in the air' (54). The only important omission is that of the 'door' and the 'pillar' in v.^{59}.

The Syro-Hexaplar, given in Ceriani's Mon. Sacr. et Prof. i. 1, is in the main a slavishly literal tr^{n} of the text of B, often in defiance of Syr. idiom; as in vv.$^{31. 45}$. Its variations are few. We may mention, 'swallows and other birds' (^{22}), so ^{88}; 'weakness' for 'shame' (^{26}), so ^{88}; 'in their temples the priests sit' (^{31}), as if καθίζουσι, with Q and its cursives; 'nor rescue the wronged' (^{54}), as if ἀδικούμενον, with A and the Lucianic cursives; and 'to devastate the mountains' (^{63}), as if ἐξερημῶσαι, with Q and its cursives.

The Vulg. also adheres closely to Gr. text. Its chief deviations are in vv.$^{8-11. 20. 41. 54}$, where it despairs of Gr. and makes a sense of its own. It also reads 'exquiram' (^{7}) for ἐκζητῶν; 'as a dead man carried to a grave' for ὡς ἐπὶ θαν. ἀπ. (^{17}): 'decerpentes' for ταριχεύουσι (^{27}), so Syr.: 'olive stones' for 'bran' (^{43}), and 'gloriabatur' for κεχρήσεται (^{59}).

It was the first city to oppose the progress of the children of Israel after they had crossed the Jordan. It had its wall (Jos 2^{15}), and its gate, which was closed at dusk (2^{5}). Like all the Can. cities of the time, it was ruled over by a king (2^{3}). The wealth of the place is inferred from the description of the spoil taken: vessels of brass and of iron are mentioned, and from the silver and gold Achan was able to sequester 200 shekels of silver and a wedge of gold of 50 shekels weight, as well as a goodly Babylonish garment (7^{21}). We find no such rich record of spoil in the accounts of the capture of the other cities in this campaign. While the children of Israel were still encamped at Shittim on the other side of Jordan, Joshua sent two spies to investigate the state of the country as far as J. ($2^{1ff.}$). Arrived at that place, they lodged at a house on the town wall, belonging to one Rahab, a prostitute. Their errand was suspected, and news was brought to the king, who sent messengers to Rahab's house to demand that she give up the spies. In the meantime she had hidden them under the stalks of flax which were laid out on the roof to dry, and when the messengers arrived she declared that the spies had left the city at dusk, and she sent the men off on a false chase as far as the fords of the Jordan. Returning to the spies on the roof, she told them of the terror Joshua's approach had inspired, and begged that, in return for her kindness to them, they would agree to save her and her family alive in the coming troubles. This they swore to do, on condition that she preserved secrecy. That her house might be recognized she tied a scarlet thread in her window, from which she let them down with a rope, advising them to hide in the mountains. There they escaped (probably hiding in the cavern-pierced cliffs of Quarantania), and remained for three days, till their pursuers had come back. Then returning to Joshua, they gave a report which greatly encouraged the leader.

After crossing the Jordan, the Isr. encamped in the 'east border of J.' at Gilgal (Jos 4^{19}), celebrating the passover in the 'plains of J.' This solemn ceremony was doubtless held in full view of the city. While near J., Joshua saw the Captain of the Lord's Host (5^{13}). From his speech before his death we gather that a preliminary skirmish preceded the siege, for he says, 'Ye came unto J., and the men of J. fought against you' (24^{11}). The siege itself was extremely strict: 'none went out and none came in' ($6^{1ff.}$). Joshua having received his commands from the Lord, delivered them to the people. They were to encompass the city once a day for six days, and on the seventh day seven times. The order of march was as follows: first came the armed men, then seven priests with trumpets of rams' horns; immediately behind the priests was borne the ark of the Covenant; and then followed the rear. The first day, having encompassed the city in silence, they returned to lodge in the camp. This was repeated for five days. On the seventh they rose very early and marched around the city seven times, but on the seventh time, when the priests blew with their trumpets, Joshua said to the people, 'Shout, for the Lord hath given you the city.' As they shouted, the wall fell down flat before them, and the people at once entered the city on every side, 'each man straight before him, and they took the city.' By special command of Joshua, Rahab and her family were saved from the general slaughter of man and beast that ensued, according to the promise she had received from the spies. Her family continued to live on in Israel, and the name Rahab occurs in the genealogy of our Lord (Mt 1^{5}) as the mother of Boaz. J. was burned and everything in it, except the silver and gold, and the vessels of brass and iron, which were reserved for the treasury of the Lord's house. The disobedience of Achan to the Lord's command, that the people should reserve nothing for themselves, resulted in a terrible punishment. The defeat of the Israelites at Ai was ascribed to the fact that the accursed thing was touched. By a process of elimination the crime was traced to Achan, and he and all his family were stoned with stones and burned with fire (Jos $7^{1ff.}$).

Some of the Mohammedans of the country give a distorted account of the taking of J., confusing it with another scene in Joshua's life. It is said that a great Imam tried to take the city, but so difficult was the task of demolishing the walls that the work was not completed when darkness compelled the besiegers to stop. In the morning the walls had sprung up again, and the siege had to be recommenced. This went on for several days, when finally the Imam caused the sun to stand still, and thus, the day being lengthened, the destruction of the city was completed. This may not represent an early local tradition, as the plains were covered with monasteries when the Arabs took the land, and the Mohammedans very probably confused the various Biblical accounts they heard from the monks.

Not only was J. utterly destroyed, but Joshua pronounced a solemn curse on the man who should rebuild it, prophesying misfortune to his children: 'He shall lay the foundations thereof in his firstborn, and in his youngest shall he set up the gates of it' (Jos 6^{26}). In 1 K 16^{34} we are told how this curse fell upon Hiel the Bethelite, who in the days of Ahab rebuilt the city. We infer that between these two periods the site was unoccupied, but that it continued to be known by its old name is proved by the facts that in the partition of the land J. was assigned to Benjamin (Jos 18^{21}), and that David's messengers, after being maltreated by the Ammonites, were told to 'tarry in J. till your beards be grown' (2 S 10^{5}, 1 Ch 19^{5}). Notwithstanding the fulfilment of the curse, the city became again inhabited, for, on the complaint of the 'men of the city' that the water was naught and the ground barren, Elisha healed the waters by casting salt in the spring (2 K 2^{19}). There was also a settlement of the sons of the prophets at the place, who had at their command fifty strong men, whom they sent on a vain search for Elijah, when he had been carried up into heaven from the other side of Jordan (2^{16}). After this the place is mentioned several times. When Pekah, king of Israel, made his raid on the southern kingdom, taking many captives, these were released by order of the prophet Oded, and taken to J., 'the city of palm trees' (2 Ch 28^{15}). Zedekiah, fleeing from Jerus. before the forces of Nebuch., was taken in the plains of J. (2 K 25^{5}, Jer 39^{5}). In the list of returned captives (Ezr 2^{34}–Neh 7^{36}) the children of J. are put down at 345. These restored exiles evidently took up their abode on the old site, for in Neh 3^{2} we read that the 'men of Jericho' had their share in rebuilding the walls of Jerus. Later on it was fortified by the Syrian general Bacchides (1 Mac 9^{50}).

In the time of our Lord, J. had become an important place, owing to the partiality shown by the Herodian family to the city. Josephus describes the place with enthusiasm (Wars, IV. viii. 2–3). The city lay 150 stadia from Jerus. and 60 from the Jordan. It was situated in a plain, divided in the middle by the river, and flanked on either side by high mountains, of which the western range overhung the town. Palm trees abounded in the plain, those near the Jordan being the richest. In summer the climate was so hot that no one cared to come near it, but in winter the air was so mild that the inhabitants went about with linen clothing when snow covered the rest of Judea. He speaks at length of a fountain which was situated near the old city taken by Joshua, and which was healed by Elisha. He claims unusual powers of irrigation for these waters, which had only to flow lightly over the soil to make it fruitful, and which watered a plain 70 furlongs long by 20 broad, fertilizing gardens thickly set with trees, which produced balsam and myrobalanum. The palm trees were of many kinds, one yielding an excellent honey. Such was the luxuriance and rarity of the vegetation that the author declares the place might well be pronounced divine, and challenges a comparison with any other climate in the whole earth. Strabo (xvi. 2) likens the plain surrounded by mountains to a theatre, and corroborates Josephus' account of its fertility, declaring that the revenues from the balsam (from which medicine was extracted for the head and eyes) and from other plants was great.

When Pompey visited Pal. and endeavoured to clear the land of robbers, he destroyed two of their strongholds, Threx and Taurus, which commanded the approach to J. (ib.). After Jerus. was taken by Pompey, Gabinius, the Rom. general, divided the country into five parts, making J. one of the seats of Assembly (Jos. Wars, I. viii. 5). When Herod was appointed at Rome to be king of the Jews, and before he was installed in Jerus., his allies plundered J., finding the houses full of all sorts of good things (Wars, I. xv. 6). Later he farmed from Cleopatra the revenues of the regions about the city, which had been granted her by Antony (Ant. XV. iv. 2), and fortified above the town a citadel, a building fine and strong, which he called Cypros in honour of his mother, and built a city to the north of J., which he named Phasaelis after his brother (Wars, I. xxi. 9). J. was important enough to have its amphitheatre, for we read that from this place Salome announced to the assembled soldiers the news of the death of Herod, which had taken place in the city, though he had given orders that he should be buried at Herodium (Wars, I. xxxiii. 8). After his death, his ex-slave Simon, aspiring to make himself king, burned down the royal palace (Ant. XVII. x. 6), but this was magnificently rebuilt by Archelaus, who also accomplished important work in irrigating the plain (Ant. XVII. xiii. 1). In the time of Josephus (Wars, III. iii. 5) Judæa was divided into eleven parts, of which Jerus. was the chief, and one of which was Jericho. When Vespasian approached J. the citizens fled to the mountains (Wars, IV. viii. 2). He erected a citadel in the place, and set a garrison (ib. IV. ix. 1). Whether Josephus refers to the destruction of J. or Gerasa in this section is not clear, but we have the statement of Jerome that, at the time when Jerusalem was taken, J. was captured and destroyed on account of the perfidy of its citizens (Onomasticon).

J., however, still preserved its magnificence when our Lord visited it. His baptism in the Jordan occurred not far off. The hill of Quarantania, to the immediate west of the city, is pointed out as the traditional site of the Temptation. At the end of His ministry, when He was on His way from Galilee to Jerus., He passed through J., and there healed a blind man (Mk 10^{46} [name given Bartimæus], Lk 18^{35}), or acc. to Mt $20^{29ff.}$ two blind men. At this same time He visited the house of Zacchæus the publican, whose eagerness to see the Lord had led him to climb a sycomore tree, as he was short of stature. The account of his conversion is one of the most graphic in the gospel history (Lk $19^{1ff.}$). Travellers to-day between Jerus. and J. have to be accompanied by an escort, to prevent their 'falling among thieves,' who have infested this route both before and ever since the Good Samaritan came to the relief of the man in the parable (Lk 10^{30}).

We are told by Jerome (Onom.) that after its destruction by the Romans, J. was rebuilt a third time, but he does not say when. That the place was inhabited in the time of Origen we infer from the fact of his discovery of some valuable biblical MSS there (Eus. Eccl. Hist. vi. 16). This third city existed in Jerome's day as well as the ruins of the other two. It became an Episcopal See, and its bishops begin to be mentioned in A.D. 325; the last reference is to Gregorius, who was present at the Synod of Jerus. A.D. 536. The sacred sites began to be pointed out early in the 4th cent. The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) was shown the sycomore tree of Zacchæus on the right of the road leading to the town from the west. A mile and a half from the town was pointed out the site of the old city taken by Joshua, close to the fountain of Elisha, immediately above which was the house of Rahab. Justinian restored a hospice in J., and a church of the Mother of God (Procopius, de Ædif. 5. 9). Theodosius (A.D. 530) visited the fountain of Elisha, which he places 2 miles from the town, and in this latter was shown the house of Rahab, the site evidently having been shifted since the time of the Bordeaux Pilgrim. Antoninus Martyr (A.D. 570) found the walls of the town overthrown by an earthquake. The house of Rabab was still standing, and had been converted into a hospice and oratory, probably the work of Justinian referred to above. At the time of Arculf's visit (A.D. 670) the town was in ruins; only the house of Rahab was standing, but roofless. The Venerable Bede (A.D. 720) describes a similar state of things. Hence the town was in a ruinous condition for at least a century and a half, but by the end of the 6th cent. many churches and monasteries had sprung up on the surrounding plains. Besides the church at Gilgal, Arculf speaks of one on the spot where Christ was supposed to have left His garments at the time of His baptism, and of the monastery of St. John, also near the Jordan. Establishments were dedicated to St. Panteleemon, St. Calamon, St. Chrysostom, St. Eustochium, and others. At the time of the Crusaders many of these were repaired and others constructed. Under the Arabs the town again rose to importance, as is proved by the many references of the Mohammedan geographers beginning in the 9th cent. (see Palestine under the Moslems, by Guy Le Strange). Ya'kubi (A.D. 874) speaks of Riha as the capital of the Ghôr, the cleft of the Lower Jordan. Mukaddasi (A.D. 985) says that this city possessed many villages in the plain, which produced much indigo, and many palm and banana trees. Edrisi (A.D. 1154) mentions Ariha, Beisan, and Amta as the finest of the cities of the valley of the Ghôr. When the Crusaders conquered the land, the plain of J. was granted to the Holy Sepulchre, but in A.D. 1111 Arnulfus, the Patriarch of Jerusalem, was blamed for assigning to his niece this district, with its annual revenues, which amounted to 5000 pieces of gold (William of Tyre, xi. 15). Later it again fell into ecclesiastical hands, as it was assigned in A.D. 1138 to a convent at Bethany (ib. xv. 26). But by the 13th cent. the town itself had sunk to small dimensions. The square tower which may be seen to-day near the modern village of er-Riha was found by Willebrand (A.D. 1211) in a ruinous condition. Brocardus (A.D. 1230) says that the wretched town had scarcely eight houses, and that all the monuments of the sacred places were destroyed. Ricaldus, writing about the same time, calls the place 'quasi deserta.' However, the plains were at this time richly cultivated. According to the Moslem Yakut (A.D. 1225) the finest sugar of the Ghôr was made at J.; palm trees and bananas abounded. Jaques de Vitry (cap. 53) also refers to the fields of sugar-cane. The ruins to the west of 'Ain es-Sultan, with the connecting aqueducts, appear to date from the Crusading period.

The modern er-Riha is a miserable village, containing about 300 swarthy inhabitants, possibly the descendants of the puny race called by Arculf Canaanites, who dwelt in his time on the plain. The rich patches of barley and wheat, with the gardens of the ecclesiastical establishments, give a hint of the possibilities of fertility which were so amply realized in former days. The level of the village is 900 ft. below the Mediter., and the flora and fauna of the plain differ largely from those of the rest of Pal., some species not being found nearer than the Asiatic and African tropics. A dozen isolated palms represent the splendid groves of the past. The Zakkûm (Balanites Ægyptiaica), identified by some with the Myrobalanum of Josephus, still abounds; also the acacia, and trees of the Zizyphus species, called in Arabic Sidr or Dom. A handsome Russian hospice now stands near the ruined tower mentioned by Willebrand, and there is a small Greek church. Two good hotels accommodate travellers, who may now make the journey from Jerus. by carriage-road, and continue their drive over the plain to the Jordan and the Dead Sea. J. contains only a few plots of freehold, as in recent times it has become the private property of the Sultan, together with many other parts of the Jordan Valley.

All authorities are agreed that the site of the Can. city is at Tell es-Sultan, above 'Ain es-Sultan (Elisha's fountain), one and a half miles from modern Jericho. As we have seen, Josephus places the old city near the fountain, and so does the Bordeaux Pilgrim, who gives the distance from the J. of his day as one and a half miles as above, which distance would do equally well if we identify the latter with the ruins near the pass to be mentioned later. Theodosius makes the distance 2 miles. This mound is 1200 ft. long from N. to S., and the larger part of its area is 50 ft. in height, measured above the fountain at the E., but not so high on the western side, as the original ground slopes from W. to E. Rising from the top of the mound along its edges are four superimposed mounds, the highest being some 90 ft. above the fountain. Near the base of the mound, above the spring, a hollow has been recently scooped out, revealing an ancient mud-brick wall in situ. The pottery found strewn over the mound belongs, as a rule, to pre-Roman times, and some pre-Israelitish ware occurs. The superimposed mounds may indicate later fortifications, but the accumulation of 50 ft. of débris below them, by analogy with the excavated mounds of Hissarlik and Tell el-Hesy (see LACHISH), probably represents the alternate growth and decay of the town for several centuries. Hence systematic excavations through the base of the mound would doubtless bring to light the remains of the pre-Israelitish city. On natural grounds, the place, with its abundant supply of water, would have been chosen by the first builders. From one and a half to two miles west of modern J., on the south bank of the Wady el-Ḳelt, near the mouth of the pass, there are abundant remains of a city. An unobservant traveller might not notice them, as the houses are ruined down to the soil, but the ground-plans remain, and often the four sides of a room are quite plain. A large pool, called Birket Mûsa, is in the neighbourhood. The character of the pottery with which these ruins are strewn indicates the Roman site. This identification is favoured by the probable identification of the site of Beit Jubr, a ruined fort on the south side of the Jerus. road, commanding the ascent from the J. plain, with the fort Cypros, which Herod built above J.; as well as by the fact that the aqueducts in the Wady el-Ḳelt, two of which were constructed to bring water to this site, appear to be Rom. work (PEF Mem. vol. iii. p. 173). Similar ruins north of 'Ain es-Sultan suggest that Roman Jericho may have been very extensive, occupying both sites, with detached villas between, as there are signs of building at many points in the intervening fields. The settlement of the Crusaders seems to have been at the modern er-Riha, about 2 miles from the pass. In the vicinity of J. the remains of five old monastic establishments may be visited. In the precipices of Ḳuruntul (Quarantania) there are hermits' caves, with chapels adorned with frescoes. The monastery of St. John, near the traditional place of baptism, built by Justinian, and rebuilt by the Crusaders, has again been restored, but traces of the old work remain. The identification of Ḳusr el-Hajlah is not sure. Tell Mogheifir probably represents the ancient St. Eustochium, mentioned by Willibald in A.D. 721 as being in the middle of the plain. At Khurbet el-Mifjir, north-east of 'Ain es-Sultan, are the ruins of a splendid monastic establishment. Most picturesque of all is the convent of Elijah, clinging to the crags above the Wady el-Ḳelt. This has been recently restored, but some of the old frescoes remain. Further down in the valley the cliffs immediately above the stream are pierced with hermits' caves, which can be approached only by ladders. They are still inhabited, but their nicely painted wooden doors produce an incongruous effect in the midst of the wild surroundings. F. J. BLISS.

JERIMOTH (יְרִימוֹת).—1. 2. Two Benjamites, 1 Ch 7^{7} 12^{5}. 3. 4. 5. Three Levites, 1 Ch 24^{30} (called in 25^{22} Jeremoth) 25^{4}, 2 Ch 31^{13}. 6. A son of David and father of Rehoboam's wife, 2 Ch 11^{18}. See GENEALOGY.

JERIOTH (יְרִיעוֹת) occurs in a genealogy in 1 Ch 2^{18}, where the only thing that is certain is that MT is corrupt (see Kittel's note in SBOT). It is possible that we ought to read with Wellhausen 'בַּת־יְר 'daughter of Jerioth' for 'אֶת־יְר. See, further, GENEALOGY, IV. 35 a, note.

JEROBOAM (יָרָבְעָם prob. 'may he plead the people's cause,' 'Ιεροβοάμ).—1. 1 K 11^{26-40} 12^{1}–14^{20}, 2 Ch $10^{2ff.}$ 11^{14-16} 12^{15} 13, son of Nebat and Zeruah, an Ephraimite of Zeredah, first king of Israel after the disruption, reigned 22 years, B.C. 937–915. Jeroboam's career began early in Solomon's reign (cf. 1 K 11^{27} with 9^{15} 3^{1}); the king, recognizing the young man's abilities, appointed him commissioner for the house of Joseph. He used his position to plot against his master; and, when Solomon sought to kill him, was forced to flee to Egypt.* In the LXX there are two accounts of the way in which Jeroboam became king. The first agrees substantially with the Hebrew, when the contradictions of the text of 1 K 12 (cf. vv.$^{2.3}$ with ^{20}) are removed.† As soon as Jeroboam heard of the death of Solomon, he returned from Egypt; he did not attend the conference between Rehoboam and the people at Shechem, but he kept within reach, and came when he was sent for. The other account in LXX B is inserted at 12^{24}. It covers the same ground as the first, but with considerable additions and variations. On hearing of Solomon's death, Jeroboam returned from Egypt, where he had found a patron in Shishak and an Egyptian princess for a wife, 12^{24e},* mustered his tribe at Shechem, and so gave the immediate occasion for the revolt. The most important divergence, however, between the two Greek accounts is found in the prophecies which promise Jeroboam the leadership of the ten tribes. In the first we have the prophecy of Ahijah delivered to Jeroboam at Jerusalem in the time of Solomon; in the second a similar prophecy is put into the mouth of Shemaiah at Shechem in the time of Rehoboam. Both accounts are clearly translated from Heb. originals, which must have existed when the LXX translation was made. The Heb. text was not fixed, and the tradition was fluctuating; we cannot feel certain as to what was the actual course of events. With regard to Ahijah a similar uncertainty exists. The prophecy in 1 K 11^{29-39} appears to be an interpolation, for it interrupts the account of Jeroboam's rebellion, which is expected after v.^{28} and implied by v.^{40}. It could not have been Ahijah's prophecy which aroused Solomon's suspicions, for it was a private communication, addressed to Jeroboam alone, as is expressly stated; no third party was aware of it.† We find, then, two different traditions of Jeroboam's accession to the sovereignty; the correct history of it must remain uncertain.

The revolt which led to the division of the kingdom and the elevation of Jeroboam was a revolt against the government of Solomon and the heavy burdens which it laid upon the people. Solomon's conception of the state was in fact alien to the national feelings. The free, democratic spirit of old Israel, which could welcome a king chosen by the people, had not become reconciled to a hereditary monarchy, especially when Solomon's heir proved to be out of sympathy with the popular demand for a less despotic government. And the tribal instinct was still strong; it had not yet surrendered to the idea of a united nation. Jealousy of the new preponderance of Judah must have been felt in the powerful tribe of Ephraim; the real strength of Israel lay in the north; neither geographical nor social conditions were in favour of Jerusalem being the centre of all Israel. Hence the revolt came to a head at Shechem, and the instigator of the democratic movement was an Ephraimite who became chieftain of the ten tribes by the free choice of the people. The historian sees in this reverse for Judah a judgment on the sins of Solomon.

But Jeroboam not merely adopted the line of democratic leader appointed by popular choice, he came forward as the patron of the popular religion and the ancient sanctuaries. He quickly realized that it was necessary for his position to establish a strong counter-attraction to the new temple at Jerusalem. Accordingly he made successful efforts to revive the popularity of the venerable holy places at Bethel and Dan, and provided them with golden images of J″ in the form of a steer or bull, in addition to the altar, asherah, and sacred stone (2 K 23^{15}), which were there already. He also instituted a new priesthood and a popular festival on the model of the feasts at Jerusalem.* The popular religion saw no offence in this form of worship (cf. Ex 32^{1-6}); and the employment of non-Levites as priests would not have appeared so irregular then as it would have done in later times. But there can be no doubt that Jeroboam's action marked a serious retrogression when compared with the higher religious level which had been reached at Jerusalem. For the sake of political security Jeroboam deliberately sacrificed the higher religious interests of Israel; and there can be no doubt that the sacred writer, who, whatever his merits as a historian may be, possessed a keen religious insight into the events of the past, was fully justified in his unsparing verdict upon Jeroboam as the man 'who made Israel to sin' (1 K 12^{30} 13^{34}, 2 K $17^{21f.}$).†

* The account of the rebellion, hinted at in 1 K 11^{26}, is not given as we should expect after v.^{26}. It is noticeable that while the compiler views this and other rebellions as punishments for Solomon's unfaithfulness (vv.$^{9-13}$), yet they occurred early in the reign, i.e. before the sins which occasioned them.

† 1 K 12^{2} is to be placed before v.^{1}, so that 'heard of it' refers to Solomon's death, 11^{43}; a slight change in the Heb. v.^{2b} gives the sense 'and J. returned from Egypt'; omit v.^{3a} and 'Jeroboam and' in v.^{12a}. Thus the narrative is brought into agreement with v.^{20}.

* LXX, Swete's edition.

† Note also that, in the Hebrew, Ahijah of the second prophecy 14^{1-16} is clearly connected with Ahijah of the first prophecy, while the Greek introduces him as a new person. LXX B places this second prophecy in an impossible place, before the assembly at Shechem, 12^{24h-n}. See, further, W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 117 ff.

The narrative 1 K 13^{1-32}, which contains a prophetic denunciation of the altar at Bethel, belongs to a much later time, when the names of 'the man of God from Judah' and of 'the old prophet' were forgotten. Some critics think that it is founded upon 2 K 23^{15-20}; others, that the latter passage, apparently foreign to the context where it stands, was added by the same hand which inserted the story here. The next narrative connected with Jeroboam, the second prophecy of Ahijah, delivered to the queen 14^{1-18}, contains old material which has been treated by the compiler in his characteristic style. The language of Ahijah is cast into much the same form as similar prophecies delivered to Israelite kings.‡

With regard to Jeroboam's external relations, the only information we have is that there was constant war between him and Rehoboam and his successor (1 K 14^{30}§ 15^{7b}, cf. 2 Ch 13). At first, no doubt, Jeroboam would have had a considerable struggle to maintain himself against his rival. But no decisive victory or success on Jeroboam's side is recorded; he seems even to have retired from Shechem to Penuel beyond the Jordan (12^{25}). When the Pharaoh Shishak made a plundering expedition into Judah he certainly did not spare the territory of his former protégé, as appears from his triumphal inscription at Karnak;‖ but we are not told that Jeroboam made any attempt at resistance. Perhaps he was more of a politician than a warrior. He had successfully managed a revolt, but he did not succeed in establishing a dynasty. If the revolt was part of the divine plan (1 K 12^{15}), Jeroboam himself proved unequal to the greatness of his opportunity; and, so far from advancing the higher interests of his people, did not rise above the popular standards, and bequeathed to posterity the reputation of an apostate and a succession of endless revolutions.

2. Jeroboam II., king of Israel for 41 years, 790–749 B.C., son of Joash, and fourth ruler of the dynasty of Jehu. Under him N. Israel reached its highest point of prosperity and splendour. For years Israel had been suffering at the hands of Syria; but the tide turned at last, and Joash recovered from Benhadad ten cities which his father had lost (2 K 13^{25}). Syria had also been greatly reduced by the campaigns of the Assyrian kings, Shalmaneser III. (782–772) and Assurdan III. (772–750); so that Jeroboam was able to recover the old limits of the Davidic kingdom 'from the entering in of Hamath unto the sea of the Arabah.' That he was able to establish his rule in the S.E. implies that he must have reduced the Moabites to submission. The meagre statement of 2 K 14^{25} is the only definite piece of information which the historical books give us. The complete picture of the times of Jeroboam must be drawn from the materials furnished by the prophecies of Amos. The nation was enjoying the fruits of Jeroboam's successes. Confident of J″'s patronage, Israel was at last free to devote itself to the ease and pleasures of a period of unwonted peace. Wealth increased, and with it went luxury and self-indulgence (Am 3^{15} 5^{11} $6^{7.8.11}$). Religious worship was celebrated with the greatest splendour and popularity, both at the royal sanctuary of Bethel (7^{13}) and at Gilgal and Beersheba (4^4 5^5 8^{14}). But along with all this material prosperity went a deep-seated moral corruption, which it was the prophet's chief concern to denounce. Oppression of the poorer classes by the rich, justice sold and perverted, immorality openly practised, rapacity and greed of gain, were the sins which Amos marks as characteristic of the time. He foretells the impending judgment. The Assyrian was not far off; the only barrier between him and Israel, Damascus, had been removed; J″ will summon this nation to afflict Israel, and they will be carried captive beyond Damascus (6^{14} 5^{27}).

JEROHAM (יְרֹחָם).—1. The father of Elkanah and grandfather of Samuel, 1 S 1^1. While LXX A has Ἰεροάμ, B has Ἰερεμεήλ, i.e. Jerahmeel, and the latter may be correct (Driver, Text of Sam. p. 3). In the genealogy of Samuel as given by the Chronicler, while MT has uniformly יְרֹחָם, the LXX has in 1 Ch 6^{27} A Ἰεροβοάμ, B Ἰδαέρ, and in 6^{34} A Ἰερεάμ, B Ἡαάλ. 2. A Benjamite family name, 1 Ch 8^{27} 9^8. 3. A priestly family, 1 Ch 9^{12}, Neh 11^{12}. 4. 'Sons of Jeroham' were amongst David's heroes, 1 Ch 12^7. 5. A Danite chief, 1 Ch 27^{22}. 6. The father of Azariah, a captain who helped Jehoiada in his measures for the overthrow of Athaliah, 2 Ch 23^1.

JERUBBAAL (יְרֻבַּעַל, Ἀρβάαλ, Ἰαρβάλ, Ἰεαροβάαλ, Ἰεροβάαλ).—A name given to Gideon, Jg 6^{32} 7^1 $8^{29.35}$ $9^{1.2.5.16.19.24.28.57}$. It is = 'Baal strives,' Baal being a name for J″, as in Ishbaal, Meribbaal; it cannot = 'one who strives with Baal,' as Jg 6^{32} would suggest (LXX δικαστήριον τοῦ B.). Perhaps Jerubbaal should be written Jerubaal (יְרֻבַעַל from יָרָה not רִיב) = 'Baal, i.e. J″, founds,' cf. Jeruel, Jeremiah: so Wellh., Budde, Moore. This name was altered to Jerubbesheth (יְרֻבֶּשֶׁת;—besheth = 'shame') when Baal could no longer be used of J″ without offence, 2 S 11^{21} (LXX Ἰεροβοὰμ υἱοῦ Νήρ, Luc. Ἰεροβοάλ); cf. Ishbosheth, Mephibosheth. See art. GIDEON.

JERUBBESHETH.—See JERUBBAAL.

JERUEL (יְרוּאֵל 'founded of El').—That part of the wilderness of Judæa facing the W. shore of the Dead Sea below En-gedi (see EN-GEDI). It was here, according to the narrative of 2 Ch 20^{16}, that in the time of Jehoshaphat there assembled a great host of the children of Moab, Ammon, and other trans-Jordanic tribes, who had swept across the plain at the S. of the Dead Sea, and were encamped at the foot of the lofty cliffs of Ziz (or Haziz). This spot was near the mouth of one of the deep ravines which descend from the table-land, along whose bed the stream, fed by perennial springs, would be available for the use of the host. The same locality was the scene of several memorable events in OT history (Gn 14^{7}, 1 S 24^{1-4}).

* 12^{31} and 13^{33b} seem to have formed one sentence, of which 12^{31} has preserved the more original end. This sentence was broken up by the insertion of $12^{33.32a}$. Note tautology in $12^{32.33}$; the latter verse forms an introduction to the following narrative. 13^{33} seems to have been adapted out of older materials to suit the preceding account, which it clearly implies. See Lv 23^{33-36} P; and Dillmann, Levit.^{2} p. 583.

† The phrase is constantly repeated, 1 K 14^{16} $15^{26.30.34}$ 16^{26} 22^{52}, 2 K 3^3 $10^{29.31}$ $13^{2.6}$ 14^{24} $15^{9.18.24.28}$ 23^{15}. The compiler, who regards past history from the point of view of Dt, looked upon Jeroboam as the founder of a schism which violated the first principle of the Dt. Code, the law of the one sanctuary.

‡ Cf. 1 K 16^{1-4} 21^{20b-22} 21^{24}, 2 K 9^{7-10}. Note the anachronism, 14^9 'all that were before thee' (Jeroboam); Tirzah, v.^{17}, does not seem to have become a royal residence till later, 15^{21}.

§ This is contradicted by 12^{21-24}, of doubtful authority. The exaggeration of the numbers and the unhesitating submission to a prophet point to later redaction.

I. NAMES.—The name Jerus. first occurs in Jos (10^{1} 15^{63}; when the inhabitants are called Jebusites, cf. Jg 19^{10}, 2 S 5^{6}). Various trs. of the name have been proposed, some depending on the later and longer form, and on its pointing as if a dual; but these discussions are superseded by the discovery of letters from an early ruler of Jerus. (Tel el-Amarna collection), which show not only that the name existed before the Heb. conquest of Pal., but also that its meaning (as spelt U-ru-sa-lim and URU-sa-lim) is 'city of Salim,' or 'city of peace,' which agrees with the rendering by Gesenius, 'abode of peace.' The suggestion of Sayce (Academy, 7th Feb. 1891, HCM 177, EHH 28) that Salim is the name of a deity is unsupported: the sign for deity is not used as a prefix to the name, and the word Sa-lim is elsewhere found in the Tel el-Amarna letters with the meaning of 'peace.'* It is by no means improbable that the Jewish tradition, which places the Salem (properly Shalem) of Melchizedek at Jerus. (Gn 14^{18}, see Jos. Ant. I. x. 2; Wars, VI. x. 1), and the King's Vale (Gn 14^{17}, Jos. Ant. VII. xi. 3) two furlongs distant, may be correct; and the monumental spelling favours the view that the city may have been first called Salem only; but it is not doubtful that it was called Jerus. as early as the time of Joshua. It may also have been called Jebus (but see Moore on Jg $19^{10.\,11}$, cf. the Jebusite, Jos 18^{28}). In Ps 76^{2} we read, 'In Salem was his covert (see Jer 25^{38}), and his lair (fig. of lion) in Zion.' The explanation in the Mishna (Zebaḥim xiv. 8), which connects Salem with Shiloh, together with other suggestions (see Midrash Bereshith Rabba, ch. 89), are too fanciful to need notice. In the Talm. the later and longer form of the name Jerusalem is used, and the city is also called Beth 'Olamim (בית עולמים) 'the house of Ages' (Tosephta, Tohoroth, ch. 1).

The Roman name, given by Hadrian after A.D. 135 to the restored city, was Ælia Capitolina, and this appeared on coins of the early Khalifs of Damascus in the Arab. form Ailia. Its survival to the 10th cent. is noticed by Eutychius, and it was known to Jerome, and appears in the lists of Synods as late as A.D. 536. This name was derived from that of Ælius Hadrianus himself, combined with that of Jupiter Capitolinus, whose statue Hadrian erected on the ruined site of the Temple. In the 10th to 13th cents. the city was called Beit el-Mukaddas, 'The Holy House' (see Sam. Chronicle, el-Mukaddasi, and el-Edrisi). The modern name is el-Kuds esh-Sherîf, 'The holy (city), the noble (town),' and in common speech el-Kuds only. On some of the Hasmonæan coins the longer spelling of the name Jerusalem occurs. The native Christians, as well as the Jews, still use the old name in the Arab. form Yerusalîm.

II. NATURAL SITE.—Jerus. stood on the site occupied by the present town, though at its greatest it extended farther to N. and S. The geogr. position (taken at the Dome of the present Cathedral of the Holy Sepulchre) is 31° 46′ 45″ N. lat., 35° 13′ 25″ long. E. of Greenwich. The town stood on spurs extending S.E. from the main watershed of Pal., and still presents almost the appearance of sliding downhill towards the Kidron ravine on the S.E. This ravine (now called Wâdy en-Nâr, 'Valley of Fire') is one of the main drains of the country, and is formed by the junction of three head valleys, the longest on the E. being the Kidron proper, running due south, west of Olivet; the second, which itself had two branches, passed through the city S.E.; the third, running S. and turning E., is the Valley of Hinnom. The summit of Olivet is 2641 ft. above the Mediter., and the valleys at their junction have a level of about 2000 ft. above the same. Thus Jerus. was defended, on the E., S., and S.W., by natural fosses 500 ft. deep, and was naturally weak only on the N. and N.W., from which quarters it has always been attacked in the various sieges recorded in history. In considering the natural site it is, however, important to remember the geological character of the region, and the changes which have been due to artificial alterations—the levelling of hills and the cutting of scarps, ditches, reservoirs, and aqueducts, together with the filling up of the valleys by ruins, or with a particular purpose. The present features, though somewhat obscured by these circumstances, are, however, distinguishable in ancient accounts of the site, and the careful measurement of rock levels, in all parts of the city, now enables us to speak with certainty as to the original conditions. The strata dip down S.E. from the watershed, with an average inclination of 10° or 12°. The highest beds, called locally Nâri and Kakûli, are found on the summit and slopes of Olivet. The Nâri is identified with the nummulitic beds found on Gerizim and Carmel, which belong to the Middle Eocene period. The Kakûli is a soft white limestone with bands of flint or chert, and containing marine shells as fossils, with ammonites and other distinctive genera of the Upper Chalk. The E. cliffs of the Kidron Valley, below this white chalk, are formed by the Mezzeh—a hard silicious limestone with bands of flint and fossils. This, with the underlying beds, belongs to the period of the Lower Chalk. The Mezzeh also appears in the Sacred Rock (es-Sakhrah), on the summit of the Temple Plateau, W. of the Kidron; in the cliff of Antonia to the N.; and in the cliff of the traditional Calvary, as well as in that N. of the city at the so-called 'Jeremiah's Grotto.' Under the Mezzeh is a deep bed of fine white limestone, very suitable for building stone, and hardening by exposure. It is locally known as Meleki, and in it are excavated the great reservoirs of the Temple Area, and the ancient quarries under the city N.W. of the Temple. Beneath the Meleki again is a hard dolomitic limestone, of white colour streaked with pink, which appears on the watershed surface W. of the city, and which is called the 'Santa Croce' marble, being found near the Convent of the Cross. The alternation of these hard and soft beds accounts for the existence of cliffs and slopes, and for the water supply of the city, which is deficient on the W., the water sinking down through the Meleki bed, and only appearing in the Kidron ravine to the E., where the dolomitic limestone is near the surface. The natural drainage of the watershed is collected in this ravine, and no springs occur near the city at any higher level. The thickness of the various beds differs in different parts, the Mezzeh 'tailing off' to the N.W.

* Sayce's view is controverted by Zimmern (Zeitschr. f. Assyr. 1891, p. 263) and Jastrow (Journ. Bib. Lit. xi. [1892], p. 105).

The rock is visible on the present surface on the N. and N.W., near the watershed, and in the N.W. part of the Temple Area. In the valley beds it is hidden by an accumulation of rubbish, which within the city has a depth in some cases of 40 or 50 feet. The level of the surface of the rock has in these parts been traced in mines, in wells and cisterns, and in sinking foundations for houses. About 150 such measurements have been carefully recorded, of which 40 are in the Temple Area and the rest within the ancient city, being fortunately most numerous in the most important parts. On the ridge S. of the Temple 30 such observations were made during the mining operations.* In some cases the rock is visible in great cisterns for a considerable distance, in others its absence is proved by the existence of masonry walls. Thus, although it is probable that a certain amount of earth covered the valley beds from the first, it is known that, in parts where a shingle of stones covers the rock, the filling up of the valleys has been caused by the frequent demolition of buildings during the various destructions of the city.

By the light of such observations it is easy to recover the original features now obscured by the ruins. The eastern spur, on which the Temple stood, was flanked by the Kidron on the E., and by a narrow valley on the W., having its head near the present Damascus Gate. This ridge was artificially cut across, at an early period, N. of the Temple Area, where its level was 2460 ft. above the sea; and a second scarp, facing S. and about 25 ft. high, was made, leaving a block of rock, on which the present Turkish Barracks stand, and a small flat plateau within, which rose gradually to a natural knoll, now known as the Sakhrah or Sacred 'Rock.' From this point the plateau narrows into a ridge, which falls gradually S. from a level of 2440 ft. to about 2130 ft. at the junction of the W. valley with the Kidron at Siloam. West again of the narrow western valley, now filled up to a depth of some 40 ft., the main site of the city itself was cut in two by a broad, deep recess, with steep slopes to N. and S., having its head at a narrow neck of land which rises to about 2500 ft. above the sea, and divides this central valley or recess from the upper part of the Hinnom Valley W. of the city. The great recess has its bed under the modern 'Street of David' (which runs down from the W. or Jaffa Gate towards the Temple), opening out into the narrow valley already noticed W. of the Temple hill. This broad, deep recess is now also partially filled in, to a depth of 50 ft., with rubbish, and its great breadth and the steepness of its slopes were hardly suspected until proved by the examination of the rock in various large cisterns in its bed, hidden under the modern surface, and discovered about 1872 during the German excavations in the precincts of the old Hospital of the Knights of St. John.

The central recess or valley thus divides the site of Jerus. into a S. and N. quarter. The S., which is generally allowed to be the 'Upper City' of Josephus, is a flat hill, measuring about 1000 yds. N. and S. by 600 yds. E. and W. On the N. it had a very steep slope, with a precipice on the N.E.; on other sides the slopes were also steep, and the plateau, which has an average elevation of 2500 ft. above the sea, thus stands 500 ft. above the valley beds on the S.E. The N. quarter was less extensive, and for the most part lower than the S. It was formed by a spur from the main watershed, and connected with the S. by the narrow neck or isthmus already noticed, towards the W. of the city. The N. spur appears to have risen into an isolated knoll of small area, which is now shown as the traditional site of Calvary, the summit being about 2490 ft. above the sea. In speaking of the topography of the city it will, however, be shown that the outline of the N. spur was changed in the 2nd cent. B.C. by cutting down the E. part of the N. ridge, near the narrow valley which divided it from the Temple, and which was then filled up. The later Herodian period witnessed an extension of Jerus. beyond this N. quarter, and the hill N. of the Temple (separated off by the artificial ditch as noticed above) was then occupied, and protected by another scarp 20 ft. high, running E. and W., and now supporting the modern city wall in the N.E. quarter. The part of the hill so included in the city (and which Josephus calls Bezetha) rose to about 2520 ft. above the sea close to the N. scarp, and to 2470 ft. on the S., opposite the rock of the Barracks from which the fosse separated it. The city also extended, on the N.W., over the flat ground beyond the knoll of the traditional Calvary, rising gradually to the watershed of Judæa, 2580 ft. above the sea. It would appear that from an early period the flat head of the narrow central valley was flanked by cliffs, the northern of which (at Jeremiah's Grotto outside the modern Damascus Gate) formed a remarkable isolated knoll, 2570 ft. above the sea, which is now regarded by many as the true site of Calvary. The N. ditch was probably in part natural, for in the cliff under the modern city wall, E. of the Damascus Gate, is the entrance to the great quarries under the city, where the Meleki beds were cut out for the Temple masonry. That these quarries existed early, and were not merely hewn for the building of Herod's Temple, has been shown by M. Clermont-Ganneau's discovery of a rudely cut sketch of a cherub, or man-bull, in the ancient Heb. or Phœn. style, attributable to a period earlier than that of Herod, and carved on the rock wall of the quarry.

The natural water supply of Jerus. is deficient, and was very early supplemented by the cutting of rain-water tanks and aqueducts. The only natural spring was in a cave on the W. side of the Kidron, S. of the Temple Area. It is remarkable for its intermittent flow, due to a natural syphon leading from a subterranean basin in the rock. The water collected by the valleys from the rocky watershed, and sinking, as above explained, down to the impervious dolomite beds beneath the hill spurs, also bursts out in winter at the junction of the three valleys, and flows in a clear rapid stream towards the Dead Sea. But this overflow is due to the sinking of a deep shaft at the well now called Bîr Eyûb ('Job's' or 'Joab's' [see below] well), which reaches down 125 ft. The well is connected with an ancient aqueduct, 70 to 90 ft. below the present surface, on the W. side of the Kidron Valley, and reached by stairways. Although unfinished, this aqueduct must have assisted in collecting the waters to the Bîr Eyûb.* The water of the upper spring was also early diverted through an aqueduct to the Pool of Siloam, as will be explained later. In the earliest period of the history of Jerus. it is possible that the bed of the Kidron, then much deeper than it now is,—in consequence of the accumulation of rubbish,—was occupied by a stream flowing on the surface from the upper cave spring, S. of the Temple. Water also found its way down the narrow ravine W. of the Temple hill, and is there still found in the subterranean cave of the Hammâm esh-Shefa, or 'healing-bath,' under the W. wall of the present Ḥaram enclosure. The shaft of the modern well is 86 ft. deep, the lower part having been apparently made in the

Rom. period. The rocky chamber and passage at the bottom extend 128 ft., but no ancient notice of this reservoir has been discovered with any certainty. The water supply, both here and at the Bîr Eyûb, failed in the winter of 1864–1865, being dependent on the rainfall of a comparatively small area, near the watershed N. of the city. The various artificial reservoirs which supplied the city will be described later. We have no information as to any works which may have been carried out by the Jebusites before David fixed his capital in Jerusalem. The spring in the Kidron Valley existed then, and it is possible that the supply in the Hammâm esh-Shefa was also available, and much nearer to the surface. In Neh (as noticed later) the 'Dragon Spring' is mentioned W. of Jerus.; but if a natural supply of water is to be understood, it would seem to be now dried up, as there is no known spring on this side of the city. Jos. calls this place the 'Serpents' Pool' (BJ V. iii. 2).

III. HISTORY.—In accordance with Jewish tradition (Jos. Ant. I. x. 2, VII. xi. 3; Wars, VI. x. 1), Jerus. may be supposed to have been a city (SALEM ?) in the time of Abraham (Gn 14^{18}, where see the cautious note of Dillmann), whose king, Melchizedek, was priest of God Most High (El 'Elyōn). The city is next noticed as the capital of a Canaanite king at the time of the Heb. conquest (Jos 10^{5}). The inhabitants were Jebusites; and although its king was killed (Jos 10^{26}), yet Jerus. was not attacked until later (Jg 1^{8} [?]), and remained a Jebusite town, and 'city of the stranger' (Jg 19$^{10-12}$), in the time of the Judges. The discovery of letters from the early governor of Jerus. to Amenophis (c. B.C. 1480–1440), in the Tel el-Amarna collection, gives us some additional light on the history of the city. It is clear from various references that an Egyptian resident, supported by an Egyptian garrison, was there established at a time when all the Philistine towns (including Gezer) were also held by Egypt. But this garrison was withdrawn in consequence of the general rebellion of Pal. and Syria against Egypt, and the king of Jerus. reported that, in consequence, all the country had rebelled to the Khabiri (see HEBREWS), who had occupied Aijalon, Lachish, Gezer, Ashkelon, and Zorah, his own position being perilous in consequence. It is clear, therefore, that Jerus. was already a royal Canaanite city before the Heb. conquest under Joshua.

The boundary line of Judah was so drawn as to leave Jerus. in the lot of Benjamin (Jos 15^{7}, cf. 18^{28}, both P; in 15^{63} [JE] Jerus. belongs to Judah); the border ran from En-rogel (in the Kidron) along the Valley of Hinnom S. of Jerusalem. The city was attacked by Judah (Jos 15^{63}; in Jg 1^{21} Benjamin has possibly been substituted for Judah; Jg 1^{8} is a very doubtful passage, see Moore's note), who, however, did not succeed in driving out the original Jebusites. The choice of Jerus. as a capital, in David's time, was probably due to its being already an important town, in a position more central than Hebron, and less exposed to incursion from the plains than Shechem. David's men scaled the 'gutter,'* or 'water-channel' (ẓinnōr, παραξίφιδι), and took the 'mountain fort of Zion,' or 'citadel' (Ἄκρα), which Josephus identifies with the Upper Agora of his own time (Wars, V. iv. 1). The mockery of David by the Jebusites shows that Jerus. was considered a strong fortress (2 S 5$^{6-9}$). The occupation of the citadel did not lead to the expulsion of the Jebusites, for at a later period David appears to have been friendly with Araunah the Jebusite. Jerus. at the time of this conquest (about B.C. 1000) included not only the fort of the upper city, but also a quarter called Millo (2 S 5^{9}), which the LXX renders Ἄκρα. Josephus states that David joined the lower city (τὴν κάτω πόλιν) to the citadel (τὴν Ἄκραν), surrounding both with walls (see 1 Ch 11$^{4-8}$), and established himself in the citadel, calling it (or else Jerus. generally) the city of David. The ark was soon after brought to the city of David, and 'placed in the tent that David had pitched for it' (2 S 6$^{12-17}$, 1 Ch 13^{13} 15^{25}–16^{3}). The site of the Temple was afterwards chosen at the 'threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite' (2 S 24^{18}, 1 Ch 21$^{18-28}$), which site was bought for fifty shekels of silver (about £9), or, according to the later account (1 Ch 21^{25}), for 600 shekels of gold. Preparations for the building were made by David, and the Temple was begun by Solomon in the month of Ziv (latter part of April), in the 4th year of his reign (about B.C. 965), and finished in the month Bul (Oct.), seven years later (1 K 6$^{1-38}$). The ark was finally removed out of the city of David into the Temple (1 K 8$^{1-8}$), at the feast of consecration in the seventh month, Ethanim (September). The royal palace of hewn stone and cedar was not finished till later (1 K 7$^{1-12}$), and two bronze pillars were cast for the Temple, with a 'sea' or large reservoir, and other vessels (1 K 7$^{13-51}$). The Temple, which in plan and adornment resembled those in Babylon, described in a later age in the records of Nebuch., was provided with an altar court with walls and cedar beams (1 K 6^{36}); but the dimensions of this court are not noticed. It is stated that the 'inner' or altar court was separated from other outer courts (2 Ch 23$^{5-8}$). The royal palace appears (as will be shown in dealing with Topography) to have stood near the Temple on the S., and it was not in the city of David (1 K 9^{24}, cf. 7^{8}). Solomon also built the wall of Jerus., and 'shut in the ravine [?; RV 'repaired the breach'; Heb. סָגַר אֶת־פֶּרֶץ] of the city of David' (1 K 9^{15} 11^{27}). Jerus. was enlarged by the building of the Temple and Palace beyond the bounds of the city of David.

After the revolt of Israel from Rehoboam, Jerus. was attacked by Shishak, king of Egypt (about B.C. 935), when the gold shields made by Solomon fell a prey, with all the treasures of the Temple and of the Palace. We possess a monumental record in which Shishak (Sheshonk) gives the names of 133 cities in Pal. subdued during this campaign, and the last name Iura . . ., though unfortunately half-defaced, may perhaps represent Jerusalem. Another attack on the city (about B.C. 850) is recorded (2 Ch 21^{16}) in the reign of Jehoram, when the Phil. and Arabs near Egypt sacked the 'king's house.' After the revolution of Jehu, and murder of Ahaziah, king of Judah, at Jezreel, Athaliah, who had usurped the throne of her grandson, was slain at the entrance of the palace, probably about B.C. 842 (2 K 11^{16}, 2 Ch 23^{15}); and about B.C. 786 Jehoash of Israel marched on Jerus. from the W. plain, and broke down 400 cubits of the wall on the W., carrying off once more the treasures of the Temple and of the Palace (2 K 14$^{13.14}$, 2 Ch 25^{23}). The incursion of Ramman-nirari from Assyria (about B.C. 803) into N. Israel and to Damascus, no doubt accounts for the strengthening of Jerus. by Uzziah (2 Ch 26$^{9.15}$), when towers were built on the W., on that part of the wall broken down some twenty years before. The city was protected by engines of war, similar to those shown in Assyr. pictures. Jotham (about B.C. 742–736) also strengthened J. by building the 'higher gate' of the Temple, and a wall on Ophel, S. of the same (2 K 15^{35}, 2 Ch 27^{3}). The conquests of Tiglath-pileser in Syria were then causing anxiety in Judah. Ahaz, the next king, was tributary to this Assyr. conqueror (about B.C. 734), and before that date he was attacked by the enemies of Tiglath-pileser,—Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Samaria,—who, however, failed to take Jerus. (2 K 16^5). The fall of Samaria to Sargon alarmed Hezekiah, son of Ahaz, and the great improvements — from a military point of view — which were carried out in Jerus., in the water supply of SILOAM (which see), may have been begun by Ahaz at the time of the fall of Damascus in B.C. 732 (Is 8^6). The advance of Sennacherib rendered it necessary to prepare for attack about B.C. 701 (Is 22^{11}), and the aqueduct from Gihon to Siloam was probably complete when the Assyr. came to Jerus. (2 K 20^{20}, 2 Ch 32^{30}). The account which we possess of this attack in the records of Sennacherib harmonizes with that found in the Bible (2 K 18^{13}–19^{37}, 2 Ch 32$^{9-23}$, Is 36. 37). Sennacherib records (see Schrader, KAT^{2}) that he invaded Philistia in B.C. 701, and defeated the Egyptians at Altaka; that he set up new tributary rulers in Ekron and Ashdod; and 'captured forty-six cities' of Judah, shutting up Hezekiah in Jerus., like 'a bird in a cage.' He speaks of the riches sent to Nineveh from Jerus., but is silent regarding the disaster that overtook his army on the Egyptian frontier, drove back the Assyr. beyond the Euphrates, and saved Jerus. for a century. The alliance with Egypt (see Is 36^6) prevented any danger from Egypt to Hezekiah's capital, but that with Babylon (Is 39) was less useful, since Merodach-baladan was defeated by Sennacherib in B.C. 696. Manasseh (acceding probably about B.C. 695) was tributary to Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal, according to their inscriptions, and the former attacked Egypt in 680, and finally took Memphis (Nah 3^8) in B.C. 670. The carrying of Manasseh to Babylon (2 Ch 33^{11}) appears to have occurred under Assurbanipal (see Jos. Ant. X. iii. 2) after B.C. 668, and this king is known to have restored Babylon as his southern capital. The further fortification of Jerus. by a wall on Ophel, outside the original city of David, and extending to the Fish Gate on the N. of Jerus., was effected apparently after his restoration. Amon, the successor of Manasseh, reigned only two years, and the rule of Josiah coincided with the last years of Assyr. empire, witnessing the terrible Scythian raid which swept down to the borders of Egypt. The Law was discovered in the Temple, and a great reformation effected in B.C. 621 (2 K 22, 2 Ch 34); but in B.C. 609 Necho marched to the aid of the Babylonians and Umman-manda (see Davidson, Nahum, note at end), who combined against Nineveh, and Josiah, endeavouring to stop his advance, was slain at Megiddo (2 K 23^{29}). The allies soon quarrelled over the spoils; and the defeat of Necho at Carchemish left Pal. an easy prey to Nebuch. of Babylon, the new master of W. Asia. In B.C. 597 Jerus. was taken and despoiled (2 K 24$^{11-15}$), and Jehoiachin carried to Babylon. In B.C. 586 Nebuch. again attacked Zedekiah, who fled 'by the way to the Arabah' (2 K 25^4), or from the S.E. side of the city. On the 7th of Ab the city was entered by the Babylonians, and on the 9th (about 1st Aug.), according to the Mishnic traditions (Taanith iv. 7), the ancient Temple of Solomon was destroyed, with the Palace and all the chief buildings of Jerusalem. The walls were broken down. The treasures of the city had already been taken in the first raid; the sacred vessels were now carried away (2 K 25^{13}, 2 Ch 36^{18}), and the ark itself was probably removed, since Nebuchadnezzar's practice in other cases was to carry off all objects of veneration belonging to defeated peoples. Many of the chief men of Judah had followed Jehoiachin into captivity, and the rest now followed Zedekiah, leaving only the 'poor of the land as vinedressers and husbandmen' under a Babylonian ruler of Palestine (2 K 25^{12}).

The history of the ruined city remains a blank until Cyrus arose and wrested the empire from Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king. The Jews, like the Phœn., were content to remain subject to the tolerant Aryan race which ruled from India to Egypt. The Temple was refounded at Jerusalem (Ezr 3^{12}), and was completed twenty years later (Ezr 6^{15}). The return of Ezra to Jerus., and the establishment of the Law, may be referred to the reign of Artaxerxes I. (B.C. 458); see ZERUBBABEL. Acc. to Jos. (Ant. XI. vii. 1), Bagoses, a general of Artaxerxes II., profaned the Temple, and laid a tax on the sacrifices. The restoration of Jerus. by Nehemiah (Neh 3) was merely a rebuilding of the ancient wall found in ruins; but this account is the most complete that we possess of the ancient topography of the city.

The battle of Issus and taking of Tyre laid Pal. at the feet of Alexander the Great, and about B.C. 332 he visited Jerus., according to Jos. (Ant. XI. viii. 4). The city suffered, after his death, from the long struggle between the Ptolemies in Egypt and the Seleucidæ in Antioch. Ptol. Soter, son of Lagus, entered Jerus. on the Sabbath in B.C. 305 (Ant. XII. i. 1), and Antiochus III. (called the Great) took the city from the Egyp. in B.C. 219 (Ant. XII. iii. 3). The influence of Greek art and customs began to spread over Pal. under the Seleucidæ, and when Antiochus IV. (Epiphanes) visited Jerus. in B.C. 172, there appears to have been a gymnasium (perhaps the Xystus, W. of the Temple), built by the Hellenists in the Holy City (1 Mac 1^{14}, 2 Mac 4$^{9-12}$, Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1). Two years later, Antiochus, defeated in Egypt, entered Jerus. unopposed, in a Sabbatic year (1 Mac 1^{20}, Ant. XII. v. 3). The Jews, for more than three centuries and a half, had been peaceful subjects of Pers. and Gr. overlords, but the growth of Gr. influence alarmed the pious, and the tyranny of Epiphanes bred a desperate spirit of revolt. In B.C. 168 Apollonius, the Gr. general, was sent to Jerus. by Antiochus, with orders to suppress the national religion. On the 15th of Chislev he desecrated the Temple by sacrifice of swine,—probably in honour of Ashtoreth and Tammuz, to whom swine were sacrificed in this age in Cyprus and Phœnicia,—and an image of a boar is said to have been erected in Jerus. (1 Mac 1^{47}, Ant. XII. v. 4). The Gr. garrison was placed in a newly erected citadel on Akra, which—as will be shown later—is identified by Jos. with the Lower City. This citadel dominated the Temple, and during the revolt of Judas Maccabæus its garrison held out even after the defeat of three Gr. armies sent against the patriotic leader. In B.C. 165, after the second defeat of the Greeks, Judas and his followers restored the half-ruinous and neglected Temple, erecting a new altar in place of that desecrated by Apollonius. The 'Feast of Lights,' on the 25th of Chislev, still commemorates this restoration (1 Mac 4^{52}, Ant. XII. vii. 7). Two years later, however, Antiochus V. (Eupator) retook Jerus., and overthrew the walls of the city and of the Temple (1 Mac 6^{62}, Ant. XII. ix. 5). After the defeat and death of Judas at Elasa, following soon after his victory at Adasa over Bacchides the desecrator of the Temple, a period of misfortune for the Hasmonæan house followed; but under the skilful management of Jonathan, the brother of Judas, the national cause prospered. In B.C. 143 Jonathan built a wall in the middle of Jerus. to separate the Akra citadel from the Upper Market or Agora (1 Mac 12^{36}, Ant. XIII. vi. 7). His successor Simon, the wisest and most prosperous of these famous brethren, finally took the Akra citadel on the 23rd of Ziv in B.C. 139, and partly levelled the mountain on which it had stood—a labour lasting three years (1 Mac 14^{36}, Ant. XIII. vi. 7; on the historical reliability of this statement see Schürer, HJP I. i. 262, note 14). John Hyrcanus, his son, who, being at Gazara, escaped the massacre at Dok, was besieged in B.C. 134 in Jerus. by Antiochus Sidetes, and is said by Jos. to have opened the tombs of the kings, and taken treasure thence (Ant. XIII. viii. 4). After his successful rule the quarrels of the Hasmonæans brought further trouble on the city, and the Romans, having under Pompey conquered Armenia to the Caucasus and to the borders of Persia, began to interfere in the affairs of Palestine. An alliance with Rome was one of the latest acts of Judas Maccabæus, and had been renewed later. The country had been at peace during the greater part of the reign of Alexander Jannæus, and the Gr. influence (as witnessed by his coins) had been steadily reasserting its power. After the death of Alexandra-Salome, the able widow of Alexander Jannæus, a war of succession broke out between her sons. Hyrcanus II., aided by Aretas (Harith) the Arab king of Petra, besieged Aristobulus II. in Jerus. in B.C. 65; but Scaurus, one of Pompey's generals, ordered him to raise the siege (Ant. XIV. ii. 1). In B.C. 63 Pompey himself besieged Jerus., to put an end to the increasing anarchy. Aristobulus was removed, the walls were demolished, and the bridge leading to the Temple was thrown down. Pompey is said to have entered the Holy of Holies itself. The city was made tributary to Rome (Ant. XIV. iv. 4; Wars, I. vii. 1). The subjection of Pal. was, however, not yet complete. In B.C. 55 Crassus, before his defeat in Parthia, again pillaged the Temple (Ant. XIV. vii. 1), and in B.C. 47 the Hasmon. rule came to an end; Antipater the Idumæan, in recognition of his services on the borders of Egypt, was made ruler of Pal. by Julius Cæsar the year after the battle of Pharsalia. Four years later his famous son, Herod the Great, became joint ruler with Phasael, and in B.C. 40 became Procurator of Judæa, by order of the Senate. He was then driven from Jerus. by the invasion of the Parthians, under their prince Pacorus, who re-established the Hasmon. Antigonus (Wars, I. xiii. 13). In B.C. 37 Herod, assisted by Sosius the Rom. governor of Syria, took the city from Antigonus (Ant. XIV. xvi. 2), and a period of strong rule and peace followed. In B.C. 24 Herod built his palace in Jerus., on the W. side of the upper city—the old Hasmonæan palace being on the E., near the Temple bridge. He also restored the citadel Baris or Antonia, N. of the Temple, and celebrated games in a new theatre in the city (Ant. XV. viii. 1–5, ix. 1). Later in his reign, in B.C. 19, Herod began to replace the ancient Temple enclosure by a new and much larger structure, and this work was finished in B.C. 11 (Ant. XV. xi. 3, 6). The death of Herod, in the year of the Nativity (B.C. 4), was signalized by the destruction of the golden eagle erected over the Temple porch (Wars, I. xxxiii. 3, 8). The history of Jerus. under Herod's successors, and under the procurators, is almost a blank. In A.D. 35 Pontius Pilate was recalled, in consequence of the riots caused by appropriating the Corban to the purpose of making an aqueduct from near Bethlehem to the Temple (Ant. XVIII. iii. 2). Agrippa the tetrarch, grandson of Herod the Great, began the building of a new wall on the N. side of the city, about ten years after the Crucifixion (A.D. 41–44), and Jerus. appears to have grown much larger during the Rom. period (Ant. XIX. vii. 2, viii. 2). King Agrippa, son of the last, built a palace in the upper city (Ant. XX. viii. 11), about A.D. 56, and the Temple courts were completed in A.D. 64 (Ant. XX. ix. 7). The Jewish discontent, gradually increasing since the time of Agrippa's death, led to revolt against the incompetent procurator Gessius Florus in A.D. 66, and during the riots the palaces and Antonia were burnt (Ant. XX. xi. 1; Wars, II. xvii. 6). Cestius Gallus, president of Syria, besieged Jerus. in consequence, and took the third wall on the N., but retreated in panic (Wars, II. xix. 1–9), and Vespasian was called to re-establish Rom. power in Palestine. The campaign was slow and systematic, and not until all the country to the N. had been subdued, and Jericho and the plains of Joppa reconquered, did the Rom. army advance to the attack of Jerus., a task left to Titus in consequence of Vespasian's becoming emperor. The great siege in A.D. 70 was perhaps the most terrible ever undergone by the city, and the full account by Jos. illustrates the topography of Jerus. at the time of its greatest extension and strength.

The great siege lasted 143 days, from the 14th Abib, when the Romans encamped on Scopus (Wars, V. xiii. 7) until the final conflagration on the 8th of Elul (Wars, VI. viii. 5). The dates of the principal events may be briefly given.

The first day of the siege (23rd Abib) corresponded in A.D. 70 to the 9th April. That lunar months must be supposed is shown by Jos. (Wars, VI. viii. 1, 9). The final fall of Jerus. took place in the hottest part of the year, on 4th September. The terrible sufferings of the besieged from famine, thirst, and disease were thus intensified by the season. It is unnecessary to enter into detail as to these sufferings, or as to the various factions whose conflicts added to the general misery. The Idumæans, introduced by one faction to support themselves, thought only of plunder; and concerted action against the Romans was rendered difficult. The numbers of the besieged are stated by Tacitus at 600,000 (Hist. v. 13); the estimate of over a million by Jos. is incredible (Wars, II. xiv. 3, V. vi. 1, xiii. 7, VI. ix. 3). The ordinary population cannot have exceeded 30,000 at most; but in consequence of the Passover, and of the Idumæans being admitted, the city must have been densely crowded. The Jewish system perished in blood and fire, and the few survivors were made victims of the circus games at Cæsarea, or led captive to Rome, where, on the Arch of Titus, the golden candlestick, the table of shewbread, and the silver trumpets from the Temple (but not the ark, which never stood in the Temple after the time of Nebuch.), are shown as spoils of this great victory.

In order to understand the topography of Jerus., and to distinguish its later remains, it is necessary briefly to follow the history from A.D. 70 down to the present day. After the capture of the upper city, the walls of the city and of the Temple were thrown down, with the exception of the royal towers and part of the W. wall (Wars, VII. i. 1), which remained as the fortress of the legion left in charge. Jerus. has no history for sixty years after its destruction, but an inscription of the time of Trajan (A.D. 117) appears to record the worship there of Serapis by a veteran who may even have been present with Titus. In A.D. 130 Hadrian visited Jerus., and in A.D. 134 occurred the desperate rebellion of the Jews under Bar Cochba and Rabbi Akiba. They were expelled from Jerus. by Julius Severus (Dion Cassius, lxix. 13), and according to later statements (Talm. Jer. Taanith iv. and Jerome, Comm. on Zec 8^{19}) T. Annius Rufus ploughed up the foundations of the Temple. In the following year they were massacred at Bether (Bittîr) close to Jerus. on the W. In A.D. 136 Hadrian rebuilt the city, and called it Ælia Capitolina. He dedicated the Temple site to Jupiter Capitolinus, and decreed the exclusion of the Jews from Jerus.—a decree which, though perhaps not always enforced, was still in existence in the time of Constantine (Dion Cassius, lxix. 12; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iv. 6). The city of Hadrian appears to have been smaller than that of the time of Titus, since the S. part of the upper city was outside the wall in the 4th cent. A.D. In A.D. 130 Hadrian found only a few houses and seven synagogues (see Biblia Sacra, pp. 393–455). Only one of these was standing in the 4th cent. (Bordeaux Pilgrim). Hadrian appears to have repaired the walls (Orosius, Hist. xv., written about A.D. 416), and, according to the Paschal Chronicle (which is, however, a late authority), the new buildings included 'the two markets' (δημόσια), a theatre, a mint, a tricameron, a tetranymphon, and a dodekapylon, formerly called anabathmoi (In Ann. 3 Æl. Hadr.). Eusebius (Life of Constantine, iii. 36) speaks of a temple of Venus erected in the city, at the site of the subsequent Church of the Holy Sepulchre. This was afterwards (see Fetellus in A.D. 1151–1157) attributed to Hadrian. Jerome (Epist. 49) speaks of a marble statue of Venus 'on the rock of the Cross,' and Eusebius connects her worship with the dark cave (μυχόν) under this rock. A coin of Antoninus Pius represents Venus in a tetrastyle temple with the legend C.A.C., and later coins of Aurelius and Severus have the same reverse with the legend Col. Æl. Cap. It seems clear that either Hadrian or the Antonines erected this Venus temple in the N. quarter of Jerus., when it was rebuilt as a pagan city. A coin of Hadrian, struck in Jerus., shows a temple which may be the same. Jerome also informs us (Comm. Is 2^{8} and Mt 24^{15}) that equestrian statues of Hadrian were placed on the site of the Holy of Holies, together with an idol of Jove. These were still standing in A.D. 333 (Bordeaux Pilgrim), and an inscription on a stone now built upside down into the S. wall of the Temple enclosure bears the name of Hadrian, and probably belonged to one of these statues. The head of a small statue was picked up by a peasant, in the road N. of the Damascus Gate, in 1873. It is crowned with laurel, and the Rom. eagle appears on the front of the crown. The features resemble those of known statues of Hadrian, and the head may have belonged to one of the above statues.

A cohort was stationed at Jerus. to prevent the Jews entering the city (Sulpic. Severus, Hist. Sac. ii. 25), and the decree still held in A.D. 312 (Eusebius, Theophania). But in A.D. 333 (Bordeaux Pilgrim) we find the Jews allowed annually to visit the 'pierced stone,' which was near Hadrian's statue in the Temple. They anointed the stone, lamented over it, and tore their garments. It apparently represented the site of the Temple, over which no building is mentioned, and is usually identified with the Sakhrah or sacred 'rock,' still remarkable for the shaft which pierces down to the cave beneath from the surface of the rock. Jerome also speaks (Comm. Ezk 1^{15}) of the Jews entering Jerus. to wail, in his own time. He says that for fifty years (or until A.D. 130) Jerus. remained laid even with the ground, and lost its former name (Comm. Ezk 5^{1}); but under Hadrian it regained the position of an ordinary provincial capital.

We hear no more of its history for nearly two centuries, until the establishment of Christianity by Constantine; but, in the tombs on Olivet, stone boxes have been found (osteophagi) belonging to the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th cents. A.D., which held the bones of Jews and Jewish Christians there collected close to the Valley of Judgment. The traditional tomb of St. Pelagia (noticed from the 4th cent. down) contains also an early Gr. text—'Courage Domitela, none is immortal'—which may (as compared with others in Bashan) belong to the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D. Pilgrimages began to be customary in the latter cent., when Alexander, a bishop of Cappadocia, visited Jerus.; and a female pilgrim is noticed by Cyprian. In A.D. 315 Eusebius speaks of pilgrims coming from all parts of the world to witness the fulfilment of prophecy, and to worship on the Mount of Olives (where the footprints of Christ were shown), which appears to have been the only sacred station then known. Our first account of the city under its new conditions is that of the Bordeaux Pilgrim, who arrived while the new cathedral of the Holy Sepulchre (or 'Church of the Anastasis') was being built by Constantine's order in A.D. 333. As regards the recognition of the site, we have no statement in earlier authors to show that the true locality was preserved by tradition. The legend of Helena's miraculous discovery of the Cross is unnoticed by contemporary writers, though in A.D. 326 the mother of Constantine visited Bethlehem and Olivet. The Cross itself is only noticed by St. Cyril twenty years after the great Basilica was built, and in A.D. 383 by Jerome (Epit. Paulæ, 5). Eusebius gives what purports to be Constantine's letter to Macarius (Chron. Ann. 339) ordering the erection of the new buildings which he elsewhere fully describes (Life of Constantine, bk. III. chs. 34–39). There is no doubt that the sites described are the same still shown, but the letter to Macarius speaks of them as 'long hidden under the earth'; and Eusebius says that the Venus temple was first destroyed, and 'beyond all hope' the sacred tomb was found under the mound then cleared away. There is no doubt that an ancient Jewish tomb (now called that of Nicodemus) was discovered, and that the traditional Holy Sepulchre (a tomb of the Gr. and Rom. type) is rock-cut; the surrounding rock is said to have been cut away to leave the monument isolated in the flat surrounding space.

What is lacking is any evidence that the sites are genuine. The story of the finding of the Cross is first told by Rufinus in A.D. 410, and by Theodoret about A.D. 440. The 4th cent. was an uncritical age, and many of the sites shown to pilgrims were impossible—such as that of Rephidim in Moab (St. Sylvia), of Job's Stone in Bashan, and of the Transfiguration on Olivet—a blunder of the Bordeaux Pilgrim, who also makes David to have met Goliath near Jezreel. The situation of the sites which Constantine honoured awakened apparently some suspicions from an early age. Eusebius (Life of Constantine, iii. 33) speaks of the new Jerus. rising round the Basilica opposite the old Jerus. in ruins; and mediæval writers all explain that the extension of the city, which in the 4th cent. A.D. surrounded the Venus temple, was due to Hadrian. A careful consideration of the topography and military considerations tend, however,—as will be seen later,—to show that these sites were equally within the city at the time of the Crucifixion. The case for the traditional sites, which have remained unchanged for fifteen centuries, is thus very weak. The buildings erected by Constantine have perished, but it is generally agreed by Willis, de Vogüé, and Prof. Hayter Lewis, that they consisted of a hemispherical building, continued eastwards by a great basilica, with a court or atrium on its E., and an entrance (propylæa) with pillars. This was, in fact, a building similar to that erected by Constantine at Bethlehem, where the original pillars of the basilica are still standing. The great leaden roof was gilded, the sacred cave was surrounded with columns, the cloisters had galleries above; the walls were adorned with sculpture (and possibly with mosaics), and, on the S. apparently, was the great tank—still traceable—in which (Cyril, Catech. Lect.) the neophytes were baptized at Easter, by total immersion, according to the usual rite. The details of the description are not very clear, but it is certain that the building was large and magnificent, and that it embraced not only the Holy Sepulchre in its open court surrounded by the hemisphere, but also the rock of the supposed Mount Calvary to the S.E. with the cave beneath. A site which had once been a pagan temple was thus (as in other cases at Tyre, Cæsarea, Gerasa, etc.) converted into a Christian shrine, but the strange festival of the Holy Fire (first noticed in the 9th cent.) seems to have perpetuated the pagan fire-feasts of earlier days—perhaps once celebrated at the same spot. In like manner the cave at Bethlehem had, according to Jerome, been sacred to Adonis before the grove was cut down, and the church built by Constantine over its site.

In A.D. 335 a synod was held at Jerus. and the Church of the Anastasis was consecrated (Euseb. Life of Const. iv. 43–47). On the temporary reversion of the state to paganism, Julian is said to have attempted to rebuild the Temple (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. iii. 20), but was deterred by what would seem to have been an explosion of fire damp, in A.D. 362. About A.D. 450 the empress Eudoxia, widow of Theodosius II., retired to Jerus., where she died in A.D. 461. She built a Church of St. Stephen, of which only a few fragments have been found N. of the city, and restored the walls, enclosing the Pool of Siloam within their circuit (Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. i. 22). During this period the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451) made Jerus. a patriarchate independent of Cæsarea. Short descriptions of the city (by Eucherius and Theodosius) belong to the 5th and 6th cents., and the number of sacred sites shown to pilgrims steadily increased; but the genuineness of these traditions is always doubtful.

About A.D. 532 Justinian erected important works in Jerus., including the Church of the Virgin—usually supposed to have stood on the site of the present Aksa Mosque, the pillars of which have Byzantine capitals which may belong to this age—together with a hospital to the W. of the Temple enclosure, and a Church of St. Sophia, which Antony of Piacenza (about A.D. 600) places at the Prætorium, distinguishing it from St. Mary. It is also placed 'in' the Prætorium by Theodosius (or Theodorus, A.D. 530), and the Prætorium was always shown by Christian tradition N. of the Temple at the site of Antonia, and near the Twin Pools in the fosse to the N. The remains of a small church in the modern barracks are believed by de Vogüé to represent St. Sophia. The Temple Area itself, as described in the 4th, 5th, and 6th cents., was in ruins, and no building stood on the site of the Holy House. The S.E. corner of the enclosure stood up as a ruined 'pinnacle' to which pilgrims refer. Even after the great Church of St. Mary was built, Antony of Piacenza speaks of the 'ruins of Solomon's Temple,' and these ruins are noticed by Eucherius (about A.D. 427–440) and by Arculf (A.D. 680). We have no account of any buildings in this area before the time of Justinian, but the description by Procopius (de Edificiis Justiniani, bk. v. ch. 6) shows that his work was extensive. Unfortunately, the account is not very clear: cloisters (στοαί) are noticed, which may have run on the outer walls of the enclosure—except, as he says, on the E. The present Golden Gate, on the E. wall of the enclosure, is architecturally Byzantine work, and may have been built in the 6th cent. (as compared with buildings in N. Syria); it is unnoticed by early writers, and apparently first mentioned by Sæwulf early in the 12th cent. The hospital attached to St. Mary is said (Antony of Piacenza) to have held from 3000 to 5000 beds. Procopius speaks of two hospices (ξενῶνες),—one for pilgrims and one for the sick,—but it is not clear where they stood.

The buildings so erected by the two great emperors, Constantine and Justinian, suffered from the attack of Chosroes II. of Persia, who, aided by 24,000 Jews, is said (Paschal Chron. A.D. 614) to have destroyed the Church of the Anastasis, taking the patriarch Zacharias and the Holy Cross to Persia. Immediately after, Modestus, the vice-patriarch, is said to have begun the restoration of the church (Life of St. John Eleemon in Acta Sanct. ii. p. 500). In A.D. 629 Heraclius made peace with Siroes, son of Chosroes, and entered Jerus. in triumph through the Golden Gate (Paschal Chron.) on the 14th Sept. This victory of Christendom was, however, shortly to be followed by the triumph of Islam. It was in the same year that Mohammed destroyed the idols of Mecca, and in A.D. 637 Khalif Omar appeared before Jerusalem. The Christians resisted for some time (four months according to Theoph., Chronograph, or two years according to Arab writers). The earliest accounts (including that of Eutychius, A.D. 870) are not contemporary, but all writers seem to agree that Omar's conquest was unstained by blood. He proclaimed security for life and property on payment of tribute, and allowed the existing churches to stand, though no new ones might be built. He erected a wooden mosque W. of the Sakhrah (Arculf, A.D. 680, and Jelâl ed-Din, A.D. 1470), and purified the Rock itself. According to Eutychius (Annals, written not later than A.D. 940), the Christians had built nothing on the site of the Temple thus accepted by Islam.

The Ommiyah dynasty of Khalifs being established at Damascus, 'Abd el-Melek, the 10th Khalif (according to all Arab authorities, see Guy le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems), erected a Kubbeh or 'Dome' over the Sacred Rock in A.D. 688. The small 'Dome of the Chain' to the E. is said to have been the model of this building, which originally consisted of a drum supported on arches, and on pillars torn from some earlier Byzantine building, with an outer arcade—octagonal, and adorned with glass mosaics. These still remain, and the Kufic text above this outer arcade still preserves the date of building, A.H. 72. Under these Khalifs, and under the great Abbaside dynasty of Baghdad, the relationship of Islam and Christendom was friendly, and Harûn el-Rashid is said to have sent the keys of Jerus., with other presents, to Charlemagne, who erected in Jerus., E. of the Holy Sepulchre, chapels, and a hospice for Lat. pilgrims (Bernard, Itin.), towards the close of the 8th cent. A.D. The buildings on the site of Constantine's Church of the Anastasis, which Modestus erected as already noticed, and of which Arculf drew a rough plan on a wax tablet for the abbot of Iona, appear to have been small separate chapels. The Holy Sepulchre was enclosed in a round church. Calvary was covered by a separate building, and a third to the E. replaced the Basilica of Constantine. On the S. was a chapel of St. Mary, and N. of Calvary a chapel of the 'Prison of Christ.' In the early part of the 9th cent. the patriarch Thomas restored the dome over the round church (Eutychius, Ann. A.D. 813–833), and these buildings remained uninjured during the rule of the Abbasides.

But in A.D. 969 Jerus. fell under the power of the Shia'h Khalif of Egypt, Mue'z (see Gibbon, ch. lii.), and in A.D. 1010 Hakem, the crazy and fanatical Egyp. Khalif, ordered the destruction of the chapels by fire (Will. Tyre, i. 4). Through the influence of the Byzantine emperor, Constantine Monomachus, they were restored in A.D. 1048 by the patriarch Nicephorus, but the new buildings, which existed when the Crusaders took Jerus., were small and poor (Will. Tyre, i. 6, viii. 3). They were similar to those of Modestus, but included a chapel of St. Mary N. of the Sepulchre, and three chapels of St. John, Holy Trinity, and St. James (which still remain), to the S. The cave under the site of Constantine's Basilica, which is covered by a dome resting on clumsy Byzantine pillars, dating perhaps from the time of Modestus, was shown as the 'Chapel of St. Helena,' and as the place where the Cross was miraculously discovered.

The history of the Temple enclosure is traced during this earlier Moslem age by inscriptions, and by the later Arab histories. In A.D. 728 a cupola was erected over the Aksa Mosque (Justinian's Church of St. Mary), and this building was injured by earthquake about A.D. 758–775, but restored soon after by the Khalif el-Mahdi. In A.D. 831 the Khalif el-Mamûn restored the Dome of the Rock, and apparently enclosed it in the present octagonal outer wall. The beautiful bronze gates of this wall bear the above date (A.H. 216). The beams on the old roof resting on the wall also bear a date answering to A.D. 913. In A.D. 1016 an earthquake partly destroyed the dome, and the mosaics were repaired in A.D. 1027 as stated in their inscriptions. The present wood-work of the dome was erected in A.D. 1022. In A.D. 1060 the roof of the Aksa fell and was repaired.

The decreasing power of the Arab race, and the rise of the Seljuk Turks, led to the attack on Jerus. by Isar el-Atsis, a Turcoman general, who drove out the Egyptians in A.D. 1077, when 3000 of the inhabitants are said to have been slain (Will. of Tyre, i. 6). The cruelty of the Turkish rulers was the immediate cause of the first Crusade, when reported by Peter the Hermit after his visit to Jerus. in A.D. 1094. The number of pilgrims had been steadily increasing since about A.D. 1000, when the Amalfi merchants founded the hospice of St. John Eleemon, on the site apparently of that of Charlemagne. While the great contest raged round Antioch, the Egyptians took advantage of the absence of Turkish forces in the N., and seized Jerus. in 1098, expelling the Turcomans after a siege of 40 days. They then rebuilt the walls a few months before the army of Godfrey appeared from the plains (Will. Tyre, vii. 19). The Crusaders encamped on the N. and W., and subsequently extended on the S.W. After forty days of desperate struggle, the city fell on 15th July 1099 (Will. Tyre, viii. 5), and a terrible massacre followed. No sooner was the feudal system established in Pal. than extensive building operations began. About A.D. 1103 a new cathedral to cover the chapels of Nicephorus—already described—was commenced (Sæwulf, Itin.; Will. Tyre, viii. 3), and by A.D. 1140 the Church of St. Mary the Great was built S. of the cathedral. In A.D. 1136 the new buildings in the Temple Area, and the new decorations of the Dome of the Rock, then called Templum Domini, were finished after 20 years of work, a chapter of canons having been established in A.D. 1112 (Will. Tyre, viii. 3). The city increased in prosperity for half a cent., and was filled with churches and palaces, many of which remain almost intact. For eighty years it was never besieged, and its walls fell into decay, until the increasing dangers of the Lat. kingdom led to their being renewed in A.D. 1177 (Will. Tyre, xxi. 25). But, after the fatal defeat at Hattîn, the Franks in Jerus. were besieged by Saladin, and surrendered, escaping any massacre, in A.D. 1187. Saladin reconverted the Temple enclosure into a Ḥaram or 'sacred' Moslem sanctuary, and two years later restored and regilt the Dome of the Rock, as shown by an inscription in the dome itself. In A.D. 1192 he repaired the city walls to oppose Richard Lion Heart, and from his time downwards the Egyp. and Turkish rulers have added constantly new buildings in the area, with minarets, stained-glass windows, and other details, which it is impossible here to notice fully.

The main building periods of Jerus., after A.D. 70, have been described at some length, in order to explain the present conditions of Jerus. archæology, and to distinguish the works of later ages. In A.D. 1219 the city walls were dismantled by order of the Sultan of Damascus, and ten years later Frederic II., emperor of Germany, received Jerus. by treaty from the Sultan of Egypt. In spite of the conditions of this treaty, the Christians, in A.D. 1239, began to rebuild the walls, when Daûd Emir of Kerak fell upon them, massacred many, and demolished the walls and the citadel. Yet in 1243 Jerus. was again restored, without conditions, to Christendom by the Sultan of Damascus, and its walls repaired. In the following year the Kharezmian Tartars—foes of Islam and Christendom alike—seized Jerus., massacred the population, and rifled the tombs of the Lat. kings near the foot of Calvary. In 1247 they were driven N. by the Sultan of Egypt, and Jerus. remained subject to Egypt for 270 years, until the Ottoman Sultan Selim I. conquered Syria in A.D. 1517. Inscriptions on the walls show that the present ramparts are due to Suleimân the Magnificent in A.D. 1542. The line differs somewhat from that of the 12th cent. on the N.W. and S.

Jerus. under the Turks remained without a history, and hardly increased at all in size, until some 30 years ago. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre was partly destroyed by fire in A.D. 1808, but most of its present structures, including the bell tower, the choir, and the chapels, remain as they were in the 12th cent. In 1825 there was a revolt against Turkish rule in the city. In 1832 it was taken by Mohammed Ali from Egypt. In 1834 the peasantry entered by the drains, and shut up the garrison in the capital for a week. They were relieved by Ibrahim Pasha on the 6th of June. In 1840 Jerus. was restored to the Turks by Europe. The Anglican bishopric was founded two years later. In 1850 the riots of Gr. and Lat. clergy preceded the Crimean War. In recent years there has been a steady influx of Jewish inhabitants, so that a population of about 20,000 souls in 1872 has risen to about 50,000 at the present time. New quarters have sprung up outside the walls, on W., N., and S., and a railway from Jaffa has just recently been completed. The main cause of this rapid development, which has led to much misery and poverty in the city, was the persecution of the Jews in Russia under the late Tzar.

IV. TOPOGRAPHY.—From the preceding account of the history it will be seen that, in treating of the topography of Jerus., we have to bear in mind various changes due to human agency throughout a period of nearly 4000 years; and that in studying the Antiquities we have to separate the work of Romans, Byzantines, Arabs, Crusaders, Egyptians, and Turks from the older remains of the semi-Greek period, of the Hebrews, or of the Canaanites. We have, in like manner, to distinguish later traditions from the true topography of the earliest writers, and monkish sites from those of the Bible. Our only real authorities are the OT for the earlier periods, and Josephus for the condition of the city just before the great destruction, which he witnessed in A.D. 70. In the Mishna we have, however (Tract Middoth), a valuable account of Herod's temple, written about A.D. 150 at Tiberias, by men who were able to visit the ruins, and to hear the remembrances of rabbis who had survived the siege. The accounts given by Jos. were, on the other hand, penned far away in Rome,—that in the Wars about A.D. 72, and the Antiquities as late as A.D. 93.

The long controversies which have raged as to most of the features of the ancient city have been silenced by the survey of Jerus. in 1864 by Sir C. W. Wilson, by de Vogüé's careful study of the Temple site in 1860–1863, and by the celebrated excavations of Sir C. Warren (1867–1870); and the differences of opinion now existing are few and comparatively unimportant. The principal discrepancies which will be found on the most recent maps concern three points only—(1) the position of the 'City of David,' (2) the position of 'Akra,' (3) the size and exact position of the Temple. The first two may here be briefly considered. The third will be noticed in treating of the Temple Area.

As regards the extent of the city at the time of David's siege, we read that 'David took the stronghold of Zion, the same is the city of David,' and 'dwelt in the fort, and called it the city of David; and David built round about from Millo (Akra in LXX) and inwards' (2 S $5^{7.9}$). Jos. (Ant. VII. iii. 1) explains that, having crossed the ravine, David seized the citadel (Ἄκραν) 'and settled himself in Jerus., which he called David's own city': he adds, 'But David having also surrounded the lower city (τὴν κάτω πόλιν) and joined the citadel (τὴν Ἄκραν), to it made them one body.' In another passage he says that the upper city of his own time was called by David the fort (φρούριον), 'but by us the Upper Agora' (ἡ ἄνω ἀγορά), and that the other hill, called Akra (Ἄκρα), supported the lower city (τὴν κάτω πόλιν) (Wars, V. iv. 1). From these passages it is clear that Jos. considered the city in David's time to have coincided with the upper and lower city of his own days; and he describes the old wall surrounding the upper city (Wars, V. iv. 2) as having been built by David and Solomon. He agrees with the LXX in identifying Millo (that part of the city which was not the fort) with the quarter called Akra by the Greeks, though he also uses the word (with the article, however) of the fort itself. He regards the term 'city of David' as equivalent to Jerus. as it existed in David's time. He never uses the term Zion, which (see ZION) is in no part of the OT identified with any particular quarter of the city, though in the 1st cent. B.C. the author of 1 Mac appears to apply this name esp. to the Temple hill. The site of the upper city, or Upper Agora, is by general consent identified with the principal S.W. hill of Jerus., which Christian writers from the 4th cent. A.D. downwards call Zion. It is also not disputed that the lower city lay to the N. of this hill, which commanded the whole town, and was indeed the only hill on which a strong military situation could be found. The meaning of the word Millo is doubtful (it is usually rendered 'rampart' or 'filling'), and the site is not clearly indicated in the OT, but there is no reason to doubt that Jos. is right in identifying it with the lower city of his own time. It appears clear, then, that the Temple hill was not included in Jerusalem. It was the site of a threshing-floor, and such floors are always found outside towns and villages in Palestine. When the Temple was built, and the quarter of the Nethinim arose on Ophel ('the swell'),—a name applied later to the lower and narrower spur of the same hill S. of the Temple,—walls were of necessity extended to include this new quarter. The 'city of David' thus became a term applying to the old main quarters of Jerus., which alone existed in David's age, or perhaps esp. to the stronghold of Zion or upper city.

It has, however, been supposed by some recent writers (e.g. W. R. Smith, C. Wilson, Stade, Sayce, Buhl)[*] that the term 'city of David' should be applied to the spur S. of the Temple, the name Ophel not applying to the whole spur. It is clear, however (Neh $3^{26.27}$, Wars, V. iv. 2), that Ophel was a place with houses, and the spur in question presents an area of only a few acres, the crest being lower than the summits of the other hills, and unfitted for the erection of a citadel. The theory rests partly on a passage which, as rendered in AV, would make the aqueduct from Gihon run 'to the W. side of the city of David,' under Ophel (2 Ch 32^{30}). The true rendering (as given by Keil and others) may be, however, 'westwards to the city of David,' which agrees with the supposition that the latter term applies to the upper city. It is sometimes also urged that the tombs of the kings buried 'in the city of David' were on Ophel—a question to be considered later. The indications found in other passages seem to show that no part of the Temple ridge was within the city of David. In 1 K 8^{1} we find the ark described as brought up to the Temple 'out of the city of David' (so 2 Ch 5^{2}). In Neh 3^{15} the 'stairs that go down from the city of David' are noticed with Siloam. In 2 Ch 32^{5} 'the Millo' is placed 'in the city of David,' and it was not on the Temple ridge. In 2 Ch 33^{14} we read that Manasseh built 'an outer wall westwards to the city of David, as far as Gihon in the ravine.' It appears therefore that the topography shown in most recent maps is correct, and that the city of David included the fortress (מְצֻדָה) of the upper city, and the quarter called Millo, or the lower city to the N. Solomon also fortified 'the Millo' (1 K 9^{24}), and 'shut in the ravine (?; RV 'repaired the breach'; Heb. סָגַר אֶת־פֶּרֶץ) of the city of David his father' (1 K 11^{27}); and after the building of his own palace he brought his Egyp. queen to her palace 'out of the city of David' (1 K 9^{24}). Subsequent notices of Millo (2 K 12^{20}, 2 Ch 32^{5}) do not throw much more light on the subject, though Silla, noticed in the first of these, may be connected with the 'causeway' of another passage (1 Ch 26^{16}), and with the stairs from the city of David, if the word (see SILLA) means 'steps.' The causeway in question was W. of the Temple. As regards the water supply of Jerus. at this time the Gihon spring (now called the Virgin's Fountain) was at some distance from the upper city; but it is possible that the great reservoir (now called Hammâm el-Batrak, 'the Patriarch's Pool,' and by others Hezekiah's Pool), which stands immediately N. of the upper city, was already in existence within the walls. It is very probably the 'upper pool'

(Is 36[2]) which, in Hezekiah's time, had a conduit, and was situated near a 'highway.' It was here that the Assyr. appeared before Jerus. in B.C. 701, and Jos. tells us (Wars, V. vii. 2) that the 'camp of the Assyr.' was on the N.W. side of the old city, which was the natural quarter whence they would have approached from Philistia. The pool in question is called by him Amygdalon, and a conduit entering the city on this side is also noticed by him. An aqueduct still leads from the Birket Mamilla outside Jerus. on the W. to the Patriarch's Pool. This upper pool may have formed the chief supply of water within Jerus. as early as David's time.

As regards the royal palace of Solomon and of the later kings, we learn that it took thirteen years to build (1 K 7[1-12]). 'For he built the house of the forest of Lebanon: the length thereof was 100 cubits, and the breadth thereof 50 cubits, and the height thereof 30 cubits.' The pillars were of cedar with rafters above. It had a porch 50 cubits wide and 30 cubits long at one end, in which was the ivory throne of judgment. A Ḥarîm or women's house appears to have been attached; courts existed both within and outside, and the 'great court' (v.[12]) seems to have been connected with the Temple itself. In later times we read of the king's high house by the court of the guard (Neh 3[25], see 12[39]), as being immediately south of the Temple, and the King's Gate was in the same vicinity (1 Ch 9[18]), being probably the high gate of the king's house (2 Ch 23[20]), and the gate of the guard near the king's house, which adjoined the Temple (2 K 11[19]). Solomon's palace was outside the city of David (1 K 9[24], 2 Ch 8[11]), and the Horse Gate was by the king's house outside the Temple, being the way by which the horses came to the king's house (2 K 11[16], 2 Ch 23[15]). This gate was on Ophel S. of the Temple (Neh 3[28], see Jer 31[40], Jos. Ant. IX. vii. 2, 3). It is clear that Ezk refers to the palace as being divided from the Temple only by a wall (Ezk 43[8]), and there is a general agreement that the palace stood south of the Temple. It seems to have still existed after the Captivity,—probably in ruins,—but disappeared when the royal cloister of Herod's enlarged Temple enclosure was built, and it is not noticed by Jos. in his account of the Jerus. of his own time.

The fortification of the Ophel spur, south of the Temple, was begun by Jotham (2 Ch 27[3]), for Uzziah is only said to have strengthened the W. wall (2 Ch 26[9. 15]), and it was completed by Manasseh (33[14]). This wall existed no doubt, therefore, in Hezekiah's time, but was rendered more formidable by his successor. It is described in the latter passage as extending from the city of David to Gihon in the ravine, and as stretching to the Fish Gate on the N. side of the city. Ophel and the Temple were thus included, about B.C. 800, in the fortified circuit. As regards Gihon, it is to be noted that it is described as 'in the torrent-valley' (naḥal), a term which appears to apply exclusively to the Kidron Valley, the valley of Ben Hinnom being always denoted by another word (gai). Thus when Solomon was taken down to Gihon (1 K 1[33. 38]) he was in full view of the faction supporting Adonijah on the cliff of Zoheleth (now Zuhweileh) on the opposite side of the Kidron. The term Gihon ('bursting forth') indicates a natural spring, such as is found only at the so-called Virgin's Pool or 'Ain Umm ed-Deraj ('spring of the mother of steps') under the E. slope of Ophel. In the Bk. of Jos (15[7] 18[16]) this spring is called En-rogel, usually rendered 'Fuller's Spring,' and sometimes connected with the Fuller's Field (Is 36[2]),* but the true meaning is perhaps the 'spring of the water channel.' Hezekiah was the first to connect this spring with the Pool of Siloam by the aqueduct still existing (2 K 20[20], Is 22[11], 2 Ch 32[4. 30]), although it would seem that the 'ditch (or basin) between the two walls' had, according to Is, been already made for the waters of an older pool in the time of Ahaz. In the last-quoted passage Hezekiah's great work is described fully, and, as tr. more correctly than in the AV, may read 'stopped the upper spring of Gihon and brought it straight underground, westwards, to the city of David.' In 2 Ch 32[4] we read that when preparing for the Assyr. attack Hezekiah 'stopped the watercourse that ran (or overflowed) through the midst of the land' (or 'earth'; the LXX read πόλις, 'city'), in order to prevent the Assyrians from getting water. It seems probable that the sudden flow of the Gihon spring (which occurs intermittently) had formerly made a stream, flowing down the Kidron Valley (the bed of which was then much deeper), and that by means of the aqueduct the water was diverted to the Siloam pool, close to the city walls. The Gihon spring now rises in a cave reached by a descent of many steps, but the earth in front of the cave may have been first piled up by Hezekiah, and some natural outlet must at first have existed. The actual line of the old wall near Siloam is unknown, but in the account of the flight of Zedekiah we read of the 'way of the gate between the two walls, which is by the king's garden' (2 K 25[4], Jer 39[4]), this gate leading to the Arabah or Jordan Valley. Jos. understands a 'fortified ditch' on the side nearest to Jericho (Ant. X. viii. 2), and the king's garden (belonging no doubt to the palace) was close to Siloam (Neh 3[15]). Hence the wall of Jotham and Manasseh appears to have passed near Siloam. Gihon is called by Jos. 'Solomon's Pool' (Wars, V. iv. 1), and placed close to Ophel.

The general topography of Jerus., before its destruction by Nebuch., thus appears to be clear; but the site of the tombs of the kings is still controverted. Fifteen kings are said in the OT to have been buried in the 'city of David,' though Josephus only says 'in Jerusalem.' These were David, Solomon, Rehoboam, Abijah, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joram, Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah, Azariah, Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, and Josiah. The monument was known in the time of John Hyrcanus (Ant. VII. xv. 3) and of Herod (XVI. vii. 1), both of whom sought treasure in it. It appears to have been known in the time of the apostles (Ac 2[29]), but Josephus unfortunately does not describe its position. According to the Mishna (Parah iii. 2, see Tosephta, Baba Bathra, ch. 1), the only tombs in Jerus. were those of the family of David and of the prophetess Huldah. Certain unworthy kings were, however, buried elsewhere. Manasseh was buried 'in the garden of his own house in the garden of Uzza' (2 K 21[18]), and Amon was buried in the same place (v.[26]). They are not said to have been buried in the city of David (see Ant. IX. x. 4, X. iii. 2), and, if the garden of Uzza was the same as the king's garden, it lay not far from the palace, and near Siloam, as above explained. This may account for the notice of the 'sepulchres of David' (Neh 3[16]) near Siloam, if the term 'city of David' is to be strictly applied only to the older city. It is possible that all the kings were buried in this 'burying-place' (2 Ch 26[23]), but it is remarkable that one ancient tomb is known in the lower city — that now called the tomb of Nicodemus immediately W. of the traditional Holy Sepulchre. Jos. gives a remarkable account of the tombs of the kings (Ant. VII. xv. 3) which might apply to this existing tomb, with three Kukim or tunnel graves at the far end, and three on each side, thus accommodating nine bodies. A hole in the floor leads to other Kukim below, to the left of the entrance. It might, therefore, have sufficed for the kings buried in the city of David if—which cannot now be determined on account of a wall foundation—there were six Kukim in the lower tier. It is not impossible that this monument may be the real tomb of the kings, but it is also possible that all were buried near Siloam within the city walls; and future excavation may reveal the 'sepulchres of David' near Siloam.

* In the Mishna, Sheḳalim viii. 1, it is stated that the upper market-place was occupied by pagan fullers.

The most complete account of the topography of Jerus. in the Bible is found in the Bk. of Neh, which relates his survey of the ruined walls, and details his restoration of the ancient circuit. In the first passage (Neh 2^{13-15}) he describes how he went out by the gate of the valley (gai), W. of Jerus., 'E. of the Dragon Spring,' which seems to be the Serpents' Pool of Jos. (τῶν ὄφεων κολυμβήθρα), W. of the city (Wars, v. iii. 2), the site being, however, unknown; and passing S. by the Dung Gate he reached the 'Gate of the Spring,' and the King's Pool (probably Siloam). Then, going up N. by the 'torrent-valley' (Kidron), and finding the road blocked with ruins, he returned to the Valley Gate. In the second passage (Neh 3^{1-32}) the whole course of the wall is described from N. of the Temple, W., S., E., and N., to the starting-point. The names of the gates, and other details, agree with the scattered notices of earlier passages, and must be considered in order. The Sheep Gate, repaired by the priests (cf. Neh 12^{39}), is generally allowed to have been on the N. of the Temple. The towers Hananel and Meah appear to have belonged to the 'fortress' (birah, an Aram. word, Assyr. biratu) of 'the house' or Temple (Neh 2^{8}), which was apparently the later Baris on the site of Antonia (see 1 Ch 29^{19}, Jos. Ant. XVIII. iv. 3, Wars, I. iii. 3, v. 4; Mishna, Middoth i. 9, Tamid iv. 1, Zebaḥim xii. 3). These two towers are again noticed (Neh 12^{39}) in the same position, and Hananel (Jer 31^{38}) marked the opposite extreme (on the east) of the breadth of the city measured from the Corner Gate. The Fish Gate (2 Ch 33^{14}, Neh 3^{3} 12^{39}, Zeph 1^{10}) was probably the entrance by which men of Tyre brought fish to Jerus. (Neh 13^{16}), and is generally supposed to have been on the N. wall. The Old Gate or gate of the old (city) was probably in the city of David, the wall of Manasseh extending to the Fish Gate (2 Ch 33^{14}), in connexion with which a place called the 'second' (city or quarter) is noticed (הַמִּשְׁנֶה, Zeph 1^{10}); it is also noticed in the time of Josiah (2 K 22^{14}, AV wrongly 'college'). It is not impossible that Jos. refers to this quarter, in one passage, when speaking of the 'other city' (ἄλλην πόλιν, Ant. XV. xi. 5). These indications would seem to place the Fish Gate at the head of the narrow valley which bounds the Temple on the W. E. of this valley was the 'second quarter,' walled in by Manasseh, and W. of it was the old city of David. Next to the Old Gate is noticed (Neh 3^{8} 12^{38}) the Broad Wall, probably in the weakest part of the city on the N.W., and in this vicinity a gate called the Gate of Ephraim (2 K 14^{13}, 2 Ch 25^{23}, Neh 8^{16} 12^{39}) is noticed, about 400 cubits from the Corner Gate: inside this gate and the Water Gate there was a 'broad place' (Neh 8^{16} AV 'street'), where booths could be erected, and the Gate of Ephraim was between the Broad Wall and the Old Gate. The description applies to the flat ground immediately N. of the N.W. corner of the upper city. Beyond the Broad Wall was the Tower of Furnaces (Neh 3^{11}) near the Gate of the Valley which probably led out to the Valley of Hinnom, to which this term (gai) seems to be generally confined (see 2 Ch 26^{9}, Neh 2^{13}). The Tower of Furnaces may be one of those built by Uzziah at the Valley Gate, and at the Corner Gate, and his towers thus seem to have occupied the site of the later 'Royal Towers' (Wars, II. xvii. 6) at the N.W. corner of the upper city. The Corner Gate (2 K 14^{13}, 2 Ch 25^{23} 26^{9}, Jer 31^{38}, Zec 14^{10}) was apparently the same as the 'first' (or 'principal') gate, and was clearly on the W. of the city, where the principal road from the plains reached Jerusalem. The Dung Gate was 1000 cubits from the Valley Gate (Neh 2^{13} 3^{14} 12^{31}), and is perhaps the same as the Ḥarsith Gate near the Valley of Hinnom (Jer 19^{2}), sometimes rendered Gate of Potsherds. The dunghills of the city must have been in this neighbourhood. The place called Bethso by Jos. (Wars, v. iv. 2) is sometimes explained to mean Beth ẓoah, 'house of dung,' and would be in the same vicinity, on the W. side of the upper city. The Gate of the Spring (Neh 2^{14} 3^{15} 12^{37}) may have led to Siloam, with which it is noticed, and was apparently near the S.E. slope of the upper city. It is probably the gate by which Zedekiah fled (2 K 25^{4}, Jer 39^{4}), and is noticed in connexion with the wall of the Pool of Siloah, and with the king's garden, and the stairs from the city of David. The next points on the wall were 'over against' the sepulchres of David, and at the 'Tower of Heroes' (gibborim), and the 'turning of the wall' (Neh $3^{16.19}$). On Ophel was the 'Projecting Tower' near the Water Gate, and apparently close to the ancient palace by the 'Court of the Guard' (Neh $3^{25.26}$). The Water Gate would lead to the Gihon spring—probably by the rocky shaft which runs up to the surface of the hill, at the back of the cave in which the Gihon wells up. Between this and the Temple the ruins of a great projecting tower still exist on the old wall. The Horse Gate leading to the palace was close to the Temple, and from it the priests repaired the wall (2 K 11^{16}, 2 Ch 23^{15}, Neh 3^{28}, Jer 31^{40}). The palace is again noticed as the 'House of David' (Neh 12^{37}). On the E. wall of the Temple were two gates called Gate of Benjamin (Jer 20^{2}, Zec 14^{10}) and Gate of the Guard (2 K $11^{6.19}$ [הַשַּׁעַר אַחַר הָרָצִים], Neh 12^{39} [שׁ' הַמַּטָּרָה]). One of these may have been the Upper Gate (2 K 15^{35}, 2 Ch 23^{20}), noticed with Ophel, and one the Gate of Ham-miphkad (Neh 3^{31}). The description of the circuit closes at the N.E. corner of the Temple, and at the Sheep Gate whence it commences. There is, as shown, nothing which indicates discrepancy between this formal account and the earlier incidental notices of the city before the Captivity, or any difficulty in tracing the approximate line of the walls. The city so described occupied about 200 acres, and it is spoken of as extensive in Nehemiah's time (Neh 7^{4}). The suggestion once made, that Jerus. before the Captivity occupied only the E. Temple hill, has found few supporters, and it would reduce the city to the impossible area of some 10 acres, not including the Temple. The upper city and lower city are clearly supposed by Jos. to have existed in the time of David and Solomon, and the measurements of 400 and 1000 cubits, above noticed, cannot be reconciled with a view which would make Solomon's capital smaller than any of the modern village hamlets of Palestine. Ancient cities like Tyre and Cæsarea occupied an area of more than 100 acres, as did Rabbath Ammon; and Jerus. was at least as important as any of these.*

* Other places in Jerus. noticed in OT include the Temple Gate Sur (2 K 11^{6}; in 2 Ch 23^{5} 'gate of the foundation' [הַיְסוֹד] should prob. be 'gate Sur' [סוּר]), the New Gate—apparently the higher (or inner) Temple Gate (Jer 26^{10} 36^{10}), the graves of the common people (Jer 26^{23} 31^{40}) apparently in the Kidron Valley, the Prison or 'Guard' (Jer $37^{15.}$ [בֵּית הָאֵסוּר] ^{21} 38^{6} [חֲצַר הַמַּטָּרָה]), the Baker's Street (37^{21}); the Third Entry (or Chief Entry) of the Temple (38^{14}), the King's wine-presses (probably near the king's

We must next consider the topography of the Greek age, when the Hasmonæans carried out important works at Jerus., and the position of the Gr. citadel or Akra, which threatened the Temple. The Greeks are said to have fortified the city of David for themselves to lie in wait against the Temple (1 Mac 1[33]), to which the term Zion seems to be applied by this writer (1 Mac 4[36. 60] 7[32]): the Gr. tower was by (παρά) the Temple (1 Mac 9[52] 13[52]), and they issued from the city of David to the Temple (14[36]). Since the Temple hill was not in the city of David, it would seem that the tower in question was not on the Temple hill. Josephus, in relating the history of this period, calls the tower 'the Akra,'—a term which, as before noticed, he applies to citadels both in the upper and in the lower city. He, however, places the Gr. fortress in the lower city, which was then high, overlooking (ὑπερκειμένη) the Temple (Ant. XII. v. 4). From this citadel Nicanor came down to (εἰς) the Temple (XII. x. 5), and the citadel lay over (ἐπέκειτο) the Temple (XII. ix. 3). In another place he says that the Akra was no other than the lower city (Wars, V. vi. 1), and this apparent contradiction is explained in the passage which relates how Simon, brother of Judas Maccabæus, took the Gr. citadel, and levelled the hill on which it stood, so that the Temple might be higher than it (ὑψηλότερον ᾖ τὸ ἱερόν), a work which occupied three years (Ant. XIII. vi. 6). The tower (ἡ Ἄκρα) of 1 Mac is thus identified by Jos. with Akra, afterwards the lower city. He distinctly explains this in another passage (Wars, V. iv. 1), where he says that the Temple ridge (λόφος) was naturally lower than the Akra, and separated from it by a broad valley (φάραγγι), which the Hasmonæans filled up in order to join the city to the Temple, and demolished the tower so that the Temple might be higher than it. Before the destruction of the Gr. tower Jonathan built a wall in the middle of the city (1 Mac 12[36], Ant. XIII. v. 11), which divided the Jews from the Greeks. It seems clear that such a wall—which may have run along the N. face of the hill of the upper city—could not have affected a citadel on the Temple hill. Some recent writers have supposed this citadel to have stood N. of the Temple, where Baris—the later Antonia—was subsequently built by the Hasmonæans (Ant. XV. xi. 4), this view being supported by the Eng. tr. (Ant. XII. ix. 3), which makes the Akra 'adjoin' the Temple,—an incorrect rendering. It is clear that if the site of the Akra was levelled it cannot have been the same high rock still existing, on which—by general consent—Baris or Antonia is held to have been built, apparently by John Hyrcanus (Ant. XVIII. iv. 3), though, as already shown, towers there probably existed in Nehemiah's time and earlier. Most modern plans (including the Ord. Surv. of Jerus., which shows Akra W. of the Temple) agree in placing the lower city N. of the upper and W. of the Temple. The valley W. of the Temple may thus conveniently be termed in future the Hasmonæan Valley, which they filled in with the soil from the Akra hill when it was lowered.

From the Hasmonæan period we pass on to consider Jerus. as it existed under Herod the Great, and at the time of the great siege by Titus; and here the accounts given by Jos. are easily understood, and accord with the earlier topography of OT. Tacitus gives us a short description (Hist. v. 11. 12), in which he states that Jerus. occupied two hills, with great walls with flanking portions, and crags with towers 60 ft. above the crags, or 120 ft. high when on the flat ground. There were other walls under the royal palace, and the tower of Antonia was particularly conspicuous. There was a fountain of water which ran perpetually, and the mountains were hollowed beneath, and pools and cisterns made for rain water. This brief notice agrees with the more detailed account by Josephus. He states (Wars, V. iv. 1, 2) that Jerus. had three walls on the only side (the N.) on which it was not defended by impassable valleys. It was founded on two hills facing (ἀντιπρόσωπος) each other, and these were divided by a valley in which the houses ended (κατέληγον) on either side (ἐπάλληλοι). The hill which supported (on the S.W.) the upper city (τὴν ἄνω πόλιν ἔχων) was by far the highest and largest. It was the fortress (φρούριον) of David, and the Upper Agora of the time of Josephus. The other hill (to the N.W.) was called Akra (not the Akra), and was gibbous (ἀμφίκυρτος) in shape. Over against (ἀντικρύ) this was a third ridge (λόφος), naturally lower than Akra, and separated from it by the broad valley filled in by the Hasmonæans. The valley dividing the upper and lower city was called Tyropœon ('of the cheesemakers'), and reached to Siloam. This is clearly the deep, broad valley, or recess, described under the head 'Natural Site,' which falls E., on the N. side of the upper city, and joining the Hasmonæan Valley runs down to meet the Kidron at Siloam. The original city stood on the two hills, and the third to the E. was the Temple ridge. In another passage (Ant. XV. xi. 5) Jos. says that the city was placed opposite the Temple like a theatre, girt with a deep valley (that of Hinnom) on the S. Opposite Antonia was a fourth hill called Bezetha (which Jos. renders 'the new city'), separated from that citadel by a deep fosse. It is not impossible that this word is the Aram. Bezatha (בזאתא [?]), 'division.' (Schürer, HJP I. ii. 239 n., thinks it is בית זיתא 'place of olives'). It was the N. part of the Temple ridge divided off by the still existing rock-cut fosse. Jos. next describes the walls, of which the first was attributed to David and Solomon, and later kings. The First Wall ran E. from the tower Hippicus to the Xystus, under the W. wall of the Temple, and this N. face of the wall seems to be the same wall in the middle of the city built by the Hasmonæans. Hippicus stood at the N.W. angle, and was one of three royal towers (Wars, II. xvii. 1), the other two being Phasaelus and Mariamne. They stood close to Herod's palace in the upper city (Wars, I. xxi. 1, II. xvii. 6, V. iv. 4, VI. viii. 1), and varied in height, though apparently, according to Tacitus (Hist. v. 11), the tops of the towers were on a level. This was due to the varying height of the rock basis, and these towers possibly correspond with the three main towers of the modern citadel, that which is popularly known as Hippicus being the largest, and corresponding to Phasaelus, the largest royal tower. Phasaelus had an outer 'cloister,' and the great 'Tower of David' is still distinguished by an outer walk round it, at the top of the scarp of the main ditch. From Hippicus the old wall, on the W. side of the upper city, ran S. to Bethso (already noticed as perhaps meaning the 'House of Dung'), which lay where the dunghills of the city are still placed. It passed a gate called the Gate of the Essenes, and its S. face extended to Siloam, where it bent, and evidently left the pool outside, since the Romans drew water at Siloam before the city was taken (Wars, V. ix. 4). On the E. it passed by Solomon's Pool (prob. Gihon), and reached to Ophel, where it joined the E. cloister of the Temple. The Tyropœon Valley, garden, Zec 14[10]), 'the suburbs' (parbarim)* close to the Temple (2 K 23[11]), and the middle city (2 K 20[4]) or middle court (MSS and all versions). The site of the Middle Gate (Jer 39[3]) is unknown. The gate Shallecheth (1 Ch 26[16]) was by a causeway W. of the Temple.

* Perhaps 'colonnade.' The word (פַּרְבָּר in 1 Ch 26[18], פַּרְוָרִים in 2 K 23[11]) is apparently Persian, and means properly something lighted, namely, by the sun.

as already explained, was divided from the upper Hinnom Valley by a narrow neck of land, close to the royal towers. It is remarkable that in this valley of 'Cheesemakers' there is still a street where fresh cheeses are sold, and the modern features of the city generally — the fortress of Antonia, the castle at the royal towers, the Temple itself, the situation even of the dunghills outside the wall — retain to the present day the same character as in the time of Josephus. The main market of Jerus. is placed just where the Upper Agora of Herodian times, and of Nehemiah's age, must have existed. The Second Wall is more briefly described. It started from a gate called Gennath (prob. the 'garden' gate of the palace), which was in the first wall, and circling round (κυκλούμενον) enclosed the N. part only (τὸ προσάρκτιον κλίμα μόνον) reaching to Antonia. It thus defended Akra or the lower city. It is clearly probable that this wall was built on high ground, and more likely to have crossed the neck of high land already noticed than to have dived down into the Tyropœon, more than 100 ft. below the ground outside it. But if it went 'in a curve,' and started from this point near Phasaelus, it must have also enclosed, or run close to, the high knoll now shown as Calvary. What is known of the rock in this part indicates the existence of a broad trench, W. and N. of the knoll in question, which may have been the fosse of the second wall which, joining Antonia—the modern barracks—at its N.W. angle, was also protected by the Bezetha fosse, which is traceable W. of Antonia. The discovery of part of an ancient wall N. of the royal towers will be noticed under the heading 'Antiquities.

The Third Wall of Jerus. had no existence till after the Crucifixion, being that of Agrippa (Ant. XIX. vii. 2; Wars, V. iv. 2). It ran from Hippicus to a great octagonal tower called Psephinus, at its N.W. corner—a place whence a wide view was obtained, and consequently on very high ground. Thence it ran E. to the Women's Towers, opposite the tomb of Helena, widow of the king of Adiabene, which was 3 furlongs from Jerus. (Ant. XX. iv. 3), and acc. to Pausanias had a rolling stone at its entrance (Greciæ Descript. viii. 16). Jerome states that it lay E. of the great N. road (Epit. Paulæ), and these indications point to the conspicuous monument in Gr.-Jewish style, with a rolling stone at the door, which is now called the 'Tomb of the Kings.' If the measurement is correct, the third wall must have run farther N. than the present N. wall of Jerusalem. Some suppose it to have followed the present line throughout, placing Psephinus—in accordance with mediæval tradition—at the castle of the Pisans (Ḳal'at Jalûd), a ruined 12th cent. castle near the N.W. corner of modern Jerusalem. Robinson, however, found traces of an ancient wall running N.W., in continuation of the present wall, towards the high ground on the watershed near the present Russian cathedral, where probably Psephinus stood.

Jos. says that the third wall stretched a long way (μηκυνόμενον) by the royal caverns, after passing the point opposite Helena's monument, and here it must have stood on the same scarp occupied by the modern wall, E. of the Damascus Gate, in which scarp is the entrance to these caverns or quarries under the city. It then bent (prob. at the existing N.E. angle, which has a rock scarp and fosse), and from the corner tower (still extant), near the Monument of the Fuller (γναφέως), it ran to meet the old wall (apparently of the Temple) by the Kidron Valley. This general description offers no great difficulties, and the only points in dispute are the exact line of the second wall, and of the third wall towards the W. As regards the first point, it should be further noticed that Jos. describes a great pool called Amygdalon, where the 10th and 15th Legions encamped in attacking the upper city on the N.W. (Wars, V. xi. 4). The name seems to mean 'almond pool, but perhaps stands for Ham-migdalon, 'Pool of the Great Tower,' from its proximity to Phasaelus. It is usually identified with the existing Hammâm el-Batrak, the 'upper pool' already noticed. This pool is not mentioned till after the taking of the second wall, and seems to have lain inside its circuit, which agrees with the course of the wall generally advocated. Those who regard the traditional Calvary as the true site seek to trace the second wall on the lower ground, S. and E. of the Calvary knoll, in which case it is almost impossible so to draw its lines as to allow of its both running 'in a circle,' and also avoiding the deep broad Tyropœon, which has its head close to the E. side of the pool Amygdalon. If the second wall ran close to the knoll, the third wall cannot have coincided, on the N.W., with the present city wall, which is too close to the line so traced. The whole question is thus mainly influenced by opinion as to the site of Calvary.

In concluding this account of the topography about A.D. 70, various places noticed by Jos. may be briefly mentioned. On the N., 7 furlongs from the city, was Scopus (Wars, II. xix. 7, v. 3), near the present village Sha'fat, a high ridge commanding a view of Jerusalem. Close to Antonia was the pool Struthius (Wars, V. xi. 4), prob. the later Piscina Interior, recently discovered W. of the Church of St. Anne. E. of the Kidron, on Olivet, was a place called the Rock of the Dovecots (τῆς περιστερεῶνος), and just N. of the village of Siloam is a quarry with remains resembling a dovecot (Wars, V. xii. 2; see Ord. Survey Notes, p. 64). On the S. was the tomb of Ananus, which is possibly the Gr.-Jewish tomb in the cliff S. of the Hinnom Valley, close to its junction with the Kidron, now known as the 'retreat of the apostles,' and used—as is shown by remains of frescoes—as a chapel in the Middle Ages. W. of Jerus. were 'Herod's monuments,' near the Serpent Pool (Wars, V. iii. 2, vii. 2, xii. 2). The exact site is unknown, but a fine Gr.-Jewish masonry tomb has recently been discovered W. of the Upper Hinnom Valley, opposite the upper city. These places are noted as points on the wall of circumvallation, made by Titus after the third wall was taken. It ran along the E. slope of the Kidron, and outside the Hinnom Valley. On the N.W. it passed the camp of the Assyr., which was outside the second wall (Wars, V. xii. 2). Within the city there was a theatre, in an unknown position (Ant. XV. viii. 1), and the palace of the Hasmonæans (Ant. XX. viii. 11; Wars, II. xvi. 3) overlooked the W. cloister of the Temple, near the great bridge, and stood apparently on the cliff at the N.E. corner of the upper city. Other palaces of Agrippa, of Bernice, and of Helena are noticed (Wars, II. xvii. 6, IV. xix. 11, VI. vi. 1–3): the first may have been Herod's palace, but that of Helena (and of Monobasus her husband) was in the lower city, as were apparently the Council house and the archives (Wars, VI. vi. 3). The Xystus, or gymnasium, built by the high priest Jason (1 Mac 1^{14}; Ant. XII. v. 1), was near the great bridge, in the valley W. of the Temple (Wars, II. xvi. 2, 3, V. iv. 1, VI. iii. 2, viii. 1). The Hippodrome S. of the Temple may be the same as Herod's theatre (Wars, I. xxxiii. 6, II. iii. 1). Jos. also speaks of secret passages near the royal towers and Herod's palace (Wars, VI. viii. 1), and such a passage still exists leading from the site of this palace underground towards the Temple hill. The city and Temple were supplied with water by Pilate's aqueduct, 200 furlongs long, from Etham ('Ain 'Atân) S. of Bethlehem, and from 'Ain Kueizîba still farther S. It still brings water along the S. slope of the upper city to the Temple enclosure (Ant. XVIII. iii. 2; see Talm. Bab. Joma 31*a*).

The places noticed in NT in or near Jerus.—Bethesda, Gethsemane, and Calvary—have been separately treated. Bethesda was very probably the same as Gihon. Calvary cannot be located with certainty, but is now regarded by many as the knoll N. of the Damascus Gate, which was outside the third wall, at the so-called 'Jeremiah's Grotto.' See, further, art. GOLGOTHA. The Judgment Hall of Pilate (Jn 18^{28}) appears to have been distinct from Herod's palace (Lk 23^{7}), and was probably in Antonia. The Pavement (λιθόστρωτον), called Gabbatha (wh. see) in Aram., was in this hall (Jn 19^{13}), and Jos. uses this term in speaking of the Temple pavement (Wars, VI. i. 8). The site of the high priest's palace (Mt 26^{58}, Mk 14^{54}, Lk 22^{54}, Jn 18^{15}) was probably also near the Temple.

Talmudic notices of Jerus. (see Neubauer, Géog. Talm. s.v.) are of little value, unless from the Mishna. An ancient rose garden is said to have existed (Talm. Bab. Baba Ḳamma 82*a*). All tombs and tanneries were outside the town (Mishna, Baba Bathra, ii. 9), but ancient tombs were suspected to exist under the surface (Parah iii. 2), and foundations were consequently not dug deep (Baba Ḳamma vii. end). Only the royal tombs and that of Huldah were allowed within the walls (Tosephta, Baba Bathra, ch. i.). The upper and lower markets are noticed (Tosephta, Sanhed. ch. 14), and there were two places called Betzain (בצעין), an upper and a lower, in Jerusalem. The lower dated from Ezra's age, the upper was included in Jerus. by a later king, and lay on the 'weak' (that is, the N.) side (Talm. Jer. Sanhed. v.; Tosephta, Sanhed. ch. 3; Talm. Bab. Shebuoth 16*a*; Megillath Taanith, ch. 6). This word seems to mean a 'cutting' or 'fosse,' and the upper Betza may be the Bezetha fosse. A place called Beth Mamila is also noticed (Talm. Bab. Erubin 51*b*, Sanhed. 24*a*; Bereshith Rabba, ch. 51), the name of which may survive at the Birket Mamilla, W. of the city. The 'market of fatteners' and the 'wool market' were towards the N. (Mishna, Erubin x. 9; see Jos., Wars, V. viii. 1, where the wool, cloth, and braziers' markets are placed just inside the second wall); and the pagan fullers occupied the upper market (Mishna, Sheḳalim viii. 1). The Stone of Proclamation (Mishna, Taanith iii. 8), where lost property was cried, seems to have been in the lower city. The tomb of Kalba Shebuya—a rich man of the time of the great siege (Talm. Bab. Gittin 56*a*)—is placed by modern Jewish tradition at the tomb of Helena of Adiabene. The tomb of the Sanhedrin (popularly of the judges) and that of Simon the Just are also shown by the Jews N. of the city. They are Gr.-Jewish monuments.

Space will not allow of any account of the later Roman, Byzantine, Arab, Norman, or recent topography of Jerusalem. The important points have been noticed in speaking of the history. The obliteration of the older ruins in later times must be carefully held in view in considering existing remains, and the mediæval traditions often confuse a topography which is only to be studied in the Bible and in Josephus.

V. ANTIQUITIES.—The existing antiquities dating before A.D. 70 include the remains of the city walls, towers, pools, aqueducts, and tombs, together with the foundations of the temple walls, its bridges and gates, and the site of Antonia with its outer fosse. The extant inscriptions are few. Many of these ruins have been brought to light by excavation since 1867. They are mingled with later remains, such as the Ecce Homo Arch,—probably erected by Hadrian or his successors,—the work of Constantine and Justinian, the wall of Eudoxia, and the numerous churches and chapels of Byzant. and 12th cent. origin; while the Temple Area is covered with the buildings of the Khalifs succeeding 'Abd el-Melek. The remains of Walls, as yet known, belong chiefly to the first wall. Its N. face followed the steep slopes and cliffs which are shown, by observations of the rock in house foundations, to have formed the N. side of the hill of the upper city. The royal towers still present, in their lower courses, the large drafted masonry of Herod's age, which occurs also in the Temple walls; but a later sloping scarp was added outside the walks which surround the so-called Tower of David (prob. Phasaelus), by the Crusaders. At the Protestant cemetery, south of the present S.W. angle of the Turkish wall, a rock scarp, with projecting rock bases for towers, was explored in 1874–5. It has recently (1894–6) been traced eastwards, and it is generally allowed to represent the S.W. angle of the ancient wall. Dr. Bliss has traced a wall thence to Siloam—where it was explored by Dr. Guthe in 1881—enclosing the pool. The character of the masonry is that distinctive of the Byzantine age, and the wall appears to be that built by Eudoxia (about B.C. 450), which enclosed Siloam. The pool, as shown above, was outside the walls in A.D. 70. Under this wall, however, in parts, on the S. slope of the upper city, Dr. Bliss has found remains of an older wall generally of rougher masonry. In one part the Byzantine wall is not carried to the rock, but rests on rubbish under which the old wall was hidden. A gate towards the west of the south face of the upper city wall belongs to the older period, but was renewed in the later times. This seems to answer to the gate of the Essenes noticed by Jos., and it is possibly the Dung Gate of Neh. in Bethso. The point where the old wall crossed the Tyropœon above Siloam is still unknown, but on Ophel Sir C. Warren discovered a fine rampart under the surface, running S. from the S.E. corner of the Ḥaram enclosure for 70 ft., and then S.W. for 700 ft., with a great tower near this end, 80 ft. face and 20 ft. projection. The upper part of the wall is of masonry like that of the modern S. wall of Jerus., but this appears to have been re-used. The first 20 ft. from the foundations present a rough rubble of moderate dimensions, not unlike the masonry of the old wall found by Dr. Bliss. This is founded, not on rock, but on red virgin soil. The rock was traced farther S. on Ophel by Dr. Guthe in 1881, and the masonry then found was of Byzantine character. Although the older wall thus traced in parts, from the gate of the Essenes to the E. cloister of the Temple, does not usually present in situ the fine masonry of the Herodian age, it is possible that the rude foundations may belong to Nehemiah's age, the wall erected on them having been used up by later builders in the present city wall and in the upper part of the Temple ramparts. As regards the second wall, it is impossible to trace it under the houses of the modern city; but in 1883 a wall of masonry like that of the royal towers was found, running N. on the neck of high land W. of the Amygdalon Pool. This is probably part of the second wall. The third wall was still traceable outside the city when Dr. Robinson visited Jerus. half a cent. ago (BRP^{2} i. 315), but the only remains of its course now traceable are the scarp E. of the Damascus Gate, and possibly the remains of a tower on a rocky knoll N. of the gate and W. of the main N. road, where the Women's Towers appear to have marked an angle in the wall. There are some fine stones in the side of a tank farther N., which may have belonged to the third wall, but they are not apparently in situ. It will, however, be seen that exploration has now shown us approximately the course of the first wall, and the starting-point of the second on the W., while remains of the third can also be laid down on the map from measurements and angles taken by Dr. Robinson. The points still requiring study on the ground affect the farther course of the second wall, and the point at which the first wall crossed the Tyropœon Valley. A fine flight of broad steps discovered close to Siloam on the north may mark the position of the 'stairs from the city of David' in the Tyropœon.

The various Pools of ancient Jerus. have been described, and it is only necessary to add that the great pool in the Hinnom Valley, now called Birket es-Sultân, did not exist till the 12th cent., though called in the 14th 'The lower pool of Gihon.' The wall of its dam bears an inscription of A.D. 1537. In the 12th cent. it was built by the Germans, and is called 'the German Lake' and the 'New Cistern' (Citez de Jherusalem after A.D. 1187, and Theodoric A.D. 1172; Cartulary of Holy Sep. Nos. 169, 170). In addition to Pilate's Aqueduct on the S. there was a conduit to the royal towers (Jos. Wars, V. vii. 2), perhaps the older conduit of the upper pool. Such a conduit still enters the city from the Birket Mamilla on the W. An aqueduct has also been found on the W. slope of Bezetha leading to the fosse N. of Antonia. It seems to have collected rain water from the rocks N. of the city to fill the fosse. It is continued through the rock of Antonia, in a narrow passage to which Jos. alludes, in connexion with Strato's Tower and Antonia (Ant. XIII. xi. 2; Wars, I. iii. 4), and it is now closed at the end by the Ḥaram wall, inside which, not far off, is a large cistern to which the passage—if used as an aqueduct—may have led. It would seem to have been cut before the time of Herod, perhaps by the Hasmonæans, and to have existed—as did the Antonia fosse—in the time of Pompey. It may, however, have served as a secret exit from a window in the Ḥaram wall, which has been found above the passage. The oldest Jerus. aqueduct is, however, probably that of Hezekiah, leading from Gihon to Siloam. The inscription found near its mouth in 1881 is cut on the rock wall of the tunnel, and records in ancient Heb. letters the fact that the tunnel was begun from both ends, the parties meeting in the middle, and that it was 1200 cubits long. The length as chained is 1658 ft. long, giving a cubit of 16 in. The point of junction was determined by the surveyors near the centre. The course of this tunnel is very winding, and the level appears to have been lowered near the mouth to obtain a proper flow. The aqueduct branches out of a passage at the back of the Gihon pool, leading to a shaft with steps reaching up to the surface of the Ophel hill at the probable site of the Water Gate. (As to the questions that have been raised regarding the date of this inscription see the Literature cited in art. HEZEKIAH, p. 377^a, footnote).

The existing Tombs of the city include the monument of Helena already noticed, in an under chamber of which de Saulcy discovered a sarcophagus bearing an Aram. inscription, with the name of 'queen Sarah,' and early Rom. coins. Sarah may have been the native name of Helena. The monuments of Herod have also been noticed, and the tomb of Ananus (Wars, V. xii. 2). On the E. side of the Kidron are four fine monuments in Gr.-Jewish style, not unlike that of the Petra tombs. The most northerly (now called Absalom's Tomb) has a masonry cupola, and is possibly the tomb of Alex. Jannæus (Wars, V. xii. 2), which lay in this direction. The so-called Tomb of St. James is a true Jewish chamber, with an outer Doric porch bearing, in early square Heb., the names of priests of the Bene Hezir family, and probably cut about A.D. 50. The other two monuments to the S. are uninscribed, but of the same period. The Tombs of the Judges (so called) belong to the Rom. period, and near them is a broken tomb with a fragment of Aram. inscription of about the 1st cent. A.D. Immediately W. of the knoll of Jeremiah's Grotto (the possible site of Calvary) are remains of a Jewish tomb, with an additional chamber in the Gr. style. There is a large cemetery near, with Christian tombs of the Byzantine and Crusaders' ages, interspersed with some which bear mediæval Jewish texts. The tombs S. of the Hinnom Valley are also Byzantine, bearing texts which connect them with the Church of St. Sion on the hill of the upper city hard by. The so-called Tomb of Simon the Just, N. of Jerus., is also a Greek tomb.

Before describing the remains of the Temple and of Antonia, a word may be added as to Inscriptions discovered at Jerusalem. The majority of these are Byzantine Greek-Christian texts and tombstones of Crusaders. An inscription of Hadrian is built upside down into the S. wall of the Temple. Another of the time of Trajan (dating A.D. 117), found in the upper city, records the worship of Serapis at Jerusalem. The osteophagi on Olivet bear Gr. names, and in one case a Heb. text is marked with a cross, as though belonging to a Jewish Christian. They date probably from the 2nd to the 4th cent. A.D. Later Jews have also cut their names on the Temple walls, but the only Jewish texts previous to A.D. 70 are those above mentioned on the tombs, the Siloam Text, probably written about B.C. 702,* and the boundary stone of the Temple enclosure, with Gr. inscription excluding strangers.

The great Ḥaram enclosure at J. presents, at its foundations, magnificent drafted masonry of Gr. character, on the S., W., and E. The dressing of the stones is found nowhere else except at Hebron, and on the arch of the Tyropœon Bridge, but in general character this masonry resembles that of the royal towers, and of the palace of Hyrcanus, built in A.D. 176 at Tyrus in Gilead. The stones average 3½ ft. in height, but on the S. wall a 'master course' 7 ft. high runs W. for 600 ft. from the S.E. angle. The longest stones measure 24 and 39 ft. The whole of this masonry is dressed smooth on face and draft, excepting at the base of the W. wall for 20 ft., under an ancient pavement near the Tyropœon Bridge, and on the E. wall N. of the Golden Gate, where the head of a cross valley exists inside the wall. Probably, in these cases, the rough-faced stones were never visible above the surface. On the E. wall, at the base, are masons' marks in red paint, and two or three Phœn. letters which have forms of a late period. The Tyropœon Bridge, crossing to the upper city from the W. wall close to the S., consisted of two spans. Beneath the old pavement under the bridge an older voussoir has been found, lying in a rock aqueduct, and evidently belonging to an older bridge. The N. side of the Ḥaram is partly bounded by the great block of rock on which the citadel of Antonia stood, and east of this the N. wall presents none of the original masonry, but is built in the later Rom. or Byzant. style. Nor is there any angle in the old E. wall at this point. The smooth masonry which occurs above the drafted was built later than the time of Hadrian,—probably by Justinian,—and the upper part of the rampart is Arab work. The original drafted masonry is attributed by de Vogüé to Herod the Great—an opinion very generally accepted; and no remains of earlier work in the Ḥaram are known. The enclosure is an oblong, with right angles on the S.W. and N.E. The S.E. angle measures 92½°. The S. wall is 922 ft. long, the N. 1042 ft., the W. 1601 ft., and the E. 1042 ft. The area included is about 35 acres. The Tyropœon Bridge appears to be of the same age with the ancient wall, and the older voussoir may have belonged to the bridge broken down by Pompey (Jos. Ant. XIV. iv. 2; Wars, I. vii. 2). In the S. wall there are two ancient gates, which answer to the two Huldah Gates of the Mishna (Middoth i. 3): they appear to have been originally both double, with two inner passages having a total width of 40 ft. (30 cubits), the roofs supported by great columns, and presenting flat domes. The domes of the W. gate remain intact, presenting a semi-classic design of coffer pattern, intertwined with a vine in low relief. This work is attributed by Ferguson the architect to the time of Herod. The lintels of the entrances were formed by huge blocks 18 ft. span. The E. gate (now called the Triple Gate) was altered later,—probably by Justinian,—and the passages leading N. from these gates seem probably also to belong to this later period. The vaults in the S.E. corner of the Ḥaram are also later restorations, but remains of a more ancient vaulting are found, by an ancient window, on the E. wall in these vaults.

* This Siloam inscription, now removed and preserved in fragments in the Stamboul Museum, must not be confused with an illegible text in Phœn. characters (now in the Brit. Mus.) found in the village of Siloam. The words Beth Baal have been read on the latter, and it may indicate the situation of one of Solomon's temples on Olivet.

On the W. there were four entrances to the enclosure, the S. being at the Tyropœon Bridge. The next is a subterranean gate with a passage leading up from the level of the valley. The third was connected with a causeway which appears to be ancient, but which is not noticed by Josephus. The last, to the N., is now converted into a cistern, but the original passage pierced the wall, and belonged to a gate on or near the level of the valley. These gates seem therefore to answer to the Parbar or 'suburb' gates of the Mishna, and to the four entrances noticed by Jos., on the W. side of the Temple (Ant. XV. xi. 5), of which the first led to the royal S. cloister, the second to the suburb (προάστειον), the third also to the suburb, and the fourth to the 'other city,' by a descent of steps into the valley.

Within the Ḥaram there are no known remains of the ancient Temple, except the great rock-cut vaults and cisterns, of which the largest towards the S.—called the Great Sea—is supported on rock pillars, and capable of holding three million gallons. On the N. the scarp of Antonia rises 30 ft. above the flat rock surface of the inner court, and the block of rock measures 140 ft. N. and S. by 350 ft. E. and W. The fosse to the N. was converted later (before A.D. 333) into a 'twin pool,' by walls and vaulted roofs, and this is identified in the 4th cent. A.D. with Bethesda. In A.D. 70, however, the twin pools had probably no existence. On the W. Ḥaram wall the present writer, in 1873, discovered, close to Antonia, the existence of projecting piers of the ancient masonry above the level of the inner court, resembling those which adorn the wall of the Hebron Ḥaram, which consists of masonry like that of the Jerus. enclosure. In other parts the wall does not reach this level, but it appears probable that the same arrangement existed, at the same level, on the other faces of the enclosure. These remains, together with 40 observations of the level of the rock surface, visible in tanks or vaults, or at the foot of the wall, are the only antiquities known to remain which enable us to understand the area and position of the Temple enclosure, and of Antonia as restored by Herod the Great.

VI. THE TEMPLE ENCLOSURE.—Solomon's Temple (1 K 6, 2 Ch 3; Ant. VIII. iii.) was 60 cubits long E. and W., 20 broad, and 30 high (the cubit, as measured at Siloam, and on the masonry of the Jerus. Ḥaram and Galilæan synagogues, being about 16 in.). Its porch to the E. was 20 cubits broad and 10 cubits deep. The chambers, on N., S., and W., were built with a wall set back in steps, so that the interiors in the third storey were 7 cubits wide, in the second 6 cubits, in the first 5 cubits. The thickness of the walls is not stated. The roofs were of cedar, and the interior gilded with designs similar to the Bab. bas-reliefs of cherubs guarding palm trees. The whole structure and style, in short, seems to have resembled the art of Phœnicia and Chaldæa rather than that of Egypt. The Temple appears to have had an inner priests' court, with bronze altar, and an outer court, but no measurements of these are given.* In the later account (2 Ch 3^{4}) the height is given as 120 cubits (LXX 20 cubits), and Jos. believed that Solomon's Temple was 60 cubits higher than the later restoration by Zerub. (Ant. XV. xi. 3). It is possible that the porch may have formed a lofty pylon higher than the Holy House itself. It is not clear whether the two bronze pillars, Jachin and Boaz, each 23 cubits high (1 K 7$^{15-21}$), supported the lintel of the pylon gate, or whether they stood outside as stelæ (the word 'in' may be rendered 'for,' v.^{21}). Jos. gives the area of Solomon's enclosure at 4 furlongs (Ant. XV. xi. 3), and places the E. cloister close to a deep valley (Ant. XX. ix. 7), stating that Sol. built the E. wall, to which later kings added others (Wars, V. v. 1). But it is not clear how these details could be known when he wrote, since he states that Herod 'took away the ancient foundations' (Ant. XV. xi. 3), and built the cloisters 'from the foundation,' and enclosed 'double the area' (Wars, I. xxi. 1). He understands the Temple itself to have had an upper storey, and gives the number of chambers as 30 in all (Ant. VIII. iii. 2); but these accounts of a building destroyed nearly seven centuries before his time are of less value than his description of buildings which he had himself seen.

There is, however, little doubt that the Holy House occupied the same site, and was of the same length and breadth, in the time of Herod and of Solomon. Jos. says that Zerub. placed the altar 'in the same place where it had formerly been built' (Ant. XI. iv. 1); and as to the situation of this building, he says that 'at first the topmost plateau (τὸ ἀνωτάτω χθαμαλόν) barely sufficed for the Holy House and the altar' (Wars, V. v. 1, see Ant. VIII. iii. 9), whence it appears that the highest part of the ridge was the site selected. Herod, though he altered the enclosure, did not touch the Temple itself, which was restored by the priests. In the Mishna it is stated that the east door of the Holy House was directly opposite the summit of Olivet (Midd. ii. 4; Parah iii. 9, iv. 2; see Ezk 43^{12}). As regards the general description of the third Temple, the account given by Jos. agrees with the careful details of the Mishna (Middoth), but his measurements are unreliable—as in other cases at Cæsarea, Samaria, Masada, etc.—and often contradictory. He makes the altar 20 cubits square (c. Apion. i. 22), or elsewhere 50 cubits (Wars, V. v. 6), and the valleys 300 to 400 cubits deep (Ant. VIII. iii. 9; Wars, V. v. 1), the real depth not exceeding 160 ft. He speaks of stones 40 cubits long and 6 cubits high (Ant. XX. ix. 7; Wars, V. v. 1), a greatly exaggerated estimate. When, therefore, he gives the circumference of the third Temple as 4 furlongs* (Ant. XV. xi. 3), or, including Antonia, 6 furlongs (Wars, VI. v. 4), we must remember that he was writing in Rome, and merely estimated the lengths. Measured along the extant walls, the area, including Antonia, is about 8 furlongs in all.

* There appears to have been a 'causeway' or ascent by steps to the Temple (1 Ch 26^{16}), perhaps the same described by Jos. (Ant. xv. xi. 5) towards the N. part of the W. wall; but as regards the 'ascent' (עֹלָתוֹ) in the time of Sol. (1 K 10^{5}, עֲלִיָּתוֹ in 2 Ch 9^{4}), LXX, Vulg., Pesh. render in K (according to the regular sense of עֹלָה) and read in Ch, 'the burnt-offerings which he offered,' and Jos. follows this reading (Ant. VIII. vi. 5). See ASCENT.

Following the description of Jos., some authorities suppose that Herod's Temple occupied a square of 600 ft. side, in the S.W. part of the Ḥaram. The objections to this view are briefly: 1st, that in this case the Temple cannot have stood on the 'topmost plateau'; 2nd, that the area noticed in the Mishna (500 cubits square) is larger; 3rd, that there are no remains of any walls, to E. and N., at the required distances, and no break in the S. wall 600 ft. from the S.W. angle; 4th, that the Ophel wall joined the 'E. cloister,' and has been discovered abutting on the E. wall of the Ḥaram; 5th, that the existing outer gates agree with the descriptions only if the Temple Area is supposed to coincide with the present boundaries of the Ḥaram; 6th, that unless placed on the topmost plateau, the Temple—surrounded by courts at various levels—must have required foundations 30 to 100 ft. deep to reach the known levels of the rock. The masonry was too heavy to have been simply founded on earth. These objections have never been answered, and in our present state of knowledge it seems safer to depend on the general statements of Jos. than on his measurements, which are hard to reconcile with his incidental remarks.

In order to study this question by the light of recent exploration it is necessary to fix the position of Antonia, that of each angle of the Temple enclosure, and the position of the 'topmost plateau' opposite the summit of Olivet. Antonia is described (Wars, V. v. 8) as standing at the corner of the N. and W. cloisters, on a rock 50 cubits high, scarped on all sides: it had four corner towers, and a large inner space with courts, baths, and places for camps. A ditch and valley protected the towers outside in the time of Pompey (Ant. XIV. iv. 2). Strabo speaks of this ditch as 60 ft. deep and 250 ft. broad (see Wars, I. vii. 3, V. iv. 2). Cloisters joined Antonia to the Temple (Wars, II. xvi. 5, 6), and the rock hid the Temple on the N. (Wars, V. v. 8), looking down on the courts (Wars, V. ix. 2, VI. i. 5, ii. 5, 9): when it was taken, immediate access was obtained to the flat courts and to the inner Temple (Wars, VI. iii. 7). The area of Antonia seems to have formed a projection on the N.W., so that when it was destroyed the Temple enclosure itself became a quadrangle (τετράγωνον, Wars, VI. v. 4). There is only one existing site which answers to such a description—namely, the block of rock already described at the N.W. angle of the present Ḥaram. This rock overlooks all the interior, and rises 20 ft. higher than the Sakhrah or holy 'rock,' which is the highest point within the Ḥaram. The outer fosse is also traceable, separating this site from Bezetha. The rock thus supporting the modern barracks is therefore identified, on all recent plans, with Antonia—the older Baris or Birah of the time of the Hasmonæans and of Nehemiah. It follows that the W. wall throughout may be regarded as belonging to the enclosure of Antonia and of the Temple in the time of Herod. The S.W. angle is generally agreed to be that of Herod's Temple; and as regards the S.E., Jos. (Wars, V. iv. 2) clearly states that the Ophel wall joined the 'E. cloister' of the Temple, so that all the E. wall appears also to belong to the time of Herod, since the junction with the Ophel wall has been determined by excavation. The N.E. angle remains in doubt; for, as above noticed, the N. wall, east of the Antonia rock, is not of the same masonry with the others, while the cisterns inside this part of the Ḥaram are not rock-cut, but are built of masonry very late in character. It seems probable that this part of the area is modern, and that the old N. wall of the Temple ran E. and W. on the line of the present N. wall of the platform, where remains of ancient buttresses have been found. The N.E. part of the Ḥaram is crossed by a valley, running into the Kidron, which has been filled in with earth, but which, in A.D. 70, may have bounded the Temple on the N., and the inner court of Antonia on the E. A gate called Tadi led, by an underground passage, out of the Temple on this side.

As regards the 'topmost plateau,' the rock below Antonia, on the S., is visible over a considerable area at a level about 2430 ft. above the Mediterranean. It has been artificially cut down to form a flat surface. Farther S.E. it rises, in the Sakhrah itself, to a height of 2440 ft., but under the platform which surrounds the Sakhrah its height nowhere exceeds 2432 ft. About twenty observations have been made, which concur in showing a flat plateau at this level, occupying the central part of the Ḥaram. The slope to the W. is very steep, the rock falling to an average level of 2350 ft. at the base of the W. outer wall. The slope to the E. is also steep, though not equal to that on the W. On the S. the plateau narrows to a long spur, which sinks towards Siloam. It is evident that a building surrounded by terraced courts, at various lower levels, can well be fitted to the ground only if its highest floor level is placed on the highest part of the plateau now ascertained to exist, as above described. If, moreover, a line be drawn E., at right angles to the W. wall of the Ḥaram, and through the Sakhrah rock, it will be found to cut the summit of Olivet immediately N. of the present Church of the Ascension. If, on the other hand, the Temple be placed farther to the S.W. (as proposed by those who accept the measurements given by Jos.), not only can no line be so drawn, but the Temple is made to stand on the narrower and lower part of the spur, and its foundations would rest on the steep W. slopes, here falling 90 ft. below the crest of the spur. These various considerations seem, therefore, all to point to the vicinity of the Sakhrah as marking the site of the Holy House itself.

Placed in such a position, it will be found that the levels of the courts, as described in the Mishna and by Jos., agree throughout with the actual levels. In no part does the rock rise or fall so as to render it necessary to suppose foundations of more than 2 or 3 ft. The Sakhrah itself may be that 'stone of foundation' (Eben hash-Shĕthîyah) which supported the Holy of Holies, and was said to be the foundation of the world (Mishna, Joma v. 3, Tamid i. 1) sealing the mouth of the abyss —a legend which still attaches to the Sakhrah and its cave. Under the altar there was no hollow place (Talm. Bab. Zebaḥim 58*a*), and its position would agree with a part of the Ḥaram where there are no vaults. The gate Tadi or 'hiding' (Middoth i. 3) was reached by an underground passage from the N. side of the inner cloister, and remains of such a passage exist N. of the Sakhrah. On the S. side was the Chamber of the Draw-well, and on this side there is an existing tank in the required position. The Altar Court was 6 cubits lower than the floor of the Temple (or at a level of about 2432 ft. above the Mediter.), and the great Court of the Women, farther E., was again 7½ cubits lower (or about 2422 ft. above the same datum), but on the S. and N. the Altar Court was only 5 cubits above the outer level, which would therefore be about 2426 ft. above the datum—these levels depending on the number of steps, each half a cubit high, noticed in the Mishna (Middoth) and by Jos. (Wars, v. v.). On applying the plan to the ground it is found that, in each case, the levels so obtained agree exactly with the actual levels, as shown by the present author in 1879 (Conder's Handbook to the Bible, last chapter).

* If Herod's Temple enclosure was double that of Sol., it is manifestly impossible that both measured four furlongs in circumference (see references in text.)

The details given in the Mishna (Middoth) suffice to enable us to draw a block plan of Herod's Temple. The exact arrangements of the gateways and cloisters can only be conjectured, but the enclosure, which is said to have been 500 cubits square, surrounded the inner courts, which no Gentile might enter. The Priests' Court, which surrounded the Holy House, and included the great altar to its east, measured 135 cubits N. and S. by 137 E. and W. On the E. was the great gate Nicanor, leading to the 'Court of the Women,' which was 135 cubits square. Between this and the Court of the Priests a narrow platform (11 cubits wide), having beneath it (Midd. ii. 6) chambers opening into the 'Women's Court,' was called the 'Court of Isr.,' and reserved for men only, who formed a representative congregation of Israel. The women were confined to galleries in the Women's Court, which was the general meeting-place of the Jews. Immediately outside these courts a fence (soreg) surrounded the Temple, and inscriptions in Gr. (one of which has been recovered) forbade any Gentile to enter on pain of death. The Holy House itself (hekal) included a porch (aula) and the Holy of Holies. The latter was 20 cubits square, and the Holy Place 40 cubits long by 20 broad (as in Solomon's Temple). The porch was 100 cubits broad N. and S., and the total length of the building was 100 cubits E. and W., the breadth of the main part being 70 cubits, including the chambers to N., S., and E., and the outer gallery (impluvium) beyond them on N. and S. The height of the porch was 100 cubits, and that of the main building 45 cubits with a flat roof. A second storey appears to have existed, above the Holy Place and Holy of Holies, its roof 100 cubits from the ground. The great gate of the porch was 20 cubits broad and 40 cubits high, and over it were five oak beams to which apparently the golden vine was nailed. There were apparently two veils—one to the outer gate, one to the doorway of the Holy Place, and these were annually renewed. The surrounding chambers, in three storeys, numbered 38 in all. A stairway in the impluvium, on the N., led to the roofs. Twelve steps led down, on the E., to the Priests' Court. In this stood the altar, of rubble and mortar, 32 cubits square at the foundation, which was 1 cubit high. The main part above was 30 cubits square and 5 cubits high; the hearth was 28 cubits square; the total height of the altar was 10 cubits, with four 'horns' at the angles. The sloping ascent on the S. was 16 cubits broad and 32 cubits long, leading to the foot of the hearth. The Court of the Priests had three gates to the N. and three to the S. The E. gate on the N. was called Nitzotz, and had an exhedra, the N.W. gate Moked had four chambers at the sides, where the Temple guard of priests kept watch. An underground passage led N. to Tadi, the gate near Antonia, and also to the latrines. On the S. the W. gate was named Aptinas, or, otherwise, the Water Gate, the two others being the Gate of the Offering and the Gate of Flaming. On the E. 15 steps led down from the great gate Nicanor to the Women's Court. These gates were flanked by chambers,—those for salt, for the high priest's bath and for washing, being on the N.; those for wood, for the drawwell and the 'Chamber of Hewn Stone' where the Sanhedrin sat, being on the S. of the Priests' Court. The four chambers of Moked were for the lamb of the daily sacrifice (on S.W.), for the shewbread (on S.E.), for the stones of the old altar taken down by Judas Maccabæus (on N.E.), and for washing, with a descent to the north passage. In the corners of the Women's Court were four chambers,—that of the Nazirites on S.E., that where the wood for the altar was kept on N.E., that of the lepers on N.W., and that for oil on the S.W. The two chambers flanking Nicanor were for the vestment keeper and the pancake maker. Musical instruments were kept in the chambers under the narrow walk called the 'Court of Isr.,' which was divided from the Priests' Court by a railing, near which was a pulpit whence they addressed the people. The Court of Isr. was apparently 2½ cubits lower than the level of the Priests' Court. The soreg was reached by three gates, on the N., S., and E. of the Women's Court, and was a lattice-work fence. The limit of 500 cubits square was marked by the khel ('rampart' or 'terrace'), which was 10 cubits wide, and reached apparently by other steps (Wars, v. v. 2). The gates of the outer walls (or 'Mountain of the House'), namely, the two Huldah Gates on the S., the Parbar Gates and Kipunos ('descent') on the W., with Tadi on the N., have been already noticed. On the E. was the gate Shushan, the position of which is doubtful. The outer cloisters, along the rampart walls, were double except on the S., where the royal cloister is described by Jos. as having three walks, with 162 pillars, each about 6 ft. in diameter (Ant. xv. xi. 5). The walks were 30 ft., 45 ft., and 30 ft. wide, and this measurement (in Gr. ft.) agrees closely with the width and position of the existing Tyropœon Bridge, which has a breadth of 50 ft., and an arch 41 ft. 6 in. span. The pillars as described are of about the size of those still standing in the vaulted chamber of the Double (or W. Huldah) Gate, and the epistylia would have been about 22 ft.—the cloister stretching to the present S.E. angle of the Ḥaram. This gives a very natural intercolumniation of 2½ diameters. The pillars were 27 ft. high according to Josephus. These details, taken—except when otherwise stated—from the Tract Middoth of the Mishna, agree with the more general description by Jos., except in some cases as regards measurements, where the account of the Rabbis—some of whom had seen the Temple standing, and had been able to measure its ruins—is to be preferred to one written in Italy. No difficulty is found in understanding this account, or in fitting plan and section to the ground, if the Temple is placed opposite the summit of Olivet, on the 'topmost plateau' of the hill.

VII. MODERN JERUSALEM. — Within the last twenty years Jerus. has so largely increased in size and population, on account of Jewish and European settlers building houses outside the walls, that the most recent plans give little idea of the city. The Mount of Olives is covered with houses, and a considerable suburb has sprung up N. of the Damascus Gate. On the W. the Jewish cottages stretch more than a mile from the Jaffa Gate (in the W. wall), and many villas, standing in gardens, reach from W. of the Russian hospice to the vicinity of Birket Mamilla. On the S. other houses, and a German settlement, stand on the high ground S. of the Hinnom Valley. On the S.W. is the railway station. The population has increased from 20,000 souls (including Christians, Moslems, and 8000 Jews) to between 40,000 and 50,000 souls, the Jews having increased to about 30,000 in all. In 1838 there were only 3000 Jews in the city. It is beyond the present purpose to describe the modern city (see Baedeker's Guide), but the above-mentioned changes are too remarkable to pass unnoticed.

LITERATURE.—The lit. of the subject would form a vol. by itself, but the progress of scientific study has rendered obsolete most of the works written before A.D. 1838. The generally accepted views as to the topography, which have been given above, are substantially in accord with the conclusions of Dr. E. Robinson (BRP, 1838 and 1852, 2nd ed. 3 vols. 1856). The work of Sir C. Warren, and of the present writer, down to 1883, is detailed in the Jerus. vol. of SWP. The later explorations, to 1898, are detailed in PEFSt, 1883–98, and in Bliss and Dickie's Excavations at Jerusalem, 1898. The Ord. Surv. Notes by Sir C. W. Wilson, 1865, give valuable accounts of the antiquities then known. The works of de Vogüé (Églises de la Terre Sainte, 1860, and Le Temple de Jerus. 1863) are standard authorities for the later periods. The Byzant. and 12th cent. topography is to be studied in the series issued by the Pal. Pilgrims Texts Soc., esp. in the valuable tract, dating after A.D. 1187, called La Citez de Jherusalem. It is also discussed in SWP. The views advocated by Sir C. W. Wilson are detailed in Smith's DB^{2}. The modern city is fully described by Dr. A. Socin in Baedeker's Handbook to Pal. and Syria.

Without reference to these leading works the student will be unable to obtain correct information as to the views of the chief authorities, and the extant buildings; but familiarity with these, and with Jos. and the Mishna, will be found sufficient, without reference to obsolete theories or to popular works. A valuable and exhaustive paper on the Talm. accounts of the Temple has been published by the PEF in 1886, representing the labours of Dr. T. Chaplin for many years in Jerus. itself. The architectural history of the Haram, by the present author, is detailed in Tent Work in Pal., and the full details of the Temple in Conder's Handbook to the Bible, 1879. Recent discoveries have not, in any instance, upset the conclusions therein urged, and in some cases they have afforded unexpected support to those conclusions, as shown in this brief account of the Holy City. C. R. CONDER.

JERUSHA (יְרוּשָׁא 2 K 15^{33}=JERUSHAH יְרוּשָׁה 2 Ch 27^1, 'possession' or 'possessed').—Mother of Jotham king of Judah. Her father's name is given as Zadok.

JESHAIAH (יְשַׁעְיָה, יְשַׁעְיָהוּ 'salvation of J″').—1. A grandson of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3^{21}. 2. One of the sons of Jeduthun, 1 Ch $25^{3.15}$. 3. A Levite, the ancestor of one of David's treasurers, 1 Ch 26^{25}. 4. The chief of the Bĕnê-Elam who returned with Ezra, Ezr 8^7. 5. Chief of the Merarites in time of Ezra, Ezr 8^{19}. 6. A Benjamite, Neh 11^7. See GENEALOGY.

JESHANAH (יְשָׁנָה).—A town, named along with Bethel, taken from Jeroboam by Abijah, 2 Ch 13^{19}. It is probably the modern 'Ain Sînia, a village with a spring, about 3¼ miles north of Bethel. See SWP vol. ii. sheet xiv. In 1 S 7^{12} we ought also (so Wellh., Driver, Klosterm., Kittel, Budde) to read Jeshanah for MT Shen (הַשֵּׁן). See SHEN. Probably the same place is meant by the Isanas (ἡ Ἰσάνας) of Josephus (Ant. XIV. xv. 12), where Herod the Great defeated the troops of Antigonus.
C. R. CONDER.

JESHARELAH.—See ASHARELAH.

JESHEBEAB (יֶשֶׁבְאָב).—A Levite, the head of the 14th course, 1 Ch 24^{13}. B of the LXX strangely enough omits the name, although thereby the whole number of courses is reduced to twenty-three. A has Ἰσβάαλ, Vulg. Isbaab. Kittel (see SBOT, ad loc.) thinks that aversion to a name compounded with -baal accounts for its elimination in B. See also Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 24.

JESHER (יֵשֶׁר 'uprightness').—A son of Caleb, 1 Ch 2^{18}. The LXX Ἰωάσαρ would lead us to expect an o in the first syllable (cf. notes of Kittel in SBOT, and Baer).

JESHIMON.—This word occurs with def. art. (הַיְשִׁימֹן) in Nu 21^{20} 23^{28}, 1 S $23^{19.24}$ $26^{1.3}$ 'Jeshimon' AV, 'desert' RV in all. A similar variation is found in the renderings of LXX and Vulgate. The latter translates by desertum and solitudo except in 1 S 23^{24}, where it has Jeshimon. The LXX renders it in Samuel by τοῦ Ἰεσσαιμού (Εἰεσσ... is a variant in A), but in Numbers by ἔρημος with the def. article. The Targums have בית ישימון in Numbers (בית ישימות Nu 23^{28} Targ. Jon.), but in Samuel ישימון; Syr. has אשימון throughout. The word also occurs in 7 places in parallelism with midhbar, which always in these passages has the def. art. (except in Dt 32^{10}), while jeshimon is without it. In Dt 32^{10}, Ps 68^7 78^{40} 106^{14} the word is used of the land through which the children of Israel passed on their way to Canaan, and there may be an indirect allusion to it in the other three places, Ps 107^4, Is $43^{19.20}$. RV deviates from its uniform rendering of this word by 'desert' in Dt 32^{10}, Ps 68^7, where with AV it has 'wilderness.' Though in these passages no distinction between midhbar and jeshimon is drawn, yet there is a difference in meaning; midhbar * is strictly a place where cattle are driven (comp. the German 'Trift' and 'treiben'), the uncultivated region where pasturage (though scanty in parts) may be found; jeshimon is the desolate waste without water or vegetation.

Some particular region of this character seems indicated both in Numbers and Samuel, and, as in 1 S 23^{24} 26^2 Ziph and Maon (places identified as being a few miles to the south of Hebron) are mentioned as being in its vicinity, a tract of land to the west of the Dead Sea seems here indicated. The eastern slopes of Judah are called (Jos 15^{61}) the wilderness, and, though the cities there mentioned show that the land was not entirely uninhabited, the fewness of them (compare the number six with the numbers of cities in other parts of Judah) is evidence of its barrenness. Though containing some fertile spots (as En-gedi), the region as a whole may well be called Jeshimon, for to its character as a desolate waste many travellers bear witness. (For the descriptions of Robinson and other travellers, see Ritter, Comp. Geog. of Pal. iii. 108 ff.; and cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 312). The traveller descending these slopes from the cities of the hill-country first passes through the pasture ground (the midhbar) in the neighbourhood of Ziph and Maon (the wilderness of Maon, 1 S 23^{24}, of Ziph, 26^2), and at length reaches the desolate waste (Jeshimon) by the Dead Sea. This tract of land may be referred to in Numbers, as it would be visible from the highlands of Eastern Palestine, but Dillmann takes Jeshimon to be that part of the Arabah to the N. of the Dead Sea and E. of the Jordan, in which Beth-jeshimoth (the only place bearing a similar name) is situate. (See his Comm. on Nu 21^{20}; and cf. art. BETH-JESHIMOTH).

From the words of 1 S 23^{24} 'the wilderness of Maon, in the Arabah, on the south of the desert' (Jeshimon), it seems that the term Arabah, which 'is applied to at least a portion of the great valley which stretches from the Gulf of Akabah into the Jordanic basin' (see art. ARABAH, vol. i. p. 130^a), here includes that portion of the valley in which the Dead Sea is situated. A. T. CHAPMAN.

JESHISHAI (יְשִׁישַׁי 'old,' 'venerable'?).—The eponym of a Gadite family, 1 Ch 5^{14}. See GENEALOGY.

---

* AV renders this word generally by 'wilderness,' but in 12 places has 'desert.' RV has altered these into 'wilderness' except in Dt 32^{10}, Job 24^5. Ex $19^{1.2}$ is an instance of AV being misleading in some words of frequent occurrence (see Revisers' Preface). The reader of AV would suppose that the original of 'desert' in v.^{2} was different from that of 'wilderness' in vv.$^{1.2}$; but midhbar is the Heb. equivalent of both, which is indicated by the change to 'wilderness' in RV.

JESHOHAIAH (יְשׁוֹחָיָה).—The eponym of a Simeonite family, 1 Ch 4^{36}. See GENEALOGY.

JESHUA (יֵשׁוּעַ 'J″ is salvation' or 'J″ is opulence' [see Oxf. Heb. Lex.], Ἰησοῦς), another form of Joshua, is used of—1. Joshua the son of Nun once only (Neh 8^{17}). 2. The head of the ninth course of priests (1 Ch 24^{11}). AV has Jeshuah. 3. A Levite in the time of Hezekiah, who had to do with the distribution of the free-will offerings (2 Ch 31^{15}). 4. A man of the house of Pahath-moab whose descendants returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2^{6} Ἰησοῦε, Neh 7^{11}). This J. is perhaps identical with No. 2 above. 5. A Levitical house or its successive heads in the times of Zerub., Ezra, and Nehemiah. J. is mentioned in connexion with the building of the temple (Ezr 3^{9}), the explanation of the law to the people (Neh 8^{7}, cf. $9^{4ff.}$), and the sealing of the covenant (10^{9}). Cf. also Ezr 2^{40} 8^{33}, Neh 7^{43} $12^{8.\,24}$ Ἰησού. 6. The high priest who along with Zerub. headed the first band of exiles that returned. In Ezr and Neh he is called Jeshua (יֵשׁוּעַ), in Hag and Zec Joshua (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ). His grandfather Seraiah, who was high priest at the time of the capture of Jerus., was executed at Riblah by Nebuch., and his father Jehozadak carried captive to Babylon, where J. was probably born (2 K $25^{18ff.}$, 1 Ch 6^{15}; see, however, Kosters, Het herstel v. Isr. 48 f.). On the arrival of the caravan at Jerus., J. naturally took a leading part in the erection of the altar of burnt-offering and the laying of the foundations of the temple (Ezr $3^{2ff.}$), in Hag and Zec he is frequently coupled with Zerub. after these prophets had begun to stimulate the people to undertake building operations in earnest (Hag $1^{1.\,12.\,14}$, Zec $3^{1ff.}$ $6^{10.\,11}$); he supplies a figure to the imagery of the latter prophet (Zec $3^{1ff.}$), and even receives a crown at his hands ($6^{10f.}$). He is eulogized in Sir 49^{12}. For further details see ZECHARIAH, ZERUBBABEL, and refer to the Literature at the end of the latter article. J. A. SELBIE.

JESHUA (יֵשׁוּעַ).—A town in the south of Judah, Neh 11^{26}. The site is possibly at the ruin Sa'wi west of Tell 'Arad and south of 'Attîr, as Beersheba is mentioned with it. See PEF Mem. iii. 409 f. Jeshua of Neh 11^{26} appears to correspond to Shema (wh. see) of Jos 15^{26} 19^{8} (?). See Dillm. ad loc. C. R. CONDER.

JESHURUN (יְשֻׁרוּן) occurs four times in OT as a designation for Israel (Dt 32^{15} $33^{5.\,26}$, Is 44^{2}). Gesenius at one time held that יְשֻׁרוּן was a shorter form of יִשְׂרְאֵלוּן (Cod. Gr., Ven. Ἰσραελίσκος), a dimin. of יִשְׂרָאֵל (Israel), while at the same time there might be an allusion to the idea of rectitude or uprightness contained in the root יָשַׁר. Latterly he adopted a derivation simply from this last root, making J. =the righteous little people. The same derivation is accepted by Reuss and Cornill, the latter of whom (with Cheyne) finds light thrown upon the meaning of J. by the references in OT to the 'Book of Jashar,' where Jashar ('the upright') may be a name for Israel. (Cf. Nu 23^{10} 'Let me die the death of the righteous,' in which יְשָׁרִים 'righteous' seems to allude to יִשְׂרָאֵל of the preceding clause). The Sept. in all the four passages cited above, renders J. by ἠγαπημένος ('beloved'). Jerome has dilectus in Dt 32^{15}, but elsewhere rectissimus, corresponding to εὐθύς or εὐθύτατος of Aq. Symm. and Theod., who manifestly connect J. with the root יָשַׁר. Delitzsch (Is.^{5} ii. 189) admits that יְשֻׁרוּן is a secondary form of יָשָׁר, but declines to regard it as a diminutive, because a 'diminutive of affection corresponds little to the language of divine love' (sic). In spite of this dictum, Schultz' explanation of J. as 'a pet name from יָשָׁר' seems a peculiarly happy one (OT Theol. ii. 29 n.). Driver (Dt 32^{15}) agrees with Dillmann that J. is a poetical title of Israel, pointing allusively to יִשְׂרָאֵל but derived from יָשָׁר, and accordingly designating the nation under its ideal character (cf. Ex 19^{6}, Dt 14^{2} etc.) as 'the upright one.' J. A. SELBIE.

JESIAS (B Ἐσίας, A Ἰεσσίας, AV Josias), 1 Es 8^{33}.—In Ezr 8^{7} JESHAIAH.

JESIMIEL (יְשִׂימִאֵל).—The eponym of a Simeonite family, 1 Ch 4^{36}. See GENEALOGY.

JESSE יִשַׁי (etym. and meaning doubtful; perh. 'wealthy,' √ יֵשׁ, Ges., but see Oxf. Heb. Lex.; Ἰεσσαί).—Father of David. As grandson of the wealthy Boaz (Ru $4^{17.\,22}$, 1 Ch 2^{12}, Mt 1^{5}, Lk 3^{32}), it is natural to suppose that he was one of the elders of Bethlehem (1 S 16^{4}); but the biblical narrative is not clear on this point. He is called 'the Bethlehemite,' 1 S $16^{1.\,18}$ 17^{58}, and 'the Ephrathite of Bethlehem-Judah,' 1 S 17^{12}. We cannot draw any safe inference as to his position from the fact that his youngest son kept the sheep, or from the simple present of farm produce which he sends, now to the king (1 S 16^{20}), now to the captain (1 S 17^{18}). The Targ. on 2 S 21^{19} calls him 'a weaver of the veil of the house of the sanctuary,' but that is merely an attempt to explain 'Jaare-oregim.' When first introduced into the history (1 S 17^{12}, on the various explanations of which see Wellh. and Driver) he is 'an old man,' 'stricken in years among men,' and he probably did not live to witness the royal dignity of the lad whom he had once thought too insignificant to share in the sacrificial feast (1 S 16^{11}). In 1 S 20^{29} David mentions his brother as superintending the family sacrifice. This may be due to the great age of Jesse, but it is also possible that we have here a survival of the custom according to which the eldest son was the family priest. We last hear of Jesse alive in 1 S $22^{3.\,4}$, when David, mindful of his ancestress Ruth, entrusts his parents to the care of the king of Moab. A Jewish tradition states that the Moabites killed them, but 1 S 22^{4} implies that they rejoined David when he left the cave of Adullam.

There are two slight difficulties connected with Jesse's family. (a) According to 1 S $16^{10.\,11}$ 17^{12} he had eight sons; seven only are named in the genealogy, 1 Ch $2^{13\text{-}15}$. The Syriac and Arabic versions here insert 'Elihu the seventh' from 1 Ch 27^{18}, but there we should probably read 'Eliab,' with the LXX. Jerome (Qu. Heb. on 1 S 17^{12}, 2 S 21^{21}) says that the prophet Nathan, or Jonathan son of Shammah, was reckoned as one of his sons. (β) In 2 S 17^{25} Abigail is called the daughter of Nahash; accordingly Jewish tradition (Targ. on Ru 4^{22}, Is 14^{29}, Jerome, Qu. Heb. in loc.) identifies Jesse with Nahash ('serpent'), explaining the double name on the ground that he had no other sin than that original sin which the old serpent introduced into the world. Stanley (Jewish Ch., Lect. 22) suggests that the same woman was first wife of Nahash, king of Ammon, and mother by him of Abigail and Zeruiah, and subsequently wife of Jesse, and mother of his sons. This theory derives some slight support from the friendliness of Nahash and his sons to David (2 S 10^{2} 17^{27}), and also from the genealogy (1 Ch 2^{16}), where Abigail and Zeruiah are not called the daughters of Jesse, but the sisters of his sons. It is possible, however, that בַּת־נָחָשׁ in 2 S 17^{25} is, as Wellh. thinks, a textual error. See NAHASH.

It is interesting to note that while in his lifetime, and in the next generation, 'the son of Jesse' was a contemptuous epithet for David (cf. Jg 9^{28}, 1 S 22^{12}, Is $7^{4.\,5.\,6.\,9}$), and is so used by Saul (1 S $20^{27.\,30.\,31}$ $22^{7.\,8}$), by Doeg (1 S 22^{9}), by Nabal (25^{10}), by Sheba (2 S 20^{1}), and by the ten tribes

(1 K 12^{16}), yet the prophet Isaiah (11$^{1.\ 10}$) associates one of the most sublime Messianic predictions with the stock (גֶּזַע) of Jesse, 'the root (שֹׁרֶשׁ) of Jesse,' and this honorific use of the phrase passed to later writers, 1 Ch 10^{14} 29^{26}, Ps 72^{20}, Ac 13^{22}.

N. J. D. WHITE.

JESUS, the Gr. form (Ἰησοῦς) of the name Joshua (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ) or Jeshua (יֵשׁוּעַ), is employed as a designation of—1. Joshua the son of Nun (AV of 1 Mac 2^{55}, 2 Es 7^{37}, Sir 46^{1}, Ac 7^{45}, He 4^{8}, in all of which passages RV has JOSHUA). 2. Jeshua (Joshua), the high priest contemporary with Zerubbabel (1 Es 5$^{5.\ 8.\ 48.\ 56.\ 68.\ 70}$ 6^{2} 9^{19}, Sir 49^{12}, where both AV and RV have in every instance JESUS). 3. The Levite (1 Es 5$^{26.\ 58}$ 8^{63} 9^{48}) who in Ezr 2^{40} 3^{9} is called Jeshua. 4. An ancestor of our Lord (Lk 3^{29} RV, where AV has Jose). 5. Jesus, son of Sirach. See SIRACH. 6. 7. See the next two articles.

Method.—What method is fittest for a Christian writer to use in approaching the Life of Christ? There is a tendency at the present moment, on the Continent perhaps rather than in England, to approach it from the side of the consciousness of Jesus as the Messiah. A conspicuous instance of this would be Baldensperger's Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu (Strassburg, 1888; 2nd ed. 1892), a work which attracted considerable attention when it first appeared. No doubt such a method has its advantages. It places the inquirer at once at the centre of the position, and enables him to look down the various roads by which he will have to travel. The advantage, however, is more apparent than real. It would hold good only if we could be sure of obtaining a far more adequate grasp of the consciousness to be investigated than on any hypothesis is likely to be obtained. On the Christian hypothesis, frankly held, any such grasp would seem to be excluded, and the attempt to reach it could hardly be made without irreverence.

It is on all grounds a safer and sounder, as well as a more promising method, to adopt a course which is the opposite of this—not to work from within outwards, but from without inwards; to begin with that aspect of the Life which is most external, and only when we have realized this as well as we may to seek to penetrate deeper, allowing the facts to suggest their own inner meaning. We may then take in certain sidelights which our documents also afford us, which, because they come, as it were, from the side, are not therefore less valuable. And we may finally strengthen our conclusions by following the history some little way into its sequel. In other words, we shall begin by placing ourselves at the standpoint of an observer, one of those who saw the public ministry of Jesus in its early stages, in its development, and to its close. When that has been fully unrolled before us, we can draw upon other data which are not of this public character; and we may further seek to argue backwards from effects to causes.

By pursuing this method we shall have the advantage of taking the facts in no imaginary order, but in the order of the history itself. We shall have them disclosed to us in the same sort of sequence in which they were disclosed to the first generations of Christians—a method always advisable where it can be had, and in this instance peculiarly advisable, because both the origins and the immediate sequel to the origins are of extreme interest and importance.

We shall also have the incidental advantage of following, not only the historical order, but the critical order suggested by the documents. It was natural that what was transacted in public should have the fullest and the earliest attestation: it lay in the nature of the case that some of the details which were most significant, just because of their private and intimate character, should become known only by degrees. This state of things is reflected in the Gospels as we have them. The common matter of the Synoptic Gospels is also the most public matter. It by no means follows that what is peculiar to a single Gospel is by that fact stamped as less historical: no one would think (e.g.) of affirming this of some of the parables peculiar to St. Luke; but it is fair to suppose that in the first instance it was less widely diffused. To this class would belong the narratives of the Nativity and of the Infancy. It will be in some ways a gain not to begin with these, but to let them enter into the story as they entered into it with the first Christians. More than one point which might otherwise perplex us will in this way suggest its own explanation.

Limits of space do not allow us to go elaborately into the question as to the trustworthiness of our materials. It may suffice to point to one undoubted fact which furnishes at least a considerable presumption in their favour. The apostolic age produced some strongly marked personalities, with well defined types of thought and phraseology. Now, broadly speaking, these types have left but little trace upon the Gospels. The special type characteristic of the Gospels themselves stands out conspicuously over against them. We need hardly do more than refer to such very significant facts as that the Gospels alone contain specimens of teaching by parables; that the idea of the 'kingdom of heaven' (or 'of God'), which is quite central in the Gospels, recedes into the background in the writings of the apostles; that the same holds good of that most significant title 'Son of Man'; that, on the other hand, such a term as 'justify' is rare and hardly technical, while 'justification,' 'sanctification,' 'reconciliation' (or 'atonement'), and a number of others are wholly absent. It may be said that the Fourth Gospel is an exception, that there we have a suspicious resemblance to the style and diction of the Epp. of St. John. Some resemblance there is, and we would not entirely reject the inference drawn from it. But even here the exception is but partial. It has often been noticed that the evangelist scrupulously confines his doctrine of the Logos to the prologue.

The writer of this art. may be allowed once more to express the conviction,* which he believes that continued investigation will confirm, that the great mass of the Synoptic Gospels had assumed its permanent shape not later than the decade 60–70 A.D., and that the changes which it underwent after the great catastrophe of the fall of Jerusalem were but small, and can without difficulty be recognized.

But the task on which we are at present engaged must in the main supply its own vindication. The picture which it is here attempted to draw will commend itself so far as it is consistent and coherent, and no further. No one, indeed, expects in these days the formal and external consistency aimed at in the older Harmonies; but the writer himself believes that in their inner essence the Gospels are consistent and coherent, and if he fails to convey the impression of this, the failure will be his own. He is conscious of something tentative in the way in which he has sought to work in data derived from the Fourth Gospel with those derived from the other three. But here, again, he is giving expression to the best opinion he can form, and the value of that opinion must be judged by the result. Where he is not satisfied with his own success, he has not hesitated to say so.

To what has been said above it should be added, that if we assume the standpoint of a spectator, a brief preface will be needed to explain what that standpoint is. In other words, we shall have at the outset to take a rapid survey of the conditions under which the Life of Christ was lived, so that we may see to what His teaching had to attach itself, and what served for it as a foil, by way of contrast and antagonism.

The main divisions of our subject will thus be—

I. SURVEY OF CONDITIONS.
II. THE PUBLIC MINISTRY OF JESUS, preceded by that of the Baptist.
III. SUPPLEMENTAL MATTER, not included in the Public Ministry, and derived from special sources.
IV. THE VERDICT OF HISTORY.

I. SURVEY OF CONDITIONS.—The picture which we form for ourselves of Palestine in the time of our Lord is apt to be wanting in play and variety. A few strong and simple colours are all that are used; we do not allow enough for their blending, or for the finer and subtler tones which mingle with them. We see the worldly ambition of the Sadducees, the self-seeking and formalism of the Pharisees; over both, the rough stern rule of the Roman; and under both, the chafing tide of popular passion, working itself up to its outburst of fury in the Great War. Perhaps we throw in somewhere in a corner the cloistered communities of the Essenes; but if so, it is rather as standing apart by themselves than as entering into the general life.

It is not so much that this picture is wrong as that it needs to be supplemented, and it needs a little toning down of the light and shade. This is the case especially with the internal conditions, the state of thought and of the religious life.

A. EXTERNAL CONDITIONS: GOVERNMENT, SECTS, AND PARTIES.—The external conditions are so comparatively simple and so well known that a rapid glance at them will suffice.

At the time of our Lord's public ministry, Judæa and Samaria were directly subject to the Romans, and were governed by a procurator (Pontius Pilate, A.D. 26–36), who was to some extent subordinate to the legatus of Syria. Pilate had a character for cruelty (cf. Lk 13^1). And the Roman rule was no doubt as a whole harsh and unfeeling: we read of wholesale executions, which took the horrible form of crucifixion. But the people whom Rome had to govern were turbulent in the extreme; and so far as the Roman authorities come before us in NT, we cannot refuse them the credit of a desire to do a sort of rough justice.

---

* See the Bampton Lectures for 1893, p. 286 ff.

The odious duty of collecting tolls and taxes for the Romans led to the employment of a class of underlings (τελῶναι, publicani), who were regarded almost as outcasts by their Jewish countrymen.

The north and east of Palestine were still in the hands of sons of Herod. Antipas (4 B.C. to 39 A.D.) held Galilee and Peræa; and his brother Philip (4 B.C. to 34 A.D.), Ituræa and Trachonitis. The name given to the former, 'that fox' (Lk 13^{32}), will sufficiently describe him; he was living in open sin with Herodias, the wife of another brother, but was not wholly unvisited by remorse, and had at least curiosity in matters of religion (Mk 6^{20} ||, Lk 23^{8}). His capital was at Tiberias, on the Sea of Galilee, and he also held possession of the strong fortress of Machærus[*] E. of the Dead Sea. Herod Philip governed his dominions quietly, and was the best and most popular of his father's sons.

The Sadducees (Zadokite priests) consisted mainly of certain aristocratic priestly families (Ac 4^{6}) who held almost a monopoly of the high priesthood, and who played an influential and active part in the Sanhedrin, which under the Romans wielded considerable power. They were typical opportunists, and were bent above all things on keeping their own rights and privileges. Hence they were sensitive on the subject of popular disorder, which was likely to serve as an excuse to the Romans for displacing them (Jn 11^{48}). It was a coalition of Pharisees and Sadducees which procured the death of our Lord, but in the period of the Acts the Sadducees were the more active persecutors. Religion with them was secondary, but they differed somewhat both in doctrine and in practice from the Pharisees (Ac 23^{8}; cf. Edersheim, Life and Times, i. 314–321, etc.). They did not encumber themselves with the Pharisaic traditions, but took their stand upon the Pentateuch. They were notorious for strictness in judgment.

As contrasted with the Sadducees, the Pharisees (lit. Separatists or Purists) were essentially the religious party. They numbered more than 6000 (Ant. XVII. ii. 4), and were pledged to a high standard of life and scrupulous performance of religious duties (Mt 23^{23}). Unfortunately, the high standard was outward rather than inward. The elaborate casuistry to which the Pharisees had recourse was used as a means of evading moral obligations (Mk 7^{1-13} || 12^{38-40} ||, Mt 23^{13-33}), and resulted in a spirit hard, narrow, and self-righteous.

Not exactly coextensive with the Pharisees, though largely to be identified with them (we read of 'scribes of the Pharisees,' Mk 2^{16} RV; i.e. 'scribes who belonged to the party of the Pharisees'), were the Scribes (γραμματεῖς, νομικοί, νομοδιδάσκαλοι), or professed students of the law, who supplied the Pharisees with their principles. They had to a large extent taken the place of the priests as the preachers and teachers of Judaism. Their chief fields of action were the synagogues and the Rabbinical schools. The most highly respected of the scribes were the great religious authorities of the day. It was their successors who built up the Talmud. There were differences of opinion within the body (e.g. the rival schools of Hillel and Shammai, contemporaries of Herod the Great), but, without, their dicta were unquestioned. This veneration was, as a rule, only requited with contempt.

While the Pharisees at this date for the most part (though not entirely) held aloof from politics, on the ground that religion as they conceived it could be practised indifferently under any domination, and their own experiences under the national line, represented by Alexander Jannæus, had been the reverse of happy, the mass of the people were burning to throw off the yoke of the stranger. The party of action, which was prepared to go all lengths, was known as the Zealots. One member of this party was numbered among the apostles (Mt 10^{4}, Mk 3^{18}, Lk 6^{15}, Ac 1^{13}). In the siege of Jerus. they took the lead, and were distinguished at once by heroic courage and by horrible crimes.

The dynasty of the Herods had from the first claimed alliance with Hellenic culture. The founder of the dynasty had mixed with advantage to himself in the haute politique of his day; and he had signalized his reign by buildings in the Greek style, but on a scale of barbaric magnificence. The courts of the Herods must always have had a tincture of Hellenism about them. But the reaction against this was strong, and its influence probably did not extend very far, though it inspired the historians Nicolaus of Damascus, Justus of Tiberias, and Josephus. More likely to affect the lower and middle strata of the population would be the 'Greek cities' founded by the Syrian kings before the Maccabæan rising, such as the cluster known as Decapolis, for the most part east of the Jordan, with later foundations like the flourishing port of Cæsarea. But more important still would be the influence of the Jews of the Diaspora, constantly coming and going to the great feasts at Jerusalem, and with synagogues for their special use permanently established there (Ac 6^{9}). The greatest of the centres with which the Jews were thus brought in contact were Alexandria and Antioch. And there is reason to think that the amount of intellectual intercourse and interchange was by no means inconsiderable.

There must have been other foreign influences at work, but rather by what might be called underground channels. The connexion of Palestine with Babylonia and the East, which goes back to immemorial antiquity, had been revived and deepened by the Captivity. It was kept up by intercourse with the Jews who remained in those regions. But whether or not they had come precisely in this way, there can be no doubt that Oriental, and indeed specifically Persian influences were present in the sect of the Essenes. The ceremonial washings, and the reverence paid to the sun, can hardly have had any other origin. The asceticism and community of goods have a Pythagorean cast, and may have come from Greece by way of Egypt, while the rejection of sacrifice and what we know of the speculative tendencies of the Essenes may well be native to the soil of Palestine. The Essene settlements were congregated near the Dead Sea.

B. INTERNAL CONDITIONS: THE STATE OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT AND LIFE.

1. General Conditions.—To describe justly the state of Judaism in the time of Christ is a difficult and delicate thing. It is too apt to seem like an indictment of the Judaism of nineteen centuries, which not only on general grounds, but specially in view of the attitude of some Jewish apologists of the present day, a Christian theologian will be loth to bring. He will desire to make all the allowances that can rightly be made, and to state all the evidence (so far as he knows it) for as well as against. But at the same time he must not gloss over real faults and defects, without a statement of which Christianity itself can be but imperfectly understood.

Truth does not, as a rule, lie in compromises. And its interests will be perhaps best served if we set down without reserve both the darker and the brighter sides, only asking the reader to remember while he has the one before him, that the other is also there. That we attempt this difficult task at all is due to no wanton assumption of a right to judge, but to the unavoidable necessity that what is so intimately bound up with history should be seen in the full light which history throws upon it.

[*] In Ant. XVIII. v. 2 Machærus is in the possession of Antipas, in the previous § it belongs to Aretas; but the reading of this latter passage is questionable (cf. Schürer, NTZG i. 362 n., 365 n. [HJP I. ii. 23, 25]).

(a) The Darker Side of the Contemporary Judaism.—As we look broadly at the religious condition of Palestine in the time of our Lord, there can be little doubt that it was in need of a drastic reformation. This is the impression inevitably conveyed by the Gospels, and by the searching criticisms of St. Paul. Nor is it belied by the witness of Josephus, and in particular by the outbreak of untamed passion, with the horrors to which it gave rise, in the Jewish War. And although it may be easy to make a selection from the Talmud of sayings of a different character, it can hardly be questioned that the same source supplies proof enough that the denunciations of the Gospels were not without foundation. There is too evident a connexion between the inherent principles of Judaism and the defects charged against it to permit us to regard these as devoid of truth.

(i.) The idea of God was perhaps the strongest side of Judaism, but it was too exclusively transcendent. It had no adequate means of spanning the gulf between God and man. The faults of Judaism were those of Deism. It had one tender place, the love of J" for Israel. But this fell some way short of the Christian idea of the Father in heaven, the God who not only loves a single people, but whose essence is love. Judaism also largely wanted the mystical element which has played such an important part in Christianity. The Johannean allegory of the Vine and the Branches, which agrees so closely with the teaching of St. Paul, the whole conception of immanent divine forces circulating through the organism, has no true analogy in it.* (ii.) But the most disastrous feature of Rabbinical Judaism was its identification of morality with obedience to written law. 'Duty, goodness, piety,—all these are to the Jew equivalent terms. They are mere synonyms for the same conception—the fulfilment of the law. A man therefore is good who knows the law and obeys it; a man is wicked who is ignorant of it and transgresses it' (Montefiore, Hibbert Lectures, p. 479). This identification of morality with law led to a number of serious evils. (iii.) Law can deal only with overt action. Hence there was an inevitable tendency to restrict the field of morals to overt action. Motive was comparatively disregarded. It is doubtless true that the Rabbis frequently insist on rightness of motive. A religion which in its Sacred Books included the Prophets as well as the Law could not do otherwise. But the legal conception was too deeply ingrained not to tell its tale. If it had not been so, there would have been no need for the Sermon on the Mount; and the address, 'Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites,' would have had no point. (iv.) Another consequence of the stress laid on overt acts was the development of an elaborate doctrine of salvation by works. We need not suppose that this doctrine was universally held and always consciously acted upon; but it cannot be denied that there was in Judaism a widespread opinion that might be expressed in the terms, 'so much keeping of the law, so much merit'; and the idea of a 'treasure of merit,' which each man stores up for himself, is constantly met with. (v.) In one sense the keeping of the law was very hard. The labours of the scribes had added to the original and primary laws an immense mass of inferential law, which was placed on the same footing of authority. This portentous accumulation of precepts was a burden 'grievous to be borne.' (vi.) Not only so, but a great part of this additional law was bad law. It was law inferred by a faulty system of exegesis. Even where the exegesis was bonâ fide, it was in a large proportion of cases unreal and artificial. But there was a great temptation to dishonesty, for which the way was left open by the exaggerated stress laid on acts, and the comparative ignoring of motive. In the dead level of written law the relative degrees of obligation were disregarded. Hence there were a number of precepts which were positively immoral (e.g. Corban, Mk $7^{11.12}$ ‖). (vii.) A further defect in the legal conception of religion was its intellectualism. The Talmud bears witness to what is little less than an idolatry of learning, and that, we must remember, Rabbinical learning. With religion converted into science, and the science in great part no science, we may well say, 'If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is the darkness!' The Scholasticism of the Middle Ages had no such unchallenged supremacy; it was not the one all-pervading ideal. (viii.) For the mass of the population the double law, traditional as well as original, could not but be a burden. The accumulation of precepts not possessed of moral value is always a thing to be deprecated. And however much we may allow for the fact that the observance of all these precepts was not expected of every one, there still remained enough to be a real incubus. And yet, on the other hand, the performance of the full Pharisaic standard was not so very difficult for persons of leisure, who deliberately made up their minds to it. It did not mean, or at least it might be understood as not meaning, more than a life mechanically regulated. But then it is easy to see that the existence of this class, consciously setting itself above its neighbours, and able, without any excessive strain, to make good its pretensions, must have inevitably engendered a feeling of self-righteousness or spiritual pride. The parable of the Pharisee and the Publican (Lk 18^{11-13}) must needs have been typical. (ix.) What the Pharisee was to the ordinary Jew, that the Jew was to the rest of mankind. However politically inferior, the Jew never lost his pride of race, and with him this pride of race was a pride of religious privilege. The Zealot sought to translate this into political domination, but the Pharisee was content to retire into the fortress of his inner consciousness, from which he could look with equanimity at the rise and fall of secular powers. (x.) This particular form of pride had a tendency to aggravate itself as time went on. 'To make a fence round the law' was a fundamental principle of Judaism. And in a like spirit the privileged people was tempted to make a fence round itself, and to dwell apart among the nations. Institutions which had had for their object to keep the nation clear of idolatry, were extended when the dangers of idolatry were past, until it required a revolution to say with St. Paul, 'There is neither Jew nor Greek.' (xi.) Worst and most disastrous of all was the tendency to fall back upon national privilege as a substitute for real reformation of life. We can see alike from the Gospels and from St. Paul how constantly the Jews had upon their lips, 'We have Abraham to our father' (Lk 3^8, Jn $8^{33.39}$, Ro 2^{17-20}). It is admitted that 'the Jews were somewhat too confident of their assured participation in the blessedness of eternal life; all Israelites, except very exceptional and determined sinners, were believed to have their share in it' (Montefiore, Hibb. Lect. p. 482).

(β) The Brighter Side of the Contemporary Judaism.—The above is a long and a serious catalogue of charges, partly resting upon the logic of the creed, but also too much borne out by positive testimony. It seems conclusively to prove that not only reformation, but a thoroughgoing reformation, was needed.

---

* The comparison of Israel to a vine is not unknown to Judaism, but in a wholly different application (see Wünsche, Erläut. d. Evang. on Jn 15^1).

And yet there is another side which the Christian teacher ought to emphasize more fully than it has been the custom to do.

(i.) In the first place, we have to remember that Judaism is professedly the religion of the OT. It is based upon a Book which includes the Prophets and the Psalms (to use the familiar description a potiori parte) as well as the Law. And however much Judaism proper gave precedence to the Law, it could not forget the other parts of the volume, or run wholly counter to their spirit. It is not too much to say that even in the Talmud we can see at every turn how the spirit of legalism was corrected by an influence which is ultimately derived from what are rightly called the evangelical portions of OT. We shall see to what an extent Christianity itself is a direct development of these.

(ii). The evidence of NT, severe as it is upon the whole, yet is not all of one tenor. Its pages are sprinkled over with Jewish characters, who are mentioned in terms of praise: Zacharias and Elisabeth, Simeon and Anna, Nathanael, Nicodemus, and Joseph of Arimathæa, the young ruler, and the scribe who was pronounced to be 'not far from the kingdom of God' (Mk 12^{34}). We must not forget that there are parts of NT itself which in recent years have been claimed by Christian scholars as thinly veneered products of Judaism (Ep. of James, Apoc.). Whatever we may think of these particular instances, there are others (such as Didachê and the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs) in which it is highly probable that a Jewish original has been adapted to Christian purposes. And our present investigation will bring before us many examples in which, while Christianity corrects Jewish teaching, it nevertheless takes its start from it, and that not only from the purer original, but in its contemporary form.

(iii.) The panegyrists of the Talmud have at least right on their side to this extent, that single sayings can frequently be quoted from it in disproof of the sweeping allegations brought against it by its assailants. There are grains of fine wheat among its chaff. Some of these are referred, on what seems to be good authority, to a time anterior to the coming of Christ. The 'golden rule' is attributed to Hillel. The story is that when Shammai drove away an inquirer who desired to be taught the whole Torah while he stood on one foot, the man went to Hillel, who said: 'What is hateful to thyself do not to thy fellow; this is the whole Torah, and the rest is commentary' (Taylor, Pirqe Aboth, p. 37). Another great saying is ascribed to Antigonus of Soko: 'Be not as slaves that minister to the lord with a view to receive recompense; but be as slaves that minister to the lord without a view to receive recompense; and let the fear of Heaven be upon you' (ib. p. 27). There is a fair number of such sayings. If we take the treatise from which the last is directly quoted we shall see in it what is probably not an unfair representation of the better Judaism in the time of Christ, with its weaknesses sufficiently indicated, but with something also of its strength.

(iv.) It is right also to bear in mind that the Judaism of this date had no lack of enthusiasts and martyrs. Akiba in particular, though a Jew of the Jews, cannot but command our admiration (see Taylor, ut sup. p. 67 ff.). And in a different category his fortitude is matched by the mitis sapientia of Hillel, of whom it was said that his gentleness brought men 'nigh under the wings of the Shekinah' (ib. p. 37).

(v.) A favourable impression on the whole is given by the numerous pseudepigraphic works, which belong in the main to the two centuries on each side of the Christian era. The oldest parts of the Book of Enoch may possibly be earlier, just as some outlying members of the Baruch literature are probably later. The most typical writings are the Book of Enoch and the Psalms of Solomon (which can be dated with tolerable certainty B.C. 70–40), the Book of Jubilees and the Assumption of Moses (which may be taken as roughly contemporary with the founding of Christianity), and the Fourth Book of Ezra (2 Es) and the Apoc. of Baruch, both after the fall of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. These writings show in varying degrees most of the characteristic infirmities of Judaism, but they also show its nobler features in a way which sometimes, and especially in the two latest works, throws the infirmities into the shade.*

It is a moot point how far the pseudepigrapha can be taken as representative of the main currents of Judaism. Montefiore, writing in 1892, says, 'It must be remembered that the apocalyptic writings lie for the most part outside the line of the purest Jewish development, and often present but the fringe or excrescence, and not the real substance of the dominating religious thought' (Hibb. Lect. p. 467). On the other hand, Charles has no difficulty in assigning the different portions to recognized party divisions in Judaism. Schürer in like manner describes their standpoint as that of 'correct Judaism,' adding, however, that they are 'not products of the school, but of free religious individuality' (HJP III. ii. 49). Similarly, Baldensperger speaks of 4 Ezra and Baruch as free from the spirit of casuistry, and not 'absorbed in the Halachic rules' (p. 35, ed. 1). This verdict would apply in some degree to this class of literature generally. It is perhaps in the main of provincial origin, or at least somewhat outside the beaten tracks of Jewish teaching. The Pss. of Solomon and Bk. of Jubilees would be nearest to these. It is very probable that 4 Ezr and Apoc. Bar were directly affected by the ferment of thought caused by the birth of Christianity.

When we endeavour to put together the impressions which we derive from these various sources, we may perhaps say that the outcome of them is that Judaism at the Christian era had all the outer framework of a sound religion if only the filling in had been different. The Jew knew better than any of his contemporaries in Greece or Rome or in the East what religion was. He had a truer conception of God, and of the duty of man towards God; but on the first head he had much still to learn, and on the second he had many faults to be corrected in the working out of detail.

The Jew had at least a profound seriousness on the subject of religion. Where this was wanting, the man was no true Jew. And, even allowing for all the external influences which told against this, there was among the Jews probably less of professed atheism, indifference, levity, than there has ever been in any other society, ancient or modern. The Jew had also an intense feeling of loyalty to this society. His love of what we should call his Church rose to a passion. It is this which makes the apocalypses which followed the fall of Jerusalem so pathetic. The faith of men has probably seldom received a shock so severe. The authors of these apocalypses feel the shock to the uttermost. They grope about anxiously to find the meaning of God's mysterious dealings; but their faith in Him is unshaken. They are divided between passionate grief and resignation: 'Two things vehemently constrain me: for I cannot resist thee, and my soul, moreover, cannot behold the evils of my mother' (Apoc. Bar 3^{3}).

2. The Special Seed-plot of Christianity.—In general terms it may be said that when we seek for affinities to Christianity we find more of them the farther we recede from the centre of official Judaism. The one thing to which Christianity is most opposed is the hard, dry, casuistic legalism

---

* For a closer and more exact but still tentative analysis and dating, the reader may be referred to the editions by R. H. Charles of Enoch (1893), Secrets of Enoch and Apoc. of Baruch (1896), Assumption of Moses (1897); or for a judicious presentation of average opinion, to Schürer, HJP II. iii. 54 ff.

of the Pharisee. If we are right in thinking of the apocalyptic literature as in the main provincial, we shall not be surprised to find the points of contact with it become more numerous. Wherever there are traces of a fresher and deeper study of the Psalms and Prophets, there we have a natural kinship for the Christian spirit.

Now there is one class among whom this continuity with Psalms and Prophets is specially marked. It has been observed * that there is a group of Psalms (of which perhaps 9. 10. 22. 25. 35. 40. 69. 109 are the most prominent) in which the words translated in EV 'poor,' 'needy,' 'humble,' 'meek' are of specially frequent occurrence. It appears that these words have acquired a moral meaning. From meaning originally those who are 'afflicted' or 'oppressed' (by men), they have come to mean those who in their oppression have drawn nearer to God and leave their cause in His hands. They are the pious Israelites who suffer from the tyranny of the heathen or of their worldly countrymen, and who refuse to assert themselves, but accept in a humble spirit the chastening sent by God. As there were many such in every period of the history of Israel, they might be said to form a class. Now there is other evidence that this class still existed at the Christian era. They are the mansueti et quiescentes of 4 Ezr (2 Es) 11^{42}. They are just the class indicated in Ps-Sol 5$^{13f.}$ 'Who is the hope of the needy and the poor beside thee, O Lord? And thou wilt hearken: for who is gracious and gentle but thou? Thou makest glad the heart of the humble by opening thine hand in mercy.' (Compare also the reff. in Ryle and James, p. 48, and Index, s.v. πτωχός). The special NT designation is πτωχοὶ τῷ πνεύματι (Mt 5^{3}). And a better expression of the spirit in question could not easily be found than the Magnificat (Lk 1$^{46-55}$). It is clear that the group which appears in Lk 1. 2, not only Joseph and Mary, but Zacharias and Elisabeth, Simeon and Anna, all answer to this description. They are those who look for 'the consolation of Israel,' 'the redemption of Israel' (Lk 2$^{25.38}$), and who looked for it rather by fasting and prayer than by any haste to grasp the sword. There was no organized party, no concerted policy; but we cannot doubt that there were many devout souls scattered throughout the country, and in just the kind of distribution which the chapters Lk 1. 2 would suggest, some for shorter or longer periods making their way to Jerusalem, but the greater number dispersed over such secluded districts as the 'highlands' (ἡ ὀρεινή, Lk 1^{39}) of Judæa and Galilee.

Here was the class which seemed, as it were, specially prepared to receive a new spiritual impulse and to take up a great movement of reformation. And other tendencies were in the air which were ready to contribute to the spread of such a movement when it came. The labours of the scribes had not been all wasted. There is a good example in Mk 12$^{32-34}$—the happy combination of Dt 4^{39} with Lv 19^{18}—which shows that even among the Rabbis there were some who were feeling their way towards the more penetrating teaching of Jesus.

One great transition had been made since Ezk 18. The value of the individual soul was by this time fully realized. The old merging of the individual in the family and the clan had been fully left behind. Another germ contained in the teaching of the prophets had been developed. We can see from the case of the Essenes that men's minds were being prepared for the abolition of animal sacrifices, and along with the abolition of sacrifice for an end to the localized worship of the temple. The great extension of the synagogue services would contribute to the same result.

The proselytizing zeal which the later Judaism had displayed (Mt 23^{15}) operated in several ways. It was a step in the direction of the ultimate evangelizing of the Gentiles. It had created a class in which the liberal influences of Græco-Roman education prevented the purer principles of OT from lapsing into Judaic narrowness and formalism, and in which it was therefore natural that Christianity should strike root. We meet with specimens of this class in the Gospels (Lk 7$^{2-5}$‖, Mk 15^{39}‖) as well as in the Acts. And not only was there created a class of recipients for the gospel, but in the effort to meet the demands of these converts from paganism there was a tendency to tone down and throw into the background the more repellent features of Judaism. If it is true, as it probably is, that the so-called Didaché is a Christian enlargement of what was originally a Jewish manual for proselytes, it would be a good illustration of this process.

3. The Messianic Expectation.—But by far the most important of all the preparations for the gospel, negative as well as positive, both as demanding correction and as leading up to fulfilment, was the growth of the Messianic expectation, with the group of doctrines which went along with it.

The more the stress of the times was felt, and the more hopeless it seemed that any ordinary development of events could rescue the Jewish people from its oppressors, the more were its hopes thrown into the future and based upon the direct intervention of God. The starting-point of these hopes was the great prophecy in Dn 7. The world empires, one succeeding another, and all tyrannizing over the Chosen People, were to be judged, and Israel at last was to enter on the dominion reserved for it. The figure of the Son of Man who appears before the Ancient of days (Dn 7$^{13f.}$) was not in the first instance a person: it was a collective expression, equivalent to the 'saints of the Most High' in v.^{18}. The form of a 'man' is taken in contrast to the 'beasts,' which represent in the context the dynasties of the oppressors. In conflict with the last of these Israel is at first to be hard pressed, but God Himself will interpose by an act of divine judgment; the enemy will be crushed, and there will be given to Israel a kingdom which is universal and eternal.

This dominion is Israel's by right. It had not only been repeatedly promised from Abraham onwards, but it had been earned as a matter of desert. It was the complement of Israel's possession of the law. By its observance of the law Israel had acquired a right which no other nation could acquire. In the compact or covenant between Israel and Jehovah, Israel was doing its part, and it remained for God to do His.

The grand catastrophe by which this was to be brought about, the περιπέτεια in the tragedy of the nations, was to culminate in an act of judgment. The day of the Lord, conceived of by the prophets at first as a decisive battle in which God intervenes, gives place to a judicial act in which those who have oppressed His people are called to account, and the parts of oppressor and oppressed are reversed. To complete the justice of the case, those of the saints who have died in the times of distress must not be left out. There must be a resurrection. And the resurrection will usher in for them a state of lasting joy and felicity. Nature would share with man. There would be a 'new heaven and a new earth.' The tendency was to conceive of these somewhat literally and materially. Elaborate but at the same time prosaic pictures are given of the inexhaustible plenty which the saints (i.e. Israel as a people) are to enjoy.

Their bliss is also sometimes compared to a great feast (cf. Lk 14^{15}).

In the Bk. of Daniel, and, as it would seem for some time afterwards, the reign of the saints is conceived impersonally. It is the dominion of Israel, the Chosen People. But gradually there arises a tendency to go back to a more primitive stage of prophecy, and to see the kingdom as concentrated in the person of its King: there is a personal Messiah. This is conspicuously the case in the Psalms of Solomon (17. 18), the date of which is fixed between B.C. 70–40. The righteous King who is to rule over the nations is the Davidic King of the elder prophets. A personal King is also implied in Orac. Sibyll. iii. 49 f., 652–656. In the middle section of the Bk. of Enoch (chs. 37–71), which is also probably pre-Christian, the title 'Son of Man' is taken up from Dn and distinctly identified with a person. Here, too, as in Orac. Sibyll. iii. 286, and Apoc. Bar 72^{2-6}, the Messiah is not only King but Judge (cf. Enoch 45^{3} 62^{8-13} 69^{27}). The execution of the judgment is handed over to Him by God. There is not absolute unity of view. Sometimes judgment is carried out by the Messiah, sometimes by God Himself (e.g. Enoch 90^{18-27}, Ass. Mos. 10^{3-10}). There is also some diversity as to the extent to which the resurrection is to be of the righteous, of Israel, or of all mankind. One view is that there are to be two resurrections, with a millennial reign between them.

The Sadducees held aloof from the Messianic expectation to which they were not clearly compelled by the few allusions in the Pentateuch, and which would have been only a disturbing element in their policy of making the best—for themselves—of things as they were. Some of the scribes must have also done what they could to discourage the belief. It is well known that Hillel is said to have asserted that the prophecies of the Messiah were fulfilled in Hezekiah. But there is abundant evidence that in spite of this the expectation was widely diffused. It must have been constantly preached in the synagogues of Palestine, and it certainly took a strong hold of the popular mind. It was differently received and understood by different hearers. With some quiet God-fearing souls, 'poor in spirit' like those who come before us at the beginning of the evangelical narrative in Lk 1. 2, it was cherished secretly with awed and wistful longing (Lk $2^{25.\,38}$). With the mass of the population, as well teachers as taught, it took its place only too easily among the body of hard, narrow, materialized beliefs which were so characteristic of the time—a visible earthly kingdom reserved for Israel as its right, and carrying with it domination over other nations, with such unlimited command of enjoyment as a sovereign people might expect under conditions specially created for its benefit: all this introduced by supernatural means, wielded by One who is variously called 'Messiah' or 'Anointed,' 'the righteous King,' 'the Elect' or 'Son of Man,' not (if the question were pressed) in the strict sense God, though endowed by God with plenary powers, a fit Head for the Chosen People in its golden age, which was at last about to begin. And scattered among these masses there were many — some banded together under the name of Zealots, and thousands more who were ready to join them at the first signal—men not of dreams but of action, who were only waiting for the leader and the hour to put their hand to the sword and rise in revolt against the hated foreigners who oppressed them, prepared to take a fearful vengeance, and proud in the thought that in doing so they would be 'doing God service' and establishing His kingdom.

LITERATURE.—Vast stores of ordered material are contained in Schürer's great work orig. called Neutest. Zeitgeschichte (NTZG), and now as in the Eng. tr. Hist. of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ (HJP). The Eng. tr. from the 2nd much enlarged ed. came out in 1885–90; a 3rd ed., still further enlarged, has begun to appear (vols. ii. and iii., 1898). The late Dr. Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (revised eds. from 1886) is also full of illustrative matter. Other works by the same author may also be consulted; esp. History of the Jewish Nation after the Destruction of Jerus. under Titus (2nd ed. carefully revised by H. A. White, 1896). Another very useful work is Weber's System d. altsynagog. Paläst. Theol., now called Jüdische Theologie (2nd ed., somewhat improved, 1897). As there is always a danger of confusing Jewish teaching of very different dates, this book should be checked as far as possible by comparison with the Pseudepigrapha, Philo, NT, and the early Talmudic work Pirqe Aboth (Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, ed. Taylor, 1877, and enlarged in 1897). To these authorities should now be added G. Dalman, Die Worte Jesu (Bd. i., 1898 fin.), the most critical and scientific examination of the leading conceptions of the Gospels that has yet appeared.

Mention may be made among older works of Drummond's Jewish Messiah (1877) and Stanton's Jewish and Christian Messiah (1887). Hausrath's NT Times (Eng. tr. 1878–80) is picturesquely written, but far less trustworthy than Schürer; and Wünsche's Neue Beiträge z. Erläuterung d. Evv. (1878) is much criticized. Montefiore's Hibbert Lectures (1892) and arts. in JQR form an attractive apology for Judaism.

II. THE PUBLIC MINISTRY.—We shall now be in a position to approach the study of the Public Ministry of our Lord in the manner indicated at the outset. We shall be able to place ourselves at the standpoint of a sympathetic spectator. We shall have some rough conception of the kind of ideas which would be in his mind, and of the kind of conditions which he would see around him. We shall thus be able to follow the course of the Public Ministry with a certain amount of intelligence. We do not as yet attempt to penetrate the whole of its secret. Broadly speaking, we suppose ourselves to see what a privileged spectator might be expected to see, and no more. We reserve until a later stage the introduction of those special details of illuminative knowledge which, as a matter of history, were not accessible to the first spectators, but were only disclosed after a time. But we hold ourselves at liberty to collect and group the facts which were not removed from the cognizance of a spectator, in any way that may be most convenient to secure clearness of presentation.

It may be well to avail ourselves of this freedom at once, before giving an outline of the ministry, to state summarily certain conclusions which seem to arise out of the study of it. We shall hold the threads in our minds more firmly if we see to what results they are tending.

The anticipated conclusions, then, are these: (i.) From the very first (i.e. from the Baptism) our Lord had the full consciousness of the Messiah, and the full determination to found the Kingdom of God upon earth. (ii.) From the very first He had also the deliberate intention of transforming the current idea of the Kingdom. (iii.) In order to make this transformation effective, it was necessary to begin with the idea of the Kingdom and not of the King. In other words, the personal Messianic claim had to be kept in the background. But (iv.) the transformation of the idea was only a preliminary to the permanent establishment of the Kingdom; and this establishment turned round the Person of the Messiah. So that in the end the history of the Kingdom centres in the personal history of the King.

With so much of preface we proceed to give an outline of the Public Ministry according to the periods into which it seems to fall.

The chronology adopted in this article, not as certain, but as on the whole the best of current systems, is in substantial agreement with that of the art. CHRONOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. It differs from that in the writer's first work, The Authorship and Historical Character of the Fourth Gospel (London, 1872), by placing the Crucifixion in the year A.D. 29 rather than A.D. 30.

A. PRELIMINARY PERIOD: FROM THE BAPTISM TO THE CALL OF THE LEADING APOSTLES.

Scene.—Mainly Judæa, but in part also Galilee.

Time.—Winter A.D. 26 to a few weeks after Passover A.D. 27.

Mt 3^{1}–4^{11}, Mk $1^{1\text{-}13}$, Lk 3^{1}–4^{13}, Jn 1^{6}–4^{54}.

The Public Ministry of our Lord begins with His Baptism. (i.) This will therefore be the first point to attract our attention, and some explanation will be needed as to the Baptist and his mission. (ii.) Along with the Baptism we must needs take the Temptation, as a glimpse vouchsafed by Jesus Himself, and early and widely published, of the principles which were to determine the nature of His Ministry. (iii.) After this will come the first preliminary gathering of a few loosely attached followers, and the first miracle at Cana in Galilee. (iv.) Then the visit to Jerusalem for the Passover of the year 27, with a short stay in the South. (v.) Then we have a return to Galilee, followed by a brief period of partial retirement, leading up to the Call of the four chief apostles.

Allusions, more or less explicit, to the Baptism and to the ministry of John, are found in all four Gospels; the other events of this period are recorded only in the fourth—unless we are to identify the Healing of the Nobleman's Son (Jn $4^{46\text{-}54}$) with that of the Centurion's Servant (Mt $8^{5\text{-}13}$, Lk $7^{1\text{-}10}$).

i. The Baptist and the Baptism.—Our survey of contemporary Judaism has shown us that 'the kingdom of God' was a phrase in almost every man's mouth. It meant, in point of fact, to the majority 'a kingdom for Israel' far more than a 'kingdom of God.' But though in a more or less indefinite sense it was understood to be near, no time had as yet been actually announced for it. Men were on the watch, but rather for the signs of the coming than for the actual coming itself.

We are not surprised, therefore, to find that the news that a prophet had appeared who preached the approaching coming of the Messiah caused a widespread excitement.* The aspect of this coming, which he put in the forefront, was the aspect of judgment. The axe was laid to the root of the trees, and the fruitless tree would be burned (Mt 3^{10}, Lk 3^{9}).

The prophet who made this announcement bore the name of John. The scene of his preaching was the wilderness of Judæa, near the lower course of the Jordan where it fell into the Dead Sea. In this wilderness he had lived in solitude for some time before he began his prophetic mission. His whole appearance was sternly ascetic. He seems to have adopted deliberately a garb and a manner of life resembling those of Elijah, probably not so much in anticipation of the verdict which was to be afterwards passed upon him (Mt 11^{14}) as because he took Elijah for his model.

His character and his mission alike were severely simple. His soul was possessed with a strong conviction, wrought in him in precisely the same manner in which such convictions were wrought in the prophets of the OT, that a great crisis was near at hand. What lay beyond was dim, and, so far as the prophet had a definite picture before him, it was probably not very different from that which presented itself to his countrymen. But he saw clearly that the crisis would take the form of a judgment, and that there would be a judge, a personal judge, with a mission vastly greater than his own. At the same time, it is also borne in upon him that the preparation required by this coming judgment is a moral reformation. This he sees intensely; and again he goes back behind the teaching of his day to that of the ancient prophets. That which is required is not merely a stricter performance of the law, but a deep inward change—a change spontaneously expressing itself in right action.

Once more, and indeed very conspicuously, he made good his resemblance to the older prophets by clothing this leading idea of his in an expressive symbolical act. The rumour of him brought the people to him in crowds; and one by one, as they confessed to him their sins and convinced him of the reality of their repentance, he took them down into the running waters of the Jordan; he made them plunge in or let the waters close over their heads, and then he led them out again with the consciousness that they had left their sinful past behind them, and that they were pledged to a new life.

The process was called 'Baptism'; and John, from the fact that it constituted the main outward expression of his mission, was called 'the Baptist.' The act bore a certain resemblance to those ceremonial washings with which the Jews were familiar enough, and which held a specially prominent place in the ritual of the Essenes. But it differed from all these in that it was an act performed once for all, and not repeated from day to day. The lesson of it was that of Jn 13^{10}: he who was once bathed in this thorough and searching fashion did not need to have the act repeated; the effect was to last for life.

The movement took hold especially of the lower and what were thought to be the more abandoned classes. John was kept fully employed in the work of confessing and baptizing, but he did not allow it to be forgotten that all this pointed forward to another mission greater than his own. The presentiment grew upon him that part of his task as prophet was to name this mightier successor. And again, after the manner of the older prophets, he knew that it would be made manifest to him whom he was to name.

Presently the sign was given. Among those who came to be baptized was one who passed for a relative of his own, with whom possibly, though perhaps not probably, he may have had some intercourse in boyhood (cf. Jn 1^{31}). As with others who before their baptism were called upon to confess, so also with this kinsman, John had some converse, and, if we may accept what is found only in a single narrative,* at first refused to baptize him. His scruples are set aside, but it is not until the actual baptism that the full truth bursts upon him. Still, the analogy of the older prophecy is maintained. A sign is given such as that which Isaiah offered to Ahaz (Is 7^{11}). From the Fourth Gospel we should gather that it was seen in prophetic vision by the Baptist (Jn 1^{32-34}); from the Synoptics we should gather that it was seen in like vision by the baptized (Mk 1^{10}, Mt 3^{16} 'he saw'). And to prophetic sight was joined also the prophetic hearing of a voice from heaven, proclaiming in words that recalled at once Ps 2^7 and Is 42^1 'Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased.'

* Stress can hardly be laid on the form of announcement in Mt 3^{2}, which would make the Baptist anticipate exactly the announcement of Jesus. This would seem to be due to the editor. The oldest version describes the Baptist as 'preaching a baptism of repentance for remission of sins' (Mk 1^{4}).

(α) The Baptist's Hesitation.—The incident of Mt $3^{14f.}$ is open to some suspicion of being a product (such as might well grow up by insensible degrees in the passing of the narrative from hand to hand) of the conviction which later became general among Christians, that their Master was without sin, and of the difficulty which thence arose of associating Him with a baptism 'of repentance.' We cannot exclude this possibility. But, on the other hand, the difficulty is for us, too, a real one, and the solution given, while it has nothing under the circumstances inconsistent or improbable, is attractive by its very reserve. 'To fulfil all righteousness'=to leave undone nothing which God had shown to be His will. In a general movement which embraced all the more earnest-minded in the nation, it was right that He too should share. It would not follow that the symbolical act of Baptism should have precisely the same significance for every one who submitted to it. For the main body it denoted a break with a sinful past and a new start upon a reformed life. For the Messiah it denoted a break simply, the entrance upon a new phase in the accomplishment of His mission. It took the place with Him of the 'anointing,' which marked the assumption of the active work to which they were called by the kings and prophets of old. This 'anointing' was the 'descent of the Spirit.' The Baptism of the Messiah was Baptism 'with the Spirit,' wherewith He was to baptize. The significance of Baptism in His case was positive rather than negative.

(β) The Voice from Heaven.—It has been too readily assumed by some distinguished writers (e.g. Usener) that the oldest version of the voice from heaven was in exact agreement with Ps 2^7 'Thou art my [beloved] Son: this day have I begotten thee.' In two of the three Synoptics the reading is undoubtedly ἐν σοὶ [ᾧ] εὐδόκησα [ηὐδ-]. It is true, however, that in Lk 3^{22} an important group of authorities has ἐγὼ σήμερον γεγέννηκά σε. This is the reading of the larger branch of the Western text (D a b c al. codd. nonnull. ap. Aug. Juvenc. al.). A similar reading is found in Justin, c. Tryph. bis and in other writers, and both readings are combined in the Ebionite Gosp. as quoted by Epiphanius. [The evidence is collected in full by Resch, Agrapha, p. 347 ff.]. On the other hand, it is by no means certain that in some of these cases the Ps is not directly quoted, and in all assimilation to the text of the Ps lay very near at hand. Even the Western text of Lk is divided, a smaller but very ancient branch (including e) agreeing with the mass of the Gr. MSS. There can be little doubt that not only the Canonical Gospels, but the ground document on which they are based, had the common reading. The competing reading was a natural application of Ps 2^7, and it fell in so readily with views which in different forms circulated rather widely in the 2nd cent. that we cannot be surprised if it met with a certain amount of adoption. See, further, below.

(γ) Apocryphal Details.—The story of the Baptism underwent various apocryphal amplifications and adornments. One of the earliest of these is the appearance of a bright light (Codd. Vercell. et Sangerm. ad Mt 3^{15}; Ev. Ebion. ap. Epiph., Ephraem Syr.) or of a fire upon the Jordan (Just. c. Tryph. 88, Prædicatio Pauli ap. Ps.-Cypr. de Rebapt. 17 al.). The most elaborate working up of this kind of material is found in the Syriac Baptismal Liturgy of Severus (Resch, Agrapha, p. 361 ff.).

(δ) The Synoptic and Johannean Versions.—When a prophet began his prophetic career he received clear proof of the reality of his call most often through some powerful inner experience or vision (e.g. Is 6), but also at times through Divine revelation to another (e.g. 1 K 19^{16}). We may regard the events of the Baptism as a Divine authentication of this kind of the Mission of Jesus. But if so, there would be nothing incongruous in supposing that this authentication was vouchsafed, both to the Messiah Himself and to the Forerunner, just as a similar authentication was vouchsafed to St. Paul and to Ananias (Ac $9^{3ff. 11ff.}$). We are therefore not in any way compelled to choose between the Synoptic and Johannean versions as to the incidence of the supernatural signs. The two versions may quite well be thought of as supplementing rather than contradicting each other.

The Baptism of Jesus undoubtedly marks the beginning of His public ministry. How much more was it than this? The Judaizing Ebionites of the 2nd century, who never rose above the conception of Christ as an inspired prophet, and some Gnostic sects which separated the Man Jesus from the Æon Christus, starting from the Synoptic narrative, and combining it with Ps 2^7, dated from the Baptism the union of the human and the Divine in Christ in such a way that they are sometimes described as making the Baptism a substitute for the supernatural Birth. We can imagine how, to those who had the story of the Baptism before them, but who had not yet been reached by the tidings of those earlier events round which the veil of a sacred privacy had been drawn, and which (as we shall see) only made their way to general knowledge by slow degrees and after some length of time had elapsed, should regard the descent of the Holy Ghost as a first endowment with Divinity. The fact that it was not till then that Jesus began to perform His 'mighty works,' would seem to give some colour to the belief. And it would be likely enough that a passing phase of Christian thought, based upon imperfect knowledge, would survive in certain limited circles. But the main body of the Church did not rest in this contracted view, which was really inconsistent with the Christology revealed to us in the earliest group of St. Paul's Epistles. It accepted, and, through such leaders as Ignatius of Antioch, emphasized strongly the earlier chapters of the canonical narrative; and the contents of those chapters gave shape to the oldest form (which can hardly be later than Ignatius) of the Apostles' Creed. Already, before the 1st century was out, St. John had presented what was to be the Catholic interpretation of the relation of the Baptism to the Godhead of Christ. Far back at the very beginning of all beginnings the Divine Word had already been face to face with God, and was Himself God; so that, when the same Word entered into the conditions of humanity, this did not denote any loss of Godhead which was inherent and essential. Much less could the Godhead of the incarnate Christ be supposed to date from the signs which accompanied the Baptism. The object of these signs was rather to inaugurate the public ministry of the Messiah, that He might be 'manifested to Israel' (ἵνα φανερωθῇ τῷ Ἰσρ., Jn 1^{31}). Though the Greek is different the idea is the same as that in Lk 1^{80}, where it is said of the Baptist himself that he was in the desert 'till the day of his showing unto Israel' (ἕως ἡμέρας ἀναδείξεως αὐτοῦ πρὸς τὸν Ἰσρ.). Whether or not the signs were in the first instance seen by more than the Messiah Himself and the Baptist (and it is probable that they were not), they were made public by the Baptist's declaration (Jn 1^{29-34}), so that in any case there was a real 'manifestation to Israel.'

No doubt there was more than this. Besides the outward manifestation, a new epoch opened for the Son of Man Himself. But the nature of this we can describe only by its effects. The evangelists evidently have before their minds the analogy of the prophetic call and prophetic endowment. After the events of the Baptism Jesus is 'full of the Holy Spirit' (Lk 4^1, cf. Mt 4^1, Mk 1^{12}). And He applies to Himself the prophetic language of Is 61^1 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek,' etc. (cf. Lk 4^{18}; it is probably this allusion to 'anointing with the Spirit' which has led to the incident in Lk being placed thus early). In the Gospel according to the Hebrews this is expressed even more emphatically than in the canonical Gospels: 'Factum est autem cum ascendisset Dominus de aqua, descendit fons omnis Spiritus sancti et requievit super eum et dixit illi: Fili mi in omnibus prophetis exspectabam te, ut venires et requiescerem in te. In eo enim requies mea, tu es filius meus primogenitus qui regnas in sempiternum' (Hieron. ad Jes. xi. 1).

* Resch (TU. x. ii. 57), in his later opinion, regards this narrative as belonging to the oldest evangelical document; but the passages which he has collected in support of this view might quite well be explained as paraphrastic allusions to the canonical Mt. The Gosp. acc. to Heb. as used by the Ebionites (Epiph. Hær. xxx. 13) had a similar scene after the Baptism of Jesus (Resch, Agrapha, p. 345 f.).

We have only to add that from this time onwards the rôle of the Messiah is distinctly assumed. The 'mighty works' very soon begin; disciples begin to attach themselves, at first loosely, but with increasing closeness; and there is a tone of decisive authority both in teaching and in act.

LITERATURE.—There is a strange mixture of fine scholarship and learning, with bold, not to say wild, speculation on the subject of this section in Usener's Religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchungen, 1 Teil, Bonn, 1889. With this may be compared Bornemann, Die Taufe Christi durch Johannes in d. dogmatischen Beurteilung d. Christl. Theologen d. vier ersten Jahrhunderte, Leipzig, 1896. John the Baptist, by the late Dr. H. R. Reynolds (3rd ed. 1888), represents the Congregational Lecture of 1874, and deals more with the career of John than with the questions which arise out of the Baptism of Jesus; but it does not leave these untouched so far as they had at that date come into view.

ii. The Temptation.—We decline to speculate where the data fail us. But one remarkable glimpse is afforded us into the state of the inner consciousness of the Son of Man after His Baptism. Strictly speaking, this would not as yet have been available to the spectator. It was probably not at this early date that it was disclosed, even to those nearest and dearest to Him. Still, the disclosure must have been made by the Lord Himself during His lifetime; and the extent to which it has found its way into all the Synoptics shows that it must have had a somewhat wide diffusion among the main body of the disciples. For this reason, as well as for the advantage of introducing it at the place which it occupies in the narratives, we shall not hesitate to touch upon the Temptation here, though it might perhaps more strictly come under the head of 'Supplemental Matter.'

The narratives of the Temptation are upon the face of them symbolical. Only in the form of symbols was it possible to present to the men of that day a struggle so fought out in the deepest recesses of the soul. There are two instances of such struggle in the life of the Redeemer—one at the beginning and the other at the end of His ministry (Lk 4^{13} comp. with 22^{53}). In both, the assault comes from without, from the personal Power of Evil. It is impossible for us to understand it, in the sense of understanding how what we call temptation could affect the Son of God. It could not have touched Him at all unless He had been also, and no less really, Son of Man. He vouchsafed to be tempted in order that He might be in all points like unto His brethren (He 4^{15}).

The Temptation clearly belongs to the beginning of the Ministry. It would have had no point before; and the issue on which it turned had evidently been decided before the public life of Jesus began, as that life throughout its whole course followed the law which was then laid down. The Temptation implies two things. It implies that He to whom it was addressed both knew Himself to be the Messiah whom the Jews expected, and also knew Himself to be in possession of extraordinary powers. To say that He was now for the first time conscious of these powers is more than we have warrant for. But, in any case, it was the first time that the problem arose how they were to be exercised. Were they to be exercised at the prompting of the simplest of all instincts—the instinct of self-preservation? Were they to be exercised in furtherance of what must have seemed to be the first condition on which His mission as the Messiah could be accomplished—to convince the world that He had the mission, that it was for Him to lead and for them to follow? And, lastly, when He came forward as the Messiah, was it to be as the Messiah of Jewish expectation? Was His kingdom to be a kingdom of this world? Was it to embrace all the secular kingdoms and the glory of them, to enfold them in a system more powerful and more magnificent than theirs, brought about by supernatural means, with no local limitations like even the greatest of past empires, but wide as the universe itself and indestructible? Was it to be a real restoring of the kingdom to Israel? Was Jerusalem to be its centre, in a new sense the 'city of the Great King'?

All these questions Jesus answered for Himself absolutely in the negative. There did not enter into His mind even a passing shadow of the ambition which marked the best of earthly conquerors. He was determined not to minister in the least to the national pride of the Jews. Still less would He work out a new pride of His own. He did not desire in any sense volitare per ora. Even the most natural cravings of the nature which He had assumed He refused to satisfy so long as their satisfaction ended with Himself.

These principles are involved in the narrative of the Temptation. They are laid down once for all; and the rest of the history shows no swerving from them. At the same time it must be remembered that although the decision had been reached by Jesus Himself, it was not yet known, except so far as He was pleased to reveal it. Partly, the revelation was made by acts and the self-imposed limits of action. The clearest revelation was the story of the Temptation itself. But neither the one nor the other was wholly understood.

iii. The First Disciples and the Miracle at Cana.—At this point we leave for some time the Synoptic narrative and follow rather that in the Fourth Gospel, which it must be confessed comes to us with very considerable verisimilitude. If we had only the Synoptic Gospels we should have to suppose that our Lord gathered about Him a band of disciples abruptly and suddenly, capturing them as it were by the tone of authority in His command. In St. John we have the steps given which led up to this, and which make it far more intelligible.

From this Gospel it would appear that Jesus remained for some time in the neighbourhood of the Baptist; that the Baptist more than once indicated Him in a marked and indeed mysterious way (Jn 1^{29} 'The Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world'; cf. v.^{36} [*]); and that one by one several of John's disciples began to attach themselves, as yet more or less loosely, to His person. The Baptist's testimony, strengthened by first impressions, awoke in them the belief that at last the 'mightier than he' predicted by the Baptist had come (Jn 1^{41}). Such a belief at this time and under these circumstances would need no elaborate demonstration. It would be accepted in a tentative way, awaiting verification from events, and, of course, only with those contents which accorded with current Jewish opinion.

The home of Jesus was still, as it had been for some thirty years of His life, at Nazareth; and at the time when He began to collect followers round Him, He was already on the point of returning thither

[*] The words are remarkable, especially as coming thus at the very threshold. It is possible that the evangelist may have been led to define somewhat in view of later events and later doctrines (for the allusion seems to be to Is 53). But the context, including the deputation from Jerusalem, is so lifelike and so thoroughly in accordance with probabilities, that the saying has a presumption in its favour.

(Jn 1^{43}). He had not as yet separated Himself from the domestic life of His family. It was as an incident in this life that He went to a marriage feast at the village of Cana (prob. =Kâna el-Jelîl rather than Kefr Kenna) in the company of His mother and some at least of His newly-found disciples. Here occurred the first of those 'signs' which were to be one conspicuous outcome of His mission. No wonder that it impressed itself vividly on the memory of one who was present, and that it confirmed his incipient faith (Jn 2^{11}). We shall speak of these signs in their general bearing presently.

iv. The First Passover.—There would seem to have been some connexion between the family at Nazareth and Capernaum,* as the whole party now spend some days there (Jn 2^{12}). But the Passover was near, and Jesus, with at least some of His disciples, went up to it. In connexion with this Passover, St. John places, what has the appearance of a somewhat high-handed act, the expulsion of buyers and sellers from the outer court of the temple (Jn 2^{13-22}). The Synoptics place a similar act in the last week of the Ministry (Mk 11^{15-18} ||). It is possible that such an act may have happened twice; but if we are to choose, and if we believe the Gospel to be really by the son of Zebedee, we shall give his dating the preference—the more so as in these early chapters the dates are given with great precision, and apparently with the intention of correcting a current impression.

This act was the first definite assumption of a public mission to Israel, and its scene was fitly chosen at the centre of Israel's worship. It was the act, not as yet necessarily of one who claimed to be the Messiah, but of a religious reformer like one of the ancient prophets. It was naturally followed by a challenge as to the right of such an assumption. To this the enigmatic reply was given, 'Destroy this temple, and in three days (i.e. in a short time, cf. Hos 6^2) I will raise it up'; which seems to be rightly glossed in Mk 14^{58}—the Jewish Church with its visible local centre should give place to the Christian Church with its invisible and spiritual centre (cf. Jn $4^{21f.}$). The saying made an impression at the time, and was brought up at the trial of Jesus to support a charge of blasphemy; the disciples at a later date referred it to the Resurrection (Jn $2^{21f.}$).

A striking feature in the Johannean version of His visit to Judæa is the way in which the work of Jesus in connexion with it takes up the work of the Baptist and fills in conspicuous gaps in the narrative of the Synoptics. The cleansing of the temple is an act of reformation which follows up the call to repentance. In Jn alone of the authorities have we a distinct statement that Jesus adopted the practice of baptism (3^{22} 4^1), though no other account of the origin of the Christian Sacrament is so natural. We find also that the necessity for baptism and the 'new birth' which went with it is made the subject of a discourse with the Sanhedrist Nicodemus. The writer of the Gospel had been himself a disciple of John the Baptist, and still kept up his connexion with him, and knew what went on in his circle (Jn $3^{23ff.}$). At the same time he seems to expand the discourses which he records with matter of his own ($3^{16ff.\ 31ff.}$).

v. Retirement to Galilee.—Soon after this John the Baptist was arrested by Herod Antipas, and Jesus retired into Galilee. On the way He passed through Samaria, and paused at Jacob's well near the village of Sychar (now generally identified with 'Askar), where His teaching made a marked impression (Jn 4^{39-42}). The Samaritans had a Messianic expectation of their own (Jn 4^{25}); and if the narrator has not defined what took place in the light of subsequent events, Jesus claimed to fulfil this expectation. This was contrary to His policy for some time to come in dealing with Israel (Mk 1^{44}), but He may possibly have used greater freedom among non-Israelites.

The events of Jn 2^{13}–4^{45} may have occupied three or four weeks, but hardly more. At the time when our Lord arrives in Galilee the impression of His public acts at the Passover was still fresh (Jn 4^{45}). This would lead us to explain the latter half of Jn 4^{35} as a description of the state of things actually existing; the cornfields were at the time 'white for the harvest,' and 'Say not ye,' etc., will be a proverb. But that being so, a difficulty would be caused if the incident of the plucking of the ears of corn (Mk $2^{23ff.}$) were in its place chronologically, as the crops would still be in much the same condition as during the journey through Samaria, though the wheat harvest was going on between Passover and Pentecost, and all the events implied in Mk 1^{14}–2^{22} would have intervened. The time is really too short for these. It is more probable that they were spread over some months. We must conceive of our Lord as returning to Galilee with the few disciples with Him still in the state of loose attachment characteristic of this period, and Himself remaining for a while in comparative privacy. The disciples had returned to their occupations when He takes the new and decisive step involved in the call described for us in the Synoptics.

The Synoptic Chronology.—If Mk 2^{23} || is to be taken as strictly consecutive with the events that precede, it would follow that the call of the leading apostles took place at least a week or two before the cutting of the ripened wheat, i.e., as we might infer, before rather than some time after the Passover season. In that case the Johannean and Synoptic narratives would not be easy to combine. But the sequence of incidents in Mk (Eating with sinners, 2^{13-17}; Fasting, 2^{18-22}; Two incidents relating to the Sabbath, 2^{23-36}) suggests that we have here rather a typical group of points in the controversy with the Pharisees than a chronicle of events as they happened in order of time. In that case the call of the apostles might fall in the autumn, and the plucking of the ears of corn might belong to the end rather than the beginning of the period upon which we are about to enter.

The Healing of the Nobleman's Son.—As the narratives have come down to us, there are no doubt real differences between the story of the healing of the Nobleman's Son (Jn 4^{46-54}) and that of the Centurion's Servant (Mt 8^{5-13} ||). We must, however, reckon with the possibility—it cannot in any case be more—that they are two versions of the same event, arising out of the ambiguity of παῖς and δοῦλος. Years ago (Fourth Gospel, p. 100 f.) the writer had taken this view, which has since been adopted by Weiss (Leben Jesu, i. 423 ff.). A similar question may be raised in connexion with the common features of the narratives Lk 5^{1-11}, Jn 21^{1-11}. There, too, there may have been some confusion (Fourth Gospel, p. 267; cf. Loofs, Die Auferstehungsberichte, p. 32). Such instances mark the limits of a laxer or stricter interpretation of the historicity of the documents, between which we are not in a position to decide with absolute certainty.

B. FIRST ACTIVE OR CONSTRUCTIVE PERIOD: THE FOUNDING OF THE KINGDOM.

Scene.—Mainly in Galilee, but also partly in Jerusalem.

Time.—From about Pentecost A.D. 27 to shortly before Passover A.D. 28.

Mt 4^{12}–13^{53}, Mk 1^{14}–6^{13}, Lk 4^{14}–9^6, Jn 5^{1-47}.

In this period the points to notice are: (i.) The Call, Training, and Mission of the Twelve, followed perhaps by a larger number (the Seventy of St. Luke); (ii.) the gradual differentiation of the ministry of Jesus from that of John Bapt. and its assumption of a much larger scope; (iii.) a full course of teaching on the true nature of the Kingdom of God (or of Heaven); (iv.) the performance of a number of Messianic works, chiefly of healing; (v.) the effect of these works on the common people as seen in a great amount of superficial enthusiasm, but without as yet much intelligent apprehension of the object really in view; (vi.) the growing hostility of the scribes and Pharisees caused by a more and more declared divergence of principle; (vii.) the very gentle indirect and gradual putting forward by Jesus of His claim as the Messiah.

* The site of Capernaum is still much debated. At one time it seemed as if the suffrage would go for Tell Ḥûm, but of late there has been a reaction in favour of Khân Minyeh (see the art. in this Dictionary, HGHL p. 456 f., and von Soden, Reisebriefe (1898), p. 160 f., who quotes a resident, Père Biever). Buhl, however, GAP p. 224, still supports Tell Ḥûm.

Up to the point which we have now reached there had been no definite 'founding' of a society; no steps had been taken towards the institution even of a new sect, much less of a new religion. The Baptism of Jesus had been attended by circumstances which marked Him out in a highly significant manner; but the general knowledge of these circumstances was vague, and even in those who were not unacquainted with them they awoke expectations rather than convictions, and these, too, were vague and left for the future to define. For the rest little as yet had occurred to define them. A certain number of disciples had gathered round Jesus in the most easy and natural manner, just as disciples had gathered round many a Rabbi before Him. These simply came and went as inclination took them; they were not as yet bound by any closer ties to His person. He had gone about quietly with some of them in His company, but nothing very startling had happened. The expulsion of the buyers and sellers from the temple was a prophetic act, and two 'signs' had occurred at a considerable interval; but this was little to what the Jews expected in their Messiah. So far Jesus had worked side by side with the Baptist, and on very similar lines. If His disciples took a share in baptizing (Jn 4^{2}), it was in the same kind of baptizing as that of John. It was a baptism 'of repentance,' and in no sense baptism 'into the name of Christ.'

The period on which we are now entering marks a great advance. The work which Jesus came to perform now took its distinctive shape. What had gone before was of the nature of foretaste, hints, foreshadowings; now the strokes follow each other in quick succession by which the purpose of Jesus is set clearly before those who have eyes to see. We may take these one by one.

i. The Call, Training, and Mission of the Twelve (and of the Seventy).—The first step is one which evidently struck the imagination of the followers of Jesus, because it is placed in the forefront of the Synoptic narrative. It is, in fact, the real beginning of the Public Ministry. Among those who had been the first to seek a nearer acquaintance with the new Prophet were two pairs of brothers, both from Capernaum, and both fishermen by trade. When Jesus returned to Galilee they all went back to their ordinary occupations, and they were engaged in these when suddenly they saw Him standing by the shore of the lake and received a peremptory command to follow Him (Mk 1^{16-20} ||). This 'following' meant something more than anything they had done as yet; they were to 'be with him' (Mk 3^{14}), so that they might receive His teaching continuously and in a manner systematically. They were encouraged to ask questions, and their questions were answered. Special and full explanations were given to them which were not given to others (Mt 13^{34}). The teaching of Jesus was not esoteric, but there was this inner circle to whom peculiar advantages were given for entering into it.

The call which was issued in the first instance to the four, Peter and Andrew, James and John, was gradually extended. The one other instance particularized in the Gospels is that of Levi, the son of Alphæus, to whom was given—possibly by Jesus Himself (Weiss, Leben Jesu, i. 503)—the name of 'Matthew' (='given by God'). A like call proceeded to others, till the number was made up to twelve (lists in Mk 3^{16-19}, Mt 10^{2-4}, Lk 6^{14-16}, Ac 1^{13}). The persons chosen belonged to the middle and lower classes. Some must have been fairly well-to-do. Not only did the fishermen own the boats they used, but the father of James and John had 'hired servants' (Mk 1^{20}), and John was acquainted with the high priest* (i.e., perhaps, with members of his household, Jn 18^{15}). Matthew was of the despised class of 'publicans.' The second Simon belonged to the party of Zealots. One, the second Judas (like his father, Simon, Jn 6^{71} 13^{26} RV), was a native of Kerioth in Judæa. They were chosen evidently for a certain moral aptitude which they showed for the mission to be entrusted to them. Judas Iscariot possessed this like the rest, but wrecked his fair chances. The choice and call of Jesus did not preclude the use of common free-will.

The course of teaching in which the Twelve were initiated covered a considerable part of that of which an outline will presently be sketched, especially its first two heads. It is summarized in the phrase 'the mystery of the Kingdom' (Mk 4^{11} ||). Of course it is not to be thought that the disciples at once understood all that was told them. Very far from it. They had much to unlearn as well as to learn, and they showed themselves slow of apprehension. But the form of teaching adopted by Jesus was exactly fitted for its object, which was to lodge in the mind principles that would gradually become luminous as they were interpreted by events and by prolonged if slow reflection.

Jesus Himself knew full well how unripe even the most intimate of His disciples were to carry out His designs. After a time—we may suppose early in the year 28—He sent out the Twelve on a mission to villages and country districts which He was not able to visit at once Himself (Mt $10^{1ff.}$||). But they were not to attempt to teach. Some of the wonderful works which Jesus did Himself they also were empowered to do; but the announcement which they were to make by word of mouth was limited to the one formula with which both John and Jesus had begun: 'The kingdom of heaven is at hand' (Mt 10^{7}).

In one Gospel mention is made of a mission which seems to be supplemental to this. Lk speaks not only of the Twelve being sent out, but also of Seventy sent out like the Twelve by twos (Lk $10^{1ff.}$). When we observe that the instructions given to them are substantially a repetition of those already given to the Twelve, the question lies near at hand whether we have not in this incident a mere doublet of the preceding, the number seventy (var. lect. seventy-two) representing in current symbolism the nations of the known world (cf. Gn 10)—being gradually substituted in the oral tradition of Gentile Churches for the number twelve, which seemed to point specially to Israel. We note also that Lk omits the restrictions of Mt 10^{5}. But, on the other hand, Lk connects with the return of the Seventy a little group of sayings (Lk 10^{18-20}) which have every appearance of being genuine, and so increase the credibility of the narrative which leads up to them. And there is reason to think that one at least of the special sources to which Lk had access came from just such a quarter as that indicated by the Seventy—not the innermost, but the second circle of disciples. He may therefore have had historical foundation for his statement. Nor need it perhaps mean more than that Jesus did not draw any hard-and-fast line at the Twelve, but made use of other disciples near His person for the same purpose.

ii. Differentiation of the Ministry of Jesus from that of John the Baptist.—We have just seen that John, Jesus Himself, and the apostles all opened their ministry with the same announcement. They also made use of the same rite—baptism. But there the resemblance ceased. These were only the links which bound the stage of preparation to the stage of fulfilment. Looking back upon the work of John, Jesus pronounced that the least of His own disciples was greater than he (Mt 11^{11}||). It was the difference between one who was within the range of the Kingdom and one who was without it. The work of John was perfectly good and appropriate as far as it went. Its character was indicated by the 'preaching of repentance,' with which it stopped short. In full keeping with this was John's ascetic habit and mode of life. The abandonment of this by Jesus was the first outward sign of divergence which struck the eye of the world (Mk 2^{18-22}||, Mt $11^{18f.}$||). But the inward divergence was far greater. John inherited the old idea as to the nature of the Kingdom and of the Messiah. While impressed with the necessity of a moral reformation as leading up to it, there is nothing to show that in other respects John's conception of King and Kingdom differed from that of his countrymen. But Jesus came to revolutionize not only the conception but the mode of carrying it out. Hence it was that towards the end of his day, with the despondency of one whose own work seemed wrecked, and who was himself confined in a dungeon, and with the disappointment natural to one who saw or heard of but few of the signs which he had expected as in process of fulfilment, John sent to inquire if Jesus were the Messiah indeed, or, in other words, if the great hope and the great faith to which he had himself given expression had proved delusive. As yet Jesus had but in part, and that very covertly, declared Himself; it was impossible all at once to open the eyes of John to the full mysteries of the Kingdom; and therefore Jesus contented Himself with appealing from the current idea to one of the fundamental passages of ancient prophecy the higher authority of which John would recognize (Mt 11^{5}||). At the same time He hinted that patience and insight were necessary for a true faith; anything less than this might easily stumble (Mt 11^{6}||).

* Hugo Delff (Gesch. d. Rabbi Jesus v. Nazareth, p. 70 ff.), distinguishing between the Apostle John and the author of the Fourth Gospel, makes the latter a Jew of priestly family.

iii. Preaching of the Kingdom.—In the meantime the crowds of Galilee, and especially the Twelve, enjoyed the privilege which John did not. They were having expounded to them in full the new doctrine of the Kingdom of God (or of heaven). This doctrine is of such far-reaching importance, and is so intimately bound up with the rest of our Lord's teaching, that it has seemed best to reserve the fuller account of it for separate and connected treatment at the end of this section. In so doing we are following the example of the First Evangelist, who has massed together a body of teaching at an early place in his Gospel (Mt 5–7), not that it was all spoken on the same occasion, but as a specimen of the general tenor of the teaching of which it formed part. We have a similar example of grouped specimens of teaching in Mt 13. It must suffice to add here (a) that the main subject of the teaching at this period would seem to have been the nature of the Kingdom and the character required in its members: such sayings as Mt $7^{22f.}$ are more in keeping with the later cycle of teaching, and were probably spoken later. (b) It must be remembered that the vast majority of those who listened to this teaching heard it only by fragments. It was like the seed-corn scattered in various kinds of ground (Mk 4^{1-20}||): it was not to be expected that even under the most favourable circumstances it should germinate and bear fruit all at once. Clearly, the Twelve themselves did not take in its full significance. But it is much that they should have remembered so much of it as they did, and that when their eyes were more fully opened they should have been able to set it down so coherently.

iv. The Messianic Works.—Another marked characteristic of this period is the number of miraculous works of healing, etc., which are attributed to it and evidently belong to it. Once more we may follow the example of the First Evangelist by treating these works, which are so much the subject of discussion in modern times, by themselves. We assume here the result which we seem to reach in the section devoted to them. We assume that the miracles are historical; and we observe only that they bear the general character indicated in the reply of Jesus to John the Baptist. They are predominantly works of mercy; and they are a direct, and as we believe conscious, fulfilment of the most authentic of ancient prophecies, as contrasted with the mere signs and wonders for which the contemporary Jews were looking. Here, as in other things, we note at once (a) that Jesus condescends to put Himself at the level of those to whom He was sent. Miracles were to them the natural credentials of any great prophet, and especially of the Messiah. Jesus therefore did not refuse to work miracles. That He should work them was part of the conditions of the humanity which He assumed. But (b) though He condescended to work miracles, it was only miracles of a certain kind. He steadily refused to perform the mere wonders which the critics of His claims repeatedly challenged Him to perform. In other words, He made His miracles almost as much a vehicle of instruction as His teaching. Those which He did perform fell into their place as the natural accompaniment of one who as in character so novel and unexpected a King was founding so novel a Kingdom.

v. Effect on the Populace.—It is a confirmation of the view taken above and based on the Fourth Gospel,—that the call of the Twelve was preceded by a preliminary and more sporadic ministry—that from the first day on which the regular ministry began it attracted great attention and was attended by great, if superficial, success among the populace of Galilee (Mk 1^{32-34}||). Nor did the success of this first day stand alone; it was frequently repeated, and indeed gives the character to the whole of this period (Mk $2^{2.\,12}$|| 3^{7-10}|| ^{32}|| 4^{1}|| 5^{21}||, Lk $7^{16f.}$). Both the miracles and the teaching of Jesus made a strong impression. The people were struck by the difference between the acts and words of Jesus and those of the teachers to whom they were accustomed. Acts and words alike implied a claim to an authority different in kind from that of the most respected of the Rabbis (Mk 1^{27}||, Mt $7^{28f.}$). The Rabbis interpreted the law as they found it; Jesus laid down a new law (Mt $5^{21.\,22}$ etc.), and when He spoke, it was with an air of command. It must not, however, be supposed that Jesus was at once recognized as the Messiah. The testimony of the Baptist had reached but few, and was by this time generally forgotten. The construction put upon the commanding attitude of Jesus was that described in Lk 7^{16} 'A great prophet is arisen among us; and God hath visited his people.' Still less can it be supposed that there was any adequate recognition of the change which Jesus came to work in the current conceptions of religion.

vi. Effect upon the Pharisees.—The populace came to Jesus with simple and credulous minds, and they did not resist the impression made upon them, though it lacked depth and permanence (Mk $4^{5f.}$||). Our documents are doubtless right in representing the first signs of opposition and hostility as coming from the religious leaders, the scribes and Pharisees. They are also clearly right in representing the growth of this opposition as gradual. At first Pharisees joined freely in social intercourse with Jesus and His disciples, and even invited them to their own tables (Lk $7^{36ff.}$ probably belongs to this early period). They could not deny the possibility of a prophet arising, and they repeatedly sought to test after their manner whether Jesus were really a prophet sent from God or no (Jn $1^{19\text{ff.}}$, Mt $12^{38\text{ff.}}$‖ $16^{1\text{ff.}}$ $19^{3\text{ff.}}$‖, Jn $7^{47\text{ff.}}$). But their suspicions were soon aroused. It was evident that the teaching and manner of the life of Jesus conflicted greatly with their own. There was a freedom and largeness of view about it which was foreign to their whole habits of thought. (a) In such matters as fasting, the practice of Jesus and His disciples was different (Mk $2^{18\text{ff.}}$, Mt $6^{16\text{ff.}}$ etc.). Worse than this, Jesus appealed expressly to those classes which they scrupulously avoided (Mk $2^{15\text{-}17}$‖ etc.). (b) Not only did Jesus direct His ministry especially to those whom they regarded as outcast and irreclaimable, but He made some direct attacks upon themselves. At first these attacks may have been slightly disguised (as in Mt $6^{1\text{ff.}}$, where the Pharisees are not mentioned by name), but they constantly increased in directness and severity. (c) One of the first topics on which they came into collision was in regard to the keeping of the Sabbath. Mark has collected a little group of incidents bearing upon this (Mk 2^{23}–3^{6}), the first of which, from the mention of the ripe corn, appears, as we have seen, to belong to the second year of the ministry, but belongs to an early phase in the conflict. To the same effect is the incident related in Jn $5^{1\text{ff.}}$, and Luke contributes another (Lk $13^{11\text{-}17}$). (d) The Pharisees were also honestly shocked at seeing Jesus adopt a tone and assume prerogatives which seemed to them to encroach upon the honour of God (Mk $2^{5\text{-}11}$‖).

It is interesting, and throws a favourable light on the documents, to note how carefully the distinction is marked between (a) the local scribes and Pharisees such as were to be found scattered throughout Galilee (Mk $2^{6.}$‖ $^{16.}$‖ $^{18.\ 24}$ 3^{6}‖, Lk 7^{36}); (b) the scribes who came down from Jerusalem (Mk 3^{22}), apparently emissaries from the hierarchy, like the deputation of Jn 1^{19}; and (c) the Herodians (Mk 3^{6}), the dynastic party of the Herods, who with quite different motives acted in alliance with the Pharisees. The Herodians are mentioned again in Mk 12^{13} ‖. The name is otherwise almost unknown to history, though the party is known to have existed. Josephus has οἱ τὰ Ἡρώδου φρονοῦντες, but not Ἡ*ρωδιανοί*. This is a pure reflexion of the facts of the time—facts which soon passed away, and which fiction would never have recovered. See, further, art. HERODIANS.

vii. The Self-Revelation of Jesus. — Although Jesus assumed these high prerogatives, and although, as we have seen, He both spoke and acted with an authority which permitted no question, He showed a singular reticence in putting forward Messianic or Divine claims. It is remarkable that from the first those possessed with demons publicly confessed Him for what He was; but it is no less remarkable that He checked these confessions: 'He suffered not the demons to speak, because they knew him' (Mk 1^{34}‖ 3^{12} [Mt 12^{16}]). He imposed a like injunction of silence on one healed of leprosy (Mk 1^{44}‖). The farthest point to which Jesus went in the way of self-revelation at this early period was by taking to Himself the special title 'Son of Man.' There was probably some precedent for the identification of this title with Messiah, but it was at least not in common use, and therefore served well to cover a claim which was made but in no way obtruded. A fuller discussion of the title will be found below (p. 622 f).

This marked reticence of Jesus in regard to His own Person is clearly part of a deliberate plan. One of its motives was to prevent the rash and reckless violence which one who appealed to the Messianic expectation was sure to excite (Jn 6^{15}). But it was in full keeping with the whole of His demeanour and with the special character which He gave to His mission. The first evangelist rightly sees in this a fulfilment (which we believe here as elsewhere to have been conscious and deliberate) of the prophecy Is $42^{1\text{-}3}$ 'My servant . . . shall not strive, nor cry aloud; neither shall any one hear his voice in the streets,' etc.

It is impossible for us to think of the Jesus portrayed in the Gospels as forcing His claims upon the attention of the world. He rather let them sink gently into the minds of His disciples until they won an assent which was not only free and spontaneous, but also more intelligent than it could have been if enforced simply by authority. But, apart from this, it was essential to the development of His mission that the teaching of the Kingdom should precede, and precede by a sufficient interval, the public self-manifestation and offer of the King. The first thing to be done was to change the character and revolutionize the moral conceptions of men. This was to be the work of quiet teaching. The hour for the Leader to come forward was the hour when teaching was to give place to action. Hence it was well that at first and for some time to come the King should remain, as it were, in the background, until the preparation for His assuming His kingship was complete.

THE TEACHING OF JESUS.

a. General Characteristics of the Teaching.

(1) Its Relation to the Teaching of the Baptist and to that of the Scribes.—We have seen that Jesus began by taking up not only the announcement of the Baptist that the Kingdom of God was at hand, but also his call to reformation of life and the rite of baptism by which that call was impressed upon the conscience. We are also expressly told that the call to repentance was part of the apostolic commission (Mk 6^{12}). And we find it no less insisted upon after the resurrection (Lk 24^{47}, Ac 2^{38} 3^{19} 5^{31} 11^{18} 17^{30} 20^{21} 26^{20}).

This is clear proof of the continuity which bound together the teaching of Jesus with that of the Baptist. The starting-point of both was the same. And yet this starting-point was very soon left behind. The heads of the Baptist's teaching are soon told; the teaching of Jesus expands and ramifies in a thousand directions. It is like passing from the narrow cleft of the Jordan to a Pisgah-view over the whole Land of Promise.

Although it was permitted to the Baptist to prepare the way for the teaching of Jesus, so far as even to enunciate its opening lesson, the place of the Baptist is quietly assigned to him; and it is a place outside the threshold of the Kingdom: 'He that is but little in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he' (Mt 11^{11}‖).

If Christ thus drew a line between His own teaching and that of John, still more marked was the difference between it and other contemporary teaching. John was at least a prophet, and spoke with the full authority of a prophet (Mt $11^{9.\ 13}$). The scribes had no original authority at all; they did but interpret a law which they had not made. Jesus spoke with an authority not only above that of the scribes (Mk 1^{22}‖), but higher still than that of John. He is the legislator of a new law (Mt 5^{22} etc.), the founder of that Kingdom which John did not enter.

(2) Its Universal Range.—With this commanding character of the teaching of Jesus there goes a corresponding width of outlook. We began with a rapid survey of the state of parties and opinions in Palestine at the time of Christ. But the object of this survey was not to explain the teaching of Jesus by affiliating it to any existing school. It was remarked of Him that He had had no regular training (Jn 7^{15}). He was not a Pharisee, not a Sadducee, not an Essene, not an Apocalyptist. The direct affinities of the teaching of Jesus were with nothing so transitory and local, but rather with that which was most central in OT. We might call it the distilled essence of OT: that essence first clarified and then greatly enlarged, the drop became a crystal sphere.

We are speaking, of course, of the substance, and of the main part of the substance, of the teaching of Jesus. The mere fact that it was conditioned by time and space involved that it should be addressed to a given generation in a language which it understood. Nor was it wholly without definite and particular applications — sidelights, so to speak, upon that space in history within which it falls. But history itself has shown that in the main it transcends all these conditions, and is as fresh at the end of eighteen centuries as when first it was delivered.

(3) Its Method.—This wonderful adaptability in the teaching of Jesus is accounted for in part by its extreme simplicity. If it had been a doctrine of the schools, something of the fashion of the schools would have adhered to it. But, as it was, it was addressed chiefly to the common people—sometimes to congregations in synagogues, sometimes to the chance company collected in private houses, more often still to casual gatherings in the open air.

And the language in which the teaching was couched was such as to appeal most directly to audiences like these. As a rule it takes hold of the simplest elements in our common humanity, 'das allgemein Menschliche.' The trivial incidents of everyday life are made to yield their lessons: the sower scattering his seed, the housewife baking her cakes or sweeping the house to find a lost piece of money, the shepherd collecting his sheep, the fishermen drawing in their net. Sometimes the story which forms the vehicle for the teaching takes a higher flight: it deals with landed proprietors, and banquets, and kings with their subjects. But even then there seems to be a certain deliberate simplification. The kings, for instance, are those of the popular tale rather than as the courtier would paint them.

(4) The Parables. — We have been naturally drawn into describing that which is most characteristic in the outward form of the teaching of Jesus—His parables. The Greek word παραβολή is used in NT in a wider sense than that in which we are in the habit of using it. In Lk 4^{23} it= 'proverb.' In Mt 15^{15} (comp. with vv.$^{11. 16-20}$) it= 'maxim,' a condensed moral truth, whether couched in figurative language or not. It covers as well brief aphoristic sayings (e.g. Mk 3^{23} 13^{28} ||, Lk 5^{36} 6^{39}) as longer discourses in which there is a real 'comparison.' But these latter are the 'parables' in our modern acceptation of the term: they are scenes or short stories taken from nature or from common life, which present in a picturesque and vivid way some leading thought or principle which is capable of being transferred to the higher spiritual life of man. The 'parable' in a somewhat similar sense to this had been employed in OT and by the Rabbis, but it had never before been employed with so high a purpose, on so large a scale, or with such varied application and unfailing perfection of form.

We may say that the parables of Jesus are of two kinds. In some the element of 'comparison' is more prominent. In these the parable moves as it were in two planes—one that of the scene or story which is made the vehicle for the lesson, and the other that of the higher truth which it is sought to convey; the essence of the parable lies in the parallelism. In the other kind there is no parallelism, but the scene or the story is just a typical example of the broader principle which it is intended to illustrate. The parables in Mt 13, Mk 4 all belong to the one class, several of those in the later chaps. of St. Luke (the Good Samaritan, the Rich Fool, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Pharisee and the Publican) belong rather to the other.

There is a group of sayings in the Fourth Gospel to which is given the name παροιμία rather than παραβολή (Jn 10^{6}, cf. $16^{25. 29}$), though the latter term would not have been inappropriate, in which Jesus uses the method of comparison to bring out leading features in His own character and person. In this way He speaks of Himself as the Good Shepherd, the Door of the sheep, the Vine, the Light of the World. These sayings form a class by themselves, and from the peculiar way in which they are worked out—the metaphor and the object explained by the metaphor being not kept apart but blended and fused together—are commonly classed under the head of 'allegory' rather than 'parable.' This is another instance in which we draw distinctions where the Greek of the NT would not have drawn them.

(5) Interpretation of the Parables.—To this day there is some difference of opinion as to the interpretation of the parables. The Patristic writers as a rule (though with some exceptions) allow themselves great latitude of interpretation. Any point of resemblance to any detail of the parable, however subordinate, justifies in their eyes a direct application of that detail. A familiar instance is the identification of the 'two pence,' which the Good Samaritan gives to the host, with the two Sacraments. An opposite modern school would restrict the application to the leading idea which the parable expresses. It is, however, fair to remember that the parables are meant to illustrate the laws of God's dealings with men; and as the same law is capable of many particular applications, all such applications may be said with equal right to be included in the parable. For instance, the parable of the Two Sons may be as true for individuals or for classes as it is for nations or groups of nations. The parable of the Great Banquet to which the invited guests do not come, and which is then thrown open to others who were not invited, no doubt points directly to the first reception of the gospel, but it is equally appropriate to every case where religious privilege is found to give no advantage, and the absence of religious privilege proves no insuperable hindrance. Any such range of application is legitimate and interesting; nor does the aptness of the lesson to one set of incidents make it any less apt to others where a like principle is at work. Every parable has its central idea, and whatever can be related to that idea may be fairly brought within its scope. To press mere coincidences with the picturesque accessories of a parable may be permissible as rhetoric, but can have no higher value.

(6) The Purpose of Teaching by Parables.—If we had before us only the fact of parabolic teaching, with the parables as they have come down to us and the actual psychological effect which they are seen to exercise, we should probably not hesitate as to the reason which we assigned for them. The parabolic form is, as it were, a barb to the arrow which carries home truth to the mind. The extreme beauty of this mode of teaching, handled as it is, has been universally acknowledged. If simplicity is an element in beauty, we have it here to perfection. But when simplicity is united to profundity, and to a profundity which comes from the touching of elemental chords of human feeling,—a touching so delicate, so sure, and so self-restrained, which reminds us of the finest Greek art with an added spiritual intensity which in that art was the one thing wanting,—we have indeed a product such as the world has never seen and will not see again. We seem to be placed for the moment at the very centre of things: on the one hand there is laid bare before us the human heart as it really is or ought to be, with all its perversities and affectations stripped away; and on the other hand we seem to be admitted to the secret council-chamber of the Most High, and to have revealed to us the plan by which He governs the world, the threads in all the tangled skein of being. No wonder that the parables have exercised such an attractive power, not over any one class or race of men, but over humanity wherever it is found.

Then the nature of the parable, at once presenting a picture to the mind and provoking to the search for a hidden meaning or application beneath it, would seem to be exactly suited to the pædagogic method of Jesus, which always calls for some responsive effort on the part of man, and which prefers to produce its effects not all at once, but rather with a certain suspense and delay, so that the good seed may have time to germinate and strike its roots more deeply into the soil.

This natural action of the method of teaching by parables seems so obvious that we might well be content not to seek any further. But when we turn to the Gospels, we find there stated a motive for the adoption of this method of teaching which is wholly different, and it must be confessed at first sight somewhat paradoxical. All three Synoptists agree in applying to teaching by parables the half-denunciatory passage Is 6^{9-10}; they would make its immediate object not so much to reveal truth as to conceal it—at least to conceal it for the moment from one class while it is revealed to another, and its ulterior object to aggravate the guilt of those from whom it is concealed. And, what is still more remarkable, all three Synoptists ascribe the use of this quotation to our Lord Himself, as though it really expressed, not merely the result of His chosen method of teaching, but its deliberate purpose. What are we to make of this? One group of critics would roundly deny that the words were ever used in this manner by our Lord. Jülicher (e.g.) takes his stand on Mk 4^{33} 'with many such parables spake he the word unto them, as they were able to hear it,' which would seem to make the method a tender concession to slowness of apprehension rather than a means of aggravating it. But, on the other hand, we observe that the quotation is attributed to our Lord in what must have been the common original of all three Gospels, i.e. in one of our best and oldest sources. And while such passages as Jn 12^{39-41} (where the same quotation is applied by the evangelist) and Ac 28^{25-27} (where it is applied by St. Paul) would show that it was part of the common property of the apostolic age, the fact that it was so would be still more intelligible if the example had been set by our Lord Himself. Nor would it be less but rather more appropriate as coming from Him, if we regard it as summing up in a broad way what He felt was and must be for many of those among whom He moved the final outcome of His mission. The lesson is very similar to that of Jn 12^{46-48}. The Son of Man does not need to pass judgment on those who reject Him. His word judges them by an automatic process. That which is meant for their life becomes to them an occasion of falling, when from indolence or self-will it makes no impression upon them. This was the actual course of things; it was a course rendered inevitable by the laws which God had laid down, and which in that sense might be regarded as designed by Him. And inasmuch as the Son associates Himself with the providential action of the Father, it might be also spoken of as part of His own design. It is so, however, rather in the remoter degree in which, allowing for the contrariant action of human wills, whatever is is also ordained, than as directly purposed before the appeal has been made and rejected. It belongs to that department of providential action which is not primary and due to immediate Divine initiative, but secondary or contingent upon human failure.

There is then perhaps sufficient reason to think that the words may after all have been spoken, much as we have them, by our Lord. But granting this, we should still not be forbidden to surmise that they are somewhat out of place. Standing where they do they come to us with a shock of strange severity, which would be mitigated if they could be put later in the ministry, where they occur in St. John. The transference may have been due to the position which the original passage occupies in Isaiah, where it also serves as a sort of programme of the prophet's mission. There, too, the arrangement may conceivably represent the actual historical order, but it may also represent the result of later experience, which for didactic effect is placed at the beginning of the career rather than at the end.

b. Contents of the Teaching.—There are five distinctive and characteristic topics in the teaching of Jesus—

(1) The Fatherhood of God.
(2) The Kingdom of God.
(3) The Subjects or Members of the Kingdom.
(4) The Messiah.
(5) The Paraclete and the Tri-unity of God.

With that simplicity which we have seen to be so marked a feature in His teaching, Jesus selects two of the most familiar of all relations to be the types round which He groups His teaching in regard to God and man—the family and the organized state; God stands to man in the relation at once of Father and of King. These two types by no means exclude each other, but each helps to complete the idea derived from the other without which it might be one-sided. At the same time, in different connexions, first one and then the other becomes more prominent. Thus, when stress is laid upon the Divine attributes, God appears chiefly in the character of Father; when attention is turned to the complex relations of men to Him and to one another, they are more commonly regarded under the figure of a Kingdom.

(1) The Fatherhood of God.—It has just been said that the doctrine that God is Father by no means excludes the doctrine that He is also King. This idea, too, is repeatedly put forward (Mt 5^{35} 18^{23} 22^{2} etc.). The title 'King' brings out what in modern language we are accustomed to call the 'transcendence' of God. But the recognition of this was, as we saw (p. 606^{a} sup.), a strong point in the contemporary Judaism, and therefore it needed no special emphasis. It was otherwise with the idea of Fatherhood.

Not that this idea was unknown to the pagan religions, and still less to the religion of Israel. From Homer onwards Zeus had borne the name 'Father of gods and men.' But this was a superficial idea: it meant little more than 'originator.' This sense also appears in the older Jewish literature, but with further connotations added to it. God is more particularly the Father of His people Israel (cf. Dt 14^{1} 32^{6}, Jer 3^{19} $31^{9.20}$), in a yet deeper sense of the righteous in Israel (Is 63^{16}), and, though not with the same wealth of meaning, of the individual (Mal 2^{10}, Sir $23^{1.4}$).

It is the tenderest side of the teaching of OT (Ps 103^{13}) which is now taken up and developed. It becomes indeed the corner-stone of the NT teaching about God. The name 'Father' becomes in NT what the name Jehovah (Jahveh) was in OT, the fullest embodiment of revelation. If it is prominent in the apostolic writings, this is traceable ultimately to the teaching of Jesus (cf. Ro 8^{15} and comms.). The title belongs primarily to Jesus Himself as 'the Son' (ὁ Πατήρ μου, esp. Mt 11^{27}). Through Him it descends to His followers (ὁ Πατὴρ ὑμῶν, ὁ Πατήρ σου, Mt 5$^{16. 45. 48}$ 6$^{1. 4. 6. 8. 9. 14. 15}$ etc.). But the love of God as Father extends beyond these limits even to 'the unthankful and evil' (Lk 6^{35}, Mt 5^{45}). The presentation of God as Father culminates in the parable of the Prodigal Son. Older conceptions of God find their counterpart in the Elder Brother of this parable (Lk 15$^{25\text{ff.}}$ contrasted with v.^{20}). The application which is thus made of the Fatherhood of God invests the teaching of Jesus with wonderful tenderness and beauty (Mt 6^{32} 7^{11} 10$^{29. 30}$, Lk 12^{32} etc.).

(2) The Kingdom of God.—If the conception of God as Father does not exclude His majesty as King, no more does the conception of His Kingdom exclude that of children gathered together in His family. Still, the leading term to denote those active relations of God with man, with which the mission of Jesus is specially connected, is ἡ βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ or τῶν οὐρανῶν.

The use of these terms suggests a number of questions which are still much debated. (i.) Were both names originally used? Or if one is to be preferred, which? (ii.) What is the meaning of the phrase? Does βασιλεία='kingdom' or 'reign'? (iii.) When we have determined this, with what order of ideas is the phrase to be associated? With the later Judaism? or with the teaching of the prophets? Or does it belong to the more novel element in the teaching of our Lord? (iv.) Is the Kingdom merely conceived of from the side of man or from the side of God? Is it something which man works out or which is bestowed upon him? (v.) Is it present or future? Was it in course of realization during the lifetime of Jesus Himself, or is it mainly eschatological? (vi.) Is it inward or outward? A moral reformation or the founding of a society? (vii.) Was the conception as at first framed national or universal?

These questions are put as alternatives. And they are usually so regarded. But it may be well to say at once that in almost every case there seems to be real evidence for both sides of the proposition; so that the inference is that the conception to which they relate was in fact many-sided, and included within itself a number of different nuances, all more or less valid. And the reason for this appears to be, that our Lord took up a conception which He found already existing, and, although He definitely discarded certain aspects of it, left others as they were, some with and some without a more express sanction, while He added new ones. The centre or focus of the idea is thus gradually shifted; and while parts of it belong to so much of the older current conception as was not explicitly repealed, other parts of it are a direct expression of the new spirit introduced into it. The one element definitely expelled was that which associated the inauguration of the Kingdom with political violence and revolution.

(i.) The Name. — It is well known that the phrase ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν for ἡ βασ. τ. θεοῦ is a peculiarity of the First Gospel (where it occurs thirty-two times), and that it receives no sanction from the other Synoptics. Neither can Jn 3^{5}, where the reading is distinctly Western, be quoted in support of it. Hence some have thought that it was a coinage of Mt. It occurs, however, also in Ev. sec. Heb. (Handmann, p. 89); and the fact that βασ. τ. θ. is found in Mt 12^{28} 21$^{31. 43}$ would go to show that the evangelist had no real objection to that form, while the corresponding phrase πάτηρ ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς though it disappears from Lk 11^{2} is verified by Mk 11^{25}. Moreover, we know that 'heaven' was a common metonymy for 'God' in the language of the time (cf. also Mk 10^{21}, Lk 10^{20} 12^{33}), and that the particular phrase 'kingdom of heaven' (though not exactly in the sense usually assigned to it; see below under ii.) occurs repeatedly in the Talmud. It seems, therefore, on the whole probable that both forms were used by our Lord Himself. In any case they may be regarded as equivalents.

(ii.) Meaning.—The phrase in both its forms is ambiguous: it may mean either 'kingdom' or 'reign,' 'sovereignty,' 'rule' of heaven, or of God. It appears that in the Talmud the latter signification is the more common (Schürer, NT Zeitgesch.^{3} ii. 539 n. [Eng. tr. II. ii. 171]; Edersheim, Life and Times, etc. i. 267 f.). And though the former is that more usually adopted by commentators, there seems to be no reason why recourse should not be had to the latter where it is more natural (as, e.g. in Lk 17$^{20. 21}$). The phrase covers both senses, and the one will frequently be found to shade off into the other. The best definition known to the writer is one given incidentally by Dr. Hort (Life and Letters, ii. 273), 'the world of invisible laws by which God is ruling and blessing His creatures.' This is the most fundamental meaning; all others are secondary. The 'laws' in question are 'a world,' inasmuch as they have a connexion and coherence of their own; they form a system, a cosmos within the cosmos; they come direct from 'heaven,' or from God; and they are 'invisible' in their origin, though they may work their way to visibility.

(iii.) Associations.—The sense just assigned was that which was most fundamental in the thought of Jesus. It was that which He saw ought to be the true sense, however much it might be missed by His contemporaries. It was deeper and subtler than the conception of Psalmist and Prophet, even than the bright and exhilarating picture of Ps 145$^{11-13}$, because it was compatible with any kind of social condition, and because it did not turn mainly on the majestic exercise of power. And if this was true of the later and more developed conception, much more was it true of the earlier notion of the theocracy, which was simply that of the Israelite State with a Prophet or Judge at the head instead of a King (1 S 12$^{7-12}$). The contemporaries of Jesus when they spoke of the 'Kingdom of God' thought chiefly of an empire contrasted with the great world-empires, more particularly the Roman, which galled them at the moment. And the two features which caught their imagination most were the throwing off of the hated yoke and the transference of supremacy from the heathen to Israel. This was to be brought about by a catastrophe which was to close the existing order of things, and which therefore took a shape that was eschatological.

This eschatological and catastrophic side Jesus did not repudiate, though He gave a different turn to it, but the essence of His conception was independent of all convulsions. The simplest paraphrase for 'the Kingdom of God' is the clause which follows the petition for the coming of the Kingdom in the Lord's Prayer: 'Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.' The only difference is that the Prayer perhaps hints rather more at the co-operation of human wills. This is not excluded in the idea of the Kingdom, which is, however, primarily the working out of the Will of God by God Himself.

(iv.) The Nature of the Kingdom: how far Supernatural? — The very name of the Kingdom 'of heaven or of God' implies that it has its origin in the world above. It 'comes' (ἔρχεσθαι, Mt 6^{10}, Mk 9^{1}, Lk 11^{2} 17^{20}; ἐγγίζειν, Mt 3^{2} 4^{17} 10^{7} etc.; φθάνειν, Mt 12^{28}=Lk 11^{20}); it is 'given' (Mt 21^{43}) and 'received' (Mk 10^{15}=Lk 18^{17}); it is 'prepared' by God (Mt 25^{34}); it is 'inherited' (ib.), and men 'enter into' it (Mt 5^{20} 19^{23}, Jn 3^{5}); it is an object of 'search' (Mt 6^{33}=Lk 12^{31}, Mt 13^{45}). All this means that it is not built up by the labour of man, it is not a product of development from below, but 'of the creative activity of God' (Lütgert, Reich Gottes, p. 26). It is a gift bestowed, not something to be done, but something to be enjoyed ('Nie eine Aufgabe, wohl aber eine Gabe,' Holtzmann, NT Th. p. 202, partly after Lütgert). It is a prize, the highest of all prizes (Mt 13^{44-46}), corresponding to the summum bonum of pagan philosophy.

This part of the conception has a considerable range, according as the context points to the popular view of the Messianic Kingdom as implying outward conditions of splendour, abundance, and enjoyment, or as it points to what we have called the inner thought of Jesus, the invisible laws of God's working, taken into and welcomed by the individual soul, as in the parables of the Pearl and the Treasure in the Field.

These parables show that there is a place, though a subordinate place, left for human effort, the co-operation of the human will with the Divine. The process of 'seeking' implies both effort and renunciation. There must be a concentrating of the powers of the soul upon the Will of God, if that Will is to be really done; but where it is done it brings its own exceeding great reward (Lk 6^{38}).

From this point of view it may be said, with Holtzmann (NT Th. i. 202–207), that the negative side of the conception is the Forgiveness of Sins as the first condition of entrance into the Kingdom, and that the positive side of it is the active practice of Righteousness with the peace and contentment which that practice brings.

(v.) Present or Future?—There can be no real question that the Kingdom is presented in both lights as present and as future. Strictly speaking, the future is divided, and the notes of time are threefold—present, near future, and more distant future. Take, for instance, the following passages: Mt 12^{28} (=Lk 11^{20}) 'If I by the Spirit of God cast out demons, then is the Kingdom of God come (ἔφθασεν) upon you'; Mk 1^{15} (=Mt 4^{17}) 'The time is fulfilled, and the Kingdom of God is at hand' (ἤγγικεν); Mk 9^{1} ‖ 'There be some here . . . which shall in nowise taste of death till they see the Kingdom of God come (ἐληλυθυῖαν) with power.' The only one of these passages about which there can be any doubt is the second (see above, p. 610), and even that belongs to the common groundwork of the Synoptic tradition, and it is supported by Mt 10^{7} ‖. If the latest of these dates still falls within the lifetime of the then generation, there is a group of parables (the Mustard Seed, the Wheat and Tares, the Drag-net) which would seem at once to bring the Kingdom into the present, and to postpone its consummation.

These apparent inconsistencies are probably to be explained in the same way as others which we meet with. The future coming, the more or less distant coming, of which the Son Himself does not know the day or the hour, is the eschatological coming of the current expectation, which, if we follow our authorities, we must believe that Jesus also shared. There was, however, a certain ambiguity even in this expectation as popularly held: it was not clear exactly in what relation of time the coming of the Messiah and the establishment of His Kingdom stood to the end of all things. And this ambiguity was necessarily heightened by the peculiar nature of the coming of Christ, and the conviction which gradually forced itself upon the minds of the disciples that there must needs be a double Coming,—one in shame, the other in triumph; one therefore which for them was past, and another still in the future.

But, apart from all this, it will be apparent that the more distinctive conception of the Kingdom as the 'world of invisible laws' by which God works is not subject to the same limitations of time. In this sense it embraces the whole providential scheme of things from the beginning; though, as we have said, it is really a cosmos within the cosmos, and it has its culminating periods and moments, such as was above all that which dates from the Incarnation. The most characteristic expression of this aspect of the Kingdom would be the parables of the Leaven and of the Seed growing secretly.

(vi.) Inward or Outward?—A like conclusion holds good for the question which we have next to ask ourselves: Are we to think of the Kingdom of God as visible or as invisible? Is it an influence, a force or collection of forces, or is it an institution? We are familiar with the very common and often quite superficial identification of the Kingdom with the Church. Is this justified? Many recent writers answer this question emphatically, No (list with reff. in Holtzmann, NT Th. i. 208). And it is true that there are certain passages by which it seems to be excluded.

Conspicuous among these are the verses Lk $17^{20.21}$ Οὐκ ἔρχεται ἡ β. τ. θ. μετὰ παρατηρήσεως. οὐδὲ ἐροῦσιν, Ἰδοὺ ὧδε, ἢ ἐκεῖ. ἰδοὺ γὰρ ἡ β. τ. θ. ἐντὸς ὑμῶν ἐστίν. A majority of leading German scholars, including Schürer (Die Predigt. J. C. p. 18) and Holtzmann (with a slight modification, 'in your reach'), take the last words as meaning 'in your midst,' the main ground being that they are addressed to the Pharisees. But Field seems to have shown (Ot. Norv. ad. loc.) that this interpretation is lexically untenable ('no sound example'), and that the better rendering is in animis vestris.

But, on the other hand, parables like the Wheat and the Tares and the Drag-net are most naturally explained of a visible community; and there can be no doubt that the popular expectation was of a visible kingdom, such as that in which the sons of Zebedee sought for a chief place.

If we keep to the clue which we have hitherto followed, the facts will be sufficiently clear. The Kingdom in its highest and most Christian sense is the working of 'invisible laws' which penetrate below the surface and are gradually progressive and expansive in their operation. But in this as in other cases spiritual forces take to themselves an outward form; they are enshrined in a vessel of clay, finer or coarser as the case may be, not only in men as individuals but in men as a community or communities. The society then becomes at once a vehicle and instrument of the forces by which it is animated, not a perfect vehicle or a perfect instrument,—a field of wheat mingled with tares, a net containing bad fish as well as good,—but analogous to those other visible institutions by which God accomplishes His gracious purposes amongst men.

(vii.) National or Universal?—The same principle holds good throughout the whole of this analysis of the idea of the Kingdom. The aptest figure to express it is that of growth. It is a germ, secretly and silently insinuated, and secretly and silently working until it puts forth first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear. It is a mistake to cut a section of that which is thus ceaselessly expanding, and to label it with a name which might be true at one particular moment but would not be true at the next. The Kingdom of God is not the theocracy of the OT, nor the eschatological Kingdom of the Apocalypses, nor the Christian Church of the present day, or of the Middle Ages, or of the Fathers. These are phases through which it passes; but it outgrows one after the other. For this reason, because He foresaw this inevitable and continuous growth, the chief Founder and permanent Vicegerent of the Kingdom showed Himself, as we might think, indifferent to the precise degree of extension which it was to receive during His life on earth; He was content to say that He 'was not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel' (Mt 15^{24}), though within a generation His gospel was about to be carried to the ends of the then known earth. It was enough that the seed was planted—planted in a soil suited to it, and under conditions that ensured its full vitality, 'like a tree by the streams of water, that bringeth forth its fruit in its season, whose leaf also doth not wither.' It is characteristic of God's processes that there is no hurry or impatience about them; the Master was not so anxious to reap immediate fruit as the disciple (Ro 1^{13}), and therefore He calmly left it to His followers to see 'greater things' than He saw Himself (Jn 14^{12}); but these 'greater things' are none the less virtually His own.

(3) The Members of the Kingdom.—As the 'Reign of God,' the βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ denotes certain Divine forces or laws which are at work in the world; as the Kingdom of God it was at most stages a society, but at all stages a definite sphere or area, into which men might enter, and, by entering, become partakers of the same Divine forces or subject to the same Divine laws. It was therefore a matter of much moment what were the conditions of entrance into the Kingdom, and what was the character impressed upon its members. The two things run into each other, because it was required of those who entered that they should possess at least the germs of the character to be developed in them.

(i.) Conditions of Entrance.—These are clearly laid down: 'Except ye turn, and become as little children, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven' (Mt 18^{3}). There was to be a definite change of mind, a break with the sinful past. This was to be ratified by submission to the rite of baptism, which, in the discourse with Nicodemus, is described as a new birth of 'water and Spirit' (Jn 3^{5}). The entrance into the Kingdom is something more than a deliberate act of the man himself, it is a self-surrender to Divine influences. The response on the part of God is forgiveness, which is the permanent concomitant of baptism, not only that of John, but also that in the name of Christ (Mk 1^{4} ||, comp. with Ac 2^{38}, Lk 24^{47} etc.).

(ii.) The Character of the Members.—The typical character of the members of the Kingdom is that of a 'little child,' in which the prominent features are innocence, simplicity of aim, absence of self-assertion, trustfulness, and openness to influences from above. A sketch of such a character is given in the Beatitudes (Mt 5^{3-9}; the || in Lk 6^{20-26} refers rather to conditions or circumstances suited to the character). The Christian ideal here depicted stands out in marked contrast to most other ideals of what is admirable in man. The qualities commended ('poor in spirit'—where the Matthæan gloss is in any case right in sense,—'meek,' 'merciful,' 'pure in heart,' 'peacemakers') are all of the gentle, submissive, retiring order. And this is fully borne out by other sayings, the cheek turned to the smiter, the litigant forestalled, the requisition of labour offered freely, and even doubled (Mt 5^{38-41} ||), enemies to be loved, persecutors to be prayed for (ib. vv.$^{43.\ 44}$), the sword to be sheathed (Mt 26^{52}), the duties of charity strongly inculcated (Lk 10^{25-37}), the duty of forgiveness of injuries (Mt $18^{23\mathrm{ff.}}$), service greater than authority (Lk $22^{25\mathrm{ff.}}$). And it is noticeable that the same type of character is praised by St. Paul (Ro 12^{21} 'Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good'; cf. ch. 13). The whole duty of man is summed up in love to God and love to one's neighbour (again cf. Ro 13^{8-10}). We observe, too, that the ethical teaching of Jesus is almost confined to that side of ethics which touches upon religion. Allusions to civic and industrial duties are very few, and those negative rather than positive (Mt 18^{27} 22^{21} = Ro 13^{7}).

(iii.) Paradoxes of Christianity.—It is only natural that these features in the teaching of Christ should be taken hold of and made a charge against Christianity, as they have been from Suetonius onwards (Domit. 15, 'contemptissimæ inertiæ,' of Flavius Clemens, probably as a Christian; cf. Tertull. Apol. 42, 'infructuosi in negotiis dicimur'). And it may be doubted whether even yet the full intention of our Lord has been fathomed, and the exact place of the specifically Christian ideal in relation to civic and social duties ascertained. The following suggestions may be offered.

The precepts in question were probably addressed in the first instance, not to promiscuous multitudes, but to the disciples. If certain passages (as Mt 5^{1}) may be quoted to the contrary, it should be remembered that these introductory notes as to the circumstances under which discourses were spoken are among the least trustworthy parts of the Gospel tradition, and are often nothing more than vague conjectures of the evangelists. The type of character described bears on its face the marks of being intended for the little community of Christians (cf. Latham, Pastor Pastorum, p. 253).

As such we can see that it had a very special appropriateness. It was not an accident that Christianity is the religion of the Crucified. The Cross is but the culminating expression of a spirit which was characteristic of it throughout. Its peculiar note is Victory through Suffering. An idea like that of Islam, making its way by the sword, was abhorrent to it from the first. Jesus came to be the Messiah of the Jews, but the narratives of the Temptation teach us that, from the very beginning of His career, He stripped off from His conception of Messiahship all that was political, all thought of propagating His claims by force. A new mode of propagating religion was deliberately chosen, and carried through with uncompromising thoroughness. The disciple was not above his Master; and the example which Jesus set in founding His faith by dying for it, was an example which His disciples were called upon to follow into all its logical consequences. Christianity, the true Christianity, carries no arms; it wins its way by lowly service, by patience, by self-sacrifice.

History shows that there are no instruments of religious propaganda comparable to these. It also shows that the type of character connected with them is of the very highest attractiveness and beauty. Is it a complete type, a type to which we can apply the Kantian maxim, 'So act as if your action was to be a law for all human beings'? This would seem to be more than we ought to say. It is not clear that the Christian type would be what it is if it were not built upon, and if it did not presuppose, a certain structure of society, to which other motives had contributed. The ethical ideal of Christianity is the ideal of a Church. It does not follow that it is also the ideal of the State. If we are to say the truth, we must admit that parts of it would become impracticable if they were transferred from the individual standing alone to governments or individuals representing society. It could not be intended that the officers of the law should turn the cheek to the criminal. The apostles were to bear no sword, but the judge 'beareth not the sword in vain.'

May we not say that the functions of Christian morals—specifically Christian morals—are these? (1) At their first institution to form a vehicle, the only possible vehicle, for the Christian religion. So far as Christianity has taken a real and genuine hold upon society, it is through these means and no others. Other things may have commended it for a time, but no trust can be placed in them. (2) The Christian motive acting in the midst of other motives gradually leavens and modifies them, imparting to them something which they had not before. If we look round us at the principles which at this moment regulate the action of States, in their external or international relations as well as those which are internal, we shall see that if these principles are not wholly Christian, they are also not pagan. They have a certain coherence, and they mark a very conspicuous advance as compared with the principles of the ancient world. Christianity has shown a power of modifying what it does not altogether supplant. The world even outside Christianity is still God's world. It is a world of which the essential characteristic is that it is progressive; and it may conduce most to this progress that it should be brought under the influence of the Christian precept, not pure but in dilution. And (3) may we not draw from this the augury that in the end, at some time which we cannot see, the social structure may be still more fully recast, under the influence of Christianity: 'Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more'? We can conceive a condition of things in which the Church became coextensive with the State, and in which religion penetrated the body politic in a sense in which it has never done so yet. When that time came, conduct which now would be only quixotic might be rational, and required by the public conscience.

When the verse Mt 5^{42} 'Give to him that asketh thee,' etc., is criticized from the point of view of modern political economy, the mistake is in applying a standard which is out of place. In those days the natural and, indeed, the only outlet of the kind for benefiting the poor was almsgiving; and our Lord's main object was to strengthen the motive, which was in itself a thoroughly right one. It would have been in vain to anticipate methods which God has evidently intended to be the result of long experience. The argument from analogy comes in here with great force. God might have removed many forms of human ill with a word; but as it is, He has been pleased to let improved methods, and the wisdom to use them, grow gradually and grow together. The advance which mankind slowly makes is a solid advance, and an advance not here and there, but all along the line.

We have seen that our Lord was not careful to guard against misunderstandings. It has been a salutary exercise for His followers to find out what was the true sense of His sayings for themselves.

(4) The Messiah.—We are not concerned here with the very remarkable historical evolution of the claim of our Lord to be the Messiah, which will come before us in connexion with the narrative of His life. At present we have to do only with His teaching on the subject, and that mainly with reference to the deeply significant names by which His claim was conveyed.

(i.) The Christ.—We need not delay over the title 'Messiah,' 'Christ,' 'Anointed,' which is simply that of the current Jewish expectation. It is repeatedly applied to our Lord by others, and on three occasions, at least, expressly accepted by Himself (Jn 4^{26}, Mt 16^{17}, Mk $14^{61.\ 62}$ ||, cf. Jn 11^{27}); but only once does our Lord use the term of Himself (Jn 17^{3} Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν), and that in a passage where we cannot be sure that the wording is not that of the evangelist. In like manner the title 'Elect' (ἐκλελεγμένος, Lk 9^{35}; ἐκλεκτός, Lk 23^{35}), which is also current (cf. Enoch 40^{5}), is applied to our Lord, but not by Himself.

(ii.) Son of David.—Much the same may be said of another title which belongs to a prominent side of the expectation. 'Son of David' occurs several times (on the lips of the crowd at and before the triumphal entry, of the Syrophœnician woman, of Bartimæus, of the Pharisees), but Jesus Himself does not use it, and rather propounds a difficulty in regard to it (Mk 12^{35}||).

(iii.) Son of Man.—The really characteristic title which occurs some 80 times in the Gospels, and is without doubt the one which Jesus chose to express His own view of His office, is 'the Son of Man.' Whereas the other titles are used by others of Him, this is used only by Him and of Himself. What He desired to convey by this is a question at once of no little difficulty and of great importance ('Die Frage gehört zu den verwickeltsten ja verfahrensten der ganzen neutest. Theologie,' Holtzmann).

The starting-point for this, as well as for the idea of the kingdom, is, we may be sure, Dn 7^{13}. The 'Son of Man' in that passage, as originally written, stood for Israel. The four world-empires are represented by beasts, the dominion that falls to Israel is that of a man. But in this as in other respects the passage was interpreted Messianically. In the Similitudes of the Bk. of Enoch (chs. 37–70) the Son of Man takes a prominent place. He is a person, and a superhuman person. It is He who holds the great judgment to which the Apocalyptic writings look forward. The attributes ascribed to Him are all more or less directly connected with this judgment, which is at once to vindicate the righteous, and finally to put down the wicked. The date of this portion of the Bk. of Enoch has been much debated, but opinion at the present time is still more preponderantly in favour of the view that it is pre-Christian (between B.C. 94–64, Charles, Enoch, p. 29 f.). The language of the Gospels requires that the title as applied to a person and to the Messiah should be not entirely new. It also requires that it should be not perfectly understood and familiar (Mt 16^{13}, Jn 12^{34}). It is probable that its use did not go beyond a small circle, the particular circle to which the Similitudes of Enoch belonged. This, however, would be enough to give the phrase a certain currency, and to make it at least suggest association with the Messiah.

It is associated with Him, especially in His character as Judge, and as the chief actor in that series of events which marks the end of the age, and the reversal of the places of good and wicked. This sense Jesus did not discard. It appears unmistakably in a number of passages (Mt 13^{41} 16^{28} 19^{28} $24^{30\text{ff.}}$ $25^{31\text{ff.}}$ 26^{64} etc.). But at the same time there can be no doubt that He read into it a number of other ideas, new and original, just as He read them into the conception of the Kingdom.

What is most distinctive in this novel element in the teaching of Jesus? There is an increasing tendency amongst scholars to lay stress on the Aramaic original of the phrase. The Aramaic equivalent is said to mean and to be the only way which they had of expressing 'Man' (generically, i.e. 'Mankind'). Hence the attempt has been made to interpret the phrase impersonally, and to get rid more or less of its Messianic application (see Holtzmann, NT Th. i. 256 ff.). It is true that an impersonal sense will suit such a passage as Mk 2^{28} 'The Sabbath was made for man . . . therefore the Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath.' At the same time this is by no means the necessary sense. And Wellhausen, who is one of those who most emphatically maintain the equation 'Son of Man' = 'Man,' yet sees that the expression must have been used by our Lord to designate His own person (Israel. u. Jüd.

Gesch.^{2} p. 381). Nor can this conclusion really be avoided by such an expedient as Holtzmann's, who calls attention to the comparative rarity of the title in the early chapters and early stages of the history (e.g. in Mk only 2$^{10.28}$), and would explain it during this period impersonally, and only after St. Peter's confession personally. Against this and against more sweeping attempts (e.g. by Martineau, Seat of Authority, p. 339) to get rid of the Messianic signification altogether, it may be enough to point out that if reasonable critics like Holtzmann allow, and a narrative such as that of the Temptation seems to prove, that Jesus from the first really assumed the character of the Messiah, and if our oldest authorities with one consent treat the title Son of Man as in the later stages Messianic, it is fair to presume that it is Messianic also in the earlier. If the Similitudes of the Bk. of Enoch are pre-Christian, this conclusion would amount almost to certainty.

It is, however, fair to argue from the natural sense of the phrase in Aramaic, that by His use of it, Jesus did place Himself in some relation to humanity as a whole. And we are led to form the same inference by the conspicuous use of the corresponding Heb. in Ps 8^4 'What is man that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man that thou visitest him?' Here the parallelism shows that 'son of man'='man.' We also know from He 2$^{6-10}$ that the psalm was at a very early date applied to Jesus as the Messiah, and at a still earlier date (the Baptism) we have the neighbouring Ps 2^7 applied to Him. It seems to follow, or at least to be a very natural presumption, that these two psalms early became an object of close study to Jesus, and helped to give outward shape to His conceptions.

Ps 8 seems specially adapted to fall in with these, as it brings out with equal strength the two elements which we know to have entered into the consciousness of Jesus—the combination of lowliness with loftiness, the physical weakness of man as contrasted with his sublime calling and destiny. We can see here the appropriateness of the application of one and the same title to Him who, on the one hand, 'had not where to lay his head,' and who must needs 'go as it was written of him,' and who yet, on the other hand, looked to come again 'with power' in His Kingdom.

We do not like to use such very modern phraseology as the 'ideal of humanity,' 'the representative of the human race'; and yet it would seem that Jesus did deliberately connect with His own person such ideas as these: He fused them as it were into the central idea of Messiahship, and we can see how the Jewish conception of the Messiah was enlarged and enriched by them. If the Messiah comes out in the claim to forgive sins, it is the Son of Man whose mission it was 'to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19^{10}), 'not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mk 10^{45} ||).

Here we have another connexion in which the name is frequently used. The prophecies of the Resurrection and of the Second Coming are closely associated with the fatal end of the First: 'The Son of Man must suffer many things, and be rejected by the elders, and the chief priests, and the scribes, and be killed, and after three days rise again' (Mk 8^{31} etc.). If we ask for the OT original of this 'Saviour through suffering,' no doubt it is the Second Part of Isaiah, and especially Is 53. Still, it would be rather too much to describe this idea as embodied in the title 'Son of Man.' It is embodied in the character of the Son of Man as conceived by Jesus, but not exactly in the name. The name which expressed it was the 'Servant of Jehovah' (παῖς κυρίου); and this name was undoubtedly applied to Christ by the Church as soon as it began to reflect upon His life and mission (cf. Ac 3$^{13.26}$ 4$^{27.30}$, Mt 12^{18}), but we have no evidence that Jesus used it of Himself. One reason for the choice of the name 'Son of Man' probably was that it admitted and favoured these associations, even if it did not directly suggest them.

This comprehensive and deeply significant title touched at the one end the Messianic and eschatological expectation through the turn which had been given to it in one section of Judaism (the Book of Enoch). At the other and opposite end it touched the idea of the Suffering Servant. But at the centre it is broadly based upon an infinite sense of brotherhood with toiling and struggling humanity, which He who most thoroughly accepted its conditions was fittest also to save. As Son of God, Jesus looked upwards to the Father; as Son of Man, He looked outwards upon His brethren, the sheep who had no shepherd.

(iv.) Son of God.—Only once in Synopt. (Mt 27^{43}) and in a few places in the Fourth Gospel (Jn 10^{36}, cf. 5^{25} 9^{35} var. lec. 11^4) is it hinted that Jesus directly assumed this title. It is repeatedly given to Him by others—by the Baptist (Jn 1^{34}), by Nathanael (Jn 1^{49}), by Satan hypothetically (Mt 4^3), as also by the crowd (Mt 27^{40}), by the possessed (Mk 3^{11} ||), by the disciples (Mt 14^{33}), by the centurion (Mk 15^{39}=Mt 27^{54}), and by evangelists (Mk 1^1 v.l. Jn 3^{18} 20^{31}).

At the same time it is abundantly clear that the title was really assumed from the indirect mode in which Jesus constantly speaks of God as 'My Father.' This is very frequent in Synoptics as well as in St. John (Mt 7^{21} 10^{32} 11^{27} 15^{13} 16^{17} etc.). And although, as we have seen, the consciousness which finds expression in this phrase becomes the basis of an extended doctrine of the Divine Fatherhood ('the Father,' 'our Father,' 'thy Father,' 'your Father'), there is nevertheless a distinct interval between the sense in which God can be claimed as Father by men, even the innermost circle of the disciples, and that in which He is Father to the Son. In this respect the passage Mt 11^{27}=Lk 10^{22} is quite explicit (cf. also the graduated scale of being in Mk 13^{32}=Mt 24^{36}). Although this passage stands out somewhat conspicuously in Synoptics, the context in which it occurs is so original and so beyond the reach of invention, while it supplies so marvellously the key to that which distinguishes the history of Jesus from other histories, that doubt cannot reasonably be cast upon it. It is confirmed by the sense in which the title 'Son of God' is taken by the Jews—not merely by the populace but by the learned (Mt 27$^{41-43}$, cf. Mk 15$^{31.32}$, Jn 19^7). And, on the other hand, it confirms sufficiently the substantial accuracy of like passages in the Fourth Gospel (e.g. 10$^{30.38}$). We are thus prepared for the unanimity with which the Church at the earliest date fixed upon this title to convey its sense of the uniqueness of Christ's nature (Ac 9^{20}, Ro 1^4, Gal 2^{20}, Eph 4^{13}, He 4^{14} etc., 1 Jn 4^{15} etc., Rev 2^{18}).

This aspect of the question will come before us more fully later. We content ourselves for the present with observing that the teaching of Jesus, reserved and reticent as it is, presupposes as its background this wholly exceptional relation of 'the Son' to 'the Father.' From that as centre radiate a number of other relationships to His immediate disciples, to the Church of which they formed the nucleus, and to mankind. The Sonship of Jesus is intimately connected with His work as Messiah (Titius, p. 116). It is in this character that 'all things are delivered' to Him (Mt 11^{27} ||), in this character that He is enabled to give to the world a revelation of the Father (ib.), in this character that He carries out His work of redemption even to the death (Mk 14^{36} ‖).

(5) The Paraclete and the Tri-unity of God.—In the earliest Epp. of St. Paul we find that the Son of God is placed side by side with the Father, and is associated with Him as the ground of the Church's being, the source of spiritual grace, and as co-operating with Him in the providential ordering of events (1 Th 1^{1}, 2 Th 1^{1}, 1 Th $3^{11f.}$). It is difficult to describe the effect of the language used in any other terms than as attributing to the Son a coequal Godhead with the Father. And it is remarkable that St. Paul does this, within some twenty-two years of the Ascension, not as though he were laying down anything new, but as something which might be assumed as part of the common body of Christian doctrine.

We observe also that throughout the earliest group of Epp. there are frequent references to the work of the Holy Spirit as the one great force which lies behind at once the missionary activity and the common life of the Church of the apostolic age (esp. 1 Co 12–14, but cf. 1 Th $1^{5f.}$ 4^{8} 5^{19} etc.). This, too, it is assumed that all Christians would understand.

How are we to account for the prevalence of such teaching at so early a date, and in a region so far removed from the centre of Christianity? It would be natural if the Lord Jesus Christ Himself in His intercourse with His disciples had prepared them to expect a great activity of the Holy Spirit, and if He had hinted at relations in the Godhead which made it threefold rather than a simple monad. Apart from such hints, the common belief of the Church respecting Christ Himself and the Holy Spirit seems very difficult to understand. Certain previous tendencies in Jewish thought might lead up some way towards it, but they would leave a wide gap unspanned.

When, therefore, we find that one Gospel ascribes to our Lord rather full and detailed teaching respecting the Paraclete, which is explained to be another name for the Holy Spirit (Jn $14^{16.26}$ 15^{26}), when there is held out a clear hope and promise of a new Divine influence to take the place of that which is being withdrawn, and when in another Gospel we are also told of the institution * of a rite associated with a new revelation of God under a threefold Name, that of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit (Mt 28^{19}), these phenomena are just what we are prepared for, and just such as we should have had to assume even if we had had no definite record of them. We may, then, regard them as having received—whatever the antecedent claims of the documents in which they are found—a very considerable degree of critical verification. The single verse 2 Cor 13^{14} seems to require something very like what we find in Mt and Jn.

LITERATURE.—Much material of value will be found in the works on the Biblical Theology of NT by Weiss, Beyschlag, and esp. H. J. Holtzmann (1897). Reference may also be made to Bovon, Théol. du NT, Lausanne, 1897. The most considerable recent work on the Teaching of Jesus as a whole is Wendt's Lehre Jesu, Göttingen, 1890 (Eng. tr., T. & T. Clark, Edin. 1892). Bruce, The Kingdom of God (1890 and later) embraces the Synopt. Gospels only. In the last few years a number of monographs have appeared on the doctrine of the Kingdom and points connected with it—all, it may be said, bringing out some real aspect in the doctrine, though in the writer's opinion too often at the expense of other aspects. The series began with two prize essays, Die Lehre vom Reiche Gottes, by Issel and Schmoller (both Leiden, 1891), and includes treatises with similar titles by Schnedermann (Leipzig, 1893, 1895, 1896), J. Weiss (Göttingen, 1892), Lütgert (Gütersloh, 1895), Titius (Freiburg i. B. u. Leipzig, 1895), Krop (Paris, 1897); also Bousset, Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judentum (Göttingen, 1892); Paul, Die Vorstellungen vom Messias u. vom Gottesreich (Bonn, 1895); Lietzmann, Der Menschensohn (Leipzig, 1896); J. THE MIRACLES OF JESUS.—There has been a certain tendency of late to recede from the extreme position in the denial of Miracles. Harnack, for instance, writes in reference to the Gospel history as follows: 'Much that was formerly rejected has been re-established on a close investigation, and in the light of comprehensive experience. Who in these days, for example, could make such short work of the miraculous cures in the Gospels as was the custom of scholars formerly?' (Christianity and History, p. 63, Eng. tr.).

(i.) Different Classes of Miracles.—Partly this change of attitude is due to the higher estimate which would now be put on the value of the evangelical sources generally, as to which something will be said below. Partly it would be due to a change of view in regard to the supernatural, which is no longer placed in direct antagonism to the natural, but which is more reasonably explained as resulting from the operation of a higher cause in nature. And partly also it would be due to the recognition of wider possibilities in nature, 'more things in heaven and earth' than were dreamt of in the narrow philosophy of the Aufklärung.

(a) In particular, it may be said that medical science would have no difficulty in admitting a large class of miracles of healing. All those which have to do with what would now be called 'nervous disorders,' all those in which there was a direct action of the mind upon the body, would fall into place readily enough. Given a personality like that of Jesus, the effect which it would have upon disorders of this character would be strictly analogous to that which modern medicine would seek to produce. The peculiar combination of commanding authority with extreme gentleness and sympathy would be a healing force of which the value could not easily be exaggerated.

A question would indeed still be left as to the treatment of the cases of what was called 'demoniacal possession.' There can be no doubt that Jesus Himself shared, broadly speaking, the views of His contemporaries in regard to these cases: His methods of healing went upon the assumption that they were fundamentally what every one, including the patients themselves, supposed them to be. We can well believe that this was a necessary assumption in order to allow the healing influences to operate. We must remember that all the ideas of the patient would be adjusted to the current belief, and it would be only through them that the words and acts of Christ could take effect. In the accounts of such miracles we see that there was a mutual intelligence between Healer and patient from the first (Mk $1^{24f.}$ ‖ ^{34} ‖ 5^{6} ‖). It was by means of this mutual intelligence that the word of command struck home.

We should be prepared, then, to say that this class of miracles implied accommodation to the ideas of the time. But when we speak of 'accommodation' on the part of our Lord, we do not mean a merely politic assumption of a particular belief for a particular purpose. We mean that the assumption was part of the outfit of His incarnate Manhood. There was a certain circle of ideas which Jesus accepted in becoming Man in the same way in which He accepted a particular language with its grammar and vocabulary.

It would have been wholly out of keeping with the general character of His Ministry if Jesus had attacked this form of disease in any other way than through the belief in regard to it which at that time was universal. The scientific description of it has doubtless greatly changed. But it is still a question which is probably by no means so clear, whether, allowing for its temporary and local character, the language then used did not contain an important element of truth. The physical and moral spheres are perhaps more intimately connected than we suppose. And the unbridled wickedness rife in those days may have had physical effects, which were not unfitly described as the work of 'demons.' The subject is one which it is probable has not yet been fully explored.

* Not, of course, the first institution, but its confirmation as a rite and its first association with the triple formula.

(β) There is, as we have seen, one large class of diseases in regard to which the healing force exerted by the presence and the word of Jesus has a certain amount of analogy in the facts recognized by modern medicine. We must not, however, treat that analogy as going farther than it does. It does not hold good equally for all the forms of disease which are described as having been healed. Wherever the body is subject to the action of the mind, there we can give an account of the miracle which is to some extent—to a large extent—rational and intelligible. But in cases in which the miracle involves a purely physical process it will not be possible to explain it in the same way.

This other class of miracles will fall rather under the same head as those which were wrought, not upon man, but upon nature. In regard to these miracles, the world is probably not much nearer to a reasoned account than it was. It must always be remembered that the narratives which have come down to us are the work of those who expected that Divine action would (as we should say) run counter to natural laws and not be in harmony with them, and that the more Divine it was the more directly it would run counter to them. We may be sure that if the miracles of the first century had been wrought before trained spectators of the nineteenth, the version of them would be quite different. But to suppose this is to suppose what is impossible, because all God's dealings with men are adapted to the age to which they belong, and cannot be transferred to another age. If God intended to manifest Himself specially to the nineteenth century, we should expect Him to do so by other means. We are then compelled to take the accounts as they have come down to us. And we are aware beforehand that any attempt to translate them into our own habits of thought must be one of extreme difficulty, if not doomed to failure.

(ii.) Critical Expedients for eliminating Miracle.—In view of the difficulty of giving a rational (i.e. a nineteenth century) version of miracle, it is not surprising that recourse should be had to critical expedients for explaining away Miracle altogether; in other words, to account for the narratives of miracles without assuming that objective facts corresponding to them really occurred. The expedients most in favour are: (a) imitation of similar stories in OT; (β) exaggeration of natural occurrences; (γ) translation of what was originally parable into external fact. These are causes which have about them nothing violent or incredible, and we may believe that they were to some extent really at work. The question to what extent, will depend mainly upon the nature of the evidence for miracles and the length of time interposed between the evidence and the events. This will be the next subject to come before us. We may, however, anticipate so far as to say that whatever degree of verisimilitude belongs to the causes suggested in themselves, they do not appear to be adequate, either separately or in combination, to account for the whole or any large part of the narratives as we have them. And there is the further consideration, on which more will also be said presently, that something of the nature of miracle, something which was understood as miracle, and that on no insignificant scale, must be assumed to account for the estimate certainly formed by the whole first generation of Christians of the Person of Christ.

(iii.) The Evidence for the Gospel Miracles in general.—Coming to the question as to the evidence for the Miracles recorded in the Gospels, there are three main observations to be made: (a) that the evidence for all these miracles, generally speaking, is strong; (β) that the evidence for all the different classes of miracles is equally strong; (γ) that although for the best attested miracles in each class the evidence is equal, there is a difference between particular miracles in each class; some are better attested than others.

(a) It is unnecessary to repeat what has been already said (p. 604 sup.) about the general character of the Gospel History. The critical student must constantly have in mind the question to what state of things the different phases of that history as it has come down to us correspond. Does it reflect conditions as they existed after A.D. 70 or before? And if before, how far does it reflect the later half of that period, and how far the earlier? How far does it coincide with a section of Christian thought and Christian life (e.g.) taken at the height of the activity of St. Paul; and how far does it certainly point to an earlier stage than this? In other words, how much of the description contained in the Gospels belongs to the period of consequences, and how much to the period of causes?

Every attempt to treat of the life of our Lord should contribute its quota to the answer to these questions. And it is becoming more and more possible to do this, not merely in a spirit of superficial apologetics, but with a deep sense of responsibility to the truth of history. And the writer of this article strongly believes that the tendency of the researches of recent years has been to enhance and not to diminish the estimate of the historical value of the Gospels.

(β) This applies to the Gospel records as a whole, in which miracles are included. It is natural next to ask, What is the nature of the particular evidence for Miracles? How is it distributed? Does the distribution correspond to the distinction which we have drawn between the easier and the more difficult Miracles? If it did, we might suppose that the former class had better claims to credence than the latter.

But an examination of the documents shows that this is not the case. Without committing ourselves to all the niceties of the Synoptic problem, there are at any rate broad grounds for distinguishing between the matter that is found in all the three Synoptics, in the First and Third, and in one only of the Three. Whether the ultimate groundwork is written or oral, the threefold matter represents that groundwork, and is therefore, if not necessarily the oldest, at least the most broadly based and authoritative. There is reason to think that the double matter is also very ancient. It consists largely of discourse, but some few narratives seem to belong to it. The peculiar sections of the different Gospels vary considerably in their character, and it is natural to suppose that they would have the least antecedent presumption in their favour. Some confirmatory evidence would be needed for facts which rested upon their testimony alone.

Now, if it had happened that the Nature-Miracles had been confined to sections of this last kind, while the Miracles of Healing—and especially the Healing of Nervous Diseases—had entered largely into the Double and Triple Synopsis; or—inasmuch as discourse more often bears the stamp of unmistakable originality than narrative—if the miracles of one class had appeared only in the form of narrative, while the allusions in discourse were wholly to miracles of the other, then the inference would have lain near at hand that there was a graduated scale in the evidence corresponding to a like graduated scale in the antecedent probability of the miracle.

But this is not the case. Miracles of all the different kinds occur in all the documents or sources. The Triple Synopsis contains not only the healing of demoniacs and paralytics, but the healing of the issue of blood (Mk 5^{25}‖), the raising of Jairus' daughter (ib.^{38}‖), the stilling of the storm (ib. 4^{37}‖), the feeding of the five thousand (ib. 6^{35}‖). This last miracle is found not only in all three Synoptists, but also in Jn $6^{5ff.}$. And there is this further point about it, that if we regard the miracles generally as a gradual accretion of myth and not based upon fact, we should undoubtedly assume that the feeding of the four thousand (Mk 8^{1}, Mt 15^{32}) was a mere duplicate of it. But it is probable that this story also belonged to the fundamental source, in spite of its omission by Luke. In that case both the feedings of a multitude would have had a place in the oldest of all our authorities, and the first growth in the tradition would have to be pushed back a step farther still. We should thus have a nature-miracle not only embodied in our oldest source, but at its first appearance in that source already pointing back some way behind it.

(γ) It thus appears that the evidence, externally considered, is equally good for all classes of miracles. It is not, as we might expect, that the evidence for the easier miracles is better than that for the more difficult, leaving us free to accept the one and reject the others. We cannot do this, because the best testimony we have embraces alike those miracles which imply a greater deviation from the ordinary course of nature and those in which the deviation is less.

It does not, however, follow that within the different classes of miracles the evidence for particular miracles is equal. When Prof. Goldwin Smith insists that all the miracles recorded in the Gospels stand or fall together, he is going in the teeth, not so much of anything peculiar to the study of the Gospels, but of the historical method generally. And the examples which he gives are unfortunate. 'We cannot pick and choose. The evidence upon which the miraculous darkness and the apparition of the dead rest is the same as that upon which all the other miracles rest, and must be accepted or rejected in all the cases alike' (Guesses at the Riddle of Existence, p. 160). No critical student needs to be told that the evidence for the apparitions of the dead (Mt $27^{52f.}$) belongs just to that stratum which carries with it the least weight. The authority for the darkness is much higher, but its miraculous character need not be magnified. Any unusual darkening of the sky would naturally strike the imagination of the disciples; and it might be not contrary to nature and yet also not accidental.

(iv.) The Quality of the Evidence.—So far we have spoken of the external character of the evidence. It is speaking within the mark to say that a large part of the evidence for the Gospel miracles, including some of those that are most miraculous, is separated from the facts by an interval of not more than thirty years. We may be pretty sure that before that date, and even much before it, stories of miracles like those recorded in the Gospels circulated freely among Christians, and were a common subject of teaching by catechists and others. We now proceed to ask, What is the quality of the narratives in which these stories occur? What features are there in the stories themselves which throw light upon their historical value?

(a) We are met at the outset by the Temptation. If there is anything certain in history, it is that the story of the Temptation has a real foundation in fact, for the simple reason that without such a foundation it would have occurred to no one to invent it. It suits exactly and wonderfully the character of Jesus as we can now see it, but not as it was seen at the time. Men were trying to apprehend that character; they had a glimpse here and a glimpse there; but they cannot have had more than dim and vague surmises as to what it was as a whole. But whoever first told the story of the Temptation saw it as a whole. We have therefore already drawn the inference that it was first told by none other than Jesus Himself. And by that inference we stand. There is nothing in the Gospels that is more authentic.

But the story of the Temptation presupposes the possession of supernatural powers. It all turns on the question how those powers are to be exercised. It not only implies the possession of power to work such miracles as were actually worked, but others even more remarkable from the point of view of crude interference with the order of nature. The story of the Temptation implies that Jesus could have worked such miracles if He had willed to do so; and the reason why He did not work them was only because He did not will.

The keynote which is struck by the Temptation is sustained all through the sequel of the history. We can see that the Life of Jesus was what it was by an act of deliberate renunciation. When He says, as the end draws near, 'Thinkest thou that I cannot beseech my Father, and he shall even now send me more than twelve legions of angels?' (Mt 26^{53}), the lesson holds good, not for that moment alone, but for all that has preceded it. The Public Ministry of Jesus wears the aspect it does, not because of limitations imposed from without, but of limitations imposed from within.

Here lies the paradox of the Miracles of Christ. He seems at once to do them, and so to guard against a possible misuse that it is as if He had not done them. The common idea of miracles was as a manifestation of Divine power. Jesus gave the manifestation, and yet He seemed so to check it from producing its natural effect that it is as though it did not serve its purpose. It really serves His purpose, but not the purpose which the world both then and since has ascribed to Him.

(β) We have seen that the principles laid down at the Temptation governed the whole public life of Jesus. He steadily refused to work miracles for any purely self-regarding end. If the fact that He works miracles at all is a sympathetic adaptation to the beliefs and expectations of the time, those beliefs are schooled and criticized while they are adopted (Mt 12^{39}‖$16^{1f.}$, Jn 4^{48}), the element of mere display, the element of self-assertion, even of self-preservation, is eliminated from them. They are studiously restricted to the purposes of the mission.

Now this carefully restricted character in the miracles of Jesus is unique in history. Among all the multitude of wonders with which the faith, sometimes superstitious, but more often simply naïve, of the later Church adorned the lives of the saints, there is nothing quite like it. We may say with confidence that if the miracles of Jesus had been no more than an invention, they would not have been what they are. We can see in the evangelists a certain dim half-conscious feeling of the self-imposed limitations in the use of the supernatural by Christ. But we may be very sure that they have this feeling, because the limitations were inherent in the facts, not because they formed part from the first of a picture which they were constructing a priori.

(γ) There are three kinds of restriction in the miracles of our Lord. The limitation in the subject-matter of the miracles is one; the limitation in the conditions under which they are wrought is another (Mt 13^{58} ∥ $15^{24.26}$); and the limitation in the manner in which they are set before the world is a third. In a number of cases, after a miracle has been performed, the recipient is strictly cautioned to maintain silence about it (Mk 1^{34} ∥ demoniacs, 1^{44} ∥ leper, 3^{12} demoniacs, cf. Mt 12^{16}, Mk 7^{36} deaf and dumb, 8^{26} blind). This hangs together with the manifest intention of Jesus to correct not only the current idea of miracles, but the current idea of the Messiah as one endowed with supernatural power. If He was so endowed, it was not that He might gather about Him crowds and establish a carnal kingdom such as the Jews expected.

This, too, is a very original feature. It is certainly not one that the popular imagination would create, because the motive to create it was wanting. It is not to be supposed that the popular imagination would first correct itself and then embody the correction in a fictitious narrative. Here again we are driven to the conclusion that the narrative truly reflects the facts.

(δ) In yet another way do the accounts of the miracles work in with the total picture of the Life of Christ. They have a didactic value, which makes them round off the cycle of the teaching. This fact perhaps leaves some opening for the possibility that here and there what was originally parable may in course of transmission have hardened into miracle. An example of such a possibility would be the withering of the Fig-tree (Mk $11^{12-14.\ 20-25}$ ∥ compared with Lk 13^{6-9}). But, on the other hand, it is just as possible that parable and miracle may stand side by side as a double enforcement of the same lesson. The story of the Temptation is proof that Jesus would not hesitate to clothe His teaching in a form at once natural and impressive to that generation, though it is less so to ours. In this He only takes up a marked characteristic of the OT Prophets.

(v.) Historical Necessity of Miracles.—The truth is that the historian who tries to construct a reasoned picture of the Life of Christ finds that he cannot dispense with miracles. He is confronted with the fact that no sooner had the Life of Jesus ended in apparent failure and shame than the great body of Christians—not an individual here and there, but the mass of the Church—passed over at once to the fixed belief that He was God. By what conceivable process could the men of that day have arrived at such a conclusion, if there had been really nothing in His life to distinguish it from that of ordinary men? We have seen that He did not work the kind of miracles which they expected. The miracles in themselves in any case came short of their expectations. But this makes it all the more necessary that there must have been something about the Life, a broad and substantial element in it, which they could recognize as supernatural and divine—not that we can recognize, but which they could recognize with the ideas of the time. Eliminate miracles from the career of Jesus, and the belief of Christians, from the first moment that we have undoubted contemporary evidence of it (say A.D. 50), becomes an insoluble enigma.

(vi.) Natural Congruity of Miracles.—And now, if from the belief of the Early Church we turn to the belief of the Church in our day, there a different kind of congruity appears, but a congruity that is no less stringent. If we still believe that Christ was God, not merely on the testimony of the Early Church, but on the proof afforded by nineteen centuries of Christianity, there will be nothing to surprise us in the phenomena of miracles. 'If the Incarnation was a fact, and Jesus Christ was what He claimed to be, His miracles, so far from being improbable, will appear the most natural thing in the world. . . . They are so essentially a part of the character depicted in the Gospels, that without them that character would entirely disappear. They flow naturally from a Person who, despite His obvious humanity, impresses us throughout as being at home in two worlds. . . . We cannot separate the wonderful life, or the wonderful teaching, from the wonderful works. They involve and interpenetrate and presuppose each other, and form in their indissoluble combination one harmonious picture' (Illingworth, Divine Immanence, pp. 88–90).

If we seek to express the rationale or inner congruity of miracles in Biblical language, we shall find this abundantly done for us in the Gospel of St. John. Miracles arise from the intimate association of the Son with the Father in the ordering of the universe, especially in all that relates to the redemption of man. When challenged by the Jews for healing a sick man upon the Sabbath, Jesus replied, 'My Father worketh even until now (i.e. since, and in spite of the institution of the Sabbatical Rest), I am working also' (Jn 5^{17}); the same law holds for the actions of the Son as for the conservation of the universe. And He goes on, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, the Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father doing: for what things soever he doeth, these the Son also doeth in like manner. For the Father loveth the Son, and showeth him all things that himself doeth: and greater works than these will he show him, that ye may marvel' (ib. vv.$^{19.20}$). Many other passages at once suggest themselves to the same effect (Jn 3^{35} $8^{28f.}$ 14^{10}). The Son is 'sent' by the Father, and He is invested with full powers for the accomplishment of that mission; or rather with reference to it and for the purpose of it, He and the Father are one (Jn 10^{30}). The sayings of this character are all from the Fourth Gospel. But there is a near approach to them in the well-known passage Mt 11^{27} ∥ ('All things have been delivered unto me of my Father'); and this does but form a natural climax to others, which, without it, would seem to leave something wanting and incomplete.

(vii.) The Unexplained Element in Miracles.—When all the above considerations are borne in mind, some may still think that there is a residuum which is not wholly explained—not so much as to the fact of miracles, or as to their congruity with the Person of Jesus, but rather as to the method of particular miracles in the form in which they have come down to us. It is quite inevitable that there should be such a residuum, which is only another name for the irreducible interval which must, when all is done, separate the reflective science-trained intellect of the nineteenth century from the naïve chroniclers of the first. Jesus Himself would seem to have been not without a prescience that this would be the case. At any rate there is a permanent significance, unexhausted by the occasion which gave rise to it, in His reply to the disciples of the Baptist, while appealing to works which, however beneficent, would, He knew, fail to realize all the Baptist's expectations: 'Blessed is he that shall find no scandal—or stumbling-block—in me' (Mt 11^{6} ∥). There was doubtless something left in the mind of John which he could not perfectly piece together with the rest of such mental outfit as he had. And so we may be sure that it will be in every age, though age after age has only helped to strengthen the conviction that the modes of thought of the Zeitgeist may and do continually change, but that the worth for man of the Person of Jesus does not change but is eternal.

LITERATURE.—Probably the best work in English at the present moment on the presuppositions of the Gospel Miracles would be Illingworth's Divine Immanence (1898), a sequel to his Bampton Lectures (1894). It may be worth while to compare Gore, Bamp. Lect. (1891). On the other hand, Mozley's lectures on the same foundation for 1865 have reference rather to a phase of the controversy which is now past. There is, of course, much on the subject in the various treatises on Apologetics; and articles are constantly appearing in magazines, as well as shorter monographs, both British and Foreign. The present writer cannot say—or at least cannot remember—that he has gained as much from these several sources as in the case of the teaching of Jesus. He would like, however, to mention with gratitude, Grounds of Theistic and Christian Belief, by Dr. G. P. Fisher of Yale (New York, 1883; also pub. in London), a very clear and temperate statement of the evidence for the Gospel Miracles on older lines; the chap. on Miracles in Dr. A. B. Bruce, Chief End of Revelation (3rd ed. 1890); and three short lectures, entitled The Supernatural in Christianity (by Drs. Rainy, Orr, and Marcus Dods, in reply to Pfleiderer, Edinb. 1894).

The most considerable attempt in English to construct Christianity without Miracles is Dr. Edwin A. Abbott's The Kernel and the Husk (1886), and The Spirit on the Waters (1897). With this may be compared Dr. Salmon's Non-miraculous Christianity (and other Sermons).

There are well-known systematic works on the Gospel Miracles by the late Abp. Trench and Dr. A. B. Bruce.

C. MIDDLE OR CULMINATING PERIOD OF THE ACTIVE MINISTRY.

Scene.—Galilee, with an excursion across the northern border.

Time.—Passover to shortly before Tabernacles A.D. 28.

Mt 14^{1}–18^{35}, Mk 6^{14}–9^{50}, Lk $9^{7\text{-}50}$, Jn 6.

This is a period of culminations, in which the prophecy of Simeon begins to be conspicuously fulfilled: 'Behold, this child is set for the falling and rising up of many in Israel, and for a sign which is spoken against' (Lk 2^{34}). The main culminations are (i.) of the zeal of the populace, followed by their disappointment and falling away; (ii.) the still greater embitterment of the scribes and Pharisees; (iii.) the awakening at last of a more intelligent faith in the disciples, reaching its highest point in St. Peter's confession; (iv.) the Divine testimony to Jesus in the Transfiguration; (v.) the consciousness of victory virtually won in Jesus Himself (Mt $11^{25\text{-}30}$, Lk $10^{17\text{-}24}$); (vi.) at the same time He sees clearly, and begins to announce the seeming but transient catastrophe, the final humiliation and exaltation, in which His work is to end.

The time of this period is clearly marked by the occurrence of the Passover of the year A.D. 28 at its beginning, and the Feast of Tabernacles (in October of the same year) at the end. It is probable that within these six months all the salient events referred to below may be included. The place is, broadly speaking, Galilee, beginning with the shores of the lake (Jn 6); but in the course of the period there falls a wider circuit than any that had been hitherto taken. In this circuit Jesus touched on, and probably crossed, the borders of the heathen districts of Tyre and Sidon (Mk 7^{24} ||); He then turned eastwards through the neighbourhood of Cæsarea Philippi (Mk 8^{27} ||); and He finally returned to Capernaum, not directly, but after taking a round to the east of the lake and through Decapolis (Mk 7^{31}). The motive was probably not so much on this occasion extended preaching as to avoid the ferment excited among the population of Central Galilee. Observe Mk 7^{24} and the strict injunctions of secrecy in Mk 7^{36} 8^{30} || 9^{9} ||. If we may follow our authorities (Mk $7^{32\text{ff.}}$ $8^{1\text{ff.}\ 11\text{ff.}}$) there was a certain amount of active work at the end of the circuit; but Mt $11^{20\text{ff.}}$ appears to mark the practical close of the Galilæan ministry.

The greater part of this circuit lay within the dominions, not of Herod Antipas, where Jesus had hitherto mainly worked, but of his brother Philip. Now we know that the hostility to Him was shared by the Pharisees with the partisans of Herod (Mk 3^{6} and p. 616^{a} above; cf. also Mk 8^{15}). We have also, but probably at a still later date, threats, which if not actually made by Herod Antipas were at least plausibly attributed to him (Lk 13^{31}). In any case, it is likely enough that intrigues were on foot between the two allied parties of the Pharisees and Herodians; and some writers, of whom Keim may be taken as an example, have attributed to these what they describe as a 'flight' on the part of Jesus. They may have had something to do with His retirement.

This division of our Lord's Life includes several narratives (the Feedings of the Five and Four Thousand, the Walking on the Water, the Transfiguration) which sound especially strange to modern ears. We must repeat the warning, that if a nineteenth cent. observer had been present he would have given a different account of the occurrences from that which has come down to us. But the mission of Jesus was to the first cent. and not to the nineteenth. His miracles as well as His teaching were adapted to the mental habits of those to whom they were addressed. It is wasted ingenuity to try, by rationalizing the narratives, to translate them into a language more like our own. Essential features in them are sure to escape in the process. It should be enough to notice that the narratives in question all rest on the very best historical authority. They belong to the oldest stratum of the evangelical tradition. And more than this: if we suppose, as it is not unreasonable to suppose, that the Feedings of the Five and of the Four Thousand are different versions of the same event, this would throw us back some way behind even that oldest stratum; because we should have to allow an additional period of time for the two versions to arise out of their common original (see p. 626 sup.). This would carry us back to a time when numbers must have been living by whom the truth of that which is reported might be controlled. In the case of the Feeding of the Five Thousand, we have the confirmatory evidence of the Fourth Gospel, which for those who believe the author to have been an eye-witness must be little less than decisive.

i. The Enthusiasm and Falling-away of the Populace.—It was just before the Passover of the year 28 that the impression which Jesus had made on the people of Galilee seemed to reach its climax. This was the result of what is commonly known to us as the Feeding of the Five Thousand. The fact that the Passover was so near at hand accounts for a special gathering of pilgrims, or those preparing for the journey, from the Galilæan towns. In such a mixed multitude there would doubtless be many Zealots and enthusiastic expectants of the 'deliverance of Israel.' The miracle convinces these that they have at last found the leader of whom they are in search. They are aware that hitherto He had shown no signs of encouraging the active measures which they desired: and therefore they hasten to seize the person of Jesus in order to compel Him to put Himself at their head, with or against His will. He, however, retires from them; and their disappointment is complete when on the next day the more determined among them, after following Him at no little trouble into the synagogue at Capernaum, find themselves put off with what they would regard as a mystical and unintelligible discourse. This is a turning-point in what had been for some time a gathering movement on the part of many who were willing to see in Jesus a Messiah such as they expected, but who were baffled and drew back when they found the ideal presented to them so different from their own. And the crisis once past, every possible precaution was taken to ensure that it should not recur (Mk $7^{24.36}$ 8^{30} ‖ 9^{9} ‖, as above).

Are the two Feedings of Mk 6^{30-46} ‖ and Mk 8^{1-9} ‖ to be regarded as two events or one? Besides the general resemblance between the two narratives, a weighty argument in favour of the latter hypothesis is, that in the second narrative the disciples' question appears to imply that the emergency was something new. They could hardly have put this question as they did if a similar event had happened only a few weeks before. The different numbers are just what would be found in two independent traditions. The decision will, however, depend here (as in the instances noted above) on the degree of strictness with which we interpret the narrative generally.

The discourse in the synagogue at Capernaum, Jn 6^{26-51}, works up to one of those profound truths which fixed themselves especially in the memory of the author of the Fourth Gospel. It is not a direct reference to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, but it is a preparatory statement of the deep principle of which that Sacrament is the expression. We shall have more to say on this head below (see p. 637).

ii. Widening Breach with the Pharisees.—More than one incident occurs in this period which points to the increasing tension of the relations between Jesus and the Pharisees (Mk $8^{11.15}$). But the decisive passage is Mk 7^{1-13} ‖, the severity of which anticipates the denunciations of the last Passover. In this Jesus cuts away root and branch of the Pharisaic traditions and exposes their essential immorality. From this time onwards the antagonism is open and declared.

iii. The Climax of Faith among the Twelve; St. Peter's Confession.—We have seen how the enthusiasm of the multitudes reached its climax after the Feeding of the Five Thousand, but did not recover from the rebuff which it then received, and from that time more or less collapsed, until it flamed up for a moment at the triumphal entry. The Twelve were in a better position to enter into the mind of their Master, and it was but natural that they should be more steadfastly attached to His person. Hence their faith survived the shocks which it was continually receiving, and St. Peter gave the highest expression which it had yet received, when, in reply to a direct question, he exclaimed, 'Thou art the Christ [the Son of the Living God]' (Mt 16^{13-20} ‖). Jesus marked His sense of the significance of the confession by words of warm commendation. He attributes it, indeed, to a direct inspiration from Heaven. The value of the confession stands out all the more clearly when it is compared with the doubts of the Baptist (see above, p. 615). We are not to suppose that St. Peter had by any means as yet a full conception of all that was implied in his own words. He still did not understand what manner of Messiah he was confessing; but his merit was, that in spite of the rude shocks which his faith had been receiving, and in spite of all that was paradoxical and enigmatical in the teaching and actions of his Master, he saw through his perplexities the gleams of a nature which transcended his experience, and he was willing to take upon trust what he could not comprehend.

It would be out of place to attempt here to discuss the conflicting interpretations of the blessing pronounced upon St. Peter. We can only say that although it is not adequate to explain the blessing as pronounced upon the confession and not upon St. Peter himself, it is nevertheless distinctly pronounced upon St. Peter as confessing. It is in the fact that there is at last one who, in the face of all difficulties, recognizes from his heart that Jesus is what He is, that the first stone, as it were, of the Church is laid: other stones will be built upon and around it, and the edifice will rise day by day, but the beginning occurs but once, and the beginning of the Christian Church occurred then. It is not to detract from the merit of St. Peter—which so far as the building up of the Church is concerned was as high as human merit could be—if we interpret the blessing upon him in the light of 1 Co 3^{11}. The Church has but one foundation, in the strict sense, Jesus Christ. It was precisely to this that St. Peter's confession pointed. But that confession was the first of all like confessions; and in that respect might well be described as the first block of stone built into the edifice.

iv. The Culminating Point in the Missionary Labours of Jesus.—God seeth not as man seeth. To the average observer, even to one who was acquainted with St. Peter's confession, it would seem to be the solitary point of light in the midst of disappointment and failure. A retrospect of the Galilæan ministry seemed to show little but hard-heartedness, ingratitude, and unbelief (Jn 12^{37-40}). Our Lord Himself can only denounce woe upon the cities which enjoyed most of His presence (Mt 11^{20-24}‖). And yet about the same time two sayings are recorded which mark a deep inward consciousness of success. The ministry which might seem to be in vain was not really in vain, but potential and in promise; to the eye which saw into the future as well as into the present, and which looked into the inmost counsels of the Father, the crisis might even be regarded as past. One of these sayings is Lk 10^{18}. The success of the disciples in casting out demons draws from Jesus the remark that the power of the prince of darkness is broken. And about the same time, as if ingratitude and opposition counted for nothing, He pours out His thanks to the Father: 'I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou didst hide these things from the wise and understanding, and didst reveal them unto babes: yea, Father, for so it was well-pleasing in thy sight' (Mt $11^{25f.}$‖). The next verse in both Gospels contains the clearest expression in the Synoptics of that sense of oneness with the Father which is brought out so pointedly in Jn. And the verses which follow in Mt are that wonderful invitation: 'Come unto me,' etc. He who understands this group of sayings has found his way to the heart of Christianity.

v. The Transfiguration.—To the confession of the apostle and to the words of thanksgiving, which are also words of serene contentment and inward assurance, there was not wanting an outward Divine sanction. This was given in the scene which is known to us as the Transfiguration (Mk 9^{2-8}‖). The narrative of the Transfiguration reminds us, in more ways than one, of those of the Baptism and Temptation. Once again the apostles hear words which seem to come from Heaven confirming the mission of their Master. At the same time they see a vision which brings out the significance of that mission in a way for which as yet they can hardly have been prepared. The appearance of Moses and Elijah by the side of, and as it were ministering to, Jesus, symbolized the Law and the Prophets as leading up to and receiving their fulfilment in the Gospel.

It is impossible not to see the appropriateness of this Divine testimony to the mission of Jesus occurring just where it does. That unique relationship of the Son to the Father, which forms the constant background of the narrative of the Fourth Gospel, and is not less the background—real, if not so apparent—of the Synoptics, could not but assert itself from time to time. And what time could be fitter for a clear pronouncement of it than this, when outward circumstances were for the most part so discouraging, and when the prospect was becoming every day nearer and more certain of the fatal and terrible end? If the Son must needs go down into the valley of the shadow of death, the Father's face will shine upon Him for a moment before He enters it with a brightness which will not be obscured.

As bearing upon the essentially historical character of the narrative, however difficult and even impossible it may be for us to reconstruct its details in such a way that we could be said to understand them, note (1) the significance of the appearance of Moses and Elijah at a time when that significance can have been but very imperfectly apprehended by the disciples, and when there was absolutely nothing to suggest such an idea to them; and (2) the Transfiguration comes within the cycle of events in regard to which a strict silence was to be observed. This striking and peculiar stamp of genuineness was not wanting to it. We may note also (3) the random speech of St. Peter (Mk 9^{5}‖) as a little graphic and authentic touch which had not been forgotten.

It might be supposed that the enlargements in Lk $9^{31f.}$ were merely editorial, but, like not a few added details in this Gospel, they become more impressive upon reflexion. The other evangelists throw no light upon the subject of the converse between the glorified figures; Luke alone says that they 'spake of his decease which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem.' This was, we may be sure, the subject which deeply occupied the mind of Jesus at this time; and it is hardly less certain that the particular aspect of it which would be most present to Him would be its relation to the prophetic Scriptures of OT (and the Law also had its prophetic side). We might expect an appearance of Isaiah rather than Elijah; but Elijah was the typical prophet, and the Jews expected his appearing (cf. Wetstein on Mt 17^{3}). The other peculiar detail in Lk, that 'Peter and they that were with him were heavy with sleep,' may well seem confirmatory of the view (e.g.) of Weiss and Beyschlag, that the scene was presented to the three apostles in divinely caused vision.

vi. The Prophecies of Death and Resurrection.—The period we are describing is a kind of watershed, which marks not only the summit of the ascent but the beginning of the descent. We have seen how this was the case with the enthusiasm of the multitude: it was also the case with Christ Himself. The confession of St. Peter was immediately followed, and the Transfiguration both preceded and followed, by distinct prophecies of the fatal end which was to close His ministry—an end fatal in the eyes of men, but soon to be cancelled by His resurrection. As these prophecies will meet us again in the next period, to which they give its dominant character, we will reserve the discussion of them till then.

D. CLOSE OF THE ACTIVE PERIOD: THE MESSIANIC CRISIS IN VIEW.

Scene.—Judæa (Jn $7^{10ff.}$ 11^{54}) and Peræa (Mk 10^{1} ||, Jn 10^{40}).

Time.—Tabernacles A.D. 28 to Passover A.D. 29.

Mt 19^{1}–20^{34}, Mk 10, Lk 9^{51}–19^{28} (for the most part not in chronological order), Jn 7^{1}–11^{57}.

In this period we may note more particularly (i.) the peculiar section of St. Luke's Gospel which might on a superficial view seem to be placed in this period; (ii.) that portion of the Johannean narrative which really belongs to it; (iii.) the general character of our Lord's Teaching at this time; (iv.) in particular, the prophecies of Death and Resurrection; and (v.) the hints which are given of a special significance attaching to these events.

The time of this period extends from the Feast of Tabernacles in A.D. 28 to the Passover of A.D. 29. There is more difficulty in mapping out the distribution of its parts topographically. We have some clear landmarks if we follow the guidance of the Fourth Gospel. The events of the section Jn 7^{1}–10^{21} partly belong to the Feast of Tabernacles and in part follow at no great interval after it. We have again in Jn 10^{22} a clear indication of time and place, the Feast of Dedication at Jerusalem. This would be towards the end of December. After that, Jesus withdrew beyond Jordan to the place where 'John was at the first baptizing' (Jn 10^{40}). Here He made a lengthened stay, and it was from hence that He paid His visit to Bethany for the raising of Lazarus. Then He again retired to a city called Ephraim on the edge of the wilderness north-east of Jerusalem, where He remained until the Jews began to gather together to attend the Passover (Jn 11^{55}). We have thus a fairly connected narrative extending from the beginning of the year to the Passover of A.D. 29, the scene of which is in part Judæa and in part Peræa. We have also a fixed point covering, perhaps, about a fortnight in the latter half of October and localized at Jerusalem. But what of the seven or eight weeks which separate this from the Feast of Dedication? Is it probable that Jesus returned to Galilee and continued His ministry there? It does not seem so. The solemn and deliberate leave-taking from Galilee is not likely to have been so broken. The principal objection to this view would be that the secret and unexpected visit to Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles does not seem consistent with the solemnity of this leave-taking. We may, however, suppose that the Galilæan ministry was practically complete before this date, and that strong expressions like those of Lk 9^{51}, if they are to be taken as they stand, refer to one of the later journeys.

i. The so-called Peræan Ministry.—There is a long section of St. Luke's Gospel, Lk 9^{51}–18^{34}, which has been often treated as a single whole and as containing the record of a special ministry, identified with the last journey towards Jerusalem, and having for its scene the lands beyond the Jordan. This is based upon the fact that the beginning of the section coincides with Mk 10^{1}, Mt 19^{1}, and that the end of it brings us to the approach to Jericho (Lk 18^{35}). It is true that some part of the time preceding the last Passover was spent in Peræa. We know this on the joint testimony of the other Synoptists and St. John (Mk 10^{1}, Mt 19^{1}, Jn 10^{40}). But to suppose that the whole section must be localized there is to misunderstand the structure and character of St. Luke's Gospel. It is far more probable that he has massed together a quantity of material derived from some special source to which he had access, and which could not be easily fitted into the framework supplied to him by St. Mark.

When we come to examine these materials in detail, it would seem probable that they belong to very different periods in our Lord's ministry. Some incidents, for instance, appear to assume those easier relations to the Pharisees which we have seen to be characteristic of the earlier period (Lk 11^{37} [but not vv.$^{42-54}$] $14^{1ff.}$). It would be natural also to refer to this or the middle period the three parables of ch. 15 (Weiss, Leben Jesu, i. 507). On the other hand, some of the incidents are practically dated by their coincidence with the other Gospels; while others, like the severer denunciations of the Pharisees and eschatological sections such as Lk 13^{22-30} 17^{20}–18^{8}, are referred to the later period by their subject-matter. It would be wrong to lay too much stress on mere symmetry; but when a natural sequence suggests itself, it may be accepted as having such probability as can be attained. The document which St. Luke is using in this part has preserved for us discourses of the utmost value, and it is largely to them that the Gospel owes its marked individuality.

ii. The Johannean Narrative of this Period.—The historical value of the Fourth Gospel comes out strongly in this period. Rarely has any situation been described with the extraordinary vividness and truth to nature of ch. 7 (see esp. vv.$^{11-15.\ 25-27.\ 31.\ 32.\ 40-52}$). Not less graphic are the details of ch. 9; and there is marked precision in the statements of Jn $10^{22f.\ 40f.}$ 11^{54-57}. We note a special intimacy with what passes in the inner counsels of the Sanhedrin (Jn 7^{47-52} 11^{47-53}). This intimate knowledge might have been derived through Nicodemus or through the connexion hinted at in Jn 18^{15}.[*] But, apart from the peculiar verisimilitude of these details, some such activity as that described in these chs. is required to explain the great catastrophe which followed. It is impossible that Jesus should have been so much a stranger to Judæa and Jerusalem as the Synoptic narrative would at first sight seem to make Him. For the steps which lead up to the end we must go to St. John.

iii. The general Character of the Teaching of this Period.—There are no doubt portions of the teaching of this period preserved in the Synoptics. But except those contained in Mk 10^{1-45} || they are difficult to identify with certainty. For the greater part of our knowledge of it we are indebted to St. John, and we may observe that the teaching now begins to take a new character. Hitherto it has been mainly concerned with the nature of the Kingdom; henceforward greater stress is laid on the person of the King. We have already noted the remarkable verse Mt 11^{27} || 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father: and no one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him.' This verse may be said to represent the text which the discourses in St. John set in various lights. We have now the self-revelation of the Son as the central life-giving and light-giving force of humanity. As He is the living Bread (Jn 6), so is He the living Water (Jn $7^{37f.}$); He is the Light of the world (Jn 8^{12} 9^{5}); He is the Good Shepherd (Jn 10^{11}), the Resurrection and the Life (Jn 11^{25}). If we suppose that these discourses were really held, we shall understand better than we could do otherwise the state of Christian thought which meets us when we open the first surviving Epistles of St. Paul.

[*] The theory of Delff has been mentioned above (p. 614 sup.); but it turns too much upon a single set of data, and leads to an arbitrary dissection of the Gospel.

iv. The Prophecies of Death and Resurrection.—From the time of St. Peter's confession Jesus began in set terms to foretell that His mission would end in His death, soon, however, to be followed by His resurrection (Mk 8^{31} ||). At the moment of His highest triumph, marked by the Transfiguration, the same solemn prediction is repeated (Mk 9^{31}), and again yet a third time towards the end of the period with which we are now dealing (Mk 10^{32-34} ||).

(a) Even an ordinary observer might have seen that the signs of the times were ominous. St. Peter's confession showed no more than one adherent whose fervid faith might be supposed capable of resisting a pressure of life or death. Herod Antipas and his faction were hostile. The Pharisees were yet more hostile, and their bitterness was growing every day. Within the period before us two deliberate attempts were made on the life of Jesus (Jn 8^{59} 10^{39}). And with the certainty that the course on which He was bent would include nothing to conciliate these antagonisms, it was clear where they would end.

(b) But the foresight of Jesus took a wider range than this. He had laid it down as a principle that it was the fate of prophets to be persecuted (Mt 5^{12} $23^{34.37}$). In particular, He had before Him the example of the Baptist, whose fate He associated with His own (Mk $9^{12f.}$ ||).

(c) But there was a deeper necessity even than this. At the Betrayal, to him who drew sword in His defence Jesus replied calmly, 'How then should the Scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be?' And this is His consistent language (comp. Lk $24^{25f.\ 44.46}$ etc.). The mind of Jesus was steeped in the ancient prophecies. He had Himself, as we have seen, deliberately fused the conception of the conquering Messiah with that of the Suffering Servant of Jehovah, and He as deliberately went the way to fulfil these prophecies in His own person. There was nothing accidental about His Death. He 'set his face steadfastly' on the road which led to it.

(d) When we look into its lessons we are carried even behind the fulfilment of prophecy. We shall have to speak presently of the extraordinary novelty of the turn which Christ gave to His mission. Others had conquered by the exercise of force; He was the first to set Himself to conquer by weakness, patience, non-resistance. And the natural and inevitable consummation of this new method of conquest was Death.

(e) In all this He was carrying out, and knew that He was carrying out, the Will of the Father. It was conceivable that that Will might have yet ulterior objects even beyond those, deep enough as we might think, which we have been considering. That Jesus ascribed to His Death such an ulterior object we are led to believe by the way in which He speaks of it. The two places in which He does so must next engage our attention.

v. Significance of the Death of Jesus.—The first of the passages to which allusion has just been made is Mk 10^{45} || 'For verily the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.' We observe here that Jesus brings His Death under the category of service, and regards it as the climax of a life of service. This is one way of stating the great paradox to which we have just alluded. The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over their subjects; but such was not to be the ambition of the disciples of Christ; rather the very opposite; and it was Christ Himself who set them the example. At the end of the avenue stood a cross, and the Saviour of men walked up to it as if it had been a crown. It is a question of pressing interest how much farther we may go than this: is the λύτρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν to be interpreted by the ἀπολύτρωσις and ἱλαστήριον of Ro $3^{24f.}$, and by the language of other similar passages? By itself we could not say that it compelled such an interpretation; but there is nothing forced in supposing that the early Church knew and followed the mind of its Founder. In that case we should have reason to think that Jesus Himself had hinted at the sacrificial character of His Death, and that He too regarded it as propitiatory.

If this passage suggests a sacrificial aspect of one kind, the other is more explicit in bringing out sacrificial associations of another. All the extant accounts of the institution of the Eucharist connect the Blood shed upon the Cross with the founding of a '[new] Covenant.' This is certainly an allusion to the inauguration of the first Covenant with sacrifice (cf. Ex 24^{4-8}, He 9^{18-23}), and the Death of Christ is clearly regarded as the Sacrifice inaugurating the second (see below, p. 638).

In other words, the momentous question came before the mind of Jesus whether the New Dispensation which He was founding was or was not like the Old in including the idea of Sacrifice. He deliberately answered that it was. And He deliberately foresaw, and as deliberately accepted the consequence, that the Sacrifice of this New Dispensation could be none other than the Sacrifice of Himself.

That which gives this particular Death a value which no other death could have had is (α) the fact that it is the Death of the Messiah, of One whose function it is to be the Saviour of His people, and whose Death like His Life must in some way enter into the purpose of the whole scheme of salvation; and (β) the further fact that although the Death is a necessity in the sense that it was required for the full development of God's gracious purpose, it was nevertheless a purely voluntary act on the part of the Son, an expression of that truly filial spirit in which He made the whole of the Father's purpose His own. 'The good Shepherd layeth down his life for the sheep. . . . Therefore doth the Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I may take it again. No one taketh it away from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment received I from my Father' (Jn $10^{11.\ 17f.}$). It follows (γ) that however much it may be right to conceive of the Death of Christ as a Sacrifice, and a sacrifice which has for its object the 'remission of sins' (Mt 26^{28}), we must not in connexion with it set the justice of God against His mercy, or think of Him as really turning away His face from the Son of His love.

LITERATURE.—The subject of these last two sections not only comes into the field of New Testament Theology in general and treatises (like Wendt's and others named above) on the Teaching of Christ, but it necessarily occupies a prominent place in discussions of the Doctrine of the Atonement. Among these may be mentioned especially Ritschl's Rechtfertigung u. Versöhnung, vol. ii. of which goes elaborately into the exegesis of the leading passages (ed. 2, 1882), and a recent treatise by Kähler, Zur Lehre von der Versöhnung (Leipzig, 1898), which gives prominence to the relation of the doctrine to the Life of Christ. A lengthy monograph by Schwartzkopff deals directly with our Lord's predictions of His Passion (Die Weissagungen Jesu Christi von seinem Tode, u.s.w., Göttingen, 1895); and 'Christ's Attitude to His Death' is the title of some striking articles by Dr. A. M. Fairbairn in Expos. 1896, ii., and 1897, i.

E. THE MESSIANIC CRISIS: THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY, THE LAST TEACHING, PASSION, DEATH, RESURRECTION, ASCENSION.

Scene.—Mainly in Jerusalem.

Time.—Six days before Passover to ten days before Pentecost A.D. 29.

Mt 21^{1}–28^{20}, Mk 11^{1}–16^{8} [vv.$^{9-20}$ an early addition], Lk 19^{29}–24^{52}, Jn 12^{1}–21^{23}.

This series of momentous events has naturally furnished much matter for discussion and controversy, some of it very recent. (i.) Our first duty will be to sketch rapidly the course of the events with special reference to the motives of the human actors in them. (ii.) We must consider the debated points in the chronology of the last week. (iii.) We shall have to discuss the eschatological teaching which the Synoptists place in this period. (iv.) A number of points, critical and doctrinal, will meet us in connexion with the Last Supper. (v.) We shall have in like manner to consider both the attestation and the significance of the crowning event of all, the Resurrection. This will include some discussion of the Appearances which followed. Lastly (vi.), as our subject is the Life of Christ and not the Gospels, we must, even though in so doing we cross the threshold of St. Luke's 'second treatise,' follow the steps of the Master to His Ascension.

i. The Action and the Actors. — Our four Gospels, taken together, in part convey and in part suggest a view at once clear and probable of the course of events which led to the Crucifixion, and of the motives which impelled the several actors in them. We have seen that the Fourth Gospel is needed to explain the heightened enmity which had so tragic an issue. A residence in Jerusalem and Bethany of four days would not be enough to account for the overtures to Judas. The events of the Feast of Tabernacles, the Feast of Dedication, and the Raising of Lazarus, with the knowledge that Jesus had been teaching and making disciples at no great distance from Jerusalem, supply what is wanted. And in the case of the Last Week the touches which the Fourth Gospel adds to its predecessors supplement them effectively.

(a) The Populace.—In the Triumphal Entry we seem to see a gleam once more of the enthusiasm which had followed the Feeding of the Five Thousand. It was probably quite as superficial. We may imagine the crowd made up in part of those who had been impressed by recent teaching beyond the Jordan or in Jerusalem itself, or by the news of the still more striking miracle wrought upon Lazarus: besides these, there would doubtless be a contingent of pilgrims from more distant Galilee, the remnant of the crowds who had at one time or another followed Jesus there. But it would be too much to expect that all, or even many of these, had acquired an intelligent insight into the character of Him whom they were cheering. They were still in the twilight of their old Jewish expectations. They supposed that the moment had at last come when the hopes which they cherished would be realized, and when before the crowds assembled for the Passover Jesus would at last put Himself forward as the Leader for whom they were waiting. Nothing, however, came of this seeming appeal to their enthusiasm. A few discourses in the temple, partly levelled against the religious authorities they were most accustomed to reverence, but containing not a word of incitement against the Romans, and that was all. What wonder if their enthusiasm died away, and if in some of the fiercer among them it changed to bitter and angry disappointment! Doubtless some of these Zealots mingled with those who cried 'Crucify him, crucify him'; it was natural that they should prefer one of their own trade, like Barabbas; but the crowds in Jerusalem at Passover time were so great that many of these fanatics may have had no personal acquaintance with Jesus at all. The choice between Jesus and Barabbas would seem to them a choice between a mock leader, a dreamer of dreams, who offered them nothing but words, and a true son of the people who had shown himself ready to grip the sword in the good cause.

(b) The Traitor. — It is possible that Judas Iscariot may have shared something of these feelings. In the lists of the apostles he is usually named next to a Zealot. The long course of training which he had undergone may have failed to purge his mind of the carnal expectations of his countrymen. It may have been a sudden access of disappointment, greater than ever before, because the hopes by which it had been preceded had been greater, which impelled him to seek his interview with the members of the Sanhedrin. It has even been suggested that he did what he did in order to compel his Master to declare Himself, and with the belief that He would at last exert for the deliverance of the nation the supernatural powers with which He was endowed. For this we have no sufficient warrant; and we are told expressly (Jn 12^{6} RV text and most Comms.) that Judas was guilty of petty pilfering from the common fund, and therefore may infer that he was accessible to the temptations of avarice. Still, few men act from motives that they cannot at least make plausible to themselves: so that a mixture of obstinate and misguided patriotism is more probable than pure malignity. If Judas had not been at least capable of better things, it is not likely that he would have been chosen to be one of the Twelve.

(c) The Pharisees.—By this time between Jesus and the Pharisees there is open war. Insidious questions are still put to Him, but only in order to 'ensnare him in his talk' (Mt 22^{15} ||). And on His side Jesus replied to their treachery by the sternest denunciations. It need not be supposed that all 'scribes and Pharisees' were equally the object of these. We know that Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathæa were members of the Sanhedrin; we do not know that they belonged to the party of the Pharisees, but we cannot doubt that there were some Pharisees like-minded with them; just as we learn from the Acts that after the Resurrection a number of the 'priests' (Ac 6^{7}) and at least some Pharisees (ib. 15^{5}) became Christians.

(d) The Sadducees.—With the last week of our Lord's life, or rather, if we may trust St. John, as far back as the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn 7^{45}), a new party comes into prominence. The Sanhedrin begins to take official action against Jesus; and, although the Pharisees had some footing in that body, its policy was more determined by the Sadducees, to whom belonged most of the 'chief priests,' and in particular Caiaphas, the acting high priest, and his yet more influential father-in-law and predecessor Annas. As against Jesus the two parties of Pharisees and Sadducees acted together, but their motives were different. The Pharisees were jealous for their authority and traditions, which were openly assailed. The Sadducees themselves rejected these traditions,—they were selfish politicians, who played their own game. Their motto was quieta non movere. They dreaded any kind of disturbance which might give the Romans an excuse to take the power out of their hands (cf. Jn 11^{48}). It is curious to note how from this time onwards the bitterest opposition comes from the Sadducees, while leading Pharisees are neutral or even favourable (Ac 5^{34-39} 23^{9}).

(e) Pilate.—The position of things is this. The Jews (i.e. primarily the Sanhedrin) were bent upon bringing about the death of Jesus. Now they themselves had not the power of life and death (Jn 18^{31}). According to the Talmud, they lost it forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, which would be about this very time. It is probable, however, that they did not long continue to possess it after the annexation of Judæa by the Romans. This being the case, they could only act through the instrumentality of the Roman governor. This necessitated the putting forward of different reasons from those that really weighed with themselves. Rather we should say that there were really three sets of reasons: (i.) The real motive of the Sanhedrin was jealousy of its own authority,—on the part of the Sadducees fear of disturbance, on the part of the Pharisees resentment of the attacks upon themselves and their traditions, and with some of the most patriotic among them perhaps disgust at a Messiah who was not a Messiah in any sense which they could comprehend. (ii.) The ostensible reason, which with some may have been sincere enough, was the charge of blasphemy against God. This charge they tried to bring home, but for a time could not (Mk 14^{59} ||), until at last they caught at the confession of Jesus Himself. On the strength of this He was condemned (Mk 14^{62-64}). (iii.) This charge, however, was not one which they could bring before the governor, and therefore they changed their ground. St. Luke, who in all these scenes draws upon special and good information, states the accusation with more precision than the other Synoptists. 'We found this man perverting our nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, and saying that he himself is Christ a king' (or 'an anointed king,' RVm ; Lk 23^{2}).

With this charge it is that the leaders of the Sanhedrin come before Pilate. Pilate has the rough Roman sense of justice, and he feels that the charge is not proved. He sees no evidence that Jesus is really a formidable conspirator, or even a conspirator at all against the State. He therefore desires to release Him; but the Jews insist, the leaders being backed by the clamour of the crowd. The Sanhedrists know the weak point in Pilate's armour, and they fasten upon it: 'If thou release this man, thou art not Cæsar's friend: every one that maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar' (Jn 19^{12}, a most lifelike touch). For themselves they protest their loyalty, 'We have no king but Cæsar' (Jn 19^{15}). For many of the Sanhedrin, Pharisees as well as Sadducees, this would be true, and those for whom it was not would discreetly hold their peace. To this pressure Pilate in the end gives way, washing his hands of the responsibility. He might have taken a nobler course, but he felt insecure of his position; he knew that the Jews had matter of just complaint against him; and sooner than face their malice, with the inconveniences which it might cause, he let them have their will.

LITERATURE.—With this section may be compared two works of imagination: Dr. Edwin A. Abbott, Philochristus, London, 1878; and As Others Saw Him, London, 1895 (written from a Jewish point of view, but sympathetic and instructive). Also Chwolson, Das letzte Passamahl Christi, etc., St. Petersburg, 1892, Anhang: 'Das Verhältniss d. Pharisäer, Sadducäer u. der Juden überhaupt zu Jesus Christus' (minimizing the opposition of the Pharisees, and laying the blame upon the Sadducees [Jewish, but written with much special knowledge]).

ii. The Chronology of the Last Week.—A number of chronological difficulties meet us in the narrative of this Last Week. (1) The prima facie view would certainly be that the Anointing at Bethany was placed by Mark two days (Mk 14^{1}) and by John six days (Jn 12^{1}) before the Passover. (2) The common opinion is that the Crucifixion took place on a Friday, and the Last Supper on the evening of Thursday; but it has also been argued that the two events took place on Thursday and Wednesday. (3) There is a much larger division of opinion as to the date of the Crucifixion in the Jewish calendar, and the relation of the Last Supper to the Paschal Meal. The Synoptists seem to identify the two, whereas St. John expressly places the Last Supper before the Passover, and would make the Crucifixion fall on Nisan 14. (4) The authorities also appear to differ as to the time of day occupied by the Crucifixion. According to Mk 15^{25} the time of the Crucifixion itself was the 'third hour' (=9 a.m.); according to Jn 19^{14} the trial was not quite over by the 'sixth hour' (=noon), and therefore the Crucifixion was still later.

Of these discrepancies No. 2 need not detain us. The view that the Crucifixion took place upon a Thursday is almost peculiar to Dr. Westcott (Introd. to the Study of the Gospels, p. 322, ed. 3). It turns upon a pressing of the phrase 'three days and three nights' in Mt 12^{40}, along with the probability of confusion between 'preparation for the Passover' and the more ordinary use of the word in the sense of 'preparation for the Sabbath' (i.e. Friday). The phrasing of Mt 27^{62} is somewhat peculiar, but not really less so on this way of reckoning than the other, because the day described as the 'morrow after the Preparation' would be itself the weekly παρασκευή. And Mt 12^{40} is due only to the evangelist, and is not supported by the other authorities. [On the length of the interval between the Crucifixion and the Resurrection see esp. art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT in this Dict. i. 410^{b} (with Field, Ot. Norv. iii. p. 7, there referred to), and Wright, NT Problems, p. 159 ff.].

No. 1 is commonly removed by treating the note of time in Mk 14^{1} || as referring to the events of vv.$^{1.\,2.\,10.\,11}$ and not to the intervening narrative of vv.$^{3-9}$. In support of this, Meyer-Weiss (ed. 8, ad loc.) points to analogous cases of intrusive matter in Mk 3^{22-30} 4^{10-25} 6^{14-29} 7^{25-30}. On the other hand, M'Clellan (Gospels, p. 472 f.) restricts the application of Jn 12^{1} to the arrival at Bethany, which, according to him, was on the afternoon of Friday, Nisan 8. The Anointing he would place on the evening of Tuesday, Nisan 12. Either view is possible, and neither can be verified. If we think that the fourth evangelist deliberately corrects his predecessors, we shall probably give the preference to him. On such a point Mark is not a first-hand authority, and the connexion between his placing of the Betrayal and of the Anointing may well be loose.

As to (4) the difference in regard to the hour of the Crucifixion, attempts have been made with some persistence to prove that St. John used a different mode of reckoning time from that in common use. The writer of this was at one time inclined to look with favour on these attempts. If the premiss could be proved, the data would work out satisfactorily. But, in view of the arts. by Mr. J. A. Cross in Class. Rev. 1891, p. 245 ff., and by Prof. Ramsay in Expositor, 1893, i. 216 ff., it must definitely be said that the major premiss cannot be proved, and that the attempt to reconcile the two statements on this basis breaks down (cf. also Wright, Problems, p. 149 ff.).

The ancient solution of the difficulty was to suppose a corruption (F for Γ, or vice versâ) of the text, more often in Jn than in Mk; and rightly, because in Mk there are three several notes of time (Mk 15^{1} ∥ $^{25.33}$ ∥) which hang together. So Eus. ad Marinum, with a group of MSS scholia (vid. Tisch. on Jn 19^{14}), etc. This solution is accepted by Mr. Wright (op. cit. p. 156 ff.), and it may conceivably hold good.

Prof. Ramsay lays stress rather on the rough and approximate way in which the ancients used the reckoning by hours. It must be remembered that an 'hour' with them was a twelfth part of daylight, and not a fixed space of 60 measured minutes, as with us. If the two statements had been inverted—if Mk 15^{25} had described the end of the trial and Jn 19^{14} the raising of the cross—this elasticity might have amply covered both. As the two passages stand, it hardly does so.

We may ask ourselves whether, supposing that the slaughter of the Paschal lambs began at 3 p.m. (the time of slaughter is given as 3–5 p.m. by Jos. BJ vi. ix. 3), there would not be a rather strong temptation on typological grounds to fix the moment of the death of the Messiah at that hour. The other notes of time would naturally be conformed to this. But, on the other hand, St. John's 'sixth hour' seems inconveniently late for the events which have to be compressed between it and the evening. The whole question must be left open. There is a choice of possibilities, but nothing more.

Can we get beyond a similar choice on the last and most important point (3), the discrepancy as to the day of the month of the Crucifixion and of the Last Supper? Perhaps not.

It is the Last Supper which the Synoptists appear to fix by identifying it with the Passover. They say expressly that on the morning of the 'first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the Passover' (Mk 14^{12} ∥), the disciples asked where the Passover was to be eaten. This would be on the morning of Nisan 14. In the evening, which from twilight onwards would belong to Nisan 15, would follow the Last Supper, and on the next afternoon (still, on the Jewish reckoning, Nisan 15) the Crucifixion. St. John, on the other hand, by a number of clear indications (Jn 13^{1} 18^{28} $19^{14.31}$) implies that the Last Supper was eaten before the time of the regular Passover, and that the Lord suffered on the afternoon of Nisan 14, about the time of the slaying of the Paschal lambs.

We are thus left with a conflict of testimony; and the question is, on which side the evidence is strongest. Now, if we are to believe a very competent Jewish archæologist, Dr. Chwolson, the Synoptists begin with an error. 'From the Mosaic writings down to the Book of Jubilees (cap. 49), Philo, Josephus, the Palestinian Targum ascribed to Jonathan ben Uziel, the Mishnah, the Talmud, the Rabbinical writings of the Middle Ages, indeed down to the present day, the Jews have always understood by the phrase יום ראשון לְחַג הַמַּצּוֹת "the first day of the feast of unleavened bread," only the 15th, and not the 14th' (Das letzte Passamahl Christi u. der Tag seines Todes, p. 3 f.); so that it would be a contradiction in terms to say with Mk 14^{12} ∥ 'on the first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the Passover.' It is, however, only right to add that Chwolson's assertion is denied by another very good authority, Dr. Schürer, ThL, 1893, col. 182. [Schürer does not directly meet the statement that where the feast of Unleavened Bread is represented as extending over eight days, the days intended are Nisan 15–22, not 14–21.*].

Waiving this point, however, for the present, we observe (after Chwolson, but cf. Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, 1872, p. 206 f. etc.) that the Synoptists make the Sanhedrin say beforehand that they will not arrest Jesus 'on the feast day,' and then actually arrest Him on that day; that not only the guards, but one of the disciples (Mk 14^{47} ∥) carries arms, which on the feast day was not allowed; that the trial was also held on the feast day, which would be unlawful (on these points see Chwolson, op. cit. p. 6 ff.); that the feast day would not be called simply 'Preparation'; that the phrase 'coming from the field' (Mk 15^{21} ∥) means properly 'coming from work'; that Joseph of Arimathæa is represented as buying a linen cloth (Mk 15^{46}), and the women as preparing spices and ointments (Lk 23^{56}), all of which would be contrary to law and custom.

It follows that the Synoptists are really inconsistent with themselves, and bear unwilling witness to the chronology of St. John. We may be still reluctant to think that the contradiction is final. The Synoptists, so far as they identify the Last Supper with the Passover, look as if they were telling the truth. It is possible that there may be some way of reconciling the two accounts, which we do not know enough of the circumstances to specify.

One hypothesis, which the writer was at one time tempted to entertain,—very tentatively,—that the 'Passover' which lay before the disciples and the Sanhedrin was not the Passover proper, but the eating of the Chăgîgāh (so Edersheim, M'Clellan, Nösgen), he now believes to be untenable (see Expos. 1892, i. 17 ff., 182 f., and Wright, Problems, p. 173 ff.). It is more likely that, for some reason or other, the regular Passover was anticipated.

Dr. Chwolson, writing as a Jew, whose interest in the question is purely archæological, would account for such anticipation by the fact that in the year of the Passion, Nisan 15 (not 14) fell upon a Sabbath. But it must be confessed that his argument seems strained (cf. also Schürer in ThL, ut sup.).

Mr. Wright thinks that the Synoptists have combined the narrative of the Last Supper with that of some previous Paschal meal partaken of by our Lord (Problems, p. 179 ff.). But even if this hypothesis held good, it would hardly meet the case; because it is just the details of the Last Supper, belonging to it qua Last Supper (e.g. the 'cup of blessing'), which remind us of the Passover. And, in any case, the hypothesis deserts the documents too far to be at all capable of proof.

As the question at present stands we can only acknowledge our ignorance. [The literature will have been sufficiently given in the course of this section; cf. esp. Mr. A. Wright's Some New Testament Problems, London, 1898, p. 147 ff.].

iii. The Prophetic Teaching of the Last Week.—This, too, has raised difficulties which are not only apparent but real. It is important to bear in mind that no less than six distinct kinds of prediction are ascribed to our Lord during this week or in the period preceding. There is (1) the prediction of His own death and resurrection. There is (2) the prediction of the siege and destruction of Jerusalem. With this in the great passage (Mk 13 ∥) is directly connected (3) the prediction of the end of the world and the last judgment. (4) The discourses in Jn clearly predict the coming of the Paraclete as the substitute for Christ Himself. (5) In another leading passage (Mk 9^{1}) a phrase is used which may be explained, though it is not usually explained, of the remarkable spread of the Christian Church from the Day of Pentecost onwards. Lastly (6), there is the explanation which is frequently given of the 'Coming of the Son of Man' as a so-called 'historical coming,' a coming not exhausted by a single occasion, but repeated in the great events of history.

* It is worth noting that the Gospel of Peter agrees with the Johannean rather than the Synoptic tradition, placing the Crucifixion not on, but before, the first day of unleavened bread (πρὸ μιᾶς τῶν ἀζύμων, Ev. Pet. 3).

The first three of these classes of predictions are, in any case, authentic and certain. To the believer in the genuineness of the Fourth Gospel the prophecy of the Paraclete is equally certain, and there is much which goes to confirm it in the Acts and Epp. independently of its direct attestation. The other two forms of prediction are more hypothetical. They have been introduced more or less in order to meet the difficulties, although they may have substantial grounds of their own. We will not as yet beg the question either way.

The great difficulty is that as our documents stand the second and third predictions are intimately connected with each other, and in at least one other passage it would seem as if it were expressly stated that the coming of the Son of Man (i.e. the final Coming, the Coming to Judgment) would take place within the lifetime of that generation. We know that it has not so taken place, and the great question is what we are to say to this. Is it an error in One who has never been convicted of error in anything else? We must not endeavour to explain away facts; but we may interrogate them, and interrogate them somewhat strictly, to see whether they are facts or no.

We cannot disguise from ourselves, that, whatever the precise language used by our Lord, the disciples would be exceedingly prone to attribute to Him the prediction of His own return as near at hand. The connexion of the Messiah with a world-wide judgment was no new doctrine, but was a common feature in the Jewish apocalypses. But this return would seem to them, as applied to our Lord, the necessary complement of the life of humiliation which He had led upon earth. For it was reserved the full triumph over His enemies which so far must have seemed very imperfect. Resurrection and Ascension would seem to be only foretastes of the great coming in glory on the clouds of heaven. They were steps, but only steps, towards the goal.

We might have been sure, even if we had not been told, that the disciples would naturally fix their thoughts on this Second Coming, and that it would be a natural inference for them to suppose that it was near at hand. Instances like the comparison of Mt 24^{29}=Mk 13^{24}=Lk 21^{25} show that the expectation as to time was not fixed but variable.

On the other side, no doubt, must be set the fact that in the apostolic circle the belief in the nearness of the Second Coming was almost universal (1 Th $4^{14ff.}$, 1 Co $7^{29ff.}$ 16^{23}, 2 Co 5^{3}, Ro $13^{11.12}$, Ph 4^{5}, 1 P 4^{7}, 1 Jn 2^{18}, Rev 1^{3} 22^{10} etc.). The obvious conclusion to draw from this would be that the belief had a common root in the teaching of Christ Himself.

And in favour of that conclusion might be quoted the language of 1 Th 4^{15}, though it may be questioned how much of this is a 'word of the Lord,' and how much the construction put upon it by St. Paul. The ease with which the apostles postponed their expectation under the teaching of events would tell against the supposition that the words of Christ had been precise on the subject; and when we come to look into the Gospels there are many hints that the time of the Second Coming could not be fixed precisely and might be distant (Mt 24^{37-51} ‖ $25^{10-13.14}$). These passages are indeed so clear that they may be fairly said to neutralize those which are quoted on the other side, and to heighten the probability that the apparent definiteness of these other passages is due to the disciples rather than to the Master.

But another hypothesis has been put forward to remove the difficulty. It has been supposed that the Coming of the Son of Man in the places where it is spoken of as near at hand refers, not to the final coming, but to another kind of coming in the great events of history. The prologue of St. John's Gospel appears to point to such repeated comings (Jn 1^{9}); and if any event deserves the name, it might well be given to the Destruction of Jerusalem, which was certainly one of the turning-points of history, and had a momentous influence upon the fortunes of Christianity. There is no doubt that our Lord directly predicted this catastrophe; and it might well seem that the passages which apparently speak of the final coming as near were due to a confusion in the minds of the disciples between the two events regarded as 'Comings.'

It is, however, a question whether this idea of repeated coming can be made good. Most recent writers are inclined to set it down as a modernism (Schwartzkopff, Weissagungen Jesu Christi, etc. p. 155; Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. i. 315). It is also very doubtful whether it has any real support in OT. What the prophets looked forward to was 'the day of the Lord'—a single great intervention of God—not a day or succession of days.

On this point the writer is glad to be able to refer to a note which he has received from Dr. Driver: 'The usual expression is "the day of J″": in Is 2^{12}, however, it is indef. ("for there is a day for," etc., or "J″ hath a day"); Zec 14^{1} has also "a day"; Ezk 30^{3} is lit. "For near is a day, and near is a day for J″"; Is 34^{8} "For there is a day of vengeance for J″ (or "J″ hath"), a year of recompense for," etc.; also "his days" in apparently the same sense, Job 24^{1}. But these hardly differ except formally from the usual "day of J″." I do not think that a succession of judgments is represented under this figure—except, of course, in so far as what the prophet pictured as taking place in a single day was in reality effected gradually.'

Another hypothesis, however, also appears deserving of consideration. The strongest of all the passages which would make our Lord expressly predict His own Second Coming within the apostolic age itself is Mt 16^{28} 'Verily I say unto you, There be some of them that stand here which shall in no wise taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom.' But when we compare this with the parallels, Mk 9^{1}=Lk 9^{27} it is clear that the words Son of Man are intrusive, and that the clause really runs, 'till they see the kingdom of God come with power' (om. 'with power,' Lk). It is not the 'Son of Man coming in his kingdom,' but the 'kingdom' itself which comes.

What is meant by the kingdom here? Is it not a very natural interpretation to explain it of that great intervention of the Spirit of God in the world, that great influx of Divine powers and energies which dates from Pentecost? In other words, is it not natural to equate it with the promise of the Paraclete in the Fourth Gospel, where it is implied that the coming of the Paraclete is equivalent to the coming of Christ Himself? (Jn 14^{16-18}).

The teaching of the Fourth Gospel respecting the Paraclete is already strongly confirmed by the part assigned to the Holy Spirit by St. Paul; and if the explanation just suggested* holds good, it would be also confirmed from another and unexpected quarter.

There has been a considerable tendency in the advanced liberal camp to get rid entirely of the apocalyptic and eschatological element in the teaching of our Lord. The chief means through which this is done has been the supposed discovery that in the discourse of Mk 13 ‖ there is incorporated a 'Little Apocalypse' of Jewish (Weizsäcker) or Jewish-Christian (Colani, Pfleiderer, Weiffenbach) origin, usually regarded as a 'fly-sheet' composed in A.D. 67–68 during the troubles which immediately preceded the siege of Jerusalem, and identified with the 'oracle' which led to the flight of the Christians to Pella (Eus. HE III. v. 3). The first to hit upon this idea was Colani (Jésus Christ et les Croyances Messianiques de son Temps, ed. 2, 1864, p. 201 ff.), who was followed by Weizsäcker, Pfleiderer, and on an elaborate scale by Weiffenbach, Der Wiederkunftsgedanke Jesu, Leipzig, 1873. This last-named work is usually referred to as having established the position. In the final form of the theory the 'fly-sheet' in question is supposed to consist of Mk 13^{7-9a} ‖ $^{14-20}$ ‖ $^{24-27}$ ‖ $^{30-31}$ ‖. And it is true that these verses are fairly detachable from the rest and make a fairly compact whole.

* A similar view is taken by Haupt, p. 133 f., and Bruston (Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. i. 315 n.), but commended itself to the writer of this independently. Cf. also Swete, ad loc.

By thus eliminating the central passage on which the eschatological teaching of Jesus seemed to rest, it became not very difficult to explain away that teaching altogether. Weiffenbach did so by the hypothesis that the critically verified allusions to the Second Coming of the Messiah all originally referred to His Resurrection, the predictions of which formed the genuine nucleus out of which the rest had grown through misunderstanding of the words of Jesus and the blending with them of current apocalyptic doctrines. By this expedient, Weiffenbach, whose object was less radical than that of most of those who went with him, escaped some real difficulties; but just in this it may be doubted whether he has found any follower. It will be seen that the critical analysis of Mk 13 ‖ is the starting-point of the whole construction; and that has not perhaps as yet been brought to any final solution.

iv. The Last Supper.—The part of the Last Supper of which it is most incumbent upon us to speak here is its culmination in the solemn acts and words which institute the second of the two great Sacraments. Besides the debates of centuries which have gathered round this subject, a number of questions have been raised in recent years which require discussion. In particular, new light has been thrown upon the text of one of our leading authorities. And our first step must be to determine as nearly as we can its exact bearing.

(1) The Text of Lk 22^{14-20}.—The importance of this section is such, and it is so desirable that the evidence should be given with completeness and precision, that we may be forgiven if in this instance we print the full text of the original (after Greek RV), and then proceed to give the more crucial variants in technical fashion.

The evidence of the leading Latin MSS is given in full; that of the two oldest forms of the Syriac Version in a retranslation, based for the Sinai MS on Mrs. Lewis and Merx, and for the Curetonian on Baethgen. For the Coptic Version the new critical edition is used (Oxford, 1898).

Lk 22^{14-20}. [14] Καὶ ὅτε ἐγένετο ἡ ὥρα, ἀνέπεσε, καὶ οἱ ἀπόστολοι σὺν αὐτῷ. To the textual critic these phenomena are fairly clear. The omission of vv.$^{19b-20}$ (D a ff^2 i l) belongs to the oldest form of the Western text. The next step (b e) was to transpose the order of vv.$^{17. 18}$ and ^{19a}, so as to make the sequence of the Bread and the Cup correspond to that in the other authorities. The next (Cur.) was to supplement the words relating to the Bread from 1 Co 11^{24}. The next (Sin.) was to supplement in like manner the part relating to the Cup by somewhat free interpolations partly suggested by Mt, Mk, but mainly from 1 Co 11^{25}. In this instance Syr.-Sin. represents a later stage than Syr.-Cur., though it is more often earlier. The omissions of vv. [^{16}] $^{17. 18}$ are probably not important.

We have then confronting each other the primitive form of the Western text, which is shorter, makes Lk transpose the order of the Bread and the Cup, and omits all mention of a second Cup, and the great mass of Gk. MSS and other authorities, which introduce a second Cup, or second mention of the Cup, and fill out the whole mainly from St. Paul. We cannot doubt that both these types of text existed early in the 2nd cent. Either may be original. And this is just one of those cases where internal evidence is strongly in favour of the text which we call Western. The temptation to expand was much stronger than to contract; and the double mention of the Cup raises real difficulties of the kind which suggest interpolation.

(2) Relation of the Texts to each other.—The adoption of the Western text of Lk greatly diminishes the coincidences between St. Luke and St. Paul. Indeed it reduces them to the practically equivalent εὐχαριστήσας for εὐλογήσας (in reference to the Bread; Mt, Mk use it of the Cup). The greatest loss is that of the apparent confirmation by St. Luke of the command to repeat the rite in memory of its Founder. It may be doubted, however, whether the introduction of this into the text of Lk, which—to obtain the circulation it had—must have taken place exceedingly early, and must have been carried out at the headquarters of the Church, is not even stronger testimony to the current practice of the Church than that of a single writer could be, even though that writer was an evangelist.

As to the main lines of the rite all the authorities are agreed. All note the taking of the Bread, the blessing (or 'giving thanks'), the breaking, the words, 'This is my Body.' All note the Cup, which both in the Synoptic (Mt, Mk) and Pauline tradition is related to the [new] Covenant inaugurated by the shedding of the Blood of the Messiah. In the Synoptics (Mt, Mk, Lk) there is an express mention of the giving of the Bread to the disciples, with the further command, 'Take' (Mt, Mk), 'eat' (Mt), and a like communication of the Cup (Synoptics, though with some difference of phrase). And whereas St. Paul emphasizes the redemptive value of the sacrificed Body (τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν lectio vera), Mt, Mk do the same for the shedding of the Blood (τὸ περὶ [ὑπὲρ] πολλῶν ἐκχυννόμενον Mt, Mk, and εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν Mt). St. Paul not only doubles the command for repetition, but also adds, 'For as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come.'

(3) Other NT Evidence.—We thus have the institution of the Sacrament fully set before us. But if we look at one of the documents upon which we have been drawing, the first in order of writing, though it is only incidentally historical, 1 Co 11, we find there that the Sacrament proper is associated with something else—the common meal or agape (Jude^{12}, 2 P 2^{13} var. lect.). We ask ourselves what can be the origin of this association? It can hardly go back to the original institution. It is more probable that the association arose out of the state of κοινωνία described in Ac 2$^{42.\ 44\text{-}46}$ 4$^{32\text{-}35}$ 6$^{1.\ 2}$.

Perhaps it goes back further still, at least to the very beginning of the period. For one of the characteristic expressions is ἡ κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου, κλᾷν ἄρτον (Ac 2$^{42.\ 46}$), of which Blass says, 'est autem κλᾷν τὸν ἄρτον sollemnis designatio cenæ dominicæ.' It must, however, be somewhat wider than that, for in the immediate context we have κλῶντες τε κατ' οἶκον ἄρτον μετελάμβανον τροφῆς, κ.τ.λ., where τροφή would seem to embrace the common meal as well as the Eucharist.

We are reminded further that the same phrase κλᾷν (κατακλᾷν) ἄρτον is repeatedly used of a solemn act of our Lord independently of the Eucharist (Mk 6^{41} ‖ 8^{6} ‖ ^{19}, Lk 24^{30}). And we gather from the context of the last passage that there was something distinctive in this particular act by which our Lord was recognized (Lk 24^{35}). We are reminded also of the many instances in which attention is specially called to the 'blessing' (εὐλογεῖν or εὐχαριστεῖν) of food by our Lord. They are the same words which are used in connexion with the sacramental Bread and the sacramental Cup.

There is something in these facts which is not quite fully explained. There are lacunæ in our knowledge which we would fain fill up if we could. The institution of the Eucharist appears to have connexions both backwards and forwards—backwards with other meals which our Lord ate together with His disciples, forwards with those common meals which very early came into existence in the Apostolic Church. But the exact nature and method of these connexions our materials are not sufficient to make clear to us.

(4) Significance of the Eucharist.—We feel these gaps in our knowledge when we pass on to consider the significance of the Sacrament. Certainly Harnack was not wholly wrong, however far we may think him from being wholly right, when he held that the primary object of Christ's blessing was the meal as such, in its simplest elements, not specifically bread and wine (cf. TU VII. ii. 137).

The prominence given to the meal and to the natural products of the earth which contribute to it, finds some support in the eucharistic prayers of the Didaché. 'First, as regards the cup: We give thee thanks, O our Father, for the holy vine of thy son David which thou madest known unto us through thy Son Jesus; thine is the glory for ever and ever. Then as regards the broken bread: We give thee thanks, O our Father, for the life and knowledge which thou didst make known to us through thy Son Jesus; thine is the glory for ever and ever. As this broken bread was scattered upon the mountains, and being gathered together became one, so may thy Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into thy kingdom; for thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ, for ever and ever. . . . Thou, Almighty Master, didst create all things for thy name's sake, and didst give food and drink unto men for enjoyment, that they might render thanks to thee; but didst bestow upon us spiritual food and drink and eternal life through thy Son' (Did. ix. 2–4, x. 3).

It would, however, be doing an injustice both to the ancient and to the modern writer if we supposed that they had in view only the gifts of God in nature. Harnack writes: 'The Lord instituted a meal in commemoration of His death, or rather He described the food of the body as His Flesh and Blood, i.e. as the food of the soul (through the forgiveness of sins), when it was partaken of with thanksgiving, in memory of His death' (op. cit. p. 139). And the Didaché looks beyond the physical eating and drinking to the 'spiritual food and drink,' and to the 'eternal life' bestowed through the Son; and when it speaks of the 'holy vine of David,' there is at least an allusion to the Jewish doctrine of the Messiah, if not directly to the Johannean allegory of the Vine.

We thus come round to an aspect of the Supper which has been emphasized and illustrated, especially by Spitta. There are allusions not only in the immediate context of the words of institution (Mk 14^{25} ‖), but also elsewhere (Lk 14^{15} 'Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God'; cf. Mt 8^{11} 22$^{2\text{ff.}}$ 25^{10}) to the language in use among the Jews respecting the great Messianic banquet. This took its start from the teaching of the Prophets (e.g. Is 25^{6}), and has points of contact with prominent passages in the Wisdom literature. Thus in Pr 9^{5} Wisdom issues her invitation, 'Come, eat ye of my bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled'; which is taken up in Sir 24$^{19\text{-}21}$ 'They that eat me shall yet be hungry, and they that drink me shall yet be thirsty.' And in a like connexion the idea of the manna is applied in Wis 16$^{20\text{f.}}$ 'Thou gavest thy people angels' food to eat, and bread ready for their use didst thou provide from heaven without their toil. . . . For thy nature (ἡ ὑπόστασίς σου) manifested thy sweetness toward thy children.'

We are clearly upon the line of thought which links on to the discourse in the synagogue at Capernaum. Indeed we meet here with the same phenomenon that has already come before us on other sides of our Lord's teaching. The current ideas are not discarded, but taken up on to a higher plane and filled with a new content. We have seen that Wisdom was regarded as giving herself to be 'eaten' (i.e. spiritually appropriated and assimilated). Philo repeatedly identifies the manna with the Logos (Spitta refers to ed. Mangey, i. 120, 214, 484, 564). Hence we are not surprised to find that St. Paul speaks of the πνευματικὸν βρῶμα and πνευματικὸν πόμα, the miraculously-given meat and drink which nourished the Israelites in the wilderness being treated as typical of the Christian Sacrament. In 1 Co 10^{4} it is not the water, but the stricken rock as the source of the water, which St. Paul identifies with Christ Himself. But a little further he says plainly, 'The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ?' (ib. v.^{16}). And in Jn 6$^{48\text{-}51}$ our Lord is made to describe Himself as the 'living bread which came down out of heaven,' and it is explained that the bread which He will give is His flesh, for the life of the world.

We take the view that the discourse in question does not relate directly to the Eucharist. But it does not do so only because it expresses the larger idea of which the Eucharist is a particular concrete embodiment, the one leading embodiment which Christ has bequeathed to His Church. As there is a communion with Him which is wider than—though it culminates in—that which we call κατ' ἐξοχήν, the Holy Communion, so is there a sense in which He is the Bread from heaven, which is wider than that in which He is given through the sacramental Bread, but it is that bread of which He said, 'This is my Body, which is for you.'

The parallelism between Jn 6^{51} and 1 Co 11^{24} (cf. Mk 14^{24} ‖) is so close that we are certainly justified in interpreting the words of institution in the manner in which the Sacrament itself is interpreted by both St. Paul and St. John.

No writer has brought out this aspect of the Supper as signifying primarily the spiritual assimilation of Christ more forcibly than Spitta. But when he goes on to maintain that the Eucharist has no relation to His death, it is sheer paradox, which can be maintained only by the most arbitrary methods.

The assimilation of Christ does not exhaust the meaning of the Sacrament. If we take the words of institution as they stand, another idea is even more prominent. We have seen that there is considerable doubt as to how far the Last Supper is to be identified with the Paschal meal. St. Paul describes the Death of Christ as the Christian Passover (1 Co 5^{7}), and not only he but other NT writers apply to that Death the language of Sacrifice. But the particular sacrifice with which our Lord's own words most directly connect it is the sacrifice, or group of sacrifices, which inaugurated the Covenant (Ex 24$^{4-8}$). As the sprinkling of the blood upon the altar of God and upon the people ratified the covenant between Israel and Israel's God, so (it was implied) by partaking of the consecrated symbol of the Blood of Christ the Christian had brought home to him his share in the new Covenant—a covenant which had at once its inestimable privileges and its obligations. It was the means of admission to the state of Divine favour, and it bound over those who were admitted to that favour to a life of loyal service. Here, too, if we want a comment on the words of institution, we may seek it rightly in the later NT writings. For words could not well be more strongly attested than those which accompany the giving of the bread and of the cup, and together they converge upon a root-idea which is expanded most directly in He 9$^{18-28}$, but is also illustrated by Ro 3$^{24f.}$ 5$^{1f.}$ 8$^{1ff.}$, Eph 1^{7}, 1 P 1^{19}, 1 Jn 1^{7} 2^{2}, Rev 1^{5}.

If we start from the idea of the Death of Christ as a Sacrifice, then it lies near at hand to conceive of the Sacrament as the sacred meal which follows the sacrifice. In this there would be combined the universal and immemorial significance of such meals as an act of communion at once with the Deity worshipped and of the worshippers with each other. This double communion, under this aspect of the sacrificial meal, seems clearly indicated in 1 Co 10$^{16f. 21}$, but it is also suggested by the words of institution, taken with the distribution of the elements of bread and wine, and the stress which is laid upon the general participation ('Drink ye all,' 'they all drank').

(5) Critical Theories.—A common feature in recent critical theories respecting the Last Supper is the denial that the command, 'This do in remembrance of me,' formed part of the original institution; or, in other words, that the particular circumstances which marked this solemn parting meal were meant to be repeated in the form of a permanent Sacrament. This view was put forward about the same time, and, it is probable, independently, in England by Dr. P. Gardner (The Origin of the Lord's Supper, London, 1893), and in Germany by Jülicher in the vol. of essays in honour of Weizsäcker (Theol. Abhandl. etc., Freiburg i. B. 1892), and by Spitta (Zur Gesch. u. Lit. d. Urchristentums, Göttingen, 1893). The English writer is the most thoroughgoing. Assuming the correctness of the WH text of Lk 22$^{19. 20}$, St. Paul is left as the sole authority for the express command of repetition. It is then argued from the phrasing of 1 Co 11^{23} 'I received of the Lord,' that the whole account belongs to one of St. Paul's ecstatic revelations, and has not a solid historical foundation. In default of this it is thought that the apostle had been influenced during his stay at Corinth by the near proximity of the Eleusinian mysteries, the central point in which 'appears to have been a sacred repast of which the initiated partook, and by means of which they had communion with the gods' (p. 18).

How St. Paul could confuse such subtle external influences with a revelation 'from the Lord,' and how he came to deliver as authoritative instructions to the Corinthians what he had (upon the theory) only himself acquired during his stay at Corinth, are only incidental questions. We cannot tell precisely how St. Paul received his knowledge in such a sense that he could refer it to the Lord. But the solemn simplicity of phrase reads like history, and, so far as other authorities exist, it is completely verified. In any case, it is incredible that a usage which is thus treated as practically the invention of St. Paul could have spread from an outlying Gentile Church over the whole of Christendom. We cannot doubt that not only the Synoptic version of the Supper, but its repetition as a Sacrament, had their origin in the Mother Church. The κλάσις τοῦ ἄρτου of Ac 2$^{42. 46}$ is an indication of this, which is confirmed by the evidence of Ignatius, Justin, and the Didaché. Spitta's theory, that the repeated Sacrament was due, not to a command of Christ Himself, but to the spontaneous instinct of affectionate recollection among His disciples, is more possible, but still gratuitous and hypercritical. We may not allege the witness of St. Luke himself in confirmation of St. Paul, but, as we have already seen (p. 636 sup.), the familiar text of his Gospel is no less valid evidence of the common belief and practice.

Of the critical theories respecting the origin of the Eucharist, that which we have just mentioned is the most important. Harnack's contention, that it was sometimes administered with water instead of wine, not only here and there among the sects but in the main body of the Church, belongs rather to the history of the Early Church than to the Life of our Lord. It turns, however, upon a somewhat cavalier treatment of the text of Justin, and has met with strong opposition and (it is believed) practically no acceptance.

LITERATURE.—A summary may be given of the more recent special literature to most of which reference has been made. Lobstein, La Doctrine de la Cène, Lausanne, 1889; a lucid exposition dating from the time before the rise of the newer theories. A reasonable criticism may go back to it with advantage. v. The Resurrection.—For our present purpose the discussion of the Resurrection of our Lord will resolve itself into a consideration of (1) the evidence attesting the fact; (2) the sequence of the events, or the appearances which followed the Resurrection; (3) the explanations which have been put forward to account for the Resurrection without miracle; (4) its doctrinal significance.

(1) The Attestation.—A fact so stupendous as the Resurrection needs to be supported by strong evidence, and very strong evidence both as regards quantity and quality is forthcoming; but all parts of it are not of equal value, and it is well that the authorities should be compared with each other and critically estimated.

When this is done one piece of evidence drops almost entirely to the rear—the concluding verses of St. Mark. This is not invalidated merely by the fact that the verses were probably not part of the original Gospel. Since Mr. Conybeare's discovery of the Armenian MS, which appears to refer them to the 'presbyter Ariston' or 'Aristion,' it is fair to attach that name to them, because, although the authority is but slender, there is nothing at all to compete with it; and the Aristion mentioned by Eusebius (HE iii. 39) as one of the 'elders' consulted by Papias, would suit the conditions as well as any one else belonging to the same generation (say A.D. 100–125). Such an authority cannot be wholly without weight; if it represented a distinct line of tradition, its weight would be considerable. But when the verses Mk 16^{9-20} are examined, it seems pretty clear that the earlier portion of them is really a summary of the narratives in the extant Gospels of St. Luke and St. John, and therefore adds nothing to these Gospels beyond such further sanction as the name of Aristion may give to them. It is proof that the statements in those Gospels were accepted as satisfactory by a prominent Church teacher, himself a depositary of tradition, in the region where St. John had been active. So much the verses contribute, but not more.

There is still some mystery hanging over the close of the Second Gospel. The most probable view appears to be that its original conclusion has been lost—it is more likely than not—by some purely mechanical accident. The fragment that remains, Mk 16^{1-8}, is insufficient to enable us to trace it to its source. If we could be sure that it was complete, we should have to say that St. Mark was not here drawing upon the Petrine tradition, because that tradition could not have failed to speak of the appearance to Peter himself. It is, however, possible that that was contained in the missing portion.

This may detract somewhat from the weight of the common Synopt. narrative, which is here disappointingly meagre. And yet, if we are to throw the absence of any mark of Petrine origin into the one scale, there is a little bit of confirmatory evidence which it is fair to throw into the other. All through the history of the Passion St. Luke has access to a special source, which we may well believe to have been oral, but which gave him some items of good information. This information relates especially to the court of Herod Antipas (Lk 23^{7-12}), and it is natural to connect it with the particular mention of 'Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward' in Lk 8^3. Now this very same Joanna appears again in St. Luke's account of the visit of the women to the sepulchre (Lk 24^{10}). The rest of the paragraph appears to be based as usual upon St. Mark. But the renewed mention of Joanna is an indication of the special source, which at least goes to show that there was nothing in that source which conflicted with the Marcan document. In other words, it confirms that document by a distinct line of testimony (cf. Lk 23^{21-24}).

Is it not possible that the story of the Walk to Emmaus has a like origin? The name Cleopas (= Cleopatros) is just such as we should expect to find in the same Herodian circle. In any case, the source bears other marks of being a good one. It gives a graphic picture of the dejection through which the disciples passed; and the phrase 'we hoped that it was he which should redeem Israel' points back to a time before the dreams of national triumph had been purified of the grosser element in them. But most striking of all is the direct confirmation by St. Paul (1 Co 15^5) of another very incidental reference, the appearance to Peter (Lk 23^{34}). Not only does St. Paul confirm the fact, but he puts it practically in the same place in the series.

We have, then, every reason to think both that the special source used by St. Luke was excellent in itself, and also that it agreed in substance with the fragmentary record of St. Mark.

If St. Luke thus reaches a hand in one direction towards St. Mark, he does so in another direction towards St. John. For the appearance of Lk $24^{36ff.}$ corresponds to that of Jn $20^{19ff.}$; and both alike receive the seal of authentication from St. Paul (1 Cor 15^5). We may not, for the reason given above, use Mk 16^9 in ratification of Jn $20^{11ff.}$. We note, however, that the incident of St. Thomas is a striking concrete illustration of the disbelief on which so many of our authorities lay stress.* For the rest, the narrative in the Fourth Gospel must go with the problem as to that Gospel generally. It has found a vigorous recent defender in Dr. Loofs (Die Auferstehungsberichte und ihr Wert, Leipzig, 1898).

The peculiar element in Mt might have seemed to possess the lowest claim to acceptance, were it not for the singular convergence of proof that something like the injunction of Mt 28^{19} must have been given, or most probably was given, by our Lord Himself (see p. 624 sup.; also p. 213 ff.). We believe that for this paragraph, too, there is solid foundation.

And yet the Resurrection is a part of the evangelical narrative for which the leading witness is, after all, not the Gospels, but St. Paul—the double witness of what St. Paul says and what he implies. It is hardly possible for testimony to be stronger than this is. In the same precise and deliberate manner in which he had rehearsed the particulars of the Last Supper, St. Paul enumerates one by one the leading appearances of the Lord after the Resurrection: (1) to Peter, (2) to the Twelve (as a body), (3) to an assembly of more than five hundred, (4) to James, (5) to all the apostles (1 Co 15^{5-7}).

We have spoken of these as the 'leading' appearances, because St. Paul doubtless has in view, not all who under any circumstances 'saw the Lord,' but those who were specially chosen and commissioned to be witnesses of the Resurrection (Ac 1^{22} 4^{33}, cf. 1 Co 15^{15}), i.e. as we should say, to assert and preach it publicly. For this reason there would be nothing in St. Paul's list to exclude such an appearance as that to Mary Magdalene (Jn 20^{11-18}). It may have been on this ground—because the two disciples involved were not otherwise conspicuous as active preachers or prominent leaders—that St. Paul does not mention the scene on the road to Emmaus. But it is equally possible that the story of this had not reached him.

We have seen by what a striking coincidence this story confirms, from a wholly independent quarter, the first appearance to Peter. The next in order, that to the Twelve, may well be identical with that which is more exactly described in Lk $24^{33ff.}$, Jn 20^{19-24}. The appearance to James is attested by another line of tradition embodied in the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Beyond this identifications are uncertain.

St. Paul contents himself with a bare enumeration, not from lack of knowledge, but because he assumes knowledge in his readers. He reminds the Corinthians of what he had delivered unto them first of all (ἐν πρώτοις, i.e. at the very beginning of his ministry among them). This throws back the date of the evidence some four years—we may say from the year 55 to 51, possibly earlier, but at the latest from 57 to 53.

We are thus brought to much the same date as that of another piece of evidence, not so detailed as that in 1 Co, but quite as explicit, so far as the fact of the Resurrection is concerned, the evidence of the first extant NT writing, 1 Th 1^{10} 4^{14}. The assured tone of these passages shows, not only that the apostle is speaking from the very strongest personal conviction, but that he is confident of carrying his readers with him; we may go further and say that the belief to which he gives this expression was unquestioned, the universal belief of Christians. We might infer this from the attitude of St. Paul in regard to it. Unfortunately, we have no evidence equally early from the Church of Palestine; but as soon as evidence begins to appear it is all to the same effect. The early chapters of Ac no doubt represent a Palestinian tradition, perhaps a written tradition; and they take the same line as St. Paul in making it the chief function of the apostles to bear witness to the Resurrection (Ac $1^{8.22}$ etc.). We need not pursue this evidence further.

* This trait is not less authentic because it passed over from primary documents into secondary (such as the Coptic work discovered by Carl Schmidt and commented upon by Harnack in Theol. Studien B. Weiss dargebracht). It really does throw into relief, and the early disciples saw that it threw into relief, the revulsion of feeling on the part of the witnesses to the Resurrection and the strength of their conviction. Otherwise Harnack, p. 8, and Loofs, p. 21.

It is noticeable that although there were doubts in the Apostolic Age on the subject of resurrection (1 Co 15^{12}, 2 Ti $2^{17f.}$), it is not as to the resurrection of Christ, but as to that of Christians. St. Paul argues on the assumption that Christ was really raised as from a premiss common to himself and his opponents.

And it is no less noticeable that even the most rationalistic of Christian sects, those (e.g.) which denied the Virgin-Birth, nevertheless shared the belief in the Resurrection (Irenæus, adv. Hær. I. xxvi. 1, 2 [where non before similiter should be expunged]; Hippolytus, Ref. Hær. vii. 35).

(2) The Sequence and Scene of the Events.—It is not an exaggeration—it is only putting in words the impression left by the facts—to say that the conviction among Christians that Christ was really raised, dates from the very morrow of the Resurrection itself. It was not a growth spread over a long period and receiving gradual accretions of strength; but it sprang suddenly into existence, and it swept irresistibly over the whole body of disciples. Of the force and universality of the belief there can be no doubt; but when we come to details it would seem that from the first there was a certain amount of confusion, which was never wholly cleared up. We have records of a number of appearances, not all contained in a single authority, but scattered over several distinct authorities; and it is probable enough that even when all the recorded appearances are put together they would not exhaust all those that were experienced. Different traditions must have circulated in different quarters, and specimens of these traditions have come down to us without being digested into accordance with a single type. The list which approaches most nearly to this character, that which is given by St. Paul in 1 Co, is, as we have seen, not so much a digest as a selection. It is a selection made for purposes of preaching, and consisting of items which had already been used for this purpose. Compared with this, a story like the Walk to Emmaus is such as might have come out of private memoirs. The brief record in St. Mark is more central, but in its present condition it is too mutilated to satisfy curiosity. The narrative of St. John is no less authoritative than that of St. Paul, but it is authority of a rather different kind. St. Paul writes as the active practical missionary, who seeks to communicate the fire of his own conviction to others. St. John also wishes to spread conviction (Jn 20^{31}), but he does so by bringing forth the stores of long and intense recollections from his own breast. He too selects what had taken the most personal hold upon him, and does not try to cover the whole ground.

It is as a consequence of these conditions that when we come to look into the narratives of the Resurrection we find them unassimilated and unharmonized. It is not exactly easy to fit them into each other. The most important difference is as to the chief scene of the appearances. Was it Jerusalem and the neighbourhood, or was it Galilee? The authorities are divided. St. Paul and the Gospel according to the Hebrews make no mention of locality. Mt and Mk throw the stress upon Galilee. The latter Gospel does not indeed (in the genuine portion) record a Galilæan appearance, but the women are bidden to say that the risen Lord would meet the disciples in Galilee (Mk 16^{7}). This is in fulfilment of a promise to the same effect given in the course of the Last Supper, and recorded in the same two Gospels (Mk 14^{28}, Mt 26^{32}). The express mention of prediction and fulfilment in both Gospels not only proves their presence in the common original, but also shows that they were no accidental feature in that original, but an essential part of the whole conception. We have besides a Galilæan appearance described in Jn 21, and clearly implied at the point where the fragment of the Gospel of Peter breaks off (Ev. Pet. § 12 [60]).

On the other hand, all the scenes of Jn 20 are laid in Jerusalem; and Jerus. or the neighbourhood is the only locality recognized in Lk 24, which ends with a command to the disciples to wait in the city for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit (Lk 24^{49}).

It is not unnatural that the critical school should regard these two versions as alternatives, one of which only can be taken. The more usual course has been to follow that of Mk and Mt, with or without the supposition that the grave was really found empty (Loofs, p. 18 ff.). According as this assumption was made or not, several constructions were possible, but all equally speculative.

Dr. Loofs has, however, recently argued in favour of the other tradition represented by Lk–Jn 20. And he has certainly succeeded in showing that there is as much intrinsic probability on this side as on the other. But, in order to carry out this theory, he is obliged to treat Jn 21 as having a different origin from the rest of the Gospel, and as falling into two parts, one of which (the fishing scene = Lk 5^{1-11}) has got misplaced, not having originally belonged to the period after the Resurrection, while the other (the dialogue of Jn 21^{15-23}) had originally nothing to connect it with Galilee. These are strong measures, which, however high our estimate of the tradition, Lk–Jn, are obviously not open to one who thinks that the identity of style between Jn 21 and the rest of the Gospel is too great to permit of their separation. (the argument in Expos. 1892, i. 380 ff., may easily be extended to ch. 21).

The only remaining course is to combine the traditions, much as they seem to be combined in the Fourth Gospel and the Gospel of Peter. We must not disguise from ourselves the difficulties which this solution leaves. The most serious of these are caused by the command of Lk 24^{49}, and the contracted space within which we shall have to compress the events in Galilee. We have only 40 days to dispose of, in all, if we accept the traditional date of the Ascension,—and even if we regarded this as a round number, the nearness of the Day of Pentecost would allow us very little more margin. From these Forty Days we should have to take off a week at the beginning on account of Jn 20^{26}. And if, as we reasonably may, we suppose that there has been some foreshortening in Lk 24^{36-53}, and that two or three distinct occasions are treated as if they were continuous, we should still, to find a place for the injunction to wait in Jerus., have to cut off another like period at the end. That would leave not much more than three weeks for the retirement to Galilee and return to Jerus.—a length of time which cannot be pronounced wholly insufficient, but which does not fit in quite naturally with the way in which the apostles are described in Jn 21^{3} as returning to their ordinary occupations. These difficulties would be avoided if we could regard the Day of Pentecost as that of the following year; but any such hypothesis would conflict directly with Ac 1^{3}, and the interval implied in Jn 21^{14} * is also a short one.

Whichever way we turn difficulties meet us, which the documents to which we have access do not enable us to remove. We have said enough as to the nature of these documents, and of the lines of tradition to which they give expression. It is not what we could wish, but what we have. And no difficulty of weaving the separate incidents into an orderly well-compacted narrative can impugn the unanimous belief of the Church which lies behind them, that the Lord Jesus Christ rose from the dead on the third day and appeared to the disciples.

(3) Attempted Explanations. — This universal belief is the root fact which has to be accounted for. It would be the natural product of a real event such as the Epistles assume and the Gospels describe. But what if the event were not real? In that case the widely held and deeply planted belief in it must needs constitute a very serious problem.

In the present century a succession of efforts have been made to account for the belief in the Resurrection without accepting it as a fact. Many of the hypotheses put forward with this object may be regarded as practically obsolete and abandoned. No one now believes that the supposed death was really only a swoon, and that the body laid in the tomb afterwards revived, and was seen more than once by the disciples (on this see a trenchant sentence by Strauss, Leben Jesu, 1863, p. 298, end of paragraph). Equally inadmissible is the hypothesis of fraud—that the body was really taken away by Joseph of Arimathæa or Nicodemus, and that the rumour was allowed to grow that Jesus was risen. The lingering trace of this which survives in Renan, Les Apôtres, ed. 13, p. 16 ('ceux qui savaient le secret de la disposition du corps') is thrown in quite by the way as a subordinate detail.

More persistent is the theory of 'visions.' This has been presented in different forms, assigning the leading part now to one and now to another of the disciples. Renan, who goes his own way among critics, sees in this part of the narrative a marked superiority of the Fourth Gospel (Les Apôtres, p. 9). In accordance with it he refers the beginning of the series to Mary Magdalene (cf. Strauss, Leben Jesu, 1863, p. 309). A woman out of whom had been cast 'seven devils' might well, he thinks, have been thrown into a state of nervous tension and excitement which would give form and substance to the creations of fancy. And when once the report had got abroad that the Lord had been seen, it would be natural for others to suppose that they saw Him. Strauss and Pfleiderer (Giff. Lect. pp. 112, 149) start rather from the case of St. Paul. Both lay stress upon the fact that he places the appearance to himself on a level with those to the older disciples. His own vision they would agree in explaining as due to a species of epileptic seizure, and the others they would regard as equally subjective, though led up to by different trains of psychological preparation.

It is at this point that some of the best attested details of the Resurrection interpose difficulties. To carry through a consistent theory of visions, two conditions are necessary. (a) If they arose, as Strauss supposes, from affectionate dwelling upon the personality of Jesus, combined with reflexion upon certain passages of OT (Ps 16^{10}, Is 53^{10-12}), it follows, almost of necessity, that we must also with Strauss throw over the tradition of the 'third day,' and regard the belief as the outcome of a somewhat prolonged process—a process spread over weeks and months rather than days. (b) On the other hand, if we must discard the tradition as to the beginning of the appearances, we must equally discard that as to their end. The wave of feverish enthusiasm to which on this hypothesis they owed their origin, certainly would not have subsided in the interval between Passover and Pentecost. We note, as it is, an ascending scale in the appearances—they occur first to individuals (Mary Magdalene, Peter, the Emmaus disciples), then to the Ten and the Eleven, then to the Five Hundred. We can see how one appearance prepares the way for another. St. Peter (e.g.) must have been present at three or four. With this increasing weight of testimony, and increasing predisposition in the minds of the disciples, we should naturally expect that the appearance to the Five Hundred would contain within itself the germs of an indefinite series. We should not have been surprised if the whole body alike of Christians and of half Christians had caught the contagion. But that is not the case. There is just the single appearance to James; and then—the vision of St. Paul standing rather by itself—with one more appearance to the assembled apostles, the list comes to what seems an abrupt end.

This description of the facts rests on excellent evidence. The 'third day' is hardly less firmly rooted in the tradition of the Church than the Resurrection itself. We have it not only in the speech ascribed to St. Peter (Ac 10^{40}), but in the central testimony of St. Paul, and then in the oldest form of the Apostles' Creed. It is strange that so slight a detail should have been preserved at all, and still stranger that it should hold the place it does in the standard of the Church's faith. We must needs regard it as original. And for the circumscribed area of the appearances, we have at once the positive evidence of the canonical documents, and a remarkable silence on the part of the extra-canonical.

These phenomena are difficult to reconcile with a theory of purely subjective visions. An honest inquirer like Keim felt the difficulty so strongly that, while regarding the appearances as essentially of the nature of visions, he held them to be not merely subjective, but divinely caused, for the express purpose of creating the belief in which they issued.

This is the least that must be asserted. A belief that has had such incalculably momentous results must have had an adequate cause. No apparition, no mere hallucination of the senses ever yet moved the world. But we may doubt whether the theory, even as Keim presents it, is adequate or really called for. It belongs to the process of so trimming down the elements that we call supernatural in the Gospel narratives as to bring them within the limits of everyday experience. But that process, we must needs think, has failed. The facts are too obstinate, the evidence for them is too strong; and the measures which we apply are too narrow and bounded. It is better to keep substantially the form which a sound tradition has handed down to us, even though its contents in some degree pass our comprehension.

* The numbering of this Galilæan appearance as the 'third' might seem to be at variance with St. Paul's list in 1 Co 15; but it is clear that the appearances which St. John enumerates were those to the body of 'the disciples' (i.e. primarily, to a group including the apostles). He himself does not count that to Mary Magdalene; nor would he have counted those to St. Peter or the Emmaus travellers.

(4) The Permanent Significance of the Resurrection.—The innermost nature of the Resurrection is hidden from us. And if we ask why the supreme proof that God had visited His people took this particular form, the answer we can give is but partial. Some things, however, seem to stand out clearly.

(a) In the first place it is obvious that the idea of a resurrection was present to men's minds. Herod thought that the works of Jesus were works of the Baptist restored to life (Mk $6^{14.16}$||). Men were quite prepared to see Elijah or some other of the ancient prophets reappear upon the scene (Mk 9^{11-13}||, Jn 1^{21}). In Palestine and among the circles in which Christianity arose, no mark of special divine indwelling seemed at the time so natural. The belief had not been allowed to grow up without a reason.

For (b) from the very first the ideas of bodily and spiritual resurrection were closely intertwined together. Perhaps the oldest passage in which there is a hint of such an idea is the vision of Ezekiel (ch. 37); and there the revivification of the body is the symbol of a spiritual revival. This intimate connexion of bodily and spiritual is never lost sight of in Christianity.

(c) 'Die to live' is one of the most fundamental of Christian principles, and this principle is embodied once for all in the Resurrection. If the one side was 'placarded' before the eyes of the world (Gal 3^1) in the Crucifixion, the Resurrection was a no less signal manifestation of the other. There is a double strain of inference and application.

(d) On the one hand, the Resurrection of Christ was the pledge and earnest of physical resurrection and the life beyond the grave. St. Paul founds upon it the hope of immortality (1 Th 4^{14}, Ro 8^{34}, 1 Co 6^{14} $15^{12ff.}$, 2 Co 4^{14} etc.).

(e) But he equally founds upon it the most earnest exhortations to holiness of life. It is not only that this follows for the Christian as a duty: if his relation to Christ is a right relation, it is included in it as a necessity (Ro 6^{3-6}). St. Paul can hardly think of the physical Resurrection apart from the spiritual. And there is a very similar vein in the teaching of St. John (Jn 5^{24}, 1 Jn 3^{14}). The Resurrection is the corner-stone of Christian mysticism.

(f) In another aspect, as a divine act, the crowning mark of divine approval, it is a necessary complement of the Crucifixion. It supplies the proof, which the world might desiderate, that the Sacrifice of the Cross was accepted. If the death of the Cross was a dying for human sin, the rising again from the tomb was the seal of forgiveness and justification (Ro 4^{25}, cf. 6^7). St. Paul saw in it an assurance that the doors of the divine mercy were thrown open wide; and to St. Peter in like manner it was through it that mankind was begotten again to a 'lively hope' (1 P 1^3).

All this mass of biblical teaching hangs together. If the Resurrection was a reality it has a solid nucleus, which would be wanting even to the theory of objective visions. The economy which begins with a physical Incarnation, naturally and appropriately ends with a physical Resurrection. Thus much we can see, though we may feel that this is not all.

LITERATURE.—Besides the recent literature mentioned above (among which the paper by Dr. Loofs deserves rather special attention), and besides the treatment of the subject in numerous works on the Gospel History and on Apologetics, it is well to remember two monographs in English—Dr. Westcott's Gospel of the Resurrection (first pub. in 1866), and the late Dr. Milligan's The Resurrection of our Lord (first pub. in 1881).

vi. The Ascension.—The Resurrection in itself was incomplete. It was not the goal, but the way to the goal. The goal was the return of the Son to the Father, with His mission accomplished, His work done.

(1) The apostolic writers unanimously represent this return as a triumph. The keynote is struck in the speech which is put into the mouth of St. Peter on the day of Pentecost[*] (Ac 2^{33-36}). It would seem that the form of expression which the conception assumed was influenced largely by Ps 110^1, a passage to which attention had been drawn by our Lord Himself shortly before His departure, and which spontaneously recurred to the mind as soon as the nature of His return to the Father had declared itself. Along with this would be recalled the saying with which our Lord had answered the challenge of the high priest (Mk 14^{62}||). Psalm and saying alike represented the Messiah as seated 'at the right hand' of the Most High. This phrase appears to have at once (in the forms ἐκ δεξιῶν and ἐν δεξιᾷ) established itself in the language of the primitive Church: it occurs repeatedly, not only in the Acts ($7^{55f.}$) and in the Pauline Epp., but in He, 1 P, and Rev; and, like the detail of the 'third day,' it occupies a fixed place in the Apostles' Creed.

The speech of St. Peter culminates in the declaration, 'Let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made him, whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ' (Ac 2^{36}); and it is substantially a paraphrase of this when in a famous passage St. Paul, after speaking of the humiliation of the Christ, adds, 'Wherefore also God highly exalted him, and gave unto him the name which is above every name, that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow,' etc. (Ph $2^{9f.}$). The return of the Son to the Father was not merely the resumption of a previous state of glory (Jn 6^{62} 17^5 etc.), it was the resumption of it with the added approval and recognition which His obedience unto death had called forth. We speak of these things κατὰ ἄνθρωπον; or rather, we are content to echo in regard to them the language of the apostles and of the first Christians, who themselves spoke κατὰ ἄνθρωπον. The reality lies behind the veil.

(2) How did our Lord Jesus Christ enter upon this state of exaltation? Now that we have before us corrected texts of the Gospels, it would seem to be probable that they did not give an answer to this question. The answer was reserved for the second volume which St. Luke addressed to Theophilus; it forms the opening section of the Acts of the Apostles.

Mk 16^{19} belongs to the Appendix to the Gospel, which we have seen (p. 638 f. sup.) to have been probably composed, not by St. Mark himself, but by the presbyter Aristion in the early years of the 2nd cent. The reading of Lk 24^{51} stands thus—

> Om. ℵ*D, a b e ff_2 Syr.-Sin., Aug. 1/2.

This means that the omission of the words is a primitive Western reading, which in this case is probably right: it was a natural gloss to explain the parting of the Lord from the disciples of the Ascension; there was no similar temptation to omit the words if genuine.

In Ac 1^{1-11} the final separation is described as an 'ascent unto heaven.' When the last instructions had been given, the disciples saw their Lord 'taken up (ἐπήρθη), and a cloud received him out of their sight.' The over-arching sky is a standing symbol for the abode of God; and the return of the Son to the Father was naturally represented as a retreat within its blue recesses, the ethereal home of light and glory. It is sometimes necessary that a symbol should be acted as well as written or spoken. The disciples were aware of a vanishing, and they knew that their Lord must be where His Father was.

[*] When we ask how these early discourses were transmitted to the writer of the Acts, there is a natural reluctance to use them too strictly as representing the exact words spoken. And yet, taken as a whole, they fit in singularly well to the order of development and the thought of the primitive community, which has an antecedent verisimilitude and accords well with indications in the Pauline Epistles.

That the narrative in the Acts is not a myth seems proved by an authentic little touch which it contains, a veritable reminiscence of what we may be sure was their real attitude at the moment, though it soon ceased to be. When they asked, 'Lord, dost thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?' their thoughts were still running in the groove of the old Jewish expectation. It is the last trace of them that we have in this naïve form.

(3) From the point of view of Christian doctrine, for those who not only accept the facts of the life of Christ but the construction put on those facts by the writers of NT, the main stress of the Ascension lies upon the state to which it forms the entrance. (a) It is the guarantee for the continued existence of Him who became incarnate for our sakes. (b) It not only guarantees His continued existence, but the continued effect of His work. It puts the seal of the divine approval upon all that the Incarnation accomplished. It is the final confirmation of the lessons of the Baptism and of the Transfiguration, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' (c) The primitive phrase 'at the right hand of God' describes as nearly and as simply as human language can describe the double truth that Christ still is and that His work still is, that the Incarnation was no transient episode, but a permanent and decisive factor in the dealing of God with man. (d) This truth is stated in other words in the doctrine of the High Priesthood of Christ, a doctrine implicitly contained in many places in the writings of St. Paul, and worked out with great clearness and fulness in Ep. to Hebrews. There is something in the relation of the exalted Son to the Father and to His Church corresponding to and that may be expressed in terms of the functions of the earthly high priest in relation to God and to Israel. The great High Priest presents the prayers of His people; He intercedes for them; He 'pleads' or 'presents' His own sacrifice. Only, when we use this language it should be remembered that we are not speaking of 'specific acts done or words spoken by Christ in His glory. His glorified presence is an eternal presentation; He pleads by what He is' (Moberly, Ministerial Priesthood, p. 246 n.).

LITERATURE.—Dr. Milligan left a volume on the Ascension as a pendant to that on the Resurrection (Baird Lectures for 1891), which is the most comprehensive treatment of the subject in English.

III. SUPPLEMENTAL MATTER: THE NATIVITY AND INFANCY.—Throughout His public ministry Jesus passed for the son of Joseph and Mary, two peasants of Nazareth. Some of those who were present at the long discourse in the synagogue at Capernaum expressed their astonishment at the high pretensions which it seemed to contain, by asking, 'Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?' (Jn 6^4; cf. 1^{45}). The inhabitants of Nazareth appear to have put a similar question when He came and preached there. The exact words are somewhat differently transmitted. Mk 6^3 has (in the better attested text), 'Is not this the carpenter?' Mt 13^{55} 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' Lk 4^{23} a passage which, although divergent, contains reminiscences of the same original, has still more directly, 'Is not this Joseph's son?' In the preliminary chapters the same evangelist speaks repeatedly of 'his parents' (γονεῖς, Lk $2^{27.41.43}$). And not only does he himself resolve this into 'his father and his mother' (2^{33}), but he makes the mother of Jesus say, 'Thy father and I sought thee sorrowing' (2^{48}).

It is in keeping with this language that both the First and the Third Gospels place in their forefront genealogies of Jesus, which, in spite of many attempts to prove the contrary, must be admitted to trace His descent through Joseph and not through Mary.

Yet, on the other hand, the same two Gospels, though differing widely in the details of the narrative, assert unequivocally that Joseph had no share in the parentage of Jesus, and that the place of a human father was taken by the direct action of the Spirit of God. The differences show that the two traditions are independent of each other; and yet both converge upon this one point. They agree not only in representing Jesus as born of a virgin, but also in representing this fact as supernaturally announced beforehand,—in the one case to Joseph, in the other case to Mary.

What account is to be given of these seeming inconsistencies? We cannot get rid of them by assigning the opposed statements to different sources. In St. Matthew the genealogy which ends in Joseph is followed immediately by the narrative of the Annunciation and Virgin-Birth. In St. Luke the successive sections of ch. 2, which begins with the Nativity and ends with the scene of the boy Jesus in the Temple, where we have seen that such expressions as 'his parents,' 'his father and mother' occur so freely, are linked together by the recurrent note, 'Mary kept all these sayings, pondering them in her heart,' 'his mother kept all these sayings in her heart' (Lk $2^{19.51}$; cf. also the argument which Prof. Ramsay skilfully draws from 1^{80} $2^{40.52}$[*]). And when we turn to St. John we cannot but remember that the Gospel which records so frankly the Jews' question, 'Is not this Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know?' if it nowhere refers directly to the Virgin-Birth, yet goes further than any other Gospel in asserting the pre-existence of the Son as God with God.

What we regard as inconsistent will clear itself up best if we consider the order of events and the way in which these preliminary stages of the history were gradually brought to the consciousness of the Church.

The sources from which the knowledge of them was derived were, without doubt, private.[†] We shall consider presently the character of these sources. We know more about that of which use was made by St. Luke than of that used by St. Matthew, and we can rely upon it as a historical authority with greater confidence. We shall see that it is ultimately traceable to the Virgin herself, in all probability through the little circle of women who were for some time in her company.

We are told expressly that the Virgin Mary 'kept all these sayings (or things) in her heart.' She, if any one, might well say, μυστήριον ἐμὸν ἐμοί. It was only by slow degrees in the intimacy of confidential intercourse that she allowed her secret to pass beyond herself, and to become known. Even if committed to writing before it came into the hands of St. Luke, it probably did not reach any wide public until it was embodied in his Gospel. The place which the Virgin-Birth occupies in Ignatius and in the Creed seems to show that it cannot have been much later than the middle of the century before the knowledge of it made its way to the headquarters of Christianity. But before some such date as that there is no reason to think that it was generally known. It was no part of our Lord's own teaching. The neighbours among whom His early life was passed, the changing crowds who witnessed His miracles or gathered round Him to hear Him, had never had it proclaimed to them. 'Jesus son of Joseph, the prophet of Nazareth,' was the common name by which He was known. And it is a great presumption of the historical truth of the Gospels that they so simply and naturally reflect this language. We may well believe that the language was shared, as the ignorance which caused it was shared, even by the Twelve themselves. It would be very fitting if the channel through which these sacred things first came to the ears of the Church was a little group of women.*

[*] Was Christ born at Bethlehem? p. 87.

[†] 'Luke gives, from knowledge gained within the family, an account of facts known only to the family, and in part to the Mother alone' (Ramsay, op. cit. p. 79). Prof. Ramsay, however, seems to go too far in contrasting Mt with Lk when he says, 'Matthew gives the public account, that which was generally known during the Saviour's life and after His death.' We do not think that any account was known during the Saviour's life, and we prefer to think of the Matthæan version as parallel to rather than contrasted with the Lucan.

i. The Sources of the Narrative.—It has often been observed that whereas the first two chapters of St. Matthew appear to be written from the point of view of Joseph, the first two chapters of St. Luke are written from the point of view of Mary. In Mt the Annunciation is made to Joseph; it is Joseph who is bidden in a dream not to fear to take to him his wife; Joseph who is told what the Son whom she is to bear is to be called. It is Joseph, again, who is warned to take the young Child and His mother into Egypt, and who, when the danger is past, receives the command to return; and it is Joseph also whose anxious care is the cause that the family settle in Galilee and not in Judæa. On the other hand, when we turn to St. Luke the prominent figures at first are the two kinswomen, Elisabeth the mother of John the Baptist, and Mary. Mary herself receives the announcement of the holy thing that is to be born of her. The Magnificat is her song of thanksgiving. She treasures in her heart the sayings of the shepherds and of her Divine Son. The aged Simeon points his prophecy to her, and foretells that a sword should pierce through her soul.

In regard to the Matthæan document we are in the dark. The curious gravitation of statement towards Joseph has a reason; but beyond this there is not much that we can say. It would not follow that the immediate source of the narrative was very near his person. In the case of Lk we can see farther down the vista. We have already had grounds for connecting the source from which he draws ultimately with the Mother of Jesus. Through what channel did it reach the evangelist? Probably through one of the women mentioned in Lk 8³ 24¹⁰; and as Joanna is the least known of the group, and therefore the most likely to drop out for any one not personally acquainted with her, perhaps we may say, by preference, through her (cf. p. 639 sup.). We learn from Jn 19²⁵ (cf. Ac 1¹⁴) that the Mother of Jesus was thrown into contact with this group,—perhaps not for any great length of time, but yet for a time that may well have been sufficiently long for the purpose. And we believe that thus the secret of what had passed came to be disclosed to a sympathetic ear.

Such an inference, if sound, would invest the contents of these chapters with high authority. Without enlarging more on this, we may perhaps be allowed to refer in confirmation to what has been already said as to the appropriateness of the picture given of the kind of circle in which Christ was born, and in which His birth was most spontaneously greeted (see p. 608 above). It was just the Symeons and Annas, the Elisabeths and Zachariahs, who were the natural adherents of such a Messiah as Jesus. And the phrases used to describe them are beautifully appropriate to the time and circumstances, 'looking for the consolation of Israel,' 'looking for the redemption of Jerusalem' (Lk 2²⁵. ³⁸).

The elaborate and courageous attempt of Resch (TU iv. Heft 3, 1897) to reconstruct, even to the point of restoring the Hebrew original, a Kindheits-evangelium, which shall embrace the whole of the first two chapters of Lk and Mt with some extra-canonical parallels, is on the face of it a paradox, and, although no doubt containing useful matter, has not made converts.

ii. The Text of Mt 1¹⁶.—Within recent years certain phenomena have come to light in the text of the first chapter of St. Matthew which demand consideration in their bearing upon this part of our subject.

The peculiarities of the Curetonian Syriac, the (so-called) Ferrar group, and some MSS of the Old Latin, had been known for some time, but in themselves they did not seem of very great importance. A new and somewhat startling element was introduced by the publication of the Sinai-Syriac in 1894. More recently still a further authority has appeared, which contains the eccentric reading. This is the curious dialogue published by Mr. F. C. Conybeare under the names of Timothy and Aquila (Oxford, 1898). It professes to be a public debate between a Christian and a Jew held in the time of Cyril of Alexandria (A.D. 412–444), and it is in the main a string of testimonia commonly adduced in the Jewish controversy. It is a question how far some of this material comes from a work older than the date assigned. The criticism of the dialogue has been acutely treated by Mr. Conybeare, but the subject needs further examination. We will set forth the evidence at length, and then make some remarks upon it.

Mt 1¹⁶ Ἰακὼβ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσὴφ τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός, Codd. Græc. unc. qui exstant omn. minusc. quamplur. Verss. (incl. f ff$_2$, def. l), cf. Dial. Tim. et Aq. fol. 113 r°.

Ἰακὼβ δὲ ἐγέννησε τὸν Ἰωσήφ, ᾧ μνηστευθεῖσα παρθένος Μαριὰμ ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενος Χριστόν, 346–826–828 (auctore K. Lake, def. 13–69); cui desponsata virgo (om. q) Maria genuit Jesum qui dicitur (vocatur g, q), Christus a g, q, cf. Dial. Tim. et Aq. fol. 93 v°.

Similiter, cui desponsata virgo Maria genuit (peperit d) Jesum Christum (om. τὸν λεγόμ., Christum Jesum d) d k Syr.-Cur.

Jacob autem genuit Joseph, cui desponsata erat virgo Maria: virgo autem Maria genuit Jesum b (cf. c).

Ἰακὼβ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσὴφ τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός· καὶ Ἰωσηφ ἐγεννησὲν τὸν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν, Dial. Tim. et Aq. fol. 93 r°.

Ἰακὼβ ἐγενν. τὸν Ἰωσήφ· Ἰωσὴφ, ᾧ ἐμνηστεύθη παρθένος Μαριάμ, ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστον, Syr.-Sin.

The eccentric readings all occur within the range of the so-called Western text, and there is no doubt that they belong to a very early stage in the history of that text. Two opposite tendencies appear to have been at work, which are most conspicuously represented in ancient forms of the Syriac Version, though the original in each case was probably Greek.

On the one hand there was a tendency to emphasize the virginity of Mary, and to remove expressions which seemed in any way to conflict with this. For the blunt phrase, 'Joseph her husband,' the Curetonian Syriac with the oldest Latin authorities substitutes, 'Joseph to whom was espoused'—not only 'Mary,' but 'the Virgin Mary.' A little lower down (with Tatian's Diatessaron), for 'Joseph her husband being a just man' (ὁ ἀνὴρ αὐτῆς δίκαιος ὢν) it reads 'Joseph being a just man' (ἀνὴρ δίκ. ὤν). In v.²⁰ for 'thy wife' it has 'thine espoused.' In v.²⁴, again with Tatian, it has some such softened phrase as 'he dwelt chastely with her,' and for 'took his wife' it has 'took Mary'; and in v.^{25} (but here in agreement with ℵBZ al.) it has simply 'brought forth a son,'—not 'her first-born son.'

* 'If we are right in this view as to Luke's authority, and as to the way in which that authority reached him, viz. by oral communication, it appears that either the Virgin was still living when Luke was in Palestine during the years 57 and 58 . . . or Luke had conversed with some one very intimate with her, who knew her heart and could give him what was almost as good as first-hand information. Beyond that we cannot safely go; but yet one may venture to state the impression—though it may be generally considered fanciful—that the intermediary, if one existed, is more likely to have been a woman than a man. There is a womanly spirit in the whole narrative, which seems inconsistent with the transmission from man to man, and which, moreover, is an indication of Luke's character; he had a marked sympathy with women' (Ramsay, op. cit. p. 88). In view of the close resemblance between much that appears in the text and Prof. Ramsay's admirable chapter, it is perhaps right to explain that this had not been read at the time when the text was written, and that it represents an opinion formed long ago. The question as to whether the source was written or oral is left open, because there is reason to think that St. Luke used a special (written) source which may have been connected with the women mentioned below, and through them with the Virgin Mary. The writer could not speak quite so confidently as Prof. Ramsay as to the nearness of this source to the Virgin, but he does not think that it could be more than two or three degrees removed from her. It must have been near enough to retain the fine touches which Prof. Ramsay so well brings out.

In some of these readings, or parts of them, the Sinai-Syriac agrees, but along with them it has others which seem to be of a directly opposite tendency. The most prominent is, of course, 'Joseph begat Jesus,' in v.^{16}. We might have thought that this was an accident due to the influence on the mind of the scribe of the repeated ἐγέννησεν of the previous verses; but in v.^{21} the same MS has 'bear thee a son,' and in v.^{25} 'she bore him a son'; and in Lk 2^{5} there is a counter change to that of the Curetonian in v.^{20} ('with Mary his wife' for 'Mary his espoused'); all which readings hang together, and appear to be distinctly anti-ascetic. And now the singular reading in v.^{16} has found a coincidence in the conflate text of one of the quotations in the Dialogue of Timothy and Aquila.

It is of course true that both these authorities—the Sinai-Syriac and the Dialogue—are very far from thoroughgoing. The Syriac text has not tampered in any way with the explicit language of vv.$^{18.20}$; and—what is especially strange—in the very act of combining Ἰωσήφ with ἐγέννησεν it inserts a large fragment of the Curetonian reading (ᾧ ἐμνηστεύθη παρθένος Μαριάμ) substituted for τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας. On the other hand, the peculiar reading occurs in one only out of three quotations in the dialogue, and there in the form of a conflation with the common text. But is it the case that these authorities point to some form of reading older than any of those now extant, which made Joseph the father of Jesus? There would be a further question, whether, supposing that such a reading existed, it formed any part of the text of our present Gospel?

There would seem to be three main possibilities. (a) The genealogy may in the first instance have had an existence independently of the Gospel, and it may have been incorporated with it by the editor of the whole. In that case it is quite conceivable that the genealogy may have ended Ἰωσὴφ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰησοῦν. Unless it were composed by someone very intimate indeed with the Holy Family, it might well reflect the current state of popular opinion in the first half of the apostolic age. (b) The reading might be the result of textual corruption. There would always be a natural tendency in the minds of scribes to assimilate mechanically the last links in the genealogy to preceding links. A further confusion might easily arise from the ambiguous sense of the word γεννᾶν, which was used of the mother as well as of the father (cf. Gal 4^{24}). If we suppose that the original text ran, Ἰωσὴφ τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας ἣ ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν, that would perhaps account for the two divergent lines of variants better than any other. A reading like this appears to lie behind the Coptic (Bohairic) Version. (c) It is conceivable that the reading (or group of readings) in Syr.-Sin. may be of definitely Ebionite origin. That which we call 'heresy' existed in so many shades, and was often so little consistent with itself, that it would be no decisive argument against this hypothesis that the sense of the readings is contradicted by the immediate context. It would be enough for the scribe to have had Ebionite leanings, and he may have thought of natural and supernatural generation as not mutually exclusive. We can only note these possibilities; the data do not allow us to decide absolutely between them.

LITERATURE.—The fullest discussion of this subject took place in a lengthy correspondence in The Academy, towards the end of 1894 and beginning of 1895.

iii. The Genealogies.—At the time when it was thought necessary at all costs to bring one biblical statement into visible harmony with another, two hypotheses were in favour for reconciling the genealogy of our Lord preserved in Mt 1$^{1-17}$ with that in Lk 3$^{23-38}$. These were (a) the hypothesis of adoption or levirate marriage, according to which the actual descent might differ at several points from the legal descent, so that there might be two equally valid genealogies running side by side; and (b) the hypothesis that the one genealogy might be that of Joseph, as the reputed father of Jesus, and the other genealogy (preferably St. Luke's) that of Mary. A certain handle seemed to be given for this latter supposition by the tradition which was said to be found in the Talmud (tr. Chagig. 77, col. 4, Meyer-Weiss), that Mary was the daughter of Eli. [This statement appears to be founded on a mistake, and should be given up; see G. A. Cooke in Gore, Dissertations, p. 39 f.]. It was felt, however, that this view could only be maintained by straining the text of the Gospel; and it is now generally (though not quite universally) agreed that both genealogies belong to Joseph. On the other hand, the theory of levirate marriage or adoption, though no doubt a possible explanation, left too much the impression of being coined to meet the difficulty. The criticism of to-day prefers to leave the two genealogies side by side as independent attempts to supply the desiderated proof of Davidic descent. Were they the work of our present evangelists, or do they go back beyond them? Both genealogies appear to have in common a characteristic which may point to opposite conclusions as to their origin. That in the First Gospel bears upon its face its artificial structure. The evangelist himself points out (Mt 1^{17}) that it is arranged on three groups of fourteen generations, though these groups are obtained by certain deliberate omissions. That would be, in his case, consistent with other peculiarities of his Gospel: he evidently shared the Jewish fondness for artificial arrangements of numbers (Sir John Hawkins, Horæ Synopticæ, p. 131 ff.). From this fact we might infer that the stem of descent had been drawn up by himself from the OT and perhaps some local tradition. If such tradition came to him in writing, the list might still conceivably have ended in some such way as that which is found in the Sinai-Syriac, though if the list was first committed to writing in the Gospel the probability that it did so would be considerably diminished.

It would seem that a like artificial arrangement (77 generations = 7 × 11) underlies the genealogy in Lk. But as this is not in the manner of the Third Evangelist, and as he does not appear to be conscious of this feature in his list, it would be more probable that he found it ready to his hand. In that case it would be natural that it should come from the same source as chs. 1. 2, which would invest the genealogy with the high authority of those chapters. We cannot speak too confidently, but the conclusion is at least spontaneously suggested by the facts.

iv. The Census of Quirinius.—Until a very short time ago the best review of the whole question of the Census of Quirinius (Lk 2$^{1-5}$) was that by Schürer in NTZG § 17, Anhang 1 (HJP I. ii. 105 ff.). This was based upon a survey of the whole previous literature of the subject, and was really judicial, if somewhat severely critical, in its tone. As distinct from the school of Baur, which was always ready to sacrifice the Christian tradition to its own reconstruction of the history, Dr. Schürer is an excellent representative of that more cautious method of inquiry which carefully collects the data and draws its conclusions with no prepossession in favour of the biblical writers if also without prejudice against them. In the present instance he summed up rather adversely to the statements in St. Luke; and in the state of historical knowledge at the time when he wrote (1890), that he should do so was upon his principles not surprising.

According to St. Luke, our Lord was born at Bethlehem on the occasion of a general 'enrolment' (ἀπογραφή) ordered by the emperor Augustus and carried out in Palestine under Quirinius as governor of Syria. The date was fixed as being before the death of Herod, which took place in B.C. 4; and it was explained that Joseph and Mary, as belonging to the lineage of David, had gone up to enter their names at Bethlehem, David's city.

There were several points in this statement which seemed to invite criticism. (i.) In the first place, there was no other evidence that Augustus ever ordered a general census of the empire, although there was good reason to think that he took pains to collect statistics in regard to it. (ii.) Even if he had ordered such a census, it seemed doubtful whether it would be carried out in a kingdom which possessed such a degree of independence as Judæa. And (iii.) if it had been conducted in the Roman manner, there would have been no necessity for Joseph and Mary to leave their usual place of residence. Further, (iv.) while it was allowed, on the strength of a well-known inscription, that Quirinius probably twice held office in Syria, yet, as it was known that Sentius Saturninus was governor B.C. 9–7, and Quinctilius Varus at least B.C. 7–4, it was argued that Quirinius' first term of office could not be before B.C. 3–1, i.e. after the death of Herod. (v.) As there was, in any case, a census of Judæa conducted by Quirinius after its annexation by the Romans in A.D. 6, it was thought that St. Luke had a confused recollection of this, and antedated it (in the Gospel, though not in Ac 5^{37}) to the lifetime of Herod.

The chief authority for the census of A.D. 6 is Josephus; and an eminent German scholar, Dr. Th. Zahn, put forward in 1893 the view that it was Josephus who was at fault in dating from this year an event which really fell in B.C. 4–3 (Neue Kirchliche Zeitschrift, pp. 633–654). This brought the data more nearly, though still not entirely, into agreement with St. Luke. The theory need not, however, be more fully considered as it has not met with acceptance, and there can be little doubt that it seeks a solution of the difficulties in the wrong direction.

There was one little expression which might have given pause to the critics of St. Luke, viz. his careful insertion of the word 'first' ('the first enrolment made when Q. was governor of Syria'). It might have shown that he was in possession of special knowledge which would not permit him to confuse the earlier census with that of A.D. 6. And yet the existence of the earlier census remained without confirmation, until it suddenly received it from a quarter which might have been described as unexpected if experience did not show that there is hardly anything that may not be found there—the rubbish heaps of papyrus fragments in Egypt.

Almost at the same time, in the year when Dr. Zahn made his ingenious but unsuccessful attempt (1893), three scholars, one English and two German, made the discovery that periodical enrolments (ἀπογραφαί) were held in Egypt under the Roman empire, and that they came round in a fourteen-year cycle. The proof of this was at first produced for the enrolments of A.D. 90, 104, 118, 132, and onwards; but in rapid succession the list was carried back to A.D. 76, 62, and 20.

This gave the clue, which was almost at once seized, and the whole problem worked out afresh in masterly fashion by Prof. W. M. Ramsay, first in two articles in Exp. 1897, and then in his volume, Was Christ born at Bethlehem? A Study in the Credibility of St. Luke (London, 1898). It would be too much to say that every detail is absolutely verified. The age of Augustus as compared with that which precedes and with that which follows is strangely obscure, and the authorities for it defective. But considering this, the sequence of argument which Prof. Ramsay unfolds is remarkably clear and attractive. (i.) He shows it to be very probable that there was a series of periodical enrolments initiated by Augustus at the time when he first received the tribunician power, and his reign formally began in B.C. 23 (this is the official date usual in inscriptions, p. 140). (ii.) He also makes it probable that this was part of a deliberate and general policy—that the census-takings were not confined to Egypt, but extended to other parts of the empire, and more particularly to Syria. Here, too, there was a tendency to periodic recurrence, though the evidence is not, and is not likely to be, so complete as in the case of Egypt. (iii.) He has shown that Palestine was regarded as part of the 'Roman world,' i.e. of the empire. Though Herod had the liberty of a rex socius, the Roman power and the emperor's will were always in the background; he had to see that the whole Jewish people took an oath of allegiance to the emperor; he could not make war without being called to account; he could not determine his own successor or put to death his own son without an appeal to Rome; in a moment of anger Augustus threatened that whereas he had hitherto treated him (Herod) as a friend, he would henceforth treat him as a subject (Jos. Ant. XVI. ix. 3). It was therefore likely enough that Herod would wish, if he was not positively ordered, to fall in with the imperial policy by taking a census of his people, as another subject king did in Cilicia in A.D. 35. (iv.) But although Herod held a census at the instance of Augustus, it would be in keeping with his whole character and conduct to temper it to Jewish tastes as much as possible; and he would do this by following the national custom of numbering the people by their tribes and families. This was the broad distinction between this enrolment of Herod's and the subsequent census of A.D. 6 or 7. The latter was carried out by Roman officials and in the Roman manner, which was the real cause of the offence which it gave, and of the armed resistance which it excited. (v.) Some uncertainty still hangs over the mention of Quirinius. Mommsen thought that he was the acting legatus of Syria in B.C. 3–1. Prof. Ramsay inclines to the view that he held an extraordinary command by the side of Varus some years earlier, as Corbulo did by the side of Ummidius Quadratus, and Vespasian by the side of Mucianus. Such a command might carry with it the control of foreign relations, and be included under the title ἡγεμών.

v. The Meaning of the Virgin-Birth.—It is but a very few years since there arose in Germany (the date was 1892) a rather sharp controversy in which many leading theologians took part over the clause of the Apostles' Creed, 'Conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary.' The echoes of that controversy reached this country, and, although not much was said in public, it is probable that some impression was made upon public opinion. This impression was strengthened by the publication soon afterwards of the Sinai-Syriac with its peculiar reading, which was not unnaturally caught at as representing a more ancient and truer text than that to which we are accustomed. But if what has been written in the preceding sections has been followed, it will have been seen that between that time and the present (end of 1898) there has been a steady reaction. The eccentric reading has found its level. As it stands, it cannot possibly be original; and however it arose, it cannot really affect the belief of the Church, as it introduces no factor which had not been already allowed for. And at the same time the historical value of the documents, especially Lk 1. 2, has been gradually rising in the estimation of scholars, until the climax has been reached in the recent treatise of Prof. Ramsay. Even those who desire to see things severely as they are must feel that the opening chapters of St. Luke are full of small indications of authenticity, that they are really not behind the rest of the Gospel, and that they form no exception to the claim made at the outset that the facts recorded have been derived from 'eye-witnesses and ministers of the word.'

Along with this process there has been growing up a better and fuller philosophy of the Incarnation. This has been due especially to some of the contributors to Lux Mundi, and may be seen in Canon Gore's Bampton Lectures (1891) and Dissertations (1895), in Dr. Moberly's Lux Mundi essay, and in Mr. Illingworth's Bampton Lectures (1894) and Divine Immanence (1898).

To those who regard primitive ideas as compounded of nothing but idle imagination, ignorance, and superstition, the evidence in folk-lore of stories of supernatural birth (such as are collected in Mr. Sidney Hartland's Legend of Perseus, vol. i., 1894) seems to discredit all accounts of such birth, even the Christian. They do not sufficiently consider the entire difference of the conditions under which the Christian tradition was promulgated from those which surrounded the creations of mythopoeic fancy. The Christian tradition belongs to the sphere, not of myth but of history. It is enshrined in documents near in date to the facts, and in which the line of connexion between the record and the fact is still traceable.

But, apart from this, if we believe that the course of human ideas, however mixed in their character—as all human things are mixed—is yet part of a single development, and that development presided over by a Providence which at once imparts to it unity and prescribes its goal,—those who believe this may well see in the fantastic outgrowth of myth and legend something not wholly undesigned or wholly unconnected with the Great Event which was to be, but rather a dim unconscious preparation for that Event, a groping towards it of the human spirit, a prophetic instinct gradually moulding the forms of thought in which it was to find expression.

And if we ask further what it all means,—why the Son of Man was destined to have this exceptional kind of birth, the answer is, because His appearance upon earth—His Incarnation, as we call it—was to be in its innermost nature exceptional; He was to live and move amongst men, and was to be made in all points like His brethren, with the one difference that He was to be—unlike them—without sin. But how was a sinless human nature possible? To speak of a sinless human nature is to speak of something essentially outside the continuity of the species. The growth of self-conscious experience, expressed at its finest and best in the formulæ of advancing science, has emphasized the strength of heredity. Each generation is bound to the last by indissoluble ties. To sever the bond, in any one of its colligated strands, involves a break in descent. It involves the introduction of a new factor, to which the taint of sin does not attach. If like produces like, the element of unlikeness must come from that to which it has itself affinity. Our names for the process do but largely cover our ignorance, but we may be sure that there is essential truth contained in the scriptural phrase, 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee; wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God.'

[The most important literature has been mentioned in the course of this section].

IV. Concluding Survey: The Verdict of History.

A. CHRIST IN HISTORY.—So far we have been involved in the study of the details of the Life of Christ, mainly on the basis of the Gospels. But the Gospels alone, though the fragments which they have preserved for us of that Life are beyond all price, would yet convey an incomplete idea of the total impression left by it even upon contemporaries, still less of all that it has been in the history of the world. Especially would this be the case if, as some would have us do, we were to follow the first three Gospels only, to the exclusion of the fourth. To that point we shall return for a moment presently. But the time has now come to enlarge our view, to look back upon our subject from the vantage-ground which we occupy at the end of the 19th cent., and to endeavour to see it no longer as an episode affecting a small portion of an 'unimportant branch of the Semitic peoples,' but as it enters into the course of the great world-movement of the centuries.

If we would appreciate this, we must once more go back to the Origins, not now so much in search of details, as in order, if possible, to catch rather more of the total impression. We cannot, of course, attempt to interrogate the whole of history. For our present purpose it may be enough to consider (i.) the net result, if we may so speak, of the portraiture of Christ in the Gospels; (ii.) the impression left by a similar reading of other parts of the New Testament, especially the Epistles; (iii.) the testimony borne by the Early Church, both formulated and informal; (iv.) the appeal that may be made to the religious experience of Christians.

The last of these heads is not really so disparate as it may seem from the rest. The ultimate object that we have in view is to bring home—or to suggest lines on which it may be possible to bring home — what Christ really was and is to the individual believer. In order to do this we endeavour to collect (i.) what He was to those among whom He moved during His life on earth; (ii.) what He was to His disciples, and primarily to the apostles after His departure; (iii.) what the still undivided Church apprehended Him as being. It will thus be seen that there is no real antithesis, as though the appeal were in the one case to history and in the other to experience. For our present purpose history may be regarded as the collective experience of the past, which we are seeking to put into line with the individual or collective experience of the present. Our historical survey, so far as it goes, simply embodies so many superimposed strata of experience.

i. The Christ of the Gospels.—We should thus be inclined to deprecate the attempts which are from time to time made to set in contrast some one or other branch of the appeal that we are making as against the rest. In this country we are accustomed to the opposition between the Christ of the (Synoptic) Gospels and the Christ of 'Dogma' or of the Church. And in Germany of late there has been a tendency to oppose the Christ conceived and preached by the apostles to the biographical Christ of the Gospels, and the experience of faith to any external and objective standards. (See especially the works of Kähler and Herrmann mentioned below).

The disparagement of the Gospels as biographies seems to us, so far as it goes,—and neither writer is really very clear on the subject,—to rest upon a somewhat undue degree of scepticism as to the critical use that can be made of the Gospels. It does not follow that all that is doubted is really doubtful. For a more detailed testing of the historical character of the Gospels we must content ourselves with referring to the previous part of this article, only adding to it the two points which will be more appropriately introduced at the end of the next section,—the peculiar kind of confirmation which the two pictures (the evangelic and the apostolic) supply to each other, the difference between them showing that the teaching of the Epistles has not encroached upon the historical truth of the Gospels, while the less obvious likeness shows that they are in strict continuity. We shall also have to state once more in that context our reasons for believing the Fourth Gospel to be really the work of an eye-witness.

But the point that concerns us most at the present moment is that, even if we make to negative criticism larger concessions than we have any right to make, there will still remain in the Gospel picture ineffaceable features which presuppose and demand that estimate of the Person of Christ which we can alone call in the strict sense Christian.

Take, for instance, that central passage Mt 11$^{28-30}$ 'Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart: and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light.' Could we conceive such words put into any other lips, even the loftiest that the history of mankind has produced? They are full of delicate self-portraiture. They present to us a character which we may say certainly was, because it has been so described. No mere artist in words ever painted such a canvas without a living model before him. The portrait is of One who is 'meek and lowly in heart,' whose yoke is easy and His burden light; and yet He speaks of both yoke and burden as 'His' in the sense of being imposed by Him; He invites men to 'come' to Him, evidently with a deep significance read into the phrase; He addresses His invitation to weary souls wherever such are to be found; and (climax of all!) He promises what no Alexander or Napoleon ever dreamt of promising to his followers, that He would give them the truly supernatural gift of rest—the tranquillity and serenity of inward peace in spite of the friction of the world; that all this should be theirs by 'coming' to Him.

And then how easy is it to group round such a passage a multitude of others! 'I say unto you, Resist not him that is evil: but whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also' (Mt 5^{39}). 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister' (Mk 10^{45}||). 'Suffer the little children to come unto me; forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God' (ib. v.^{14}||). 'Whosoever would save his life shall lose it: and whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's shall save it' (Mk 8^{35}). 'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19^{10}, comp. the three parables of Lk 15). 'Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye did it unto me' (Mt 25^{40}).

Sayings like these, it is needless to add, could be multiplied almost indefinitely. Through all of them there runs, indirectly, if not directly, the same self-portraitures. And it is a self-portraiture that has the same two sides. On the one hand there is the human side, the note of meekness or lowliness, condescension that is not (though it really is!) condescension but infinite sympathy, patience, tenderness; and, on the other hand, no less firmly drawn, for all the lightness and restraint of touch, an absolute range of command and authority; all things delivered to the Son in heaven and on earth (cf. Mt 11^{27} 28^{18}).

That which we have called the 'human side' fills most of the foreground in the Gospels; the other, the transcendental side, is somewhat shaded by it; and we can see that it was deliberately shaded, that the proportions were such as mainly (though, as we shall see, not entirely) corresponded to the facts, or, in other words, to the divine method and order of presentation. But when we turn from the Gospels to the rest of the NT we shall find these proportions inverted.

We only pause upon this Gospel picture a moment more to say that, apart from any question of criticism of documents or of details in the narrative, it seems to us to be utterly beyond the reach of invention. The evangelists themselves were too near to the events to see them in all their significance. They set down, like honest men, the details one after another as they were told them. But it was not their doing that these details work in together to a singular and unsought harmony.

LITERATURE.—The fullest account of recent discussions as to the adequacy and trustworthiness of the presentation of Christ in the Gospels will be found in the second enlarged edition of Kähler's Der sogenannte historische Jesus und der geschichtliche, biblische Christus, Leipzig, 1896. Another work, which lays the stress rather on personal experience of the life of Christ, and is written with great earnestness from that point of view, but seems to us too restricted in its historical basis, is Herrmann's Der Verkehr des Christen mit Gott, ed. 2, Stuttgart, 1892 (Eng. tr. 1895).

ii. The Christ of the Apostles.—In passing over from the Gospels to the rest of the NT we find ourselves hampered by critical questions. What we should most wish to ascertain is the conception of Christ held by the mass of the first disciples. And to some extent we can get at this; but, so far as we can do so, it is nearly always indirectly. The writings that have come down to us are those of the leaders, not of the followers; and many even of these are encumbered with questions as to date and origin. Some of these do not so much matter, because in any case they belong to the end rather than the beginning of the apostolic age. The one book which we should most like to use more freely than we can is the Acts, the earlier chapters of which we quite agree with the author of the article in this Dictionary in estimating highly.

We will, however, cut the knot by not attempting to summarize the teaching of all the undisputed books, but by taking a single typical example of manageable compass, the first extant NT writing, 1 Thessalonians, written probably about A.D. 51—in any case not later than 53, or within the first quarter of a century after the Ascension.

Let us suppose for a moment, with the more extreme critics, that a thick curtain falls over the Church after this event. The curtain is lifted, and what do we find? We turn to the opening verse of the Ep. (emended reading). St. Paul and his companions give solemn greeting to the 'Church of the Thess. (which is) in God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.' An elaborate process of reflexion, almost a system of theology, lies behind those familiar terms. First we note that the human name 'Jesus' is closely associated with the title 'Christ' or 'Messiah,' which in the Gospels had been claimed with such quiet reticence and unobtrusiveness. From this time onwards the two names are almost inseparable, or the second supersedes the first: in other words, Jesus is hardly ever thought of apart from His high Messianic dignity. This effect is pressed home by the further title 'Lord' (Κύριος). The disciples had been in the habit of addressing their Master as 'Lord' during His lifetime, in a sense not very different from that in which any Rabbi might be addressed by his pupils (Jn 13$^{13f.}$). But that sense is no longer adequate; the word has been filled with a deeper meaning. That 'Jesus is Lord' has become the distinctive confession of Christians (1 Co 12^{3}, Ro 10^{9}), where 'Lord' certainly='the exalted Lord' of the Resurrection and Ascension (cf. Ac 2^{36}).

What is still more remarkable, the glorified Jesus is, as it were, bracketed with 'God the Father.' Let us think what this would mean to a strict Jewish monotheist; yet St. Paul evidently holds the juxtaposition, not as something to which he is tentatively feeling his way, but as a fundamental axiom of faith. In the appellation 'Father' we have already the first beginning — may we not say the first decisive step, which potentially contains the rest?—of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. And we observe, further, that the Thessalonian Church is said to have its being 'in Christ' as well as 'in God.' This is a characteristic touch of Pauline mysticism. The striking thing about it is that in this, too, the Son already holds a place beside the Father (cf. 2^{14} 4^{16}).

There is another passage in the Ep. (1 Th 3^{11}) in which there is the same intimate combination of 'our God and Father' and 'our Lord Jesus.' Here the context is not exactly mystical, but the two names are mentioned in connexion with the divine prerogative of ordering events. The apostle prays that God and Christ will together 'direct' (κατευθύναι, 'make straight and unimpeded') his way to them (the Thessalonians).

It is not by accident that the Holy Spirit is in a similar manner implicated in divine action (1$^{5.6}$ 4^{8} 5^{19}), though it would be too much to say that the Spirit is spoken of distinctly as a Person.

The historical events of the life of Christ are hardly alluded to, except His death and resurrection (1^{10} 4^{14} 5^{10}). In the last of these verses Christ is said to have died 'for us'; and in the preceding verse 'salvation,' which is contrasted with 'death,' is said to come 'through' Him. In 1^{10} He is also spoken of as delivering Christians 'from the wrath to come.' It is assumed that Christ is in heaven, from whence He is expected to come again with impressive manifestations of power (1^{10} $4^{15f.}$; cf. also the frequent allusions to ἡ παρουσία τοῦ Κυρίου).

The Second Coming is the only point on which the Ep. can be said to contain direct and formal teaching. The other points mentioned are all assumed as something already known, not as imparted for the first time.

Not only may we say that they are known, but it is also fair to infer that they are undisputed. There is a hint of controversy with the unbelieving Jews, but no hint of controversy with the Judæan Churches, which stand in the same relation to Christ ($2^{14\text{-}16}$). This is important; and it is fully borne out by the other Epistles, which show just how far the disputed ground between St. Paul and the other apostles extended. There was a good deal of sharp debate about the terms on which Gentiles should be admitted. There is no trace of any debate as to the estimate of the Person of Christ.

We have referred to the Pauline mysticism and to the hints, slight but significant, of what is known as the doctrine of the Atonement. It is clear that St. Paul ascribed to Christ not only divine attributes but divine activities—activities in the supersensual sphere, what he elsewhere calls 'heavenly places' (τὰ ἐπουράνια). We know how these activities are enlarged upon in Epp. to Co, Gal, and Ro. It would, of course, be wrong to suppose that all Christians, or indeed any great number, had an intelligent grasp of these 'mysteries'; but we can see from the Ep. to He, 1 P, Epp. Jn, and Rev, that conceptions quite as transcendental had a wide diffusion. And a verse like 2 Co 13^{14} shows that there must have been large tracts of important teaching which are imperfectly represented in our extant documents. When we consider how occasional these documents are in their origin, the wonder is not that they have conveyed to us so little of the apostolic teaching, but that they have conveyed so much.

The summary impression that we receive is indeed that the revolution foreshadowed at the end of the last section has been accomplished. The historical facts of the Lord's life were not neglected; for Gospels were being written, of which those which we now possess are only surviving specimens. But in the whole epistolary literature of NT they have receded very much into the background, as compared with those transcendental conceptions of the Person and Work of Christ, to which the Gospels pointed forward, but which (with one exception) they did not directly expound.

No doubt this was in the main only what was to be expected. The narrative of the Gospels goes back to the period before the Resurrection; the epistolary literature dates altogether after it. Still it is remarkable how we seem to be plunged all at once into the midst of a developed theology. Nor is the wonder lessened, it is rather increased, when we remark that this theology is only in part set before us deliberately as teaching. The fact that it is more often presupposed shows how deep a hold it must have taken alike of the writer and of his readers.

Impressive contrasts are sometimes drawn (e.g. at the beginning of Dr. Hatch's Hibbert Lecture) between the Sermon on the Mount and the Nicene Creed; and the contrast certainly is there. But it goes back far beyond the period of the Arian controversy. It is hardly less marked between the Sermon on the Mount and the writings which have come down to us under the names of St. Peter and St. Paul. And yet these writings are practically contemporary with the composition of the Gospels. The two streams, of historical narrative on the one hand and theological inference on the other, really run side by side. They do not exclude but rather supplement, and indeed critically confirm, each other. For if the Gospels had been really not genuine histories of the words and acts of Christ, but coloured products of the age succeeding His death, we may be sure that they would have reflected the characteristic attitude of that age far more than they do. They do not reflect it, but they do account for it by those delicate hints and subtly inwoven intimations that He who called Himself so persistently Son of Man was also Son of God.

The one Gospel which bridges the gap more unmistakably than the others is the Fourth. And the reason is obvious, if St. John was its author. He had a foot in both worlds. As the disciple whom Jesus loved, he vividly remembered His incomings and outgoings. And in the same capacity, as a disciple who was also an apostle, it fell to him to build up that theology which was the deliberate expression of what Jesus was to His Church, not in a section only of His being, the short three years which He had spent among His followers, but in His being as He had revealed it to them as a whole. It is difficult to think of either function as merely assumed by the writer at second-hand. On the contrary, we acquire a fresh understanding of the weight and solemnity of his words when we think of these as springing from direct personal contact with Christ, and intense personal conviction of what Christ really was, not to himself only, but to the world. In this respect the Fourth Gospel is unique; and the very expansion which it gives of the divine claims of Christ prepares us more completely than the other Gospels alone might have done for the transition from them to the Epistles.

It is an especial satisfaction to be able to quote, in support of this view of the first-hand character of the Fourth Gospel, Dr. Loofs in PRE^{3} iv. 29.

iii. The Christ of the Undivided Church.—For the purpose which we have before us we must examine the evidence of the Undivided Church on three distinct points. (a) What was the estimate of the Person of Christ in the age immediately succeeding that of the Apostles? (b) Are there any traces of a tradition different from this? (c) What is the bearing upon the subject of the creeds and conciliar decisions?

(a) On the first head we may say broadly that the mass of Christian opinion was in strict continuity with the NT, rarely (as we might expect) rising to an apprehension of its heights and depths, and keeping rather at the average level, but steadily loyal in intention, and showing no signs of recalcitrance.

Ignatius of Antioch has the strongest grip of distinctive features of NT teaching (Virgin-Birth, pre-existence, incarnation, Logos, Trinitarian language). Clemens Romanus, though much less theological, also has pre-existence and a clearly implied Trinity (lviii. 2). In the former point Barnabas and Hermas agree, though the latter shows some confusion, not uncommon at this date, between Son and Spirit. And then we have the opening words of 2 Clement which exactly describe the general temper, 'Brethren, we ought so to think of Jesus Christ as of God, as of the Judge of quick and dead.'

These, with Polycarp and Aristides, who adopt a similar tone, are the writers. And then, when we look for evidence as to popular feeling and practice, we have the wide prevalence of baptism in the Threefold Name (Didaché and Justin), and the hymns sung 'to Christ as God' (Pliny, Ep. ad Trajan. xcvi.; cf. Eus. HE v. xxviii. 5). It is clear that prayer was generally offered to Christ. Origen's objection to this was a theological refinement, as he held that the proper formula was εὐχαριστειν τῷ θεῷ διὰ Χ. Ἰ. (de Orat. 15).

The group of Apologists which stands out so clearly in the middle of the 2nd century is characterized chiefly by the use that is made of the Logos doctrine which was identified with the Logos of philosophy. With them begins a more active spirit of reflexion and speculation. The relation of the Son to the Father, and indeed the whole problem of unity and distinctions in the Godhead (Justin and Athenagoras), is beginning to be keenly canvassed. And at the same time it is clear that the question of what were afterwards called the 'Two Natures' was causing much perplexity. It was this difficulty which really lies behind the experiments of Gnosticism. When we come to the latter half and last quarter of the century, with the theologians of Asia Minor, Irenæus, and Clement of Alexandria, the foundations have been laid of a Christian theology, which already bears the stamp that marks it throughout succeeding centuries, viz. that it is not free speculation, but reflexion upon data given by the Bible.

(b) It was natural, and could not well have been otherwise, that there was in this reflexion at first a considerable tentative element. There was no break, and no conscious divergence between it and the canonical writings. But are there no signs of such divergence? Are there no signs of a tradition differing from that embodied in these writings? Perhaps we ought to say that there are.

The Gnostics began by inventing traditions of their own, but they soon fell into the groove, and professed to base their views like the rest on the canonical Scriptures. A conspicuous example of this is Heracleon's commentary on St. John. But in these circles there was what we might call recalcitrance, as when Cerinthus and Carpocrates rejected the Virgin-Birth as impossible (Iren. adv. Hær. I. xxvi. 1, xxv. 1). The Gnostics, however, are outside the true development of Christianity, and their systems had a different origin.

In closer contact with Christianity proper are the heretical Ebionites. For them a better claim might be made out to represent a real divergence of tradition. It is possible that their denial of the Virgin-Birth was derived from the state of things when the canonical narratives had not yet obtained any wide circulation. And yet we should have to pass upon these Ebionites a verdict similar to that already passed upon the Gnostics. They were really Jews imperfectly Christianized. If they regarded Christ as ψιλὸς ἄνθρωπος, it was doubtless because the Jews did not expect their Messiah to have any other origin. This is a different thing from, though it may have some subordinate connexion with, the views (e.g.) of Paul of Samosata, whose difficulty was caused by the union of the two natures. The human nature he regarded as having an ordinary human birth, though it came to be united to the Divine Logos.

A like account would hold good of Theodotus of Byzantium and the Rationalists described in Eus. HE v. xxviii. At last the reader may think that he is upon the track of a genuine Rationalism; but this did not go very deep. It was consistent with belief in the Virgin-Birth and in the Resurrection (Hippolytus, Ref. Hær. vii. 35); in fact it probably amounted to little more than a dry literal exegesis.

The Clementine Homilies point out that Christ did not call Himself 'God,' but the 'Son of God,' and they emphasize this distinction somewhat after the manner of the later Arians (xvi. 15, 16). When we have said this, we shall have touched (it is believed) on all the main types of what might be thought to be a denial of Christ's full Godhead.

The more pressing danger of primitive Christianity lay in an opposite direction. Loyalty to Christ was so strong that the simpler sort of Christians were apt to look upon the humanity as swallowed up in the divinity. This is the true account of the early prevalence of Docetism (which made the deity of Christ real, the humanity phantasmal or unreal), and of the later prevalence of what is known to students as Modalistic Monarchianism, and to the general reader as Sabellianism (the doctrine that the Son and the Spirit were not distinct Persons in the Godhead, but modes or aspects of the One God). The answer of Noetus was typical of the frame of mind that gave rise to this, 'What harm do I do in glorifying Christ?' (Hippol. c. Noet. 1): it seemed meritorious to identify Christ with God. Both these tendencies were far stronger and more widely spread than anything that savoured of Rationalism. Docetism entered largely into the Apocryphal Gospels and Acts, which were very popular; and both Tertullian (Prax. 1, 3) and Hippolytus (Ref. Hær. ix. 6, μέγιστος ἀγών) imply that the struggle against Monarchianism was severe.

It is evident from this to which side the scales inclined. The traces of anything like Rationalism in the modern sense are extremely few and slight. For the most part, what looks like it is not pure Rationalism (or Humanitarianism) at all. More formidable was the excess of zeal which exalted the divine in Christ at the expense of the human. But the main body of the Church held an even way between both extremes,—held it at least in intention, though there were no doubt a certain number of unsuccessful experiments in the construction of reasoned theory.

(c) It was inevitable that in the early centuries there should be a great amount of tentative thinking. But little by little this was sifted out; and by the middle of the 5th cent. the ancient Church had practically made up its mind. It formulated its belief in the Chalcedonian definition (ὅρος τῆς ἐν Χαλκηδόνι τετάρτης συνόδου) of the year 451 (which counts as Ecumenical, though the only Westerns present were the two legates of Pope Leo and two fugitive bishops from Africa), and in the Quicumque vult, a liturgical creed composed, according to a tradition which may be sound, by Dionysius [of Milan] and Eusebius [of Vercelli], (cf. the remarkable preface in the Irish Liber Hymnorum, i. 203, ii. 92, ed. Bernard and Atkinson, Lond. 1898).

This creed and the definitions of Chalcedon represent the end of the process; the beginning is marked by the creed known as the Apostles'. Criticism has of late been active upon this creed as well as upon the so-called Nicene and Athanasian, with a result which tends, it may be generally said, to heighten the value of all three. The date of the Apostles' Creed (in its oldest and shortest form) has been reduced within the limits A.D. 100–150; Kattenbusch, the author of the most elaborate monograph on the subject, leans to the beginning of that period, Harnack to the end. It is agreed that it was in the first instance the local baptismal creed of the Church of Rome, and that it was the parent of all the leading provincial creeds of the West. The principal open question at the present moment (1899 in.) is as to its relation to the Eastern creeds. Kattenbusch and Harnack both think that it was carried to the East in the time of Aurelian (circa 270), and that it became the parent of a number of Eastern creeds, including that which we know as the Nicene; but this is conjecture. Harnack thinks that the Roman creed coalesced with floating formulæ, to which he gives the name of Kerygmata, already circulating in the East. But these also are more or less hypothetical. And the question is whether the Eastern creeds, which resemble the Roman, were not rather offshoots, parallel to it, of a single primitive creed, perhaps originating in Asia Minor. This is substantially the view of Dr. Loofs. The main argument in favour of it is that characteristic features of the Eastern type of creed already appear in Irenæus and in a less degree in Justin. Harnack would explain these features as due to his Kerygmata; and from the point of view of the history of doctrine the difference is not very great, because the Kerygmata were in any case in harmony with the creed.

It would be difficult to overestimate the value of the existence of this fixed traditional standard of teaching at so early a date. It was the rallying and steadying centre of Catholic Christianity, which kept it straight in the midst of Gnostic extravagances and among the perils of philosophical speculation. Our so-called Nicene Creed is only the Apostles' Creed in one of its more florid Oriental forms, with clauses engrafted into it to meet the rising heresies of Arius and Macedonius; while the Chalcedonian formula and the Quicumque take further account of the controversies connected with the names of Apollinaris, Nestorius, and Eutyches.

The decisions in question were thus the outcome of a long evolution, every step in which was keenly debated by minds of great acumen and power, really far better equipped for such discussions than the average Anglo-American mind of to-day. If we can see that their premises were often erroneous (especially in such matters as the exegesis of the OT), we can also see that they possessed extraordinary fertility and subtlety in the handling of metaphysical problems. The disparaging estimates of the Fathers, which are often heard and seen in print, are very largely based upon the most superficial acquaintance with their writings. There are many things in these which may provoke a smile, but as a whole they certainly will not do so in any really open mind. There exists at the present time in Germany a movement, which bears the name of its author Albrecht Ritschl (1822–1889), directed against metaphysics in theology generally. No doubt Ritschl also was a thinker and writer of great ability; and the stress that he lays upon religious experience is by no means without justification. But it has not yet been proved that the negative side of his argument is equally valid, or that metaphysics can be wholly dispensed with. And so long as this is the case we certainly cannot afford to ignore these ancient decisions. Every word in them represents a battle, or succession of battles, in which the combatants were, many of them, giants.

LITERATURE.—The subject of this section brings up the whole history of 'Christology,' which may be studied in well-known works of Baur, Dorner, and Thomasius, or in Harnack's History of Dogma. There is an excellent survey by Loofs in PRE^{3} iv. 16 ff., art. 'Christologie, Kirchenlehre,' marked by much independent judgment and research. In English may be mentioned Gore, Bampton Lectures (1891); Fairbairn, Christ in Modern Theology (1893); R. L. Ottley, Doctrine of the Incarnation (1896).

The later phases of the critical discussions on the creeds are set forth in Kattenbusch, Das Apost. Symbol (Leipzig, 1894, 1898, unfinished); Harnack's art. 'Apost. Symb.' in PRE^{3} i. 741 ff. (this is the author's most complete and latest utterance; the Eng. reader may consult Hist. of Dogma, i. 157 ff.), and an important art. by Loofs in Gött. gel. Anzeigen, 1895.

For Ritschl's attitude it may be enough to refer to his tract, Theologie u. Metaphysik, Bonn, 1881. We had an English version of the opposition to metaphysics in the writings of Matthew Arnold.

iv. The Christ of Personal Experience.—In the case of Ritschl the religious experience of the individual or of communities is directly pitted against metaphysics as the criterion of theological truth. But apart from philosophical theory it is the criterion which is practically applied by hundreds of thousands of plain men—we will not say in search of a creed, but in support of the creed which they have found or inherited. And there is an immense volume of evidence derived from this source in corroboration of the truth of Christianity, or of what amounts to the same thing, the Christian estimate of the Person of Christ. The singular attraction of this Person, the sense of what Christ has done, not only for mankind at large but for the individual believer, the sense of the love of God manifested in Him, have been so overpowering as to sweep away all need for other kinds of evidence. They create a passionate conviction that the religion which has had these effects cannot be wrong in its fundamental doctrine, the pivot of the whole.

This personal experience operates in two ways. It makes the individual believer cling to his belief in spite of all the objections that can be brought against it. But it also possesses a formative power which so fashions men in the likeness of Christ, that they in turn become a standing witness to those who have not come under the same influence. St. Paul expresses this by a forcible metaphor when he speaks of himself as in travail for his Galatian converts 'until Christ be formed' in them, as the embryo is formed in the womb (Gal 4^{19}). The image thus formed shines through the man, like a light through glass, and so He who came to be the Light of the world has His radiance transmitted downwards through the centuries and outwards to the remotest corners of the earth.

This that we speak of is, of course, matter of common knowledge and of everyday experience. The note of the true Christian cannot help being seen wherever there is genuine Christianity. It is, however, an inestimable advantage that the process should have found expression in such classics of literature as the Confessions of St. Augustine and the De Imitatione. In these it can not only be seen but studied.

B. THE PERSON OF CHRIST.—It is necessary that this article should be brought to a close, and the close may seem rather abrupt. And yet the design which the writer set before himself is very nearly accomplished. It will be his duty at a later date to return to his subject on a somewhat larger scale; and for the present he would conclude, not so much by stating results as by stating problems.

i. The Problem as it stands.—We have seen that there are four different ways of attempting to grasp what we can of the significance of the Person of Christ. Towards these four ways the attitude of different minds will be different. For some the decisions of the Undivided Church will be absolutely authoritative and final. They will not seek to go either behind them or beyond them. Others will set the comparative simplicity of the Gospel picture against the more transcendental and metaphysical conceptions of the age that followed. To others, again, the picture traced in the Gospels will seem meagre and uncertain by the side of the exalted Christ preached by the apostles.[*] Yet others will take refuge in the appeal to individual experience, which will seem to give a more immediate hold on Christ and to avoid the necessity and perplexities of criticism. Others, still more radical in their procedure, will begin with the assumption that Christ was only man, and will treat all the subsequent development as reflecting the growth of the delusion by which He came to be regarded as God.

This last is a drastic method of levelling down the indications of the divine in history, against which human nature protests and will continue to protest. But, short of this, the other milder alternatives seem to us to put asunder what ought rather to be combined. They seem to us to propound antitheses, where they ought rather to find harmony. As the phases in question, distinctly as they stand out from each other, are so many phases in the history of Christianity, they ought to contribute to the elucidation of the Christianity which they have in common.

They ought to contribute to it, and we believe that they do contribute to it. There is, however, room still left for closer study, especially of the transitions. We have been so much in the habit of studying the Gospels by themselves and the Epistles by themselves that we have not paid sufficient attention to the transition from the one to the other. If we follow this clue, it will, we believe, show that the first three Gospels in particular need supplementing, that features which in them appear subordinate will bear greater emphasis, and that the resulting whole is more like that portrayed in the Fourth Gospel than is often supposed.

For instance, we are of opinion that much of the teaching of Jn 14–16 is required by the verse 2 Co 13^{14} and other allusive passages in the early Epp. of St. Paul; that the command of Mt 28^{19} (or something like it) is required by Didaché vii. 1, 3; Just. Apol. i. 61; that the teaching respecting the Paraclete is required by the whole Pauline doctrine of the Spirit; that the allegory of the Vine is required by the Pauline doctrines of the Head and the Members, and of the Mystical Union; that the full sense of Mk 10^{45} ‖ is required by such passages as Ro $3^{24.25}$ 4^{25} 5^{6-8} etc., and the full sense of Mk 14^{24} ‖ by He 9^{18-22}. And observations of this kind may be very largely extended.

In like manner, while it is certainly right that the conceptions current in the early Church as to the Person and Work of Christ should be rigorously analyzed and traced to their origin, full weight should be given to the analogues for them that are to be found in NT; and where they have their roots outside the Bible, even there the efforts of the human mind to express its deepest ideas may deserve a more sympathetic judgment than they sometimes receive.

And throughout, it is highly important that the doctrinal conceptions, whether of the apostolic age or of subsequent ages, should be brought to the test of living experience, and as far as possible expressed in the language of such experience. The mind and heart of to-day demands before all things reality. It is a right and a healthy demand; and the Churches should try with all their power to satisfy it. If they fail, the fault will not lie in their subject-matter, but in themselves.

ii. A pressing Portion of the Problem.—There is one portion of the problem as to the

[*] 'We know, literally speaking, with much greater certainty what Paul wrote than what Jesus spoke.' 'The centre of gravity for the understanding of the Person (of Christ) and of its significance falls upon what we are in the habit of calling His Work.' Kähler, Jesus u. das AT, pp. 37, 60.

Person of our Lord Jesus Christ which both in this country and in Germany has excited special interest in recent years. In its most concrete form this is the question as to our Lord's Human Knowledge, which, however, runs up directly into what is generally known as the question of the Kenosis. And that, again, when thoroughly examined, will be found to raise the whole question of the Two Natures. In regard to this series of connected questions there is still abroad an active spirit of inquiry.

It was started in the first instance by the argument from our Lord's use of the OT in its bearing upon the question of OT criticism. This led to a closer examination of the text, Mk 13^{32} ‖ var. lec. That, again, expanded into a discussion of the technical doctrine of the Kenosis (see the art. s.v.), an episode in which was a renewed study of the exegesis of Ph 2^{5-11}. And that in turn, in its later phase (H. C. Powell's Principle of the Incarnation, 1896), has opened up the whole question of the Two Natures, which in Germany for some time past has been far more freely handled than in Great Britain.

These discussions have produced one little work of classical value, Dr. E. H. Gifford's study of Ph 2^{5-11}, entitled The Incarnation, a model of careful and scientific exegesis, which appears to leave hardly anything more to be said on that head. It is also right to note the special activity on this subject of the diocese of Salisbury, largely due to the initiative and encouragement of its bishop (Mr. W. S. Swayne's Our Lord's Knowledge as Man, with a preface by the Bp. of Salisbury, 1891, and Mr. Powell's elaborate work, mentioned above). Weighty contributions have been made to the subject by Dr. Bright in Waymarks of Church History (1894), Canon Gore (Dissertations, 1898), and in arts. in the Ch. Quarterly, Oct. 1891, and July 1897.

On the Continent special views of the Kenosis are connected with the names of Dorner, Thomasius, Gess, Godet, and others rather more incidentally. Tracts upon the smaller questions have recently appeared by Schwartzkopff (Konnte Jesus irren? 1896), and Kähler (Jesus u. das AT, 1896).

In spite of all this varied activity, it may be doubted whether the last word has yet quite been said (Dr. Gifford's treatment of the exegetical question seems to us to come nearest to this). The first concern of the historian is that the facts shall be taken candidly as they are. It is more probable that our inferences will be wrong than the data from which they are drawn. And for the rest, we should not be surprised if a yet further examination of the subject should result rather in a list of tacenda than of prædicanda.

C. THE WORK OF CHRIST.—In regard to the Work of Christ also it is best for us to state problems. Of these the most important are the two that meet us first; they have not been much discussed; and complete agreement upon them has not yet been attained.

i. The Place in the Cosmical Order of the Ethical Teaching of Christ.—It is almost a question of names when it is asked whether Christ brought into the world a new ethical ideal. The question would be what constituted a new ideal. The Christian ideal, properly so called, is a direct development of what is found in OT, esp. in Pss. and the Second Part of Isaiah. But it receives a finish and an enrichment beyond what it ever possessed before, and it is placed on deeper foundations.

The chief outstanding question in regard to it would be the relation in which it stood to the older ideals of the best pagan life and philosophy in regard to the civic virtues, and to the newer ideals put forward in modern times in the name of science, art, and industry. The Christian ideal, it must be confessed, rather leaves these on one side. That it should do so would be quite as explicable if we adopt the Christian estimate of the Person of Christ as if we do not. If we do not adopt it, then the omission (so far as there is an omission) would be one of the limitations for which we were prepared. But if we take St. John's view of the relation of the Son to the Father, and see in His action the action willed by the Father, we shall see it as part of the great world-movement, presupposing so much of that movement as had proved itself to be of permanent value in the past, and leaving room for further developments, corresponding to altered states of society, in the future. The teaching of Christ was not intended to make a tabula rasa of all that had gone before in Greece or Rome any more than in Judæa; nor was it intended to absorb into itself absolutely all the threads of subsequent evolution, where those threads work back to antecedents other than its own. It was intended so to work into the course of the world-movement as ultimately to recast and reform it. Its action has about it nothing violent or revolutionary, but it is none the less searching and effective. It is a force 'gentle yet prevailing.'

Some remarks have been made above (p. 621 f.) on the way in which the Christian ethical ideal operates and has operated. It is not thought that they are really sufficient; but they represent such degree of insight as the writer has attained to at present, and he would welcome warmly any new light on the subject.

ii. The Significance of the Personal Example of Christ in regard to His Ethical Teaching.—When once it is realized that the root principle of the ethics of Jesus is Life through Death, the death of the lower self with a view to the more assured triumph of the higher, it must needs break in upon us that the Life of Christ bears to His teaching a wholly different relation from that which the lives of ordinary teachers bear to theirs. An honest man will no doubt try to practise what he preaches, but that will be just a matter of maxims of conduct. The Life of Christ, we can see, was something very much more than this. It was a systematic working out of the Christian principle on a conspicuous and transcendent scale. The Death and Resurrection of Jesus were the visible embodiment of the law of all spiritual being that death is the true road to the higher life.

When we reflect further who it was that was thus exhibiting in His own Person the working out of this law to the utmost extremity, we become aware that Christians have it indeed 'placarded' before their eyes (Gal 3^{1}) in a sense in which no moral law ever was set forth before.

Add that Christ had Himself predicted and that His followers generally believed that after His Ascension He was again visiting His people through His Spirit; that Divine forces were at work in the world, all radiating from Himself—Himself at once crucified and risen; add this to the previous beliefs of which we have just spoken,—remember that Christians supposed themselves to be actually conscious of these forces impressing and moulding their own hearts and lives, and we may come gradually to understand what St. Paul meant when he spoke of 'dying' or 'being crucified' with 'Christ' and 'rising again with Him.' It seems to be a similar idea to that which St. John expresses when he puts into the mouth of Christ the claim, 'I am the Way.' Rather, perhaps, we should not narrow down this phrase to anything less than the whole content of the Life of Christ on earth. 'He supplied in Himself the fixed plan, according to which all right human action must be framed: the Spirit working with their spirit supplied the ever-varying shapes in which the one plan had to be embodied' (Hort, Huls. Lect. p. 30).

iii. The Work of Christ as Redemptive.—Here we come on to more settled ground. At a very early date Christian tradition gave to Christ the title 'Saviour' (Lk 2^{11}, Ac 5^{31} 13^{23} etc.; cf. Mt 1^{21}, Lk 19^{10}), 'Saviour of the world' (Jn 4^{42}; cf. 3^{17}

12^{47}). What does this title 'Saviour' include? It doubtless includes every sense in which Christ rescued and rescues men from the power and the guilt of sin. He does this, as we have seen, both by teaching and by example—by inimitable teaching and by a consummate example. But if we follow the method indicated above (p. 651), if we take the hints in the Gospels, with the fuller light thrown upon them by the Epistles, we shall be led to the conclusion that there was something yet more in the Life and Death and Resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ than this, that there was something in these connected acts of His which had its counterpart in the sacrifices of OT; and that the deepest meaning and purpose of sacrifice was fulfilled in Him. This is a belief which Christians have held from the first days onwards; and it is a belief which does not and will not lack careful restatement at the present time.

iv. The Work of Christ as Revelation.—On a similar footing is the belief that Christ came not only to give, but to be a revelation of the inmost mind and character of the Father. Such a revelation was needed. It is not contained in the 'cosmic process.' If we had that process alone before us, we could not infer that God was a Being absolutely righteous and absolutely loving. The idea that He might be so could not rise above a hypothesis. But at this point the Incarnation intervenes. And here again the Synopt. Gospels present us with one central passage (Mt 11^{27}‖) with other scattered hints which are taken up and made more explicit in the Fourth Gospel, while that again does but give the fuller ground for a belief which was certainly held in the apostolic circle (comp. e.g. the central passage Jn 14^{7-10} with $10^{14f.}$ 3^{16}, 1 Jn $4^{8.\,16}$, Ro 5^{8} etc.). So we get the broad doctrine led up to by St. Paul and Ep. to the He (2 Co $4^{4.\,6}$, Col 1^{15}, He 1^{3}), and finally formulated by St. John, that the Son was the Logos or Word (which might be paraphrased 'mouthpiece,' or 'vehicle of utterance of the mind') of the Father.

v. The Founding of the Church.—Conventional language is too often heard as though the immediate object of the Incarnation was the founding of the full hierarchical system as it existed in the Middle Ages. This language is based on the complete identification of the Church with the 'kingdom of heaven' (see p. 620 sup.). On the other hand, there is a school of critics, both in Germany and in England, who deny that 'Jesus ever created, or thought of creating, an organized society.' The main ground for this latter view is the doubt that rests over the two instances—one of them ambiguous—of the use of the word 'Church' which are confined to the peculiar element of the First Gospel (Mt 16^{18} 18^{17}), and the certainty that there are some senses in which the 'kingdom' and the Church cannot be identified. In some (though not in all) of those who adopt this line of reasoning there is the further tendency to minimize or restrict all that would imply an extended outlook of Jesus over the ages.

It seems to us, however, to be going too far to say that the 'kingdom of heaven' is 'without organization and incapable of being organized.' The two parables of the Tares and the Draw-net distinctly imply the existence of a society; and that the divine laws and influences which constitute the kingdom should express themselves in a society as the vehicle for their realization is antecedently probable. But when Jesus gathered round Him the Twelve, He was practically forming the nucleus of a society; and that society has had a continuous existence ever since, so that it is difficult to think that it was not contemplated. Moreover, when we turn to the writings of St. Paul, we find that even in his earlier Epp. he seems to think of Christians as forming a single body with differentiation of function (Ro 12^{4-8}, 1 Co 12^{4-30}), and in his later Epp. (Eph, Col, Past. Epp.) the unity of the Church with its regular forms of ministry is brought out still more emphatically.

We also find that the Day of Pentecost is described in Ac as inaugurating a state of things which agrees well with the indications in Epp. Paul, while it confirms the promise of Lk 24^{49}, Jn $14^{16.\,26}$.

On the assumptions made in this art. it would be extremely improbable that this series of phenomena was not fully foreseen and deliberately designed by Christ. It would seem, however, that, after the manner of the divine operations in nature, He was rather content to plant a germ with indefinite capacities of growth, than thought it necessary Himself to fix in advance the details of organization.

The exact nature of the powers conferred upon the apostles is still a subject of much discussion as these concluding lines are written.

LIVES OF CHRIST.—To write the Life of Christ ideally is impossible. And even to write such a Life as should justify itself either for popular use or for study, is a task of extreme difficulty. After all the learning, ability, and even genius devoted to the subject, it is a relief to turn back from the very best of modern Lives to the Gospels. And great as are the merits of many of these modern works, there is none (at least none known to the writer—and there are several that he ought to know but does not) which possesses such a balance and combination of qualities as to rise quite to the level of a classic. What is wanted is a Newman, with science and adequate knowledge. No one has ever touched the Gospels with so much innate kinship of spirit as he. It should be needless to say that the Life of Christ can be written only by a believer. Renan had all the literary gifts—a curiosa felicitas of style, an æsthetic appreciation of his subject, and a saving common-sense which tempered his criticism; but even as literature his work is spoilt by self-consciousness and condescension, and his science was not of the best.

It will be well here only to name a select list of books which may be used more or less systematically. The minor works are legion.

Among the older works that would still most repay study would probably be those of Neander (ed. 7, 1873), Hase (Leben Jesu, ed. 5, 1865; Geschichte Jesu, 1876), Ewald (vol. vi. in Eng. tr. of Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, 1883), Andrews (American; revised ed. Edin. 1892).

In this country the books most generally current are Farrar's Life of Christ (since 1874); Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (since 1883, revised editions from 1886, abridged ed. 1890); to which should perhaps be added Cunningham Geikie, Life and Words of Christ (1877). Of these the best is probably Dr. Edersheim's (with very ample illustrations from Jewish sources); but none of the three can quite be said to grapple with the deeper underlying problems, critical or other. A striking attempt was made by the late Prof. J. R. Seeley to realize in modern forms the ethical and social aspect of the Life of Christ in Ecce Homo (ed. 6, 1866). And the imaginative works, Dr. Edwin A. Abbott's Philochristus (ed. 3, 1878), and the anonymous As Others Saw Him (1895, see p. 633^{b} sup.), may be consulted with advantage. [Dr. Abbott's later works have been mentioned above (p. 628^{a})].

In French, besides Renan, E. de Pressensé (1866, Eng. tr. same date and later; Protestant) may still be read. Père Didon (1891, also translated; Roman Catholic) represents with dignity the older orthodoxy, and A. Réville (1897) the newer criticism.

The most thoughtful and searching, as well as (if we except Dr. Edersheim) the most learned work, has been done in Germany. The two writers who have tried most earnestly to combine the old with the new are Bernhard Weiss, and Beyschlag. Of these we prefer Weiss. His Leben Jesu (1882, Eng. tr. 1883, 1884) is a conscientious and thorough piece of work, which, however, has to be studied rather than read. Beyschlag's (1885 and later) is more flowingly written, but also exhibits rather more markedly the weaker side of a mediating theology. Keim's Jesus von Nazara (1867–1882, abridged ed. 1873–1883) is impressive from the evident sincerity of its author, his intellectual force and command of his materials, but the critical premises are unfortunate. A concise Life which has just appeared by Dr. P. W. Schmidt of Basel (Gesch. Jesu, 1899) seems, if a glance may be trusted, to come under the head of minor works. It gains its conciseness by omitting debatable matter.

The student may be advised to take Weiss for his principal commentary, referring to Schürer (p. 609 sup.) or Edersheim for surroundings, and using along with it Tischendorf's Synopsis Evangelica, or a Harmony like Stevens and Burton's. He should read Ecce Homo.

JESUS CALLED JUSTUS (’Ιησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος ’Ιοῦστος).—A Jewish Christian resident in Rome during St. Paul's first imprisonment. The apostle sends a greeting from him to the Colossians (4^{11}), speaking at the same time of the comfort that he had received from him as a fellow-worker unto the kingdom of God. Nothing further is known of him.
J. O. F. MURRAY.

JETHER (יֶתֶר ‘abundance,’ ’Ιέθερ).—1. Father-in-law of Moses (RVm of Ex 4^{18} E), prob. a mistake for Jethro, יִתְרוֹ. 2. Eldest son of Gideon, Jg 8^{20}. When called upon by his father to avenge his uncle's death by executing the two Midianite chiefs, Zebah and Zalmunna, the lad shrank from the deed ‘because he was yet a youth.’ It seems surprising at first to find such a youth among Gideon's 300 tested warriors; but $8^{4ff.}$ belongs to a much older source than 7^{4-8}, and may be connected with 6^{34}, where Gideon's men are drawn from his own clan of Abiezer; thus the boy would be included in his father's following. 3. An Ishmaelite, father of Amasa, 1 K $2^{5.32}$, 1 Ch 2^{17}=יִתְרָא 2 S 17^{25} ’Ιόθερ, Luc. ’Ιέθερ. 4. 5. Two men of Judah, 1 Ch 2^{32} 4^{17}. 6. A man of Asher, 1 Ch 7^{38}=יִתְרָן v.^{37}, ’Ιέθερ A. Ithran was the name of an Edomite clan, Gn 36^{26} P.
G. A. COOKE.

JETHETH (יְתֵת).—The eponym of an Edomite clan, Gn 36^{40}=1 Ch 1^{51}, which has not been traced. The MT is not beyond suspicion, in view of the LXX (A) reading ’Ιεβέρ in Gn, (B) ’Ιεθέτ (A) ’Ιεθέθ in 1 Ch, and Luc. ’Ιεθέρ in both passages.

JETHRO (יִתְרוֹ; in Ex 4^{18a} יֶתֶר, i.e. Jether [so RVm]; LXX everywhere ’Ιοθόρ. יִתְרוֹ may be for יִתְרוֹן, or, as Dillmann prefers, for יִתְרוּ, a name of the same class as גַּשְׁמוּ of Neh 6^6 and bearing the same relation to יֶתֶר that גַּשְׁמוּ bears to גֶּשֶׁם of Neh 2^{19}).—The priest of Midian and father-in-law of Moses. It was while keeping Jethro's flocks that Moses had his vision of the burning bush and received his commission from J″ to the court of Egypt (Ex $3^{1ff.}$). Shortly thereafter he went to his father-in-law and obtained his permission to return to his brethren (4^{18}). In a previous narrative ($2^{15ff.}$) we are told how Moses, on fleeing from Egypt, came and dwelt in the land of Midian, how he assisted the seven daughters of the priest of Midian to water their flocks, and how finally he married one of these daughters named Zipporah. In this narrative no name is given to the priest (or it has been lost; see below).

An analysis of the above passages shows that Ex 3^1 and 4^{18}, as well as all the other passages where the name Jethro occurs (viz. $18^{1.2.5.6.9.10.12}$), belong to E, whereas Ex $2^{15ff.}$ is from J. Now the question arises, What is the relation of Hobab of Nu 10^{29} (also J) to Jethro? Is he identical with him, so that in the latter passage חֹתֵן מֹשֶׁה, ‘Moses' father-in-law,’ * applies to Hobab; or is he his son, Reuel being another name for Jethro, so that Hobab ben-Reuel was Moses' brother-in-law; or, as a third possibility,† are Hobab and Jethro both sons of Reuel and thus brothers? Various considerations point to the following as the most probable answer to these questions. Jethro is the name of Moses' father-in-law according to one tradition (E), Hobab ben-Reuel is the name according to another (J), which appears not only in Nu 10^{29} but also in Jg 1^{16} (see Moore's note) 4^{11}. All difficulty in the way of identifying Jethro and Hobab is removed if we regard ‘Reuel’ of Ex 2^{18} as a gloss due to a misconception of Nu 10^{29} (Driver, LOT^{6} p. 22f.), or substitute for this reading ‘Hobab ben-Reuel.’ It is true that some obscurity (but this is so upon any theory of the relation of the two names) still arises from the circumstance that alike in Ex $2^{15ff.}$ (J) and 3^1 (E) Moses' father-in-law is priest of Midian, whereas in Jg 1^{16} 4^{11} he is a Kenite. (See, further, Moore on Jg 1^{16}, and Dillmann-Ryssel on Ex 2^{18}).

A very important incident is recorded in Ex 18 (E), where Moses receives a visit from Jethro, and at his father-in-law's instigation appoints subordinates to assist him in the work of ‘judging’ the people. In v.^{27} we are told how thereafter Jethro ‘went his way into his own country.’ In J's narrative (Nu $10^{29ff.}$) we find Hobab in the camp of Israel, and gather the impression (cf. also Jg 1^{16} 4^{11}) that, though at first reluctant, he finally agreed to the proposal of Moses that he should remain and give the people the benefit of his services as guide. See, also art. HOBAB.

JETUR.—See ITURÆA.

JEUEL (יְעוּאֵל).—1. A Judahite, son of Zerah, 1 Ch 9^6. 2. A Levitical family name, 2 Ch 29^{13}. 3. A contemporary of Ezra, Ezr 8^{13}. In 2 and 3 Ḳerê has יְעִיאֵל, Jeiel. See GENEALOGY.

JEUSH (יְעוּשׁ; in Gn $36^{5.14}$, 1 Ch 7^{10} the Kethîbh has יְעִישׁ Jeish. The Ḳerê is supported by Gn 36^{18}, the LXX ’Ιεούς, ’Ιαούς, Vulg. Jehus, Jaus, as well as by the form in which the name occurs elsewhere).—1. A son of Esau by Oholibamah; also the eponym of a Horite clan, Gn $36^{5.14.18}$=1 Ch 1^{35}. 2. A Benjamite chief, 7^{10}. 3. A descendant of Saul, 1 Ch 8^{39}. 4. The name of a Levitical family, 1 Ch $23^{10f.}$. 5. A son of Rehoboam, 2 Ch 11^{19}.

W. R. Smith (Kinship and Marriage, 218, RS^{2}, 42 n. 4) proposes to identify Jeush with the Arabian lion-god Jaghûth, of whose name he declares that it is ‘the exact phonetic equivalent.’ This is favoured by Wellhausen (Reste^{2}, 22) and Nöldeke (ZDMG, 1886, p. 168); but Lagarde (Mittheil. ii. 77, Bildung der Nomina, 133), followed by Dillmann (Genesis, ad loc.), objects on the ground, amongst others, that the LXX ’Ιεούς points to ‘ and not gh in Arabic (see Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 109).

JEUZ (יְעוּץ).—The eponym of a Benjamite family, 1 Ch 8^{10}. See GENEALOGY.

JEW, JEWS (Heb. יְהוּדִי, יְהוּדִים (Kethîbh יהודיים), Aram. יְהוּדָיֵא, יְהוּדָאִין, ’Ιουδαῖος, strictly=persons belonging to Judah).—In Jeremiah, the earliest writer employing the term whose date is certain, it is found without (32^{12}) or with implied contrast to others ($40^{11.12}$ Moabites, 38^{19} 41^3 $52^{28.30}$, cf. 2 K 25^{25} Chaldæans, 44^1 Egyptians). Curiously (unlike the earlier phrase, ‘men of Judah,’ אִישׁ יְהוּדָה 1 S 11^8 etc., or אַנְשֵׁי י׳ 2 S 2^4) it is never found in contrast to persons of the N. Kingdom (2 K 16^6 is a more apparent than real exception, for though the ‘Jews’ spoken of do, in fact, belong to the S. Kingdom (14^{22}), yet they are contrasted with Syrians [MT] or, rather, Edomites). It seems, therefore, to have been scarcely used until the kingdom of Judah was the one existing Heb. kingdom. This change would make it the more easy for ‘Jew’ to be employed as a synonym of ‘Hebrew’ (Jer 34^9), and for the language common to N. and S. Pal. to be called ‘Jewish’ (יְהוּדִית 2 K $18^{26.28}$ ∥ 2 Ch 32^{18}, cf. Neh 13^{24}). Although those who inhabited Jerus. and Judah were still regarded for a time as having a special right to the title (Neh 1^2 6^6), yet it became the national name of the people of Israel in contrast to Gentiles (Neh 4^6 [^{12} AV] 5^8, Zec 8^{23}, Dn 3^8, Est 2^5, and often; cf. 1 Mac $8^{23.27}$ τὸ ἔθνος τῶν ’Ιουδαίων).

* It is very doubtful whether the Heb. חֹתֵן has ever the sense of brother-in-law; at least there is no certain example in OT of its meaning anything but father-in-law.

† If (with Ewald, Gesch. ii. 38) we read ‘Jethro ben-Reuel’ for ‘Reuel’ in Ex 2^{18}.

Josephus is therefore not far wrong when he says, ἐκλήθησαν δὲ τὸ ὄνομα ἐξ ἧς ἡμέρας ἀνέβησαν ἐκ Βαβυλῶνος, ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰούδα φυλῆς, ἧς πρώτης ἐλθούσης εἰς ἐκείνους τοὺς τόπους, αὐτοί τε καὶ ἡ χώρα τῆς προσηγορίας αὐτῆς μετέλαβον (Ant. XI. v. 7). Josephus also quotes a passage from Clearchus, which speaks of his master Aristotle definitely using the word 'Jew'; but as he only says that it is derived from Judæa, the country that the Jews inhabit, it is doubtful whether he uses the term in the merely local or the national sense (c. Ap. i. 22). Further, though nowhere expressly applied to members of the Ten Tribes (Mordecai as belonging to Benjamin would readily be called 'Jew'), yet, in view of the wide area over which 'Jews' are said to be scattered in Est 9^{15-19}, it seems impossible to believe but that when the Book of Esther was written the term included them.

In Neh 2^{16} (and so also, perhaps, 5^{17}, but not 5^{1}, cf. 5^{8}) 'the Jews' are distinguished from the priests, the nobles, the princes (sĕgānîm), and 'the rest that did the work,' and seem to mean the middle classes, which were, perhaps, then, as in NT times, the most zealous for Judaism. The term occurs as denominative of Gentiles adopting Judaism in Est 8^{17}.

In NT J. is generally used in contrast to Gentiles (e.g. Jn 2^{6} Ac 14^{1}), Samaritans (Jn 4^{9}), or proselytes (Ac 2^{10}), i.e. it = Jews both in race and religion (cf. also Jn 4^{22}). It is more natural in the mouth of Gentiles than Jews (Mt 2^{2}, cf. Lk 23^{37} spoken by Roman soldiers with ‖ Mt 27^{42}, Mk 15^{32} by the high priests). In Jn it specially denotes the typical representatives of Jewish thought contrasted with believers in Christ whatever their nationality and stage of belief, or with other Jews of less pronounced opinions (e.g. Jn 3^{25} 'a Jew,' 5^{10} 7^{13} 9^{22}, see more fully Westcott, St. John, Introd. I. 1. i. a. γ.). In Gal 2^{13} it refers to Christians of Jewish race (cf. St. Paul, 'a Jew, a man of Tarsus,' Ac 21^{39}). Lk 23^{51} ('Arimathæa, a city of the Jews') perhaps means that Ar. was in Judæa, not Samaria or Galilee. For a similar use of the adj. cf. Mk 1^{5}, Jn 3^{22}. In Ro $2^{28.29}$ (cf. Rev 2^{9} 3^{9}) with ref. to ideal Jews who correspond to God's call and choice. In Gal $1^{13.14}$ St. Paul speaks of the 'Jews' religion,' and the same expression (Gr. Ἰουδαισμός) occurs also in 2 Mac 8^{1} (cf. 2^{21} 14^{38}).

Jewess (הַיְּהֻדִיָּה 1 Ch 4^{18}).—'And his wife the Jewess,' RV ('Jehudijah,' AV), i.e. perhaps of the tribe of Judah, but perhaps in the widest sense (see above), esp. if she is contrasted with Bithiah, the daughter of Pharaoh, who was, as it seems, Mered's other wife.

In NT Timothy's mother is said to be a believing Jewess, but his father a Greek (Ac 16^{1}). In Ac 24^{24} Drusilla the wife of Felix is called a Jewess. In both cases there is no thought of the tribe.

Jewish (יְהוּדִית, Ἰουδαιστί).—Of the language of the inhabitants of Jerus. in time of Hezekiah (2 K $18^{26.28}$ ‖ Is $36^{11.13}$, cf. 2 Ch 32^{18}) and of Nehemiah (Neh 13^{24}); in both cases contrasted with that of non-Isr. nations. In the time of Hez. this was quite, and in that of Nehem. almost, certainly Hebrew. In Tit 1^{14} 'Jewish fables' prob. = Haggadôth, by which Jewish teachers popularized their philosophical speculations. A. LUKYN WILLIAMS.

JEWEL is EV tr^{n} of 1. חֲלִי Ca 7^{1} 'The joints of thy thighs (RVm 'thy rounded thighs') are like jewels.' The word comes from a root חָלָה 'adorn.' Its only other occurrence is in Pr 25^{12}, where it is coupled with נֶזֶם 'nose-ring,' and where AV, RV tr. 'ornament.' From the same root comes 2. The ἅπ. λεγ. חֶלְיָה (again coupled with נֶזֶם) in Hos 2^{13} [Heb.^{15}], used of the jewellery worn upon the occasion of a religious festival. Festal garments and ornaments were in accordance with ancient custom, Ex $3^{18ff.}$. One who had not a special robe (Gn 35^{2}), at least washed his ordinary garments (Ex 19^{10}) before approaching the presence of the Deity (cf. W. R. Smith, RS 433 f.). After the celebration was over, the festal garment and ornaments were put off, because a certain virtue was believed to attach to them from contact with the object of worship, cf. Ezk 44^{19} '(The priests) shall put off their garments wherein they minister and lay them in the holy chambers, and they shall put on other garments, that they sanctify not the people with their garments'; cf. also the mantle of Elijah, 2 K $2^{8ff.}$ (see the interesting note of Nowack, Kl. Proph. 20).

3. כְּלִי, a general term for 'article,' 'utensil,' 'vessel,' 'thing.' When coupled with כֶּסֶף 'silver,' or זָהָב 'gold,' or both of them, it is tr^{d} 'jewels' in Gn 24^{53}, Ex 3^{22} 11^{2} 12^{35} 35^{22}, Nu $31^{50.51}$, 1 S $6^{8.15}$, Job 28^{17} (with פָּז), Is 61^{10}; so with יְקָר ('preciousness') in Pr 20^{15}; with תִּפְאֶרֶת ('fairness') in Ezk $16^{17.39}$ 23^{26}; with חֲמֻדָה ('desirableness,' 'preciousness') in 2 Ch 20^{25} (cf. חֶמְדָּה in 32^{27}, where for AV 'jewels' RV has 'vessels').

4. נֶזֶם, which in EV is three times (Pr 11^{22}, Is 3^{21}, Ezk 16^{12}) tr^{d} 'jewel,' means 'nose-ring.'

5. סְגֻלָּה, Mal 3^{17} 'in that day when I make up my jewels.' Unfortunately, there can be no doubt that this beautiful and familiar phrase rests upon a mistranslation. The Heb. reads וְהָיוּ לִי לַיּוֹם אֲשֶׁר אֲנִי עֹשֶׂה סְגֻלָּה, which can hardly mean anything else than 'They shall be mine, in the day that I do make* (cf. v.^{21}), even a peculiar treasure' (so RV and Amer. RV, except that the latter gives 'mine own possession' instead of 'a peculiar treasure'). סְגֻלָּה, applied in 1 Ch 29^{3}, Ec 2^{8} to a private treasure (of gold, silver, etc.) belonging to kings, is repeatedly used of Israel as the special possession or prize of J″, Ex 19^{5}, Dt 7^{6} 14^{2} 26^{18}, Ps 135^{4} (see Driver on Dt 7^{6}).

In Ca 1^{10} where AV has 'rows (of jewels)' RV gives 'plaits (of hair).' The Heb. is תּוֹרִים, the meaning of which is quite uncertain. Baethgen (in Kautzsch's AT) gives Gehänge, Siegfried-Stade Schnüre. In the second clause of the same verse RV substitutes 'strings of jewels' for AV 'chains (of gold).' The Heb. is חֲרוּזִים, which Siegfried-Stade tr. Perlen-, Corallenschnüre; Baethgen, Schnüre; Oxf. Heb. Lex. 'strings of beads.' In 1 P 3^{3} where AV has simply 'gold' RV gives 'jewels of gold,' which is a more exact rendering of χρυσίων (gen. plur.).

In Trumbull's Studies in Oriental Social Life (p. 319 ff.) there is a striking chapter on the extent to which gold and silver ornaments are worn by the women of Egypt and Arabia. Oriental dress lends itself to ornamental treatment much more than the Western style. The materials may be gold, silver, and rich cloth, as well as precious stones. All the references in Scripture to jewellery imply that it was highly appreciated, and might easily become dangerous to the moral life. It caused the tragedy of Achan; and provided at once the golden calf and the furnishings of the tabernacle. Among Orientals, the same taste that enjoys rich heavy perfumes and bright dazzling colours in dress, naturally found pleasure in the gorgeous display of jewellery. Jewels took the form of armlet, anklet, bracelet, crescent, earring, nose-ring, necklace, and often had a value of amulet protection. See, further, STONES (PRECIOUS).

JEWRY.—The Gr. name Ἰουδαία was rendered by Tindale Jewry (usually spelt by him 'Jury'), and this was accepted by all the VSS following, except occasionally Rhem. (Juda) and AV. The AV was apparently the first to use the more accurate form Judea, and it does so everywhere in NT, except Lk 23^{5}, Jn 7^{1}, where the earlier form Jewry has been allowed to stand. RV has everywhere the still more accurate spelling Judæa (wh. see). The Apocr. was more carelessly tr^{d} in AV, hence Jewry is oftener retained, as 1 Es 1^{32} 4^{49} $5^{7.8.57}$ 6^{1} 8^{81} 9^{3}, Bel ^{33}, 2 Mac 10^{24}; but still Judea is the more frequent form. In RV the Apocr. is not more carelessly, but it is less consistently tr^{d} than NT, and so Jewry is allowed to remain in 1 Es and Bel, but changed to Judæa in 1 Mac. In OT the form Jewry occurs but once in AV, Dn 5^{13}. The Aram. is יְהוּד, a form which in the very same verse is tr^{d} Judah, as it is rendered everywhere else except Ezr 5^{8} (Judea). RV always Judah. Cf. Tindale's tr^{n} of Mt $2^{5.6}$ 'And they sayde unto hym; at Bethleem in Jury (τῆς Ἰουδαίας). For thus it is written by the Prophet. And thou Bethleem in the londe of Jury (γῆ Ἰούδα), art not the leest concernynge the Princes of Judah (Ἰούδα).'

J. HASTINGS.

JEZANIAH (in Jer 40 [Gr. 47]^{8} יְזַנְיָהוּ, LXX Ἰεζονίας; in 42 [Gr. 49]^{1} יְזַנְיָה, BA Ἀζαρίας, Q^{mg} Ἰεζονίας).—A Judahite military officer who joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (Jer 40^{8}). After the murder of Gedaliah, Jezaniah was one of those who went to the prophet Jeremiah for counsel as to their future action (42^{1}). He is called in 2 K 25^{23} Jaazaniah (which see), and is apparently to be identified also with Azariah (עֲזַרְיָה Ἀζαρίας) of Jer 43^{2}, who was prominent in rejecting the prophet's advice.

JEZEBEL (אִיזֶבֶל, perhaps * 'un-exalted,' 'unhusbanded' [see Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 33^{a}], Ἰεζάβελ).—The daughter of Ethbaal, and wife of Ahab. Ethbaal (Ithobaal) had, after a period of revolution and anarchy, seized (c. B.C. 888) the throne of Tyre, which he occupied for more than thirty years. He was the first monarch of note who had reigned in Phœnicia since the days of Hiram, and his alliance was doubtless sought by Omri and Ahab in order to counterbalance the hostility of Damascus. The marriage of J. to Ahab (1 K 16^{31}) exercised a powerful influence upon the history of religion in Israel, and indirectly also in Judah, where J.'s daughter, Athaliah, afterwards shared the throne with Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat. The worship of the Tyrian Baal was now supported by all the court influence. We are not, indeed, to suppose that Ahab abandoned the worship of J", whose prophets he still consulted (1 K 22^{6}), and whose name he meant to honour by the names he gave to his children (Ahaziah, Jehoram, Athaliah, all of which are compounds containing some form of יהוה). Nay, he could have pleaded that he simply copied the example of Solomon, both in his foreign marriage and in erecting a sanctuary for Baal (cf. 1 K $11^{1.7}$ with $16^{31.33}$). But what had been tolerated in the days of Solomon now met with strenuous opposition. To the great prophet Elijah, J" was a jealous God; there was no longer room in Israel for the worship of Baal; there must be no 'halting between two opinions,' but a definite choice of the one or the other deity. The attitude assumed by Elijah, and those like-minded with him, provoked the resentment of J., in whose hands Ahab seems to have been little more than a tool. The prophets of J" were either put to death or driven to conceal themselves (1 K 18^{4}), until Elijah could exclaim, 'I, even I only, am left, and they seek my life to take it away' (1 K 19^{14}). The issue of the conflict on Mount Carmel, and the slaughter of the prophets of Baal, from which Elijah hoped so much, served only to augment the persecuting zeal of the queen (1 K 19^{2}).

The darkest stain, however, upon the memory of J. is left by the atrocious crime she perpetrated (1 K 21) in order to procure for her husband the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite (see NABOTH). The judicial murder of Naboth sent a thrill of horror through the land, and, as W. R. Smith (Proph. Isr. 87), following Ewald and Wellhausen, has truly remarked, this crime had far more to do than the worship of Baal with undermining the throne of Ahab and Jezebel. The popular feeling is doubtless truly reflected in the terrible sentence which (according to the Deuteronomic compiler) Elijah passed upon the actors in this tragedy (1 K 21^{17-24}).

J. survived her husband (who fell in battle at Ramoth-gilead, c. B.C. 853) some ten years, and saw her two sons, Ahaziah and Jehoram, in succession seated upon the throne. The house of Omri was at length destroyed by Jehu, a cavalry officer in the service of Jehoram, who treacherously slew both his master and Ahaziah king of Judah (2 K $9^{24ff.}$). When tidings of the catastrophe reached J., the aged queen prepared to meet death with fortitude and dignity. Having attired herself as for a state occasion (the notion that she meant to captivate Jehu by her charms is too ridiculous to need refutation), she awaited the arrival of the usurper, whom she mockingly accosted, 'Is it well with Zimri, the murderer of his master?'* The answer of the brutal Jehu was to order her eunuchs to cast her down from the window of the palace, and, as the helpless woman lay stunned by the fall, he and his captains trampled her under their horses' feet. After a banquet held to celebrate the success of his conspiracy, the savage warrior ordered the rites of sepulture to be paid to his victim; but it was discovered that her body had been devoured by the street dogs. So perished miserably the proud daughter of Tyre, and the murder of Naboth was avenged (2 K 9^{30-37}).

The impression of J. that is left upon us by the narrative of the OT is that of an able, resolute woman, who, once she had formed a purpose, carried it to a conclusion, without much scruple as to the methods she employed. Whether she was guilty, in a literal sense, of the 'whoredoms and witchcrafts' of which Jehu speaks in 2 K 9^{22}, we have not sufficient evidence to decide. Her accuser is by no means an unprejudiced witness, and even he may have only meant, in his coarse fashion, to allude to her worship of the Tyrian Baal. Later traditions interpreted the accusation in its most literal sense (cf. Rev 2^{20}).† There can be little doubt that the prevailing estimate of J.'s character is far less favourable than that which was cherished by her contemporaries. Much of the obloquy that attaches to her name, and that has made 'a Jezebel' a term of reproach, is due to an inexcusable misunderstanding of 2 K 9^{30}, which records a perfectly innocent and dignified act. It is surely a singular coincidence whereby the murderer and his victim, Jehu and Jezebel, are remembered best, not for the part they played at an important crisis in Israel's history, but he for his 'furious driving,' and she for her painted face!

* Hommel's theory (AHT 116), that the first element of the word is a divine name, is very precarious. König (Expos. Times, Jan. 1899, p. 190^{a}) suggests that the first element is אִי 'island,' and that the name may mean 'exalted isle,' which may have been originally an honorific appellation of Tyre itself.

* AV 'Had Zimri peace who slew his master?' is an improbable rendering, and even RV (text) 'Is it peace, thou Zimri, thy master's murderer?' seems hardly to suit the occasion. Our rendering is supported by Kautzsch's AT, 'Geht es Simri wohl?' and by Reuss, 'Wie geht's du Simri?' which is paraphrased by the latter, 'Ei guten Tag du Canaille!'

† The correct text is τὴν γυναῖκα. The copyist who added σου seems to have understood the 'angel' of the Church as the bishop. The name 'Jezebel' must be understood symbolically and not as the real name of the woman against whom the denunciation is uttered. She appears to have been a false prophetess (within the Christian Church, and not belonging to Judaism or heathenism) whose teaching had a licentious tendency, πορνεύειν and μοιχεύειν being probably used in a literal and not a figurative sense. Bousset (see his exhaustive note) thinks there is not sufficient evidence to warrant the interesting suggestion of Schürer, that Jezebel in this text is the priestess of the Chaldæan Sibyl, Sambethe, who is believed by Schürer to have had a sanctuary at Thyatira.

JEZIEL (יְזִיאֵל Kerê, יזואל Kethîbh; B Ἰωήλ, A Ἀζιήλ).—A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12³.

JEZRAHIAH (יִזְרַחְיָה='J" will shine,' Luc. ℵᶜ·ᵃ Ἰεζριάς, ℵ*BA omit, Neh 12⁴²).—The leader of the singers at the solemn dedication of the walls of Jerus. in the time of Nehemiah. In 1 Ch 7³ bis the same name is rendered Izrahiah.

JEZREEL (יִזְרְעֶאל 'God soweth').—1. A Judahite (1 Ch 4³). See GENEALOGY. 2. The symbolical name of Hosea's eldest son (Hos 1⁴), given in token of the prophet's disapproval of the massacre of Ahab's family at J., and his expectation that divine vengeance would speedily overtake the dynasty of its perpetrator, Jehu. See HOSEA, p. 421ᵃ. 3. J. is used in Hos 2²²· ²³ as a name for Israel, with a play upon the etymology of the word.

JEZREEL (יִזְרְעֶאל 'God soweth'; LXX A Ἰεσραέλ, Ἰεζραέλ, Ἰεζραήλ, Ἐσραέ; B Ἰαζήλ, Ἰσραήλ, Ἐζερεέλ; Jos. Ant. VIII. xiii. 6, Ἰερέζηλα; VIII. xv. 4, 6, Ἰεζέρηλα, var. Ἰζάρα, etc.).—This is the Heb. name of the great plain (עֵמֶק יִ׳, Jos 17¹⁶, Jg 6³³, Hos 1⁵) now generally called Esdraelon, and by the Arabs known as Merj ibn-'Amr. In modern times it has been applied especially to the vale between Jebel Duhy and Gilboa, sloping E. towards Beisân (see ESDRAELON). Jezreel* is the name also of—

1. A city in the territory of Issachar (Jos 19¹⁸), the site of which is now occupied by the village of Zer'în. This identification is beyond question. The two names are practically identical; the soft initial yod of the Heb. is dropped, and, as is not unusual, the Heb. -el is replaced by the Arab. -în in the modern word. Similar instances are found in Beitîn for Bethel, and Isma'în for Ishmael. Eusebius and Jerome (*OS*² 268. 52, 165. 14) place Jezreel in the great plain between Legio (Khân Lejjûn) and Scythopolis (Beisân), and the Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) gives the distance from Beisân as 12 Roman miles, conditions quite met by Zer'în. Eusebius and Jerome speak of Esdraela, and the Bordeaux Pilgrim of Stradela, both obvious modifications of the Greek name of Jezreel. In Crusading times it was called Parvum Gerinum (William of Tyre, xxii. 6), and in 1173 Benjamin of Tudela mentions Zarein (זַרְיין) as Jezreel. (The Constantinople ed. gives זַרְזִין, but it is full of errors). Brocardus (c. vii. 176, 177) speaks of Zarein, and notes the fine view which it commands. Sir John Maundeville says, '5 miles from Nain is the city of Jezreel, which was formerly called Zarim' (Early Travels in Palestine, Bohn's ed. p. 184). Robinson observes that from the 14th cent. to the beginning of the 19th the identification was lost sight of. He was himself the first to put it on a secure basis (BRP iii. 161–168 [² ii. 318–325]).

The beautiful and commanding situation of Jezreel amply warranted the distinction conferred upon it by Ahab and Jezebel. Mount Gilboa terminates to the N. in bold bluffs which descend steeply into the vale of Jezreel, and to the N.W. throws off a low sinking promontory, thrust like a wedge between the vale of Jezreel and the great bay of Esdraelon, which sweeps round by the base of Gilboa to Jenîn. Guarded on the N. by precipitous cliffs about 100 ft. in height, with the splendid rampart of Gilboa S. and S.E., it is a position of considerable strength, being easiest of approach from the S.W. Here, at an elevation of 200 ft. above the plain, stands the village of Zer'în. The hovels that form the village, some thirty in number, built on a mound of rubbish, are mean and dirty, and the general aspect is one of squalor. The inhabitants have been corrupted by travellers, and have learned to prey upon all who pass, while the street dogs here have an evil reputation for savageness.

The place contains little of interest and no antiquities. There are numerous broken cisterns among the houses; and Guérin found a white marble sarcophagus W. of the town (Samarie, i. 311; PEF Mem. ii. 131). The one conspicuous building is a large square tower, of no great age, now commonly used as a medâfeh or place for the entertainment of guests. From the top of this structure a magnificent view is obtained, including the great plain in its whole extent, and every point of importance around it, with the single exception of Tabor. S. and S.E. runs the high barren wall of Gilboa, with its memories of humiliation and defeat for Israel. From En-gannim (Jenîn), its white domes and minarets glancing amid the greenery of its sheltered nook, the Samaritan mountains rising behind, the eye ranges along the edge of the plain to Megiddo (Khân Lejjûn), and thence to the bushy heights of Carmel, the rough crest of el-Maḥraḳah, the place of Elijah's burnt-offering showing clear against the sky. Cut off from the mountain on the north by the gorge of the Kishon, low oak-clad hills divide the plain of Acre from Esdraelon, and, sweeping round eastward in more fertile slopes, drop in precipitous cliffs upon the plain just south of Nazareth, the highest of whose white houses one may descry, with the dark uplands of Galilee beyond. Mt. Tabor is hidden by the shapely mass of Jebel Duhy, the hill of Moreh, crowned by its wely, with Shunem, Nain, and Endor clinging to its sides. Far down the broad and fertile vale of Jezreel as it slopes to the Jordan Valley, we catch a glimpse of the citadel of Beisân; and across the Ghôr the view is barred by the steep and rugged mountains of Gilead.

Besides the cisterns mentioned above, Jezreel was well situated for water supply. Bîr es-Suweid lies to the N. of the town; and at the base of the cliffs to the E. the waters of el-'Ain el-Meiyiteh, 'the dead spring,' form quite a considerable stream. The fountain is so named because once it dried up. After deep digging the waters flowed again; the pit was filled with loose gravel, and since then the supply has been continuous. About a mile farther E., in a cave at the base of Gilboa, a still more copious spring bursts forth, the stream from which is strong enough to turn a mill. This is probably the fountain where the Israelites encamped before the disastrous battle of Gilboa (1 S 29¹). It is also with some likelihood identified with the spring of Harod (Jg 7¹). The native name, 'Ain Jalûd or Jalût (Arab. for Goliath), seems due to some confusion with the scene of David's encounter with the giant. 'Here is the plain where David slew Goliath,' says the Bordeaux Pilgrim; but beyond this, says Robinson, no trace of the tradition is to be found. The fountain which the Crusaders knew as Tubana was doubtless the spring 'Ain Ṭuba'ûn, some little distance off, surrounded by marshy ground. The water is slightly reddish in colour. Conder suggests that this may represent the Talmudic Tubnia (Tosephta, Sheviith, ch. vii. ; PEF Mem. iii. 79). The water of all these fountains is sweet, and abounds in small fish : on this was founded the legend of the Crusading army being miraculously supplied with fish for some days (William of Tyre, xxii. 27).

* The plain probably derived its name from the city, and not vice versâ (see Budde, Richt. u. Sam. 46 ff.).

Jezreel is first mentioned in marking out the lot of Issachar (Jos 19^{18}). It, with its district, remained faithful to the family of Saul, after the disaster at Gilboa (2 S 2^{9}). The days of its greatest prosperity dawned when Ahab and Jezebel, fascinated no doubt by the beauty of the place and its surroundings, chose it as a royal residence. The palace stood on the E. side of the city, the harem being close by the gate, with windows overlooking the road leading thither (2 K $9^{30.\,31}$). A tower commanding a view of the approach from Jordan, up the vale of Jezreel, also formed part of the building (ib. 9^{17}). This was most necessary to guard against surprise ; as then, and until comparatively recent times, the hordes of the East came this way in making their inroads upon the fruitful land of Esdraelon. An object of special admiration was the house of ivory built by the king, an evidence also of the luxury in which the royal pair indulged (1 K 22^{39}; cf. Am 3^{15} 6^{4}). The establishment of idolatrous priests must also have been large (1 K 16^{33}, 2 K 10^{11}). Hither drove Ahab from Carmel through the storm, preceded by the stern, swift-footed Tishbite (1 K $18^{45.\,46}$). Here was the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite (הַיִּזְרְעֵאלִי), coveted by Ahab (ib. 21^{1}). Probably it lay E. of the town, where wine-presses cut in the rock are still to be seen (2 K $9^{21.\,25}$). Whether this city or Samaria was the scene of Jezebel's outrage upon Naboth and his sons (1 K $21^{8\text{-}14}$, 2 K 9^{26}) is in some doubt. If Ahab's blood was licked by the dogs at Samaria, that would point to the southern city as the scene of Naboth's execution (1 K 22^{38}). On the other hand, the natural sense of 1 K 21 seems to place it at Jezreel; and with this Josephus agrees (Ant. VIII. xv. 6).* Joram, succeeding his father Ahab, maintained Jezreel as a royal residence; and here he was visited by his kinsman Ahaziah king of Judah (2 K 8^{29}). These two were together when surprised by the newly anointed Jehu, who slew Joram and cast his body into the plot of Naboth : Ahaziah fled, but was wounded, and died at Megiddo (2 K 9^{27}). Here Jezebel also suffered miserably for her offences, being at the conqueror's command hurled from the window into the courtyard, where she was devoured by the pariah dogs (2 K $9^{30\text{-}37}$). By the gateway of Jezreel were piled the heads of Ahab's 70 sons, brought hither by Jehu's orders from Samaria (2 K 10^{7}); then the town became the scene of one of those sickening massacres which so often stain the records of Oriental monarchies: all who might be suspected of sympathy with the house of Ahab, 'his great men, his familiar friends, and his priests,' were relentlessly done to death (ib. 10^{11}). The prosperity of Jezreel seems to have ended with the downfall of the house of Ahab, and its name is seen no more in the sacred books, save only in Hos $1^{4.\,11}$, where it occurs with a symbolic significance. (See HOSEA).

The Crusaders knew Jezreel as Parvum Gerinum, and close by occurred in 1183 a skirmish with Saladin, after which the Saracen leader retired (William of Tyre, xxii. 26). In 1217 the Christian army passed down the vale to Beisân ; but the place has been the scene of no important event in later history ; and for many centuries it has presented, practically unchanged, the aspect of squalid poverty that meets the eye of the traveller to-day.

2. A town in the hill-country of Judæa, the site of which has not been identified. It was not far from the Judæan Carmel (Jos 15^{56}). Ahinoam (the Jezreelitess, הַיִּזְרְעֵלִית or הַיִּזְרְעֵאלִית), one of David's first two wives (1 S 25^{43} 27^{3} 30^{5}, 2 S 2^{2} 3^{2}, 1 Ch 3^{1}), was a native of this town.

JEZREELITE, JEZREELITESS.—See preceding article.

JEZRIELUS (A Ἰεζρίηλος, B Ἰεζόρικλος ; AV Hierielus), 1 Es 9^{27}.—In Ezr 10^{26} JEHIEL. The AV form is derived from the Aldine text.

JIDLAPH (יִדְלָף, perh. 'he weepeth,' if from root דָּלַף 'drip'; A Ἰελδάφ, D om., Luc. Ἰεδλάφ).—A son of Nahor, Gn 22^{22} (J). The clan of which he is the eponym has not been identified.

JOAB (יוֹאָב 'J" is father').—1. (Ἰωάβ) the son of Zeruiah and brother of Abishai and Asahel. J.'s mother is named because she was David's sister, and thus of more importance than his father, of whom all we are told is that his sepulchre was at Bethlehem (2 S 2^{32}). The first mention of J. is upon the occasion of the engagement at Gibeon between David's men and those of Ishbosheth. Abner, who commanded the latter, was completely beaten, but in the course of his retreat killed Asahel, who had overtaken him. At sunset J., at the request of Abner, recalled his men from the pursuit, and returned to David's headquarters at Hebron (2 S $2^{12\text{-}32}$). Some time afterwards Abner, having quarrelled with Ishbosheth, offered his allegiance to David. J. was absent when Saul's general visited Hebron for this purpose, but returned shortly after his departure. Prompted by a desire to avenge the death of his brother Asahel, and perhaps also by a jealous dread that Abner might supplant him in the favour of David, J. sent messengers to recall him, and then treacherously murdered him (2 S $3^{22\text{-}27}$). At the siege of Jerus. by David, it was J., acc. to the Chronicler, who first scaled the citadel, and thus earned the reward promised by the king, that he should be chief captain of the host (1 Ch 11^{6}). After the defeat of the Edomites (2 S $8^{13\text{f.}}$, cf. title of Ps 60) J. remained in Idumæa for six months, and sought to exterminate all the male population. The terror of his name haunted that country for long (1 K $11^{14\text{-}21}$). In conjunction with his brother Abishai, J. waged successful war against the allied forces of Syria and Ammon ; and when at length the citadel of Rabbath-ammon was ready to fall, he displayed a combination of magnanimity and prudence in sending for David to deal the final blow, so that the king himself might have the credit of the victory (2 S 11^{1} $12^{26\text{-}29}$). It was during the siege of Rabbah that David was guilty of the most heinous sin of his life. J. fell in readily with the king's plan for getting rid of Uriah the Hittite, and thus obtained a new hold upon David through sharing his guilty secret (2 S $11^{6\text{-}27}$). After Absalom's murder of Amnon, and his flight to Geshur, it was J. who, through the medium of 'a wise woman from Tekoa,' induced David to recall his son, and who at last, but with reluctance, effected a final reconciliation between them (2 S $14^{1ff.}$). When the rebellion of Absalom broke out, J. remained loyal, and accompanied David in his flight across the Jordan. With his brother Abishai, and Ittai the Gittite, he shared the command of the royal army in the battle which proved so disastrous to Absalom and his adherents. It was by J.'s own hand that Absalom met his death as he hung defenceless in the branches of an oak. As he had not hesitated to take the rebel's life in spite of David's strict charge to the contrary, J. did not hesitate after the battle to remonstrate with the king for giving such unrestrained vent to his grief for his son's death. The sturdy common-sense of J., although his plainness of speech must have been very displeasing to his master, availed to check the disaffection that had begun to spread among the royal troops (2 S 19). It was probably resentment at J.'s conduct on this occasion that led David to transfer the command of the army to another of his nephews, Amasa, who had been Absalom's commander-in-chief (2 S 19^{13}). The deadly mistake of this appointment speedily became apparent when the standard of revolt was raised by Sheba ben-Bichri. Amasa proved himself a useless fainéant, and the situation became so alarming that David was compelled to send Abishai (or perhaps J. himself) * to take command of the army. At any rate J. was present with the expedition, which was ultimately joined also by Amasa. J. seized the first opportunity to rid himself of his rival, whom he despatched with as little compunction as he had shown in the case of Abner (2 S $20^{8ff.}$, on the text and interpretation of which see Driver, Sam., ad loc.). He then prosecuted the campaign with vigour, and speedily brought it to a successful issue. Sheba having taken refuge at Abel-beth-maacah, J. laid siege to the town, and only desisted when the head of the rebel was cast to him over the wall (2 S 20^{22}). J. offered strenuous resistance to David's proposal to number the people (2 S $24^{1ff.}$), and, acc. to the Chronicler, did not complete the work (1 Ch 21^{6}). When Adonijah took steps to have himself proclaimed king, J. attached himself to his party, probably without the slightest thought of disloyalty to David, who seems himself to have intended that Adonijah should succeed him, until the household intrigue of Bathsheba, aided by the powerful support of the prophet Nathan, led him to decide in favour of Solomon. The latter, upon his accession to the throne, considered it prudent to rid himself of J., whose influence with the army might have constituted a serious danger to the new monarch. No doubt a desire to wipe away from his house the stain of the unavenged blood of Abner and Amasa partially influenced Solomon, but State reasons must have predominated. J., on hearing that Adonijah had been put to death and Abiathar deposed, needed no further intimation that his own life was in danger, and he fled to the asylum of the altar. Refusing to leave the sacred place, by Solomon's order he was slain there by Benaiah, whose readiness to act as executioner was doubtless all the greater because he thus secured the reversion of the office of commander-in-chief for himself (1 K 2^{28-34}). Acc. to 1 K 2^{1-12} Solomon, in the execution of J., acted in obedience to the dying injunction of David. Wellh. and Stade hold, however, that this passage is an unhistorical interpolation. The hand of the Deuteronomic redactor is certainly evident in v.^{3}, but Budde (Richt u. Sam. 263 f.), following Kuenen, defends the antiquity (without committing himself to the historicity) of at least vv.$^{5-9}$.

* It is possible that the prediction in 1 K 21^{19} (which is from a different hand from 22) contemplates the deed of Jehu in 2 K 9^{25}, and not the death of Ahab himself (cf. 1 K 21^{29}). In any case, 22^{38} is an interpolation. See, further, Wellh. Comp. 284.

The character of J. has often been unfairly estimated, either from lack of a due regard to the spirit of the age in which he lived, or from prejudice in favour of David and Solomon. The least that can be said is that he was a man of far-seeing statesman-like views, a brave soldier, a skilful commander, and a loyal subject. Even his assassination of Abner and Amasa, so repellent to us, could plead as excuse, in the one case the supposed duty to avenge his brother's death, and in the other the gross injustice of David in depriving him of his command. The Oriental is not usually distinguished for generosity to his enemies or scrupulousness in his methods of revenge, and J. was no exception to this rule; but his action on these two occasions must not blind us to the splendid services he rendered to his country. Without him David was like Ferdinand without Wallenstein. No doubt, like the last-named great general, J. made the most of his knowledge that he was indispensable, and thus in the end was able to obtain his own terms from his master. One thing he had resolved upon, that as he alone was fit for the post, he alone must command David's army. 'Wallenstein war Nichts wo er nicht Alles war, er muss entweder gar nicht oder mit vollkommener Freiheit handeln' (Schiller). This determination to brook no rival, combined with the low moral standard of the age, will suffice to explain the most questionable episodes in the career of the Wallenstein of Israel. J.'s conduct all through the Absalomic rebellion reflects the greatest credit upon his foresight. It is needless to offer any apology for his killing of Absalom, an act that was pardonable because necessary. Nor is it possible, as we have explained already, to convict him of treason because at first he supported Adonijah. Taking everything into account, we feel that this great man deserved a better fate, and it leaves a painful impression upon us when we learn that, after he had served his king and his country so faithfully, his grey hairs were not suffered to go down to the grave in peace.

2. (Ἰωβάβ BL, Ἰωάβ A).—The son of Seraiah, a descendant of Judah, and father 'of the valley of Charashim' (AV), or 'of (the inhabitants of) the valley of craftsmen' (AVm), or 'of Ge-Harashim' (RV), or 'of the valley of craftsmen' (RVm), 1 Ch 4^{14}, cf. Neh 11^{35}. See GE-HARASHIM. 3. (Ἰωβάβ, Ἰωάβ).—The name of a family which returned from exile with Zerubbabel and Ezra (Ezr 2^{6} = Neh 7^{11}, Ezr 8^{9}, 1 Es 8^{35}).

J. A. SELBIE.

JOACHAZ (A Ἰωχάζ, B Ἰεχονίας), 1 Es 1^{34} (LXX^{32}).—Jehoahaz the son of Josiah; cf. 2 Ch 36^{1}. B and the Vulgate (Jechonias) are in agreement with Mt 1^{11} in omitting the short reign of Jehoahaz.

JOADANUS (A Ἰωάδανος, B Ἰώδανος), 1 Es 9^{19}.—One of the sons of Jesus, the son of Josedek, the priest. The corresponding name in Ezr 10^{18} is GEDALIAH.

JOAH (יוֹאָח 'J" is brother').—1. Son of Asaph, the 'recorder' at Hezekiah's court, 2 K $18^{18. 26. 37}$ = Is $36^{3. 11. 22}$. 2. A Levitical family name, 1 Ch 6^{21} (apparently same as Ethan of v.^{42}), 2 Ch 29^{12}. 3.

---

* In 2 S 20^{6} the MT and LXX have Abishai, but Syr. has Joab, and the latter reading is adopted by Thenius, Wellh., Driver, Kittel, Löhr. On the other hand, Budde, in his notes to the Bks. of Sam. in Haupt's Sacred Bks. of OT (p. 95), considers that MT is correct, and that the narrative is perfectly intelligible upon this assumption. 'As the new commander-in-chief Amasa left him in the lurch, David was obliged to make use of J.'s services, but his dignity as king would not permit the acknowledgment of this by an immediate reinstatement. By charging Abishai his brother with the commission he makes sure that J. will not remain behind, and the latter willingly joins the expedition as a volunteer, in order to put the king under new obligations to himself. The fact that he takes the leadership into his own hands is so much a matter of course that it does not need to be mentioned.'

A Levite, son of Obed-edom, 1 Ch 26^4. 4. Son of Joahaz, the 'recorder' at Josiah's court, 2 Ch 34^8.

JOAHAZ (יוֹאָחָז).—The father of Joah, the 'recorder' in the reign of Josiah, 2 Ch 34^8. See also JEHOAHAZ.

JOAKIM (Ἰωακίμ or -ειμ, LXX form of יְהוֹיָקִים).—The name is spelt Jehoiakim in canon. books, but Joacim or Joachim in Apocr. AV, and Joakim everywhere in Apocr. RV.

In Apocr. the name belongs to six persons. 1. King Jehoiakim, son of Josiah, father of Jeconiah (Bar 1^3). 1 Es 1^{40} follows LXX of 2 Ch 36^6 in saying that he was carried in copper chains to Babylon. This is in apparent, but not hopeless, discrepancy with 2 K $24^{1.6}$ and Jer 22^{18} 36^{30}. 2. Jehoiachin, son of Jehoiakim, who is erroneously called Joakim in 1 Es 1^{43}, and is said to have reigned after his father 3 months and 10 days. 3. A priest, son of Hilkiah, to whom the captives of B.C. 597 are said, in Bar 1^7, to have sent money for the purchase of offerings and incense. The Gr. says that the money was 'sent to J. the priest (τὸν ἱερέα), and to the priests (πρὸς τοὺς ἱερεῖς).' Hence RV renders ἱερέα, 'the high priest.' No high priest of this name, however, is mentioned in Scripture, and it is therefore better with Zöckler to regard J. as the second priest, invested with the duties of overseer or treasurer of the temple, as Pashhur (Jer 20^1) is called chief officer in the house of J″; and as Zephaniah, a son of Hilkiah and brother of Seraiah who succeeded his father, was promised to be officer in the temple (Jer 29^{26}), and was afterwards 'second priest' (Jer 52^{24}). It is reasonable to suppose that Zephaniah was J.'s successor as sagan, or second priest. 4. A high priest, who, in the days of Holofernes and Judith, when the people of Judæa were 'newly come up from captivity,' is said, as head of the Senate, to have directed military affairs, by commanding the inhabitants of Bethulia to occupy the northern passes (Jth $4^{6.7}$), and at the same time to have led the people in devout supplication in the temple, clad in sackcloth, and with ashes on his mitre (Jth $4^{14.15}$). 5. A priest, son of Zorobabel, mentioned among the returning exiles in the reign of Darius (1 Es 5^5). 6. The husband of Susanna, a wealthy Jew in Babylon. The rooms of his mansion were used for the administration of justice among the Jews; and acc. to Syr. W_2, for the Synagogue. The horrid calumny concocted by the two lascivious elders came on J. as a terrible blow, and, when Daniel solved the mystery, J. joined with Susanna's relatives in singing praises that no dishonour was found in her (Sus ^{63}). W_2 stands alone in saying that J. died shortly after marriage, and that Susanna was a pious widow when her trial came.

J. T. MARSHALL.

JOANAN (Ἰωανάν WH, Ἰωαννᾶ TR, AV Joanna).—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3^{27}.

JOANNA (Ἰωάνα WH, Ἰωάννα TR), the wife of Chuza, the steward of Herod Antipas. She was one of 'certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities' (Lk 8^2). Thus bound to Jesus by the tie of gratitude, J. ministered to Him of her substance, and after the crucifixion was one of the company that went to the tomb to anoint the body of the Lord (Lk 8^3 24^{10}).

JOANNES (Ἰωάννης, AV Johannes).—1. (B -άνης) 1 Es 8^{38} son of Akatan, in Ezr 8^{12} JOHANAN. 2. 1 Es 9^{29} son of Bebai, in Ezr 10^{28} JEHOHANAN.

JOARIB (Ἰωαρ(ε)ίβ, Ἰωαρ(ε)ίμ), 1 Mac 2^1 14^{29}, Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1, the head of the priestly family from which the Maccabees were descended. Acc. to 1 Ch 24^7 this family, there called that of JEHOIARIB (which see), was the first of the twenty-four courses of priests.

JOASH (יוֹאָשׁ).—1. Father of Gideon, a native of Abiezer (Jg 6^{11} 8^2). Notwithstanding Gideon's modest language (6^{15}), J. must have been the most important person in his town ('one of the principal persons of the tribe of Manasseh,' Jos. Ant. V. vi. 2); he had more than ten servants (6^{27}), and he was guardian of the local sanctuary of Baal. It may be reasonably supposed that the demonstrated impotence of Baal to protect his altar and the Asherah, coupled with love for his son, revived strongly in the mind of J. a conviction of the unique power of J″, which found utterance in that sarcastic address to the Abiezrites which recalls the mockery of Elijah on a like occasion, and which received a lasting memorial in the name Jerubbaal by which Gideon was known in later times (1 S 12^{11}, 2 S 11^{21}).

2. A son of Ahab to whose custody, and that of Amon, governor of Samaria, Ahab committed Micaiah on his departure for Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22^{26}=2 Ch 18^{25}). J. was probably left behind as his father's viceroy. Rawlinson suggests that here and in 2 Ch 28^7 'king's son' means a state officer; cf. Jer 36^{26} 38^6. 3. A descendant of Shelah, son of Judah, 1 Ch 4^{22}. Vv.$^{21-23}$ are very obscure (see QPB). 4. (יוֹעָשׁ) A Benjamite, son of Becher, 1 Ch 7^8. 5. A Benjamite warrior who joined David at Ziklag, 1 Ch 12^3. 6. (יוֹעָשׁ) One of the comptrollers of David's private estate. He was over 'the cellars of oil,' 1 Ch 27^{28}. 7. See JEHOASH.

JOB, BOOK OF.—In mod. edd. of the Heb. Bible, the third in order of the books called Kĕthubim in the Jewish Canon. Its place, however, has varied; in the Talm. order it stands between Ps and Pr; Jerome places it before both. In the Greek Canon the division of books is for the most part according to subject-matter. After the historical books follow Ps, Pr, Ec, Ca, Job (this is order in B); succeeded by Wis, Sir, and other extra-canonical books. Job, together with the canonical books of Pr and Ec, and the apocr. books Sir and Wis, belongs to what is called the Ḥokhmah or Wisdom-Literature of the Old Covenant, and forms its crown and climax. This article will deal severally with the Name of the book, its Contents, its Form, its Text, its Integrity, its Scope and Purpose, its Date and Authorship, and the History of its Exegesis.

i. NAME.—Heb. אִיּוֹב, Gr. Ἰώβ, 'Iyyōb, misrepresented in the usual Eng. pronunciation. In a postscript to the LXX (not found in Aq. or Symm., and in Theod. only in part), Job is confused with the Idumæan king Jobab, mentioned in Gn 36^{33}. The sentence runs: 'This man is described in the Syriac book as living in the land of Ausis, on the borders of Idumæa and Arabia; and his name before was Jobab, and having taken an Arabian wife, he begot a son whose name was Ennon.' By a further confusion in the name Ζαρά (Gn 36^{13}), Job's descent from Esau is inferred. The traditions embodied in this postscript are followed in the Koran, but are wholly untrustworthy. (For additional traditions concerning Job, see Koran, Suras 38, 40, also Sura 21).

The derivation of the name is doubtful, and the attempts to give to it a significance drawn from etymology are very questionable. It has been taken (Ges. and others) as a passive form from root איב, meaning 'one persecuted' by Satan, or by his friends, or by calamity. Cf. יִלּוֹד from ילד. But this form is never purely passive (Volck, p. 6). Others (including Ewald and Delitzsch) explain after the analogy of Arab. awwâb, as from root אוב, 'the penitent one, resipiscens, or pious, ever turning' to God. The latter explanation is favoured by Hitzig and Cheyne (see his Job and Solomon, p. 62 and note).

The name of Uz (עוץ) as the country in which Job lived is not of much assistance in determining his personality. The name is given to a son of Aram in Gn 10^{23}, to a son of Nahor Gn 22^{21} (RV, in AV Huz), and to a grandson of Seir Gn 36^{28}. This last passage, joined with Jer 25^{20} and the mention of Uz in connexion with Edom in La 4^{21}, points to a district E. or S.E. of Palestine, N. of Arabia, and adjacent to Edom. The LXX, quoted above, probably embodies a prevalent tradition; another tradition, traced out by Wetzstein (see Delitzsch, Comm., Appendix), points to the district of the Hauran. Fr. Delitzsch, judging from certain cuneiform inscriptions, fixes upon a district near Palmyra for the site of Uz, whilst some view the names both of place and hero as symbolical only. The names Bĕnê-ḳedem, 'children of the East' (1^{3}), 'Temanite,' and to a less extent 'Shuhite' and 'Naamathite,' may be held to confirm the general indications of locality mentioned above. (See Uz).

Outside this book, Job is mentioned in Scripture only in Ezk 14$^{14.19}$ 'These three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job'; and in Ja 5^{11} 'Ye have heard of the patience of Job.' Both of these passages apparently imply a belief in the actual existence of the proverbially upright and patient man of that name, but not necessarily the existence of this book, or the treatment which Job's history receives in it.

ii. CONTENTS.—The following is an outline or 'argument' of this remarkable book; its form and significance will be considered later. It may be divided into five parts. 1. Prologue, written in prose, chs. 1 and 2. 2. Colloquies between Job and his friends, including Job's Lament, ch. 3. First colloquy, chs. 4–14; second colloquy, chs. 15–21; third colloquy, chs. 22–31. In the first two colloquies, each friend speaks once, and Job replies to each; in the third, according to the present arrangement of the text, Zophar fails to take up his turn, and Job, after replying to Bildad (ch. 26), speaks at unusual length, partly in a kind of monologue (chs. 27–31). 3. Intervention of Elihu, chs. 32–37. 4. A Theophany; utterances of J″, with very brief replies of Job, chs. 38–42^{6}. 5. Epilogue, written in prose, ch. 42$^{7-17}$.

1. The Prologue introduces us to a man named Job, living in the land of Uz, of great wealth and exceptional piety, surrounded by a large and happy family, and possessing every mark of divine favour. Upon this man there falls a series of heavy calamities, succeeding one another with startling rapidity, each more severe and trying than the last. His flocks are carried off by marauders or smitten by lightning, he is stripped of all his possessions, and bereaved at a stroke of all his children. The Prologue represents this as due to a scene in the Council of Heaven, at which there appeared among the 'sons of God' a being called 'the Satan' or 'the Adversary,' who questioned the sincerity and disinterestedness of Job's religion, and received permission to afflict him in various ways, but not to touch himself. This experiment is described as resulting in Job's complete vindication. He bowed in submission to the divine will, and in all this first stage he 'sinned not, nor charged God with folly,' i.e. never questioned the moral rectitude of divine providence.

Another council is represented as held in heaven, at which the Adversary accounts for Job's fidelity by saying that he has not been made to suffer in his own person. Permission is then given to inflict the utmost bodily pain upon Job, only his life is to be spared. Job is accordingly smitten with one of the most painful and loathsome of diseases, elephantiasis, a peculiarly trying form of leprosy. But in his utmost suffering and degradation he utters no complaint, though even his wife bids him 'renounce God and die.' Having received good at God's hand, he was content patiently to 'receive evil,' and in all this Job 'sinned not with his lips.'

2. Three friends, Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, now come to condole with him. They sit in silent sympathy for seven days and seven nights, and 'none spake a word unto him, for they saw that his pain was very great.' The silence is at last broken by Job himself. He had thus far borne unparalleled troubles with unparalleled resignation, but now he 'opened his mouth and cursed his day.' The long-drawn wail of the third chapter is not a direct arraignment of God's providence, but it contains a bitter, agonised complaint which virtually amounts to this. He curses the day on which he was born, wondering why the misery of birth into such a life should ever have been inflicted upon him, and passionately longing for death as a blessed release which is inexplicably denied him. This outburst from the depth of a soul in anguish forms the occasion of the debate which follows. The tone of Job's complaint appears impious in the ears of his friends, who remonstrate, each after his own fashion, whilst to each elaborate speech Job makes elaborate reply. The first stage of the discussion is chiefly occupied by an assertion on the part of the friends of the justice and goodness of God, whose government of the world must be in accordance with truth and equity, the wicked suffering for their sin and the righteous enjoying divine favour. Job meets this by a passionate assertion of his own innocence, and a bitter and often very bold arraignment of the present order of things. At the second stage, the friends dwell more upon history and experience, pointing out the calamities which attend upon evil-doing, and leaving it to be inferred that some kind of sin must lie at the root of the troubles which have overwhelmed Job. On his part, Job clings all the more tenaciously to his original position. At the third stage of discussion, the friends attack Job more directly and explicitly, charging him with definite sins which they are sure he must have committed, to be thus punished. As the friends become more violent, Job becomes more calm. He has been working his way towards a solution, though as yet it is far from clear. He cares less to debate with men, and throws his soul more and more upon God, though He be still strangely and darkly hidden from him. Job's long monologue is full of pathos and sadness, but the bitterness which marked his 'curse' and opening speeches has given place to a more equable frame of mind.

Such is a general outline of the three colloquies, but it must not be understood that the progress thus sketched is uniform and unbroken. Neither Job nor his friends speak 'by the card.' Their utterances contain reasoning of a kind, but they are for the most part the outpourings of deep and earnest feeling, which cannot be reduced to syllogisms, and which necessarily imply much repetition and occasional inconsistencies. Job travels back upon his own course, varies in his moods, speaks now to God, now to the friends, now to himself; he is sometimes inconsistent, if not self-contradictory, as a sufferer wrestling with such a problem was likely to be. The speeches form part of a poem, not of an abstract demonstration, though the poet is artist enough to preserve order in the midst of variety, and never loses the thread of his argument amidst the outpourings of speakers whose feelings are sometimes at white heat. The first speech of Eliphaz is undoubtedly the most moderate, being almost apologetic in tone, whilst the last speeches show that the argument has come to a deadlock, and the resources of the friends fail them. Beyond this it is difficult to trace any clearly defined or steadily maintained advance in the arguments on either side. The conclusion shows each speaker as only more fully confirmed in his original position.

3. Here, according to the arrangement of the book as it has come down to us, an episode occurs, in which a previously unmentioned speaker, named Elihu, intervenes, and gives at considerable length his judgment upon the question in dispute (chs. 32 to 37). After a somewhat tedious introduction (32^{6-33}), Elihu blames the friends for the insufficiency of their arguments, but still more severely condemns Job for justifying himself, and undertakes to correct his many mistakes. The address to Job may be divided into four parts, corresponding with chs. 33. 34. 35 and 36–37 respectively. The gist of the whole may, however, be described as an attempted vindication of God, as at the same time a just and a merciful ruler of the world, who is great and glorious above man's power to comprehend, and who sends afflictions upon His own people as a chastisement, or as a means of purification, or as a divine warning against sin. In the stress laid upon affliction as discipline, lies Elihu's chief contribution to the discussion.

4. In the next section of the poem, J″ intervenes and 'answers Job out of the whirlwind.' Two addresses of the Almighty are given—the first in chs. 38^{1}–40^{2}, followed by a brief reply from Job $40^{3.5}$; the second in chs. 40^{6}–41^{34}, followed by another act of submission on Job's part, 42^{1-6}. The chief subject of the divine address is the glory of God in creation, the sublime and awe-inspiring features of which are recounted in order to impress Job with the greatness of God and the littleness of man, and the unsearchable wisdom and inconceivable power of God compared with man's utter ignorance and weakness. Sometimes the description enters into minute detail, as in the picture of Behemoth (the hippopotamus) in 40^{15-24}, and Leviathan (the crocodile) in 41^{1-34}. The description of the war-horse also in 39^{19-25} is elaborate and highly poetical. The object of the whole address, however, as indicated from time to time by a series of ironical questions, is to overwhelm Job with a sense of the irresistible majesty and resource of that God the justice of whose government he has ventured to impugn. How can one who is so utterly unable to subdue a single one of God's creatures, whose knowledge of even a corner of creation is so hopelessly inadequate, dare to arraign the procedure of Him who holds a universe of such creatures in the hollow of His hand? The effect of these addresses is immediate and complete. Job first confesses himself silenced and justly rebuked, and at last in full contrition acknowledges his sin and folly, repents of his ill-advised complaints, and bows low in submission beneath the irresistible hand of the Almighty.

5. In the epilogue, the story which was begun by a scene in heaven ends with a dénoûment visible on earth. The friends who had thought themselves representatives of the divine cause are rebuked, because they had not spoken of God 'the thing that is right,' as His servant Job had done. They are forgiven at Job's intercession, while on Job himself is bestowed prosperity precisely double that which he had previously enjoyed. Job lived long after all his troubles were over, saw 'four generations' of descendants, and died 'being old and full of days'—a sure mark of divine approval and favour (42^{7-17}).

iii. FORM.—The first question which falls to be considered under this head is whether the author intended to convey the idea that he was writing literal history. His narrative begins with the matter-of-fact statement, 'There was a man in the land of Uz,' etc., and both prologue and epilogue at first sight appear to be simple statements of actual fact. This view was held by a large proportion of early Jewish interpreters, but not universally. R. Resh Lakish is quoted in the Talmud (Baba Bathra, § 15. 1) as having said, 'Job existed not, and was not created, but he is (only) a parable.' This was altered later into 'was not created except to be a parable.' The prevailing opinion amongst both Jews and Christians for many centuries was that the Bk. of Job was strictly historical. Luther questioned, not the existence of Job, nor the substantial accuracy of the story told in the book, but its literal interpretation throughout as a record of actual facts. Some recent critics (Reuss, Merx, Hengstenberg) have gone to the opposite extreme, and represent the book as entirely imaginative. The majority of modern interpreters, however, view the book as 'poetically treated history'; some (e.g. Cheyne) finding in it but a small kernel of fact; others, from Grotius and Lowth to Delitzsch, Davidson, and Driver, being content to read the poem as a free and imaginative rendering of facts handed down by tradition and here substantially reproduced. It is hardly necessary to argue at length that the book cannot be read as literal history from beginning to end. The descriptions of the heavenly council in the prologue are clearly symbolical. The numbers used in the prologue, and the exact doubling of Job's possessions in the epilogue, indicate an ideal rather than an actual picture. Job's calamities come upon him in such a sudden and dramatic form, and are described in so poetical a fashion, with a sort of refrain, 'I, even I only, am left to tell thee,' that we readily understand we are not too literally to interpret every word. And never was it known that sufferer in the extremity of his anguish delivered his soul in highly elaborated poetical phraseology. If, then, the view of the book as 'poetically treated history' be taken as the most probable hypothesis, it is clear that considerable room is left for diversity of judgment as to where the solid substance of fact ends and the drapery of the poet's imaginative treatment begins. The names of the hero and his friends, the country in which he dwelt, the afflictions which befell him, the patience with which he endured them, and his emergence out of his difficulties, may perhaps be considered a kind of irreducible minimum of history used by the inspired genius of the author in his wrestling with the age-long problem before him.

Closely akin to this is the question whether the author of 'Job' intended to represent his hero, not as an individual, but as a type of the righteous in affliction. Does imaginative treatment extend so far that the name of an historical personage is merely used to embody teaching concerning national calamities and the way to meet them? Cheyne adopts the view of Chateaubriand, that 'Job is a type of righteous men in affliction' (see his Job and Solomon, p. 65, and the essay in Proph. of Isaiah, ii. 235–244), adding, that 'the common view that the hero of the poem of Job is simply an individual must, it is clear, be abandoned.' This can only be established if emphasis upon the word 'simply' is maintained. A purely allegorical view of the poem leads to questionable and sometimes fantastic exegesis. And there is no sufficient warrant for supposing that the modern dramatic mode of treating such a theme, the historical element being so far minimized as to be hardly discernible, and a purely imaginative treatment of a religious subject adopted, was likely to have been used by a Jew at any period to which this book has been assigned. It seems most satisfactory to say, with such writers as Fairbairn (City of God, p. 146), that 'the national reposes on the personal sense,' and with A. B. Davidson, that 'Job is scarcely to be considered Israel, under a feigned name. He is not Israel, though Israel may see itself and its history reflected in him. It is the elements of reality in Job's history common to him with Israel in affliction, common even to him with humanity as a whole . . . it is these elements of truth that make the history of Job instructive to the people of Israel in the times of affliction when it was set before them, and to men in all ages' (see his Job, Introd. pp. xxvi, xxvii).

The chief reasons which incline us to this view of the poem lie, in truth, upon the surface. The references in Ezk 14^{14} and Ja 5^{11} suggest that Job was an actual person, known to tradition. The writer of the book conveys the impression that he is dealing with actual history, and his teaching would lose much of its force if it were supposed that the whole story lay in the mere cloudland of imagination. A majority of writers, however, include the word dramatic, in some form or other, in their characterization of the poem. Theodore of Mopsuestia employed the epithet in the 4th cent., and in modern times Ewald, Hupfeld, and Davidson use the word drama to describe the book. Delitzsch styles it a drama not emancipated from the lyric element, reminding us that a drama need not be scenic in its character. Volck, after Nöldeke, defines Job as 'a didactic poem, in dialogue form, with dramatic development.' Milton described it as an epic, and Godet follows in the same direction. Cheyne calls it a 'germinal character drama,' and compares Goethe's 'Iphigenia' and 'Tasso.' Driver says, 'It is of the nature of a drama, and may be termed a dramatic poem. Its principal parts are constructed in the form of a dialogue, and the action which it represents passes through the successive stages of entanglement, development, and solution. The action is, however, largely internal and mental, the successive scenes exhibiting the varying moods of a great soul struggling with the mysteries of fate, rather than trying external situations' (Introd. to O.T. Lit.^{6} p. 411). If any technical definition of form is to be given, that of Volck, quoted above, appears to be the best, or the shorter phrase 'dramatic poem' might be admitted, for a drama in the usual sense of the word the book certainly is not. The name 'lyrical' or 'didactic-lyrical' (G. Baur, Stud. und Krit. 1856, p. 582) is misleading in its associations. But it is probably a mistake to attempt to stretch this highly original poem upon a Procrustes' bed, in order to make it fit in with later systems of classification. 'Soul is form, and doth the body make.' The author of Job had certain materials to use, and he kept certain religious objects in view as he wrote; he possessed a poetic genius of remarkable constructive power, and his thoughts were guided by the Divine Spirit. Under these circumstances he produced, not a drama, nor a didactic poem, nor any composition of conventional form or shape, but—the Bk. of Job, which is a law to itself, and which has influenced subsequent writers whose names stand among the highest in literature, yet who, by general consent, are, merely from the literary point of view, outsoared and outshone by their great prototype.

The intimate structure of the poem can best be understood in connexion with the general subject of the poetry of the OT (see POETRY). It may, however, be well to say that the ultimate element in Job, as in all Heb. poetry, is the couplet or distich, consisting of two parallel clauses, the length of each line being determined, not by the laws of regular metre, but by the beat of an irregular but musical rhythm. The single stones of which the poetical structure is composed may be triplets or quatrains instead of couplets, but these larger or smaller units are combined so as to form a strophe (the 'paragraph' of prose), and laws, which are none the less effective because informal and instinctively obeyed, determine the varying lengths of the line, the varying character of the parallelism, and the varying structure of the strophe. An analysis of Job's lament in ch. 3, or of any of the speeches, would illustrate in detail what can here be stated only in outline. It may be remarked, however, that the skill of the poet is especially conspicuous in the success with which he employs throughout a long poem a form of composition which is chiefly suited to the gnomic wisdom of 'Proverbs' or the comparatively brief lyrics of the Psalms.

But the poetical character of Job does not depend upon the balance of syllables or the answering beat of lines and clauses. The constructive imagination of the writer is conspicuous throughout. It reveals itself as remarkably in the bold conceptions, the free, flowing outlines of the whole poem, as in the wealth, variety, and finish of its detailed imagery. The architect of a cathedral shows his skill alike in the detailed workmanship of bosses and finials and in his conception of a majestic whole. It is hardly within the compass of this article to dwell upon the poetical grandeur of Job viewed as a literary composition. The sublimity and simplicity of its leading conceptions, the pictures of the august scene in the council-chamber of heaven, and of the sudden desolation and overwhelming sorrow in the earthly household, of Job lying in physical anguish and mental bewilderment upon the mezbelê or ash-mound outside his house, and the deep sympathetic silence of his friends broken at last by the heartrending wail of the sufferer's despair,—all indicate the hand of a poet at the outset, and prepare the way for the unfolding of the tragedy that follows. Only a close study of the book can give an idea of the richness and multiplicity of its metaphors, the concentrated vigour of its phraseology, its depth of human feeling, its portraiture of patriarchal life, and the impressiveness of the descriptions of external nature, which form throughout a majestic background to the moving picture of human pain and sorrow.

Sometimes the figurative language is closely condensed—

'Wilt thou harass a driven leaf,
And chase the withered stubble?' (13^{25}).

Sometimes the metaphor is elaborated with startling vigour and emphasis, as in the description of the Divine Being as a giant antagonist wrestling with the puny human frame, or making a target of the miserable man who can offer no resistance—

'I was at ease, but he shattered me;
He seized me by the throat and shook me;
He set me up as his mark,
His arrows beset me.
He cleaveth my side, and doth not spare;
He sheddeth my gall upon the ground;
He breaketh me with breach upon breach,
He rusheth upon me like a giant' (16^{12-14}).

The description of the lion in $4^{10.11}$, of the eagle in ch. 39, 'where the slain are, there is she,' the comparison of deceitful friends to the brook drying up in summer and the mirage of the desert in 6^{15-20}, the brief but graphic succession of figures to describe the rapid flight of years—

'My days are swifter than a runner;
They flit away, they see no good;
They shoot by like skiffs of reed,
Like an eagle that swoopeth upon its prey!' ($9^{25.26}$)—

are only examples taken at random of a poetic vitality in the writer which seems inexhaustible. The sketches of the wild beast in the desert are as faithful in detail as the limning of the glories of the constellations in the nightly sky is impressive; but in each case the work is done by a few strokes of a master-hand. One passage only may be transcribed as an example of several of the features which have been thus summarily and inadequately sketched, and it will, at the same time, illustrate the arrangement of the poem in strophes—

'The Shades tremble
Deep below the waters and their inhabitants.
The Unseen World is naked before him,
The Abyss of Destruction hath no covering,
He stretcheth out the North over the void,
And hangeth the earth upon nothing . . .
The pillars of heaven tremble,
And are amazed at his rebuke . . .
Lo, these are but the outskirts of his ways;
And how small a whisper hath been heard of him
But the thunder of his power, who can understand?'
($26^{5.6.11.14}$)

iv. TEXT.—The Massoretic text of the OT, as is now generally recognized, stands in some places in great need of critical emendation, but the materials extant for the purpose are very scanty. The oldest MS of Job is separated in date from its composition by more than twelve hundred years, and few critical helps from without are forthcoming to aid in the examination and, if need be, the reconstruction of the text. Under these circumstances, textual criticism virtually resolves itself into a comparison of the Heb. with the chief ancient versions, and an examination of internal evidence and inherent probabilities of corruption. Such a process naturally leads to widely differing results, varying according to the preconceptions and methods of individual critics. In modern times Merx led the way in his Das Gedicht von Hiob (1871), advocating a reconstruction of the text, based partly upon the ancient versions and partly upon a metrical arrangement of his own. G. Bateson Wright in 1883 carried the work some steps further. Bickell in his Carmina V.T. (1882) and in a series of papers in the Vienna Zeitsch. f. K. d. Morgenlandes (1891–94) has propounded an elaborate and revolutionary theory for ascertaining what he considers to be the primitive text of Job. He depends partly upon the LXX, but partly also on certain metrical theories, of which more will be said shortly. This work of Bickell has been popularized in English by Dillon in his Sceptics of the Old Testament (1895). Finally, Siegfried has published a polychromatic ed. of the text of Job (in Haupt's Sacred Books of OT), in which a thoroughgoing recension is advocated, based mainly upon internal evidence such as satisfies the critic.

The chief point for consideration at this stage is the LXX version.

This probably dates from the early or middle portion of the 2nd cent. B.C. The character of the translation is too free and loose to be of much service in the detailed criticism of the text, but it has been long known to scholars that the original text of the LXX was much shorter than the Textus Receptus now found in our MSS. In the time of Origen the current Gr. version was shorter than the Heb. by some 400 lines, the omissions noted by Jerome amounting to more than 700. Origen (Ep. ad Afric. § 4) tells us that, in the copies he used, as many as from three or four to sixteen or nineteen verses were lacking in some places, and he remedied the deficiencies by supplying the Greek from Theodotion, obelizing all the passages thus added to the Gr. text before him. Five MSS are extant preserving Origen's marks, and in 1889 Ciasca published a Coptic tr. of the LXX version of Job which exhibits the pre-Origenian state of the text. As this version substantially agrees with the evidence furnished by the five MSS above named, omitting the passages which in them are marked with asterisks, it is clear that this text gives us the LXX version in its earliest form.

The question is, what is its relation to the Hebrew? It must not be taken for granted either that it is earlier and purer than the MT, or that it is simply a curtailed and mutilated tr. from the Heb. that has come down to us. A similar state of things exists in relation to the text of Jeremiah, and scholars are not yet agreed upon an interpretation of the facts. In the case of Job, Bickell uses this evidence to support his own very sweeping reconstruction of the text, seeking to show that the book in its present state has grown by additions, successively made, to a very much shorter poem. Hatch (Essays in Bib. Greek, pp. 215-245) argues in the same sense, that the early Greek translation represents the primitive form, the Hebrew a later and amplified form, of the text. Dillmann, on the other hand (Trans. Royal Prus. Acad. of Sci. 1890), contends that, except in a few cases, omissions from the Heb. were arbitrarily made by the Gr. translator—a view apparently held previously by Bickell himself; and Driver (Contemp. Rev. Feb. 1896, p. 262), though with some hesitation, pronounces the latter to be the more probable hypothesis. It is noteworthy that the omissions of the LXX do not relieve the chief difficulties which attend the text of the book as it stands, whilst, in several cases at least, it is difficult to understand the context without these omitted passages, or to explain how, if they did not form part of the original text, the passages in the Heb. came to be added to it. Glosses and amplifications on such a scale generally declare themselves as such beyond much possibility of question. Intrinsic probability, in other words, is almost entirely against the hypothesis that the shorter Gr. form represents the primitive type of text. Budde, in his latest work on Job (see Literature below), also pronounces against the view of Bickell and Hatch.

None of the other versions are of much use in textual criticism. The Peshiṭta Syriac was made from the Heb., and its renderings are occasionally serviceable in difficulties of detail. The variations of the Targum are more curious than helpful, while the old Latin version was made from the Gr., and exhibits the same peculiarities (cf. Burkitt, Old Lat. and Itala, p. 8 f.). A revision of it was made by Jerome, preserving the critical marks which indicated the passages supplied from the Heb. to fill up the considerable deficiencies noted above.

v. INTEGRITY.—Obviously, this subject is closely connected with the last, and some arguments of critics concerning the text have been reserved for this section, because a discussion of the genuineness of certain passages cannot be carried on without an examination into the subject-matter of the book. Criticism has been busy in recent years with the construction of Job, and most modern interpreters hold that the book as it has come down to us has undergone more or less of amplification or modification. Some would reduce the volume of the book by at least one half. They hold that neither prologue nor epilogue, neither the speeches of the Almighty nor those of Elihu, formed part of the original work, and that the speeches of Job and the three friends must be both reduced in bulk and altered in character, if we would read them in their original form. Representatives of this extreme view, which lops off from the statue limbs and members till a mere torso, altered in its proportions, is left, are Bickell and Studer.

Three main reasons are assigned for this trenchant handling of the text. (1) The fact that the earliest form of the LXX version was so much shorter than the Heb. as it now stands. But we have seen that it is by no means clearly proved that the shorter form represents the primitive type, and the reconstruction proposed in many respects does not follow the lines thus indicated. (2) A metrical theory concerning the composition of Job—a hypothesis of great learning and ingenuity, in which, however, few Heb. scholars have followed Bickell—demands some such system of wholesale abbreviation as is thus proposed. This attempt to make the lines of Job 'scan' can only be carried out by the application of extreme violence. Not only must whole passages be shorn away, but the lines that remain must be read with frequent elisions and accommodations. In many cases these are so violent and unnatural as to make it clear that Bickell is trying to force into uniformity and regularity an irregular though real and impressive poetical rhythm which runs through the book. It may be added, that a metrical version of a poem which can be remembered with ease would not readily be displaced by a more cumbrous and irregular form. The whole history of Heb. poetry, moreover, is against the supposition that a poem of the length of Job, and of its probable date, was composed in regular metre with lines of almost uniform regulation length.

(3) The third chief line of argument is drawn from a view of the scope and design of 'Job' which is by no means proved. It assumes that the book in its first conception was a poem of revolt, the utterance of a genuine 'sceptic of the Old Testament,' who rebelled against the current doctrine of reward and punishment, and that it has only assumed its present shape under the hands of a number of 'orthodox' manipulators, who, by various additions and interpolations, have contrived to dress up the original product of a Sturm und Drang period into a shape in which it might appear in the sacred Canon. Without discussing this hypothesis in full, two remarks may be made. One is, that writers in the OT are not in the habit of disguising their moods of doubt and murmuring, and even rebellion against the will of God. The psalmists give the account of their gloomy periods of unsettled faith and positive denial; while Jeremiah from time to time 'waxes very bold,' and, like Elijah in his despondency, is driven by the pressure of the problems of life to doubt and to deny the goodness of Him who controls life. This supposed dressing up of doubt into decent orthodoxy is a device of modern days. It should be noticed, also, that this theory of the origin and history of 'Job' is hampered with the further difficulty that these large additions were made to the original text by a poet or poets whose 'imaginative power was at least not inferior to that of the original writer' (Hatch, op. cit. p. 244)—a somewhat large demand to make, when the original and sublime character of the book as a whole is borne in mind.

Siegfried, without going so far as Bickell, is yet very severe in his castigation of the MT. He classifies some passages — which may be represented by ch. 28, and the Elihu speeches, chs. 32–37 —as 'polemical interpolations directed against the tendency of the poem.' Other passages found in the 12th, 27th, and other chapters, are styled 'correcting interpolations, conforming the speeches of Job to the orthodox doctrine of retribution'; while others, again, are 'parallel compositions,' amongst them being found the section 40^{6}–42^{6}. Some fifty separate passages are banished from the text as scattered interpolations of editors, inserted during the process of 'working over' the poem, which de Wette was the first to suggest had been freely employed. The shorn remnant of the text is, especially in chs. 13 and 14, 20 and 21, and again in 30 and 31, rearranged as regards the order of its clauses and paragraphs, according to the critic's judgment. It is, perhaps, unnecessary to say that for this wholesale reorganization there is no external evidence, the primitive form of the LXX text giving very little assistance in the places where serious difficulties in subject-matter are supposed to require radical changes in the text. Studer (1881) reconstructs the whole book, making chs. 29 and 30 the original prologue—a process which A. B. Davidson describes as leaving a mere trunk, 'so misshapen that its shoulders are found in the region of its bowels.'

Two recent monographs, representing the prevailing current of contemporary criticism, may be mentioned: Grill, Zur Composition des B. Hiob (1890); and Laue, Die Composition des B. Hiob (1896). The former rejects, as not belonging to the original book, the Elihu speeches, the descriptions of Behemoth and Leviathan, also $12^{4\text{-}13}$ $24^{5\text{-}9.\,14\text{-}21}$ $26^{2\text{-}27}$ $27^{7\text{-}31}$, and chs. 29 and 30. Laue holds that ch. $9^{9\text{-}24}$ and ch. 12 are out of place, and that the former paragraph should be placed after ch. 25, and the latter after ch. 27. Ch. 24 is condemned in part as having been 'worked over,' only a portion of it representing the original tendency of the poem. From chs. 25–28 he admits only $26^{1\text{-}4}$ and $27^{1\text{-}6}$ as genuine. Laue, like many other critics, pronounces the Elihu speeches and the 'Behemoth and Leviathan episodes' to be interpolations, but he holds both prologue and epilogue to be genuine and indispensable parts of the original poem.

Merx, Bateson Wright, and Cheyne may stand as representing those who advocate less sweeping but very considerable changes. Some of the chief modifications proposed are, that as Bildad's speech in ch. 25 is very short, ch. $26^{5\text{-}14}$ might be better placed as a continuation of it. To supply the place of Zophar's third speech, which is lacking, ch. $27^{8\text{-}23}$—very awkwardly placed where it stands —might be read as coming from him. Ch. 28 is held to be a later insertion, as well as the whole episode of Elihu. The few verses, ch. $31^{38\text{-}40}$, even Delitzsch considers to be misplaced, forming an anti-climax in their present connexion. He would transpose and read them between vv. ^{32} and ^{33}.

A. B. Davidson is still more moderate; he is, in fact, one of the most conservative critics of the book. He holds that, with the exception of the speeches of Elihu, no serious objection can be brought against any of the five great divisions of the poem, but the Elihu episode he, in common with nearly all moderns, pronounces to be a later addition. Further, he entertains somewhat serious suspicions concerning ch. $27^{7\text{-}23}$, ch. 28, and the descriptions of Behemoth and Leviathan in the speeches of the Almighty, but apparently would not, on the whole, remove these from the text. A view nearly coinciding with this will be advocated in the present article; but the ultimate decision of such a question as this largely depends, it is clear, upon subjective considerations. Two classes of these may be mentioned. (1) What measure of difficulty in a passage warrants conjectural emendation, and how far is a 19th cent. critic competent to reconstruct an ancient poem, without being guilty of the vice of trying it by his own preconceived ideas and standards? (2) What is the view to be taken of the scope and design of the book? Can it be viewed as a fairly harmonious whole in its present state, and what amount of apparent inconsistency warrants interference with the text as it stands? These are questions which are certain to receive different answers from different types of mind. The only satisfactory line of argument in a conservative direction lies in a justification of the book as it stands, and its success must depend upon power to show that the book can be better understood as we have it, with certain comparatively slight omissions and modifications, than in the forms proposed by more destructive and revolutionary theories.

The section most open to objection is that containing the speeches of Elihu. The chief arguments against its having formed a part of the original book are the following. (a) Elihu is not mentioned either in the prologue or the epilogue. In the latter, especially, it would seem unnatural that Jehovah, when referring to the speeches of the three friends and Job, should pass Elihu by in silence. (b) Chs. 32–37 are awkwardly placed between Job's monologue and the divine answer out of the whirlwind. The intervention of the Almighty, and the words with which He addresses Job, are much better understood if ch. 38 follows immediately upon ch. 31. The ease and advantage with which this section could be detached from the rest of the poem seems to point to a line of juncture here. (c) Elihu's arguments appear to consist partly of a repetition of those of the three friends, partly an anticipation of the address of Jehovah. So far as Elihu does furnish an original contribution to the discussion in the emphasis which he lays upon the purifying influence of suffering viewed as chastisement, it is not in harmony with the general teaching of the book. (d) The style is prolix, and, in the opinion of most, distinctly inferior to the rest of the book; though Kuenen (for example) has pronounced that style alone would in this case be insufficient to prove a later origin. (e) Certain peculiarities of language are discernible, a much stronger and more decided Aramaic colouring being discernible in this section. Canon F. C. Cook (Speaker's Com.) argues, after Schlottmann, that this is the poet's way of indicating Elihu's Aramæan origin. The subject is investigated at length in Stickel's Das Buch Hiob (1842), Budde's Beiträge zur Kritik des B. H. (1876), and in an essay of Kleinert (Stud. u. Krit. 1886); and the bearings of these are investigated by Cheyne (Job and Solomon, Appendix, etc. 291–293), who sums up in the words, 'Evidently the speeches of Elihu are later compositions.' (Budde is the most distinguished of the defenders of the genuineness of the speeches).

The force of these arguments really lies in their conjunction. It will be observed that they are of different kinds, and their cumulative force is therefore all the greater. Standing alone, each one would not be fatal. Cook, for example, points out that no person is named in the book till he begins to take part in the action, and he attaches considerable weight to the arguments adduced by Elihu. Bradley, however, in his thoughtful lectures on the Book of Job (1887), takes a different view. The concurrence of arguments drawn from different quarters appears to the present writer convincing, and perhaps the strongest evidence of all is drawn from the view taken of the book as a whole, the plan and outline of which the episode of Elihu mars, or positively disfigures.

The same must, on the whole, be said of ch. 27^{7-23} and ch. 28. The former passage contains an elaborate account of the afflictions which overtake the wicked, apparently quite out of place on the lips of Job, and containing precisely such arguments as had previously been urged by his friends. Compare, e.g., the speech of Zophar in ch. 20, and observe that 27^{13} is almost identical in expression with 20^{29}. There is no real connexion between the first six verses of ch. 27, in which Job asserts his own innocence, and the strain of the verses that follow, which are quite inconsistent with Job's previous contentions. The only two modes of reconciliation possible are these. (1) Job wishes to show that he does not altogether deny the fact that the wicked are punished, and is anxious to sever himself from their perilous and friendless condition. He shrinks from the very thought of being as the wicked are. He wishes to 'avoid everything that can appear ambiguous, and to take a position upon a much higher elevation' (Ewald). Even, however, if this train of thought were appropriate in Job's mouth, it cannot be said that it fits in at all suitably with 27^{1-6} which precedes, or ch. 28 which follows. Or (2) it may be urged (again with Ewald) that Job has by this time conquered his doubts as to the divine moral government, that these 'have worked their own cure,' and that he anticipates already some such issue as is described in the epilogue. But it requires only a moment's consideration to see that this disturbs the whole order of the composition, that it is quite inconsistent with the language of Job's soliloquy, especially ch. 30, and it does not harmonize with the address of the Almighty to Job, which follows.

Ch. 28, again, is of the nature of an episode, beautiful and impressive in itself, worthy of a poetic genius and a devout spirit, but exceedingly difficult to understand in the place which it occupies in the poem. The general drift of the chapter is that Wisdom—in the sense of the principles of true and righteous government which direct the course of this world's affairs—is inscrutable by man; the only possible course for man is to fear and trust Jehovah, and (by implication) to leave himself and his fortunes entirely in the hands of God. Such a train of thought is quite in harmony with the teaching of other parts of Jewish sacred books,—compare several psalms and parts of Proverbs,—but it is irreconcilable with Job's previous position and subsequent language in chs. 30, 31. If Job had already reached this stage in his education, what need of chs. 38–42, and how account for the laments of ch. 31? Again, no satisfactory connexion of thought between chs. 28 and 27^{23} or 27^{6} can be established. The opening כִּי may, indeed, be variously understood. 'For there is a vein for the silver' (RVm) is the most obvious translation, the rendering 'surely' being adopted to avoid a difficulty, since the inscrutability of divine wisdom affords no reason for the fate which the end of ch. 27 describes as overtaking the wicked. It is necessary to read much between the lines in order to eke out a kind of connexion between the chapters as they stand, e.g. 'the wicked are punished, but for all that there are problems in life which that simple principle does not explain, and wisdom is really inscrutable'; or 'the wicked are overthrown, and such a fate is sure to overtake all who disobey God; for wisdom can only be attained by those who fear Jehovah.' It must be felt that these attempts are so forced and artificial that there is a strong presumption against the sequence of chapters as they stand. The difficulty of the opening כִּי would hardly, however, be a sufficient objection, if the chapter as a whole was appropriate to the frame of mind in which the book presents Job at the moment. This is far from being the case; the opening words of ch. 29, 'Moreover, Job continued his parable—Oh that I were as in months past,' etc., exhibit far too violent a break with 27^{23} for sound exegesis to explain.

We are led, therefore, to the conclusion that the section 27^{7-23} is out of place, whether or no it should form part of a speech of Bildad or a third speech of Zophar; that ch. 28 also, with all its truth and beauty, cannot be understood where it stands; and that chs. 32–37 form a subsequent addition to the original book by a pious writer who was not fully satisfied with its teaching. Ch. 31^{39-40a} may perhaps also with advantage be transferred to a place between vv.$^{32 \text{ and } 33}$.

The arguments urged against the genuineness of other portions of the book are not, however, convincing. Cheyne holds that prologue and epilogue do not form a part of the book, the prologue being perhaps part of a prose book of Job, and the epilogue added later by an editor whose object and views were quite distinct from those indicated in the prologue. His work is done 'in a prosaic spirit,' and he makes 'a sad concession to a low view of providential dealings' (Job and Sol. p. 69). This is a natural, but perhaps superficial, objection. Dillmann in the 4th edition of his Hiob (1891) finds these arguments unsatisfactory. The reply to those who contend that prologue or epilogue, or both, do not fit in with the rest of the poem, can only be made good when the scope of the whole book is examined.

It is further urged that the speeches of the Almighty are 'inserted passages' as much as those of Elihu, while the descriptions of Behemoth and Leviathan were added later still, a 'purple patch' the removal of which would be a gain. The last objection seems to resolve itself into a question of taste, on which no critic's judgment can be final. That the speeches of the Almighty constitute the book as it stands into a consistent whole, which would lose a chief portion of its meaning, if indeed it would be intelligible, without them, is a point which may conveniently be reserved till the scope of the poem is considered. The views of those who would separate prologue, epilogue, and the speeches of Jehovah from the text of the original poem are represented in the words of Cheyne when he says that the book as it stands forms a 'confused theodicy,' that these sections constitute 'disturbing elements,' and that to attempt to weld them into one whole shows a failure to understand the position. These are only the 'conflicting thoughts' of 'earnest, warm-hearted men' on the great question of the suffering of the righteous, interesting separately, but not intelligible in combination. This is the only objection to passages which in style and diction, in force and beauty, are confessedly of a piece with the rest of this noble and remarkable poem. The prose passages also, it is admitted, are not in themselves unworthy of the place in which they stand. The main issue, therefore, with regard to the integrity of the book, so far as these great divisions of it are concerned, depends upon the view taken of its scope and teaching. A fundamental difference of opinion on this head accounts for the differing conclusions of eminent critics on questions of genuineness.

vi. SCOPE AND DESIGN.—The mode of treatment adopted in this section will be to discuss the whole book as it now stands, showing how each part is related to the whole, and inquiring what teaching it may be supposed to convey in its present form. It has been shown in the last section that in all probability certain chapters did not form part of the original design: but this is matter of opinion; and while some critics would excise more, others object to the setting aside of any portion of the book. A picture may be surveyed as a whole, apart from the varying opinions of judges who hold that the colours in one portion or another of the canvas have been laid on by a later artist. Such a survey may aid in the decision of controverted questions.

The poem of 'Job,' so remarkable for imaginative power and literary skill, was unquestionably intended to set forth theological doctrine. Nothing abstract or technical is intended by the phrase; it is but a way of expressing the aspect from which the deepest questions of life are here viewed. The poet can be engaged with no higher themes, with no more living and burning questions, than God, man, evil, good, suffering, hope, destiny. The thesis of the book—to translate poetry into prose—is that suffering in the present life is not precisely proportioned to ill desert; on the contrary, the righteous suffer; yet God is, and God is good. How can this be? It is the object of Job to answer the question.

In the first place, let the presuppositions of the discussion be borne in mind. The debate is not concerning the primary truths of natural theology. God is: that is an axiom unquestioned, unquestionable. And by 'God' is meant a Ruler of the world, understood to be righteous and merciful, though the exact measure of His mercy and truth be not apprehensible by man. No atheistic theories are admissible,—that would mean to give up the problem, not to solve it. The pantheist, the materialist, have here no standing-ground. A Western mind of to-day may cut the knot presented in Job in a hundred several ways not open to the Eastern—to say nothing of the Israelite—of 2500 years ago. Further, the evidently accepted religious doctrine presupposed by the book is that in this life the wicked are punished and the righteous rewarded by a just God, each man according to his deeds and character. Against this current orthodox opinion the book is a protest, but it is a religious protest. It is not a sceptical inquiry, nor a cynical denial, nor a blasphemous denunciation, either as a whole or in any of its constituent parts. It is a plea for a wider, deeper, truer, more easily defensible orthodoxy. It represents the process by which a step was taken in the formation of religious thought, and a religious explanation of life-problems was arrived at. Even those who would reduce the book to the narrowest dimensions, and who reject certain portions as pious glosses or orthodox corrections, must admit that Job's attitude throughout is that of the man who is trying to understand God, not denying His existence or mocking at His rule. Job pleads for God as truly as the friends. The ring, if we may so speak, within which the conflict is carried on—a fight for life so far as Job is concerned—i.e. the recognized limits of the discussion, must be borne in mind throughout.

The colloquies form the kernel of the book: let them be taken first, especially as they are the only portions which beyond all question constitute its original elements. The exact issue between Job and his friends concerns, not the punishment of the wicked, but the suffering of the righteous. Job is not concerned to deny that the wicked as such suffer: if ch. 27^{7-23} belongs to him, he explicitly asserts it. What the friends assume is that only the wicked suffer, and precisely in proportion to their wickedness; what they at first imply and afterwards explicitly declare is, that if an apparently righteous man suffers, he cannot be so righteous as he seems; hence that Job, who is enduring exceptional pain and calamity, must have flagrantly offended, in secret if not openly, against the laws of righteousness and the Power which executes and vindicates them. This, Job strenuously and even passionately denies. Moreover, it is contrary to hypothesis. To draw for a moment from the prologue, Job is not only asserted by the historian, but by the Almighty, to be upright; 'perfect,' indeed, when judged by the relative standard which alone is in question, a man of thorough integrity within and without. If this be not granted, the whole problem vanishes. Job not only denies his opponents' contention, with his own consciousness and the testimony of facts to back him, but he does so successfully. The poet represents him as victor in the contest of words. The friends are silenced, though not convinced. Without availing ourselves of the justification of Job pronounced by the Almighty in the epilogue, it is clear that the friends are worsted in the conflict, and their position is rendered untenable.

But it does not follow that Job has succeeded in settling the great point at issue. The friends are wrong, but he may not be wholly right. What is Job's position, if we consider only chs. 3–31? Omitting for the moment the doubtful sections 27^{7}–28, and remembering in any case that Job's state of mind is set forth, not in a series of categorical propositions, but in the fervent outpourings of a deeply troubled soul, we may say that up to this point he is absolutely certain of his own righteousness, and that his sufferings are undeserved. He is deeply convinced also in what the mystics call 'the ground of the heart,' that God is righteous and rules righteously; but how these two convictions are to be reconciled, he does not clearly see. Some light has dawned upon him from various quarters in the course of his wrestlings with the great problem. At one moment he is disposed to hope against hope, and hold fast by what he cannot see. 'Though he slay me, yet will I wait for him,' may or may not be the meaning of ch. 13^{15},—for the readings admit of almost opposite interpretations,—but the words represent Job's attitude in certain moods. Not very different is his state of mind when he pleads that he might be allowed to come face to face with the Almighty; he is so sure that he could 'order his cause before him, and fill his mouth with arguments.' At another time he rests in the confidence that his own vindication will come, sooner or later. Whether Job expects this in the present life, or more or less vaguely in a future life, is a very important question in its place, but may for the purpose of this exposition be passed over for the moment. The passage ch. $19^{25.26}$ remains on any translation ambiguous when we ask whether the vindication was to come on this side of the grave or beyond it, though it is glorious in its triumphant assurance that the Vindicator will speak at the last—'he will speak, and cannot lie.' This confidence, however, Job is unable continuously and permanently to preserve. It is not represented as a solution of the problem. Job's last words (ch. 31) are a pathetic lament over his vanished greatness, and a reiterated asseveration, strong, though no longer bitter, that he has not offended. If ch. 28 is to be assigned to Job, it must imply that for a time and in a certain mood he was prepared to bow before the inscrutable wisdom of the Most High; but this is not an abiding frame of mind, and cannot be presented as Job's solution of his own difficulties.

If the Elihu section formed a part of the original book—which we cannot admit—it must be understood as a contribution towards a solution, but one not completely adequate. It forms, in any case, a kind of side-chapel in relation to the whole structure. The righteous man must remember his need of chastisement; suffering is intended to exercise an educative and purifying influence, and the wise man will not recklessly rebel or fretfully chafe against it. But in the poem no one replies to Elihu, the Almighty disregards his utterances, no reference is made to them in any other part of the book, and they can scarcely be said, on any theory of their origin, to form an intimately organic part of the whole.

On the theory advocated by many modern critics, the original poem left the problem in this undetermined condition. The book puts forward no solution, it is a prolonged note of interrogation. There is nothing constructive about the colloquies when standing alone, especially in the mutilated form to which some critics would reduce them. But as the poem now stands, what solution does it furnish of the moral difficulty which it has so powerfully raised? The solution may be said to be threefold; or rather, three classes of considerations may be borne in mind in mitigation of the difficulties propounded. The first is found in the prologue. This lifts the curtain which hides the counsels of Heaven. It suggests that the drama of our earthly life has a significance which earth does not exhaust. The government of the Most High may contemplate issues which are at present beyond us. It may be needful to prove the existence of disinterested goodness to men, to angels, to devils; or to satisfy that strange personality who on the stage of history represents the great Accuser or Adversary of men, a being hard to persuade that goodness means something more than a pious care for one's own possessions or due consideration for one's own skin. If it were given to the righteous man, like a greater Prometheus, to suffer for such a cause, and demonstrate for once to assembled hosts of human spectators of the great drama of human life, or to invisible principalities and powers, that goodness and truth are something more than a cunning provision for the comforts they bring in their train, a life of pain and woe might be considered well spent. The vivid picture of the heavenly tribunal is only the graphic Oriental way of propounding what would now be called a philosophical or theological thesis. The lesson of Plato's Gorgias is here enforced against the sophistry of his Protagoras. Hedonism is not ethics. With magnificent daring Job is conceived as proving this great thesis on the side of God, against the insinuations of the Satan. Utilitarians should be the first to acknowledge that whether this be or be not a tenable solution of the problem of human suffering, it is a noble one. God knows the hearts of His servants, but on some is conferred the high prerogative of suffering in order to demonstrate to a scoffing world or an incredulous Accuser of the brethren what righteousness really means. This is not, however, represented in the poem as an ultimate or complete solution. The veil that has been drawn aside to allow a glimpse into the designs of Heaven drops again, and is never re-lifted. Job, by hypothesis, must not know of this procedure. Unless he can hold fast by the Right unaided, unconsoled, the experiment will be a failure. The fact that he never gives in or gives up is the poet's silent way of saying that the Adversary has lost his case. With all the odds against him, Job has won. He was content to 'hold hard by truth and his great soul,' beggary and leprosy and desertion and calumny notwithstanding. If the Almighty had never spoken, Job would remain alone upon the field—unconquered, if not victorious.

The Almighty, however, does speak. It is an old complaint with students of the Bk. of Job, that He says so little, according to men's conceptions, of what ought to be said. But much more is said than appears upon the surface. The addresses of Jehovah out of the whirlwind are a powerful plea for the probability that God's providence is right and man's indictment of it wrong. The Creator and Preserver of such a world as we see may surely be left to conduct its affairs unchallenged by the puny creature who knows but one corner of one field in a vast universe, and knows that imperfectly and ill. So far from 'binding the cluster of Pleiades or loosing the bands of Orion,' man does not know 'when the wild goats bring forth,' nor can he even 'loose the bands of the wild ass.' Thou who complainest against Me, 'where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth —hast thou an arm like God?' It is replied, though not in the poem, that this is no answer to Job's questions. By such arguments the Almighty may silence, but He does not convince. The poet judges otherwise. He represents Job as not only submissive, but contrite. Job acknowledges that he has been wrong in reasoning and in temper; he not only gives up his arguments, but repents him of his sin. And the inspired poet displays deeper insight into truth and more profound knowledge of the human heart than the self-sufficient reasoner of later days. Mozley, in his masterly study of Job (Essays, vol. ii. p. 219), suggests that the explanation is that 'amazing power softens him, and he feels himself within its grasp a poor and feeble creature, to be dealt with just as that Power pleases'; but this is surely only half the truth. Submission of soul is not satisfaction of mind. Job has learned to rest in God at last. His former attitude was wrong, and only now for the first time does he see light and find peace. Why is this, when no definite answer has been given to his passionate question, Why do the righteous suffer?

First, because he has seen and heard God Himself. What is meant by that phrase it would be hard to explain, for it can only be understood by one who has heard that Voice and seen that Vision. But the experience of mankind attests that there is a whole heaven between listening to the most convincing human arguments and receiving a message which is as the very voice of God to the soul. There is a difference between hearing of God and seeing Himself. That, Job says (42^5), is the essential difference between his former and his later state. Further, Job is convinced of God's perfect wisdom in his own case by the spectacle of His combined wisdom, power, righteousness, and goodness in creation around. It is the argument from the analogy of nature before Butler and before Origen. An indirect argument is more cogent against some forms of scepticism than a direct dealing with the difficulty. A contemplation of all that my friend is and has done—his course, his career, his character—may convince me that he is right in a particular instance which I cannot understand, more effectively than any amount of discussion concerning the case itself. Further still, Job's attitude of penitent submission is represented as the real solution of all his difficulties. Only in that attitude of spirit can man really rest. If he could reason out all the causes of all events—he cannot, but we may suppose it possible—he would still be further from the state of mind in which best to face the problems of life than Job was in ch. 42^6. The ultimate solution is not intellectual, but moral, since the problem is more moral than intellectual. 'I retract—and repent in dust and ashes.' The words do not mean that Job does not think, does not feel; but that he has risen above the level of keen resentment of physical pain, above the level of quick-witted dialectic and cut-and-thrust argument, soaring into the lofty altitudes or sinking into the peaceful depths where alone the godly man finds peace—in the shelter of the everlasting arms. The reasoner and the sceptic complain that the issue has been evaded; the religious man knows that he has not shirked it, but left it behind and beneath him, when he bows his head in self-abasing prayer, after a face-to-face vision of God.

After this, the epilogue might well appear to be a bathos indeed. That a man who has borne the extremity of anguish and fought the fiercest of battles and had a vision of the Almighty and come out conqueror, should descend to the level of an unusually prosperous sheikh who owns a few thousand more sheep and oxen than he did before, seems too humiliating. The irony could hardly go further than in the words, 'every man also gave him a piece of silver, and every one a ring of gold' —as if an answer to the soul's questionings were to be expressed in terms of coins and jewellery. The writer of the postscript to the LXX Version seems dimly to have felt this, for, to the words of ch 42^{17} 'Job died an old man and full of days,' he adds that 'it is written that he will rise again with those whom the Lord raises up.' From a modern point of view the epilogue is impossible; it does not move on the same plane as the prologue and the speeches of the Almighty. But the interpreter of Job should not occupy a modern point of view. The writer of the book could not say 'he will rise again at the last day.' If the light shed upon this life's tangles by the clear prospect of a future life had been vouchsafed to him, his book would have been very different. The epilogue is the author's way of saying the same thing. Under a dispensation in which there was no clear revelation of a future state, Job's subsequent prosperity was only the outward expression of the divine judgment expressed in 42^{8} 'ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath.' The men who had prided themselves on understanding God's methods and defending Him against aspersion were condemned, and forgiven only at Job's intercession; whereas Job, who had fought against the God of narrow tradition in defence of the God of righteousness and truth was commended. His restoration to more than his former prosperity is but the outward expression of this divine sentence—a kind of 'poetic justice' which, under the conditions of the time, was felt to be needful to the vindication of Job's character and the justification of Job's arguments. And, as Froude suggests in his impressive study of this book, Job was now for the first time prepared fully to use prosperity aright (Short Studies, vol. i. p. 325). But the epilogue is not necessary in order to point the chief moral lessons of the book. These are independent of circumstances, and belong to all time.

Leaving the details, and taking the book as a whole, what may be said of Job as to its place in the history of revelation? It can only be rightly understood if it is viewed as a stage in the history of religious thought, an advance upon all that preceded it, a step forward taken at the cost of severe suffering and mental conflict, but still only one step in advance. It was given to the author of the poem to see the shallowness and insufficiency of the theory that would make righteousness and prosperity, wickedness and calamity, vary directly in proportion to one another, in the present life. It was not given to him to obtain anything more than a passing glimpse into the prospect of a future life, in which the balance might be redressed; in all probability even this phrase is too strong to express the nature of the confidence attained in ch $19^{25.\ 26}$. The mystery and the beauty of vicarious suffering in the moral and spiritual world were hidden from him. But he had begun to see that, even as regards the present, pain may be a privilege rather than a punishment; that the loftiest spirits may have to pass through it as a trial of their loyalty rather than a chastisement for their transgressions; and that in such a case it behoves them to bear, as the Lord's chosen ones, the burden and the mystery of life, as pregnant with a deep significance certain hereafter to be made known.

It has often been said that Job is a type of Christ. The Christian holds that throughout the OT there were hints and foreshadowings of spiritual truth more fully revealed in the NT, and the suffering of the upright man under the earlier dispensation prepared the way for and was in turn explained by the suffering of the only Sinless Man, the Mediator of a new covenant. Mozley says, 'The Crucifixion is the one consummate act of injustice to which all others are but distant approaches.' The Cross of Christ is at the same time the darkest and the brightest spot upon earth, because there is most fully seen the meaning of that world-old problem of the suffering of the righteous in an evil world. What appears 'injustice' is intended to be a part of redemption. The author of Job did not clearly see, perhaps never dimly guessed at that mysterious solution of a mystery. But he grappled with the moral difficulties of his own time like a giant, and left upon record some lessons concerning suffering and its significance, which neither the world nor the Church has fully learned yet.

vii. DATE AND AUTHORSHIP.—There is little or no external evidence of a trustworthy kind to enable us to determine either author or date. The reference in Ezk 14^{14} cannot be quoted in relation to the Bk. of Job, though it may have a bearing on the historical reality of the man. Jewish tradition as represented in the Talmud (Sota v. 8; Baba Bathra 15*a*) assigned it to Moses. Writers so recent as Ebrard (1858) and Rawlinson (1891) have been found to hold the same position. But the earliest date assigned by the consensus of modern scholarship is the time of Solomon (Delitzsch, Cook, Cox), whilst by far the larger majority of critics place the book somewhere between the 7th and the 4th cent. B.C. For the period after the captivity of the Northern tribes, somewhere between Isaiah and Jeremiah, may be quoted the names of Ewald, Renan, Merx, Dillmann; Davidson and Driver would date the book during or shortly after the Exile, the period which Cheyne and Margoliouth are also inclined to favour. Cornill (Einleitung, p. 241) places the book amongst the very latest canonical OT literature. No author's name except that of Moses, which is quite out of the question, has ever been suggested. Whenever the writer lived, he is for us a great Unknown, and it is perhaps impossible to fix the time of composition, except by stating the century within which it probably falls. The following is the principal evidence on the subject furnished by the book itself.

At first sight Job presents a picture of primitive non-Israelitish life. Much that we are accustomed to find in other books of OT is conspicuous by its absence. The picture drawn of the life of Job is on the whole faithful to the conditions of patriarchal life. The wealth of the patriarch consists in his flocks and herds (1^{3} and 42^{12}); such sacrifices as are mentioned (1^{5} 42^{8}) are of a primitive type, performed by the head of the household as a priest. The age to which Job finally attains is patriarchal (42^{16}); the piece of money, קְשִׂיטָה named in 42^{11} is uncoined and primitive, mentioned elsewhere only in Gn 33^{19} and Jos 24^{32} of Jacob's purchase from the children of Hamor; whilst the musical instruments, תֹּף, כִּנּוֹר, עוּגָב, mentioned in 21^{12} 30^{31} are the primitive ones of Gn 4^{21} 31^{27}

The names of God are such as belonged to patriarchal times, El and Eloah (occurring some fifty times in Job, but rarely in OT generally) being the oldest Semitic titles of the Divine Being. The name 'Jehovah,' used in the prologue and epilogue, is not found in the body of the book except once, as if by accident, in 12^{9} (compare אֲדֹנָי in 28^{28}). In these and other features the colouring appropriate to the circumstances of Job's life is preserved with great fidelity and skill.

It is impossible, however, to believe that the book dates from a very early or even a moderately early period in the history of Israel. Davidson asserts that the features of a much later time may be perceived 'beneath this patriarchal disguise'; that 'the author is a true Israelite, and betrays himself to be so at every turn, however wide his sympathy be with the life of other peoples, and however great his power of reanimating the past'; and he urges that no careful reader should be deceived by the 'thin antique colour of the book.' Other critics would demur to such decided phraseology, and it is certain that the book has to be searched very carefully before any traces of the law can be discovered in it, and these are not of a pronounced kind. In 22^{6} 24^{9} we read of the taking of 'pledges' (see Ex 22^{26}), and in 22^{27} of vows, while in 24^{2} mention is made of the removal of 'landmarks' (see Dt 19^{14}). The adoration of sun and moon is spoken of in 31^{28} as an iniquity to be punished by the judge; so also adultery in 31^{9}. These, however, must be considered slight and doubtful references, and it is not upon them that the case turns for holding, in Davidson's words, that the book is 'the genuine outcome of the religious thought and life of Israel, the product of a religious knowledge and experience possible among no other people.' We should rather turn to the evidence that the book presupposes an advanced state of society, a knowledge of natural history and human life, a wide and varied experience impossible to a primitive inhabitant of an unsettled country bordering on the desert, who must have lived a nomadic life. Critics have pointed out that passages such as 12^{17-21}, with its mention of counsellors and kings, priests and princes, spoiled and overthrown and captive, implies a knowledge of the history of nations, if not actually of the political changes brought about by great military empires like Assyria and Babylon. Disorder and misery must have been familiar features in the life of the author of this book; not merely personal suffering, but such as the psalmist describes when he says, 'If the foundations be destroyed, what shall the righteous do?'

Perhaps no conclusive argument can be drawn from the language. It is true that this is peculiar and striking. The book contains an unusually large proportion of Aramaic words, and of ἅπαξ λεγόμενα explicable only by the help of Arabic. But it has been argued by some that this is a mark of early date, by others that it is a mark of the Solomonic period as one of wide culture and extended intercourse, by others that it proves a date more or less contemporary with Deutero-Isaiah (Driver), only that the author of Job was brought even more within Aramaizing influences than the prophet. Dillmann does not lay stress upon the 'Aramaisms' as a mark of date, but holds that the language generally points to the period of the later Heb. in the 7th or 6th cent. B.C. Cornill thinks the 'Aramæo-Arabic' cast of the language supports the very late date he adopts (Einleitung, p. xxxii). The literary form and character of the poem certainly point, at least, to the maturity of Jewish literature. It is true that a poem of genius and power often characterizes the dawn of a nation's history; and in Dante, the first great writer in the vernacular of his country, is found a master of Italian who has never since been surpassed. This illustration alone is sufficient proof that the concentrated vigour and intensity of expression characteristic of some passages in Job does not necessarily imply a late date in the history of a national literature. The originality of the author of Job is one of his most striking characteristics, but it is not the originality of an early writer. His knowledge, his illustrations, his references, and, to some extent, his style, appear to imply an advanced and not a primitive period of literature and life.

The strongest argument, however, and perhaps the only one which is really conclusive, is drawn from the subject-matter. The theme here discussed and the manner of its discussion necessitate a long previous history. The problems of human life are doubtless old, but they could not be raised in the manner displayed in Job, without a previous religious history, and one of considerable duration, in which the doctrine of the three friends had come to be the current and orthodox explanation of the facts of life. The history of the OT shows that only at a comparatively late period were these maxims questioned; and when we find them not only questioned but discussed in the thorough manner of the Bk. of Job, we may be sure that it was not composed till at least the closing period of the monarchy. Other features of religious doctrine—the doctrine of God, the way in which Satan is mentioned, and the spiritual doctrine of man, for example—point, likewise, to a comparatively late date. In saying this, we do not include the passages which have often been thought to imply a doctrine of immortality, since the meaning of these is by no means certain.

The argument as to date drawn from parallel passages is one that the best critics do not press, as it is encumbered with doubt and difficulty, and is apt to resolve itself into a matter of subjective impressions. But a comparison of some passages in Job with other books in the OT is instructive, to whatever conclusions it may lead, and a few words may be said upon the subject. The parallels are numerous, though in no case are they exceedingly close; they are chiefly found in Dt, Ps, Pr, Is, Jer, and La; the books of Hos, Am, and Zec presenting in a minor degree certain points of comparison. The chief parallels with Dt are Job 5^{14} compared with Dt 28^{29}, Job 5^{18} with Dt 32^{39}, Job 20^{4} with Dt 4^{32}, whilst the references to the removal of landmarks and other offences in Job 24^{2} and $31^{9.11}$ have been thought to imply a knowledge of Dt 19^{14} 22^{22}. Davidson goes so far as to say that if Dt be understood to be a composition of the reign of Josiah, B.C. 620 is the point above which the composition of Job cannot be carried. As to the Psalms, it appears quite certain that Job 7^{17} implies Ps 8^{5}, but the date of the latter cannot easily be fixed. The reader may further compare Job 10^{9} with Ps 138^{8} 139, Job 35^{14} with Ps 37^{6}, Job 22^{19} with Ps 107^{42}, and Job 13^{4} with Ps 119^{69}. The Books of Job and Pr, as both belonging to the class of Wisdom-literature, exhibit, as might have been expected, considerable affinity. The personification of Wisdom is found in both; the providential features of human life are dealt with in both, though from different points of view; whilst some phrases are common to both books, the coincidence of form being such as can hardly be the result of accident. The proverbial expression concerning 'the lamp of the wicked being put out' of Pr 13^{9} 24^{20}, is taken up in Job 21^{17} in a way which absolutely proves the priority of the former. Job 6^{3} may be compared with Pr 27^{3}, and Job 3^{25} with Pr 10^{24}, though the comparison presents nothing conclusive as to date. Much more reliance may be placed upon a general comparison of the representations of Wisdom in Pr chs. 1–9 and Job 28, with regard to which it would appear manifest that Job is the later. It has been already admitted that ch. 28 may be a later addition to Job, and the date of the opening section of Pr is not conclusively fixed; but of the general teaching of Job it is clear that it must have followed upon and not preceded the general teaching of Proverbs. For the proverbial philosophy of the latter is in the main that true but insufficient generalization from experience, embodied in prudential maxims, which forms the groundwork of the arguments of the friends. Upon this Job forms a searching criticism, and represents a considerably later stage of thought.

The relation between Job and Isaiah, especially Deutero-Isaiah, is exceedingly interesting. It has been discussed at length by Cheyne in the essay appended to his Proph. of Isaiah (ii. 235 f.). Job 14^{11} presents coincidence in expression with Is 19^{5}, the latter being probably the earlier passage. But a more extended parallel with the later chapters of Isaiah may be established by a comparison of Job 12^{9} with Is 41^{20}, Job 15^{35} with Is 59^{4}, Job 9^{8} with Is 44^{24} and 45^{12}, Job 26$^{12.13}$ with Is 51^{9}, and Job 13^{28} with Is 50^{9}. The whole teaching of the Bk. of Job should be studied in connexion with the remarkable picture of the Servant of J″, which is one of the chief features of Deutero-Isaiah. The spectacle of the righteous servant of God suffering, desolate, mocked of men and apparently afflicted of God, yet retaining his hold upon God and ultimately justified by Him, is so far common to the two books and to these almost alone in the OT as to make the comparison full of interest. Cheyne and Davidson have discussed it in full, but the question of priority is not easily settled. Perhaps the conclusion to which most readers will be brought by a study which cannot even be outlined here, will be that announced by Davidson and Driver, acquiesced in by Cheyne, that the two writers were 'surrounded by the same atmosphere of thought' and 'worked up common conceptions into independent creations.' Most critics incline to place Job the later of the two, but the view of suffering taken in Is 53 can never have presented itself to the author of Job. Either the two were entirely independent, or Job is earlier than Deutero-Isaiah, would seem to be the inevitable verdict.

A comparison with Jer furnishes two or three parallel passages in which coincidence can hardly be accidental, though priority may not be easy to determine. One of the chief of these is the 'curse' of Job 3$^{3-10}$ compared with Jer 20$^{14-18}$. Dillmann in 1869 judged that the passage in Job must have been the earlier of the two, an opinion which he modified later (Hiob^{4}, p. 33); while Cheyne writes that Jer 20^{15} 'clearly betokens the hand of the original writer.' Other parallels are Job 6^{15} and Jer 15^{18}, Job 12^{4} and Jer 20^{7}, whilst Job 9^{18} may be compared with La 3^{15}, Job 30^{9} with La 3^{14}, and Job 16^{13} with La 3^{12}. In the latter passages opinion is likely to assign a later date to the highly wrought elegy of La than to the vigorous and forcible language of Job. Ps 37 and 88 suggest a general comparison with Job, and there are points of coincidence in expression with other psalms; but all that can be said is that the writer of Job seems to have been acquainted with some psalms, whilst other psalmists appear more or less to have imitated the greater poet.

On the whole, the use of parallel passages in this instance seems to mark out the general position of Job in relation to other OT literature, rather than to fix definitely its date in relation to particular books. All the signs point to a period subsequent to the 7th cent. B.C., though how much later, remains undecided. As Margoliouth has pointed out, the references to Ophir in 22^{24} 28^{16} give a terminus a quo in the Solomonic period, and a comparison with 1 Ch 21^{1}, in which Satan is used as a proper name, shows that Job 1 and 2, etc., in which the article is used, must have been written earlier. This furnishes a terminus ad quem in the 4th cent. B.C. The alternatives lie between the 'very late date somewhere in the Persian period' favoured by Margoliouth and Cheyne, and a date somewhat, though not much, earlier than the Bab. captivity, which appears to the writer the more probable. The range of a century earlier or later than the Exile would be sufficient to include all but the most extreme of modern critics.

LITERATURE.—The following may be mentioned amongst the writers who have contributed to the elucidation of the Bk. of Job during the Christian era, but chiefly during the last century. Origen's contributions towards the study of the text, and Jerome's translation, have been already referred to. Not many of the early Christian writers commented on Job, but the Scholia of Ephraem Syrus may be mentioned, and the bulky commentary of Gregory the Great, Moralia in Jobum, in which exposition proper is overlaid by a discussion of an endless variety of doctrinal and ethical questions. Amongst the Jewish expositors of the Middle Ages, R. Sa'adya Gaon wrote brief notes in Arabic, and besides Ibn Ezra and Rashi, the two most important commentaries are those of R. Moses ben Nachman and R. Levi ben Gerson, of the 13th and 14th cents. respectively. At the time of the Reformation, Luther characteristically illustrated the new spirit of exegesis by the way in which he handled the Bk. of Job; his remarks gave offence to many by their freedom. The Conciones of Calvin exhibit the strength and lucidity characteristic of that prince of expositors.

In the 18th cent. Alb. Schultens (1737) opened a new epoch in the study of Job by his philological notes, illustrating the meaning of words largely—some have thought too largely—from the Arabic. Reiske (1779) and Schnurrer (1781) followed in the same direction. In the present century the number of commentaries on Job has multiplied very largely. The following list of selected literature during the last half century does not profess to be exhaustive or exactly chronological, the dates affixed usually indicating the publication of the first and last editions.

Umbreit, Das B. Hiob (1824–1832); Ewald, Dichter des A. B. iii. (1836–1854); Stickel, Das B. Hiob (1842); Sehlottmann, Das B. Hiob (1851); Renan, Le Livre de Job (1859); Frz. Delitzsch, Das B. Hiob (1864–1876); Hengstenberg, Das B. Hiob erläutert (1870–1875); Merx, Das Gedicht von Hiob (1871); Zöckler in Lange's Bibelwerk (1872); Hitzig, Das B. Hiob (1874); Budde, Beiträge zur Kritik des B. Hiob (1876); Hiob (in Nowack's Handkom. 1896, a summary of the conclusions of which is given by Budde himself in Expos. Times, Dec. 1896, p. 111 ff.); Reuss, La Sainte Bible, pt. 6 (1878–1888); Volck in Kurzgef. Komm. (1889); Dillmann in Kurzgef. Exeg. H'buch (1891); Duhm, Das B. Hiob erklärt (in Mohr's Kurzer Hand-Com. 1897); also Beer, Text des B. Hiob untersucht (1895). Of these, Umbreit, Ewald, Renan, Delitzsch, and Zöckler have been translated into English. Amongst recent English writers may be named Cook in Speaker's Com.^{7} (1880); Cox, Commentary and New Translation (1880); and Bateson Wright, Translation, with Essays, chiefly Critical (1883). A. B. Davidson published in 1862 a full commentary based upon the Heb., but this included only chs. 1–14, and has not been completed. In 1884 his English commentary appeared (Cambr. B. for Schools). Cheyne, Job and Solomon (1887); Bradley, Lectures on Job (1887); R. A. Watson in Expositor's Bible (1892); also Rawlinson in Pulpit Commentary (1891). The section on the Bk. of Job found in each of the chief 'Introductions' to the OT should, of course, be consulted. The following may be mentioned as representative:—Bleek (6th edition by Wellhausen, 1893), Riehm (ed. Brandt, 1889), Driver (6th ed. 1897), and Cornill (3rd and 4th ed. 1896). Amongst separate articles some of the most noteworthy are Riehm, Zeitschr. f. Luth. Theol. (1866); Godet, Études Bibliques (1874); Budde, Beiträge (1876), ZATW (1882), 193–247; Giesebrecht, Wendepunkt des B. H. (1879); Kleinert, Das specifisch Hebräische in B. H. in Stud. u. Krit. (1886); C. H. Wright, Bibl. Essays (1886); Mozley in Bibl. and Theol. Essays (1878); Dillmann, Textkritisches zum B. H. in Sitz. Ber. der K. Akad. d. Wis., Berlin (1890); as well as the monographs of Grill and Laue mentioned above. The present writer has dealt with the subject in his Wisdom Literature of Old Test. (1893).

W. T. DAVISON.

JOBAB (יוֹבָב).—1. Name of a son of Joktan, Gn 10^{29} (1 Ch 1^{23}): identified by Glaser (Skizze, ii. 314) and others with יהיבב, a place mentioned in a Sabæan inscription (CIS iv. p. 55; Glaser, Mittheilungen, 3 ff.). The author of that inscription speaks of his 'fathers and uncles' as governors of YHYBB, and further mentions a king of Saba, Karibail Wathar, whom there is reason to place in the middle of the 8th cent. B.C. The name is said to occur in another inscription also (Glaser, Skizze, ii. 303); but in neither is there anything which fixes its locality, though its governors would appear to have been vassals of the kings of Saba. It is variously read Yuhaibab and Yuhaibib, and is compared by J. Dcrenbourg with the Arab. yabāb, 'a desert.' Earlier commentators thought of the Ἰωβαρῖται of Ptolemy (vi. 7. 24), and indeed one recension of the LXX has the form Ἰοβόρ. This name seems to correspond with the Arabic Wabār (so Sprenger), which denotes a considerable portion of Yemen 'all between Najrān and Ḥaḍramaut, Mahrah and Shiḥr' (Yāķūt). Neither of these identifications can be considered more than conjectural. 2. A king of Edom, Gn 36$^{33f.}$ = 1 Ch 1$^{44f.}$, confused in LXX of Job 42^{17b} with Job (see above, p. 660^{b}). 3. A king of Madon, Jos 11^{1}. 4. 5. Two Benjamites, 1 Ch 8$^{9.18}$.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

JOCHEBED (יוֹכֶבֶד 'J″ is glory,' cf. the Phœn. כברמלקרת 'Melķart is glory' (?) CIS I. i. 364).—Known to us by name only from P, who states that J. was a sister of Kohath, who was married to Amram her nephew, and who bare to him Aaron and Moses (Ex 6^{20}) and Miriam (Nu 26^{59}). An earlier writer, E, in narrating the birth of Moses, speaks of his mother as a daughter of Levi, but seems to have been unacquainted with her name (Ex 2^{1}).

W. C. ALLEN.

JOD (י).—The tenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such used in the 119th Psalm to designate the 10th part, each verse of which begins with this letter. It is transliterated in this Dictionary by y. See JOT.

JODA (A Ἰωδά, B Ἰούδα[ς?]), 1 Es 5^{58} (^{56} LXX).—1. The same as JUDAH the Levite in Ezr 3^{9}; elsewhere called HODAVIAH, Ezr 2^{40}; HODEVAH, Neh 7^{43}; SUDIAS, 1 Es 5^{26}. 2. An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3^{26} (Ἰωδά WH, Ἰουδά TR, AV Juda).

JOED (יוֹעֵד, etymology uncertain, Syr. ܝܘܥܕ).—A Benjamite, the father of Meshullam and son of Pedaiah, Neh 11^{7}. In the corresponding list 1 Ch 9^{7} the name does not occur.

JOEL (יוֹאֵל).[*]—1. The prophet (see next article). 2. A son of Samuel, 1 S 8^{2}, 1 Ch 6^{28} (RV, see Driver's note on 1 S 8^{2}) 6^{33}. 3. An ancestor of Samuel, 1 Ch 6^{36} (called in v.^{24} Shaul). 4. A Simeonite prince, 1 Ch 4^{35}. 5. A Reubenite, 1 Ch 5$^{4.\,8}$. 6. A Gadite chief, 1 Ch 5^{12}. 7. A chief man of Issachar, 1 Ch 7^{3}. 8. One of David's heroes, 1 Ch 11^{38}. 9. 10. 11. Levites, 1 Ch 15$^{7.\,11.\,17}$ 23^{8} 26^{22}, 2 Ch 29^{12}. 12. A Manassite chief, 1 Ch 27^{20}. 13. One of those who married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{43}. 14. A Benjamite overseer after the Exile, Neh 11^{9}.

JOEL (יוֹאֵל, Ἰωήλ), the son of Pethuel (LXX Βαθουήλ, Vulg. Phatuel), is the author of the second (LXX fourth) book of the Minor Prophets. No information has reached us regarding the prophet or his father. The name Joel probably signifies 'J″ is God,' and, on the assumption of the date proposed by Credner, may contain a reference to the re-establishment of the worship of J″ after the overthrow of Athaliah (cf. 2 K 11$^{4\text{ff.}}$). This, though possible, is scarcely probable. The name is not an uncommon one (cf. 1 S 8^{2}, Ezr 10^{43}, Neh 11^{9}, etc.).[†] The book supplies no definite information, either as to the place or the time of the prophet's labours. The date is greatly disputed, but it is generally agreed that Judah, and most probably Jerus., was the theatre of Joel's prophetic activity.

i. OCCASION.—The occasion of the prophecy was an invasion of the country by locusts, accompanied by a drought of unusual severity. A calamity of this kind was not uncommon in Pal., and, in ordinary circumstances, would not be made a subject of prophetic discourse. But the visitation described by J. was exceptionally severe. Successive swarms of locusts swept over the country (1^{4}), and their devastations went on for years (2^{25}). The produce of the fields, vineyards, and orchards was destroyed (1$^{10\text{-}12}$). Food failed for man and beast (1$^{10\text{-}12.\,16.\,17.\,18\text{-}20}$). The daily offering to J″ was suspended from lack of the necessary materials (1$^{9.\,13}$ 2^{14}). This was equivalent to an interruption of the covenant relation between J″ and His people. A calamity which led to such a result was a very serious one. No prophet would have been faithful to his mission as watchman of Israel if he had failed to warn the people of the danger with which such a visitation threatened them. Joel saw in the locust invasion a special judgment from J″, and used it as a text for one of the most interesting and instructive discourses contained in the prophetical books of the OT.

ii. CONTENTS.—The book consists of three chapters. [The Heb. text has four chapters, the last five verses of ch. 2 in AV forming ch. 3 in the MT]. It divides itself easily into two parts, in the first of which (1^{2}–2^{17}) the prophet, and in the second (2^{18} to the end) J″, is the speaker.

The first part is made up of two discourses, of which, however, the theme is the same, viz. the locust invasion. The language in which the calamity is depicted differs considerably in the two chapters. But that the army, whose movements and operations are described so graphically and rhetorically in ch. 2, must be identified with the locusts of ch. 1, appears from 2^{25}, where the promise of the removal of the judgment and the renewal of blessings is given in the words, 'I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten, the cankerworm, and the caterpillar, and the palmerworm, my great army which I sent among you.'[*] After introducing his subject (1$^{2\text{-}4}$), the prophet, in the first discourse (1$^{5\text{-}20}$), describes the judgment which has fallen on the country in a narrative remarkable for the vividness of the picture and the minuteness of the details. The invading host pours over the land in countless myriads, with teeth like the teeth of lions for the work of destruction before them. The vine is wasted. The fig-tree is not merely stripped of its leaves,—the very bark is torn off, and trunk and branches are left bare (1^{7}). The grain and the fruit crops are alike destroyed (1$^{10\text{-}12}$). The prophet lingers over the desolation which has been wrought, and pushes his description into regions which, if the visitation were not real, would scarcely be referred to. The seed perishes under the clods; the barns are left to fall into decay because there is nothing to gather into them (1^{17}). Such a calamity falls heavily on the beasts of the field. Under the pangs of hunger and thirst they groan and cry unto God. The instinctive appeal of these irrational creatures affects the prophet so powerfully that he associates himself with them in supplicating the Lord for relief (1$^{18\text{-}20}$). Thus the first discourse closes.

In the second discourse (2$^{1\text{-}17}$) the language is highly poetical and rhetorical. The figure before the prophet's mind is that of an army which marches with unbroken ranks and irresistible force to the accomplishment of its mission. This army is J″'s host, at the head of which He marches (2^{11}). The army, as we have seen, is the locusts (2^{25}); and, if the testimony of travellers is to be relied on, the prophet's description as a whole, and the individual illustrations, are true to nature. But no description of the calamity—however powerful and startling—can exhaust the prophet's duty in connexion with it. Such a judgment calls for humiliation and prayer on the part of the people; and the prophet urges this in terms scarcely less striking than those employed in depicting the divine visitation (1^{14} 2$^{12\text{-}17}$).

The second part of the book (2^{18} to the end), with J″ as the speaker, contains the promise of blessings—first of temporal, and secondly of spiritual, blessings. The first words of the promise show that the judgment is at an end (2$^{19\text{b}}$). Famine and drought are to cease; prosperity is to be restored. The new abundance will compensate for the losses inflicted by the ravages of the locusts, and Israel, having learned in the school of suffering that J″ alone is worthy of their trust, will acknowledge and rejoice in Him as their God (2$^{21\text{-}27}$). This prepares the way for the bestowal of spiritual blessings (2$^{28\text{-}32}$, Heb. 3). The outpouring of the Spirit on all the people, without distinction of age or sex, of rank or class, is to follow, in point of time, the restoration of material prosperity (2^{28} 'it shall come to pass afterward that I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh'). How long afterward is not indicated. On a matter of this kind the horizon of prophecy is undefined. Then shall come the day of the Lord, which occupies so prominent a place in the book. This day, ushered in by awe-inspiring phenomena, is a day of doom for the nations hostile to Israel. These nations are brought down to the valley of Jehoshaphat ('J″ judges'), where J″'s heavenly warriors crush them as grapes are crushed in the wine-press—cut them down as the grain is cut by the reaper. Israel, on the other hand, shall dwell securely in a land of extraordinary fertility, and J″, enthroned on Mount Zion, shall dwell among them. The situation, as between the people of J″ on the one side and the hostile powers on the other, is summed up in the pointed contrast at the close of the prophecy (vv.$^{19.\,20}$ Egypt and Edom are to be a desolation; Judah is to dwell under the favour of J″ for ever).[†]

iii. INTERPRETATION.—The interpretation of the prophecy depends on the view taken of the locusts. 1. Many of the early Fathers explained the locusts figuratively; and in recent times this view has been supported in his usual fearless fashion by Hengstenberg (Christ. of OT, Eng. tr. i. 296 ff.). According to this view, the prophecy refers to future events, and the locusts, in chs. 1 and 2, represent the world-powers opposed to the Church,—such as J″ judges on His great day (3$^{1.\,2}$ [Heb. 4$^{1.\,2}$]). 2. What may be regarded as a modification of this ancient opinion has been recently proposed. According to this view the locusts are apocalyptic,—creatures of a supernatural kind, such as may fitly find a place in a vision of the last things, with which the Bk. of Joel closes (cf. the locusts in NT Apocalypse). 3. The third and, in recent times, the most generally accepted opinion is that the locusts are real. The prophet describes an actual locust invasion, and makes it the occasion of his prophecy. According to the first two views, the book becomes an eschatological prediction, without any historical basis, or any direct reference to the prophet's contemporaries. Against this explanation of the book, the text, on a fair interpretation, offers serious objections. (1) It is not easy to find a satisfactory explanation of the twofold call to repentance already noticed. According to the allegorical or apocalyptic view, we have to think of the prophet as sitting, like a monk in his cell, brooding over the past history of his people, and endeavouring to forecast their future. The fruit of his meditations he records for us in this short book. He has no message to his contemporaries. Even the call to repentance is a mere ideal appeal. The ground of the appeal is the locust invasion. But to the prophet's contemporaries the appeal can have no practical value, if not a single locust is visible and no trace of locust devastation can be discovered. For the ordinary purpose of prophetic teaching the appeal vanishes into thin air. This explanation utterly fails to do justice to the text. The prophet urges repentance on his fellow-countrymen with a view to the removal of a grave calamity, and the restoration of the divine favour. This purpose was realized. The second part of the book begins, as we have seen, with the promise of the withdrawal of the judgment and the bestowal of rich blessings. The explanation may be inferred from 2^18. 19a^. J″'s anger is at an end. The way is open to the restoration of the covenant relation between Him and His people. The inference is that the people have repented and humbled themselves before Him. Now, that is the practical result for which every prophet laboured among his countrymen. And when the prophetic purpose and the result aimed at are exhibited in the proper relation, as they are in Joel, it is scarcely possible to accept the view that the prophecy has no direct reference to the circumstances of the prophet's contemporaries. (2) The language in which the locust invasion is described is strongly opposed to the allegorical and apocalyptic explanation. The details of the first chapter have been partially referred to. It is highly improbable that the narrative, in this part of the book, is a pure work of imagination, produced by some recluse of post-exilic times. The description of the second chapter is equally opposed to the figurative explanation. If the language is figurative, the locusts represent the world-powers hostile to the Church. The prophet has before his mind men, —warriors, like those led by a Sennacherib or a Nebuchadnezzar. He tells us that these invaders 'run like mighty men' (v.[7]); if they were really gallant warriors, like whom else, or what else, should they run? 'They climb the wall like men of war' (ib.); if they were human soldiers, what does the prophet mean by these words? He presents a picture of an invading horde, going steadily forward, in perfect order, to the accomplishment of their task. In their progress they reach the capital, and climb the walls; but it is not said that they make breaches in the walls or cast them down. 'They leap upon the city' (v.[9]), but there is not a hint that their purpose is to destroy it. The ravages wrought by these invaders are confined to the fields. Not a man falls before them. The people suffer grievously, but it is indirectly, through the destruction of their crops, etc. And when the prophet urges the people to repent with the view of propitiating J″, the effect of the withdrawal of the judgment is, not the sparing of the lives of the inhabitants, but the renewal of fertility to the earth, so that there should no longer be the lack of the materials required for the daily meal-offering and drink-offering (vv.[12-14]). The description in these verses ([7ff.]) loses its point, and raises a perplexing question as to the literary character of the book, if the locusts are not real but figurative. If the prophet has before his mind — not locusts, but — a horde of cruel men sweeping over the country and leaving ruin behind them, his language raises not the least difficult of OT problems. And there should be little hesitation in admitting a real invasion of locusts.

[*] This name is generally taken to mean 'J″ is God,' and this was prob. the etymology accepted by the later Hebrews, with whom the name was popular. But it is very doubtful if this was the primary meaning. Nestle (Eigennamen, 86) and W. R. Smith (Kinship, 301) identify with the god Wail (Iolaos). See, further, Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v., and Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 153.

[†] The name might be taken as a Hiph. Impft. from יאל, (cf. יוֹסֵף), but this is not a probable derivation. (See Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.).

[*] The words used in this verse for the locusts are the same as in 1^{4}, but the order is different; and the prophet perhaps refers to successive swarms of locusts rather than to the same swarm in different stages of growth.

[†] The connexion in which Egypt and Edom are mentioned at the end of the book deserves consideration. The Phœnicians and Philistines appear (v.^{4}) to have been actively hostile to Judah in the prophet's day. The Egyptians and Edomites would naturally have been mentioned along with these if they had stood in the same relation to Judah. And it is possible that, in the antithesis at the close of the book, Egypt and Edom are used typically,—the former representing hostile powers that had no family connexion with Judah, the latter those that were of common ancestry.

iv. DATE.—The date is greatly disputed, but there is general agreement that it is either very early or post-exilic. The book itself contains no distinct chronological data of the kind supplied by the superscriptions in many of the other prophetical books. In such a case the most helpful and trustworthy evidence for the fixing of the date is derived from the nations (if any) mentioned in the book. On this point the argument e silentio is important in Joel. No mention is made of Syria, Assyria, or Babylon. But from the days of Amos to the exile of Judah, one or other of these powers has a prominent place in prophetic literature. It may therefore be reasonably inferred that J. wrote before the Assyr. power began to threaten the chosen people, or after the Bab. power ceased to be dangerous; in other words, the date is prior to the 8th cent. B.C., or later than the overthrow of Babylon by Cyrus. If the late date is accepted, the prophecy would fall in the Pers. period. No valid objection to this date can be founded on the non-mention of Persia. For, while it is true that the Jews were in subjection to the Persians, there was a radical difference between the relation of Persia to the chosen people and that of Assyria and Babylon. The latter invaded and conquered the land of promise, and carried the people into captivity. Their relation was one of active hostility. The Persians inaugurated the period of their supremacy by the restoration of the Jewish exiles to their own land. This would sufficiently account for the Persians being placed in a different category from the Assyrians and Babylonians. And the way is clear for a pre-Assyr. or post-Bab. date. The prophet, however, mentions certain peoples as hostile to Judah: Phœnicians and Philistines (3[4] [Heb. 4[4]]), and Egyptians and Edomites (3[19] [Heb. 4[19]]). If the typical use of Egypt and Edom is accepted (p. 672[b] n.†), the mention of these countries is of no importance in the discussion as to the date. Otherwise, a date must be found comparatively near to hostile action on the part of Egypt and Edom; and the same remark applies to Phœnicia and Philistia. In the period between the invasion of Judah by Shishak (c. B.C. 930) and the war in which Josiah fell (B.C. 610), there is no report of hostile action on the part of Egypt such as would meet the requirements of the prophecy. With regard to the other countries mentioned, the case is different. The Chronicler (2 Ch 21[16. 17]) reports an invasion of Judah by the Philistines in the reign of Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat and son-in-law of Ahab. The serious character of this invasion may be inferred from the statement of the Chronicler, that the palace was captured, and the royal family—wives and children, with the exception of a single son—were carried into captivity. That the Philistines were actively hostile to Judah about this period is sufficiently attested by Amos (1[6]). According to this prophet, the Philistines found a market for their Jewish slaves in Edom; and in this traffic the Phœnicians are associated with the Philistines (Am 1[9]). Further, as against Edom, which apparently had been a dependency of Judah since the time of David, the Chronicler reports that, in the days of Jehoram, it made an effort to secure its independence,—'Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah and made a king over themselves' (2 Ch 21^8, cf. 2 K 8^{20}, where the statement of Ch is confirmed). Edom, indeed, was an inveterate enemy; but in the days of Jehoram specific acts of hostility were committed, which suffice to explain the reference in Joel. It is true that in Ch the Phœnicians are not mentioned. Amos, however, includes them in the same charge as the Philistines. The Phœnicians were the great naval power of the time. The maritime carrying-trade of the world was very largely in their hands. The Jewish slaves who were sold to the Ionians (Jl 3^6 [Heb. 4^6]) were, no doubt, conveyed in Phœn. vessels to the slave markets of Greece. The descendants of those whom Hiram allied to Judah broke the friendly relation, and ranged themselves with the enemies of the chosen people. And there was more than this. The Phœn. Baal-worship had been introduced into the northern kingdom through Jezebel, and into Judah through her daughter Athaliah, the wife of Jehoram. The influence of Phœnicia had been powerful enough to largely suppress the worship of J″ throughout the land of promise. When that worship was restored by Jehoiada, pious Jews would regard the friendship of Phœnicia as more dangerous than the hostility of Philistia. And a prophet of the period might be expected to assign to the Phœnicians a first place among the powers hostile to Judah. This is what Joel does (3^4 [Heb. 4^4]). In support of the late date, attention is directed to the fact that Joel mentions only petty peoples in the neighbourhood as enemies of Judah; whereas, in the early prophets, prominence is given to a heathen power of widely extended influence, which threatens the independence of the chosen people. It is quite true that from the time of Amos, who, if Joel is late, first raises this question in OT prophecy, a world-power aiming at universal empire has to be dealt with. But if a prophet did actually appear and write a book fifty years before Amos,—what then? At that time Assyria was beyond the prophetic horizon. Egypt since the days of Shishak—a century before—had ceased to cause anxiety. Only Phœnicians, Philistines, and Edomites troubled Judah. On the assumption of the late date, the peoples mentioned by Joel raise a serious difficulty. The date proposed by Merx, and favourably regarded by other critics, is about the middle of the 5th cent. B.C., when Nehemiah restored the wall of Jerusalem. In the historical books that deal with that period, tribes in the neighbourhood of Jerus. are spoken of as bitterly hostile to the Jewish community. Chief among these are the Samaritans and the Ammonites,—no mention is made of the Phœnicians (cf. Neh $4^{1ff.}$). It is scarcely credible that a prophet living in Jerus., while Nehemiah was struggling to put the capital in a position of security, should threaten heavy judgments against powers—some of them remote—whose hostility was scarcely felt, and not so much as mention the peoples bordering on Judah whose forces were united in active opposition of the most bitter kind against the Jewish community. And the case is strengthened by the fact that Ezekiel, from whom, according to Merx, Joel is supposed to have freely borrowed, begins his denunciation of the hostile powers with the Ammonites,—as bitter opponents as the Jews of the period had to deal with (cf. Ezk $25^{1ff.}$). Accordingly, if Merx' date is accepted, the mention of the peoples referred to—a factor of the weightiest importance in the determination of the dates of prophetical books—is deprived of its historical significance.

It has been urged that the Bk. of Joel is not an original work, but a Midrash—a sort of eschatological compendium—founded on the books of earlier prophets. According to this view, the nations named would lose their historical value. This might be admitted of the Egyptians and the Edomites, and, in a less degree, of the Philistines. But the reference to the Phœnicians cannot be explained in this way. And, in point of fact, so far as our historical information warrants an opinion, there is no period when a prophet loyal to the theocracy would be more likely to introduce his censure of hostile powers in the words of Joel (3^4 [Heb. 4^4]) than the early part of the reign of Joash, when Judah had just escaped the danger of ruin through the Phœn. Baal-worship. To sum up this point—a typical reference cannot be assigned to all the nations mentioned; an exact historical reference is not consistent with the post-exilic date proposed.

In connexion with the late date, another point deserves consideration. The prophet summons the people to repentance; but he does not name any special sin of which they are guilty. How unlike this is to Amos and his successors! On this ground alone it is difficult to find a suitable place for Joel between Amos and the exile of Judah. This may appear to favour a post-exilic date. But the condition of Judah described in the post-exilic books of OT is quite unlike that suggested in Joel. If the latter half of the 5th cent. is accepted as the date, Joel and Malachi would belong to the same period. Malachi gives as melancholy a picture of the moral and religious state of his countrymen as any prophet before the Exile. And the situation, then, is this. One prophet lays bare the sins which are eating as a canker into the heart of the post-exilic Church in language as severe as that of Amos or Isaiah,—while another prophet—practically a contemporary—writes as if there were not a special sin to denounce. Further, Malachi's efforts do not appear to have been crowned with much success (see his book throughout); Joel's simple, earnest appeal led to the happiest results (cf. $2^{18ff.}$). It follows that, if Joel had a practical message to his contemporaries, he can scarcely be placed in the generation to which Malachi belonged. A fair interpretation of the language is opposed to the view that the book is a mere Midrash, having no reference to the circumstances of the prophet's day. If the occasion of the prophet's exhortation was found in the actual condition of Judah at the time, the proposed post-exilic date is highly improbable. If the date is pre-exilic, it is not easy to point to a time more suitable than that suggested by Credner, viz. the early part of the reign of Joash of Judah. Through the reforming zeal of Jehoiada, the worship of J″ was at that time comparatively pure. And the people would be likely to respond to the earnest and affectionate appeals of a prophet like Joel.

Other points of less importance have found a place in the discussion as to the date. No king is mentioned. The prophet appeals to the priests as if the direction of affairs was in their hands. This is held to point to the condition of Judah after the return of the exiles from Babylon, when there was no king, and the administration of affairs, under the Pers. governor, was conducted by the priests and elders The conclusion seems reasonable. It is urged in reply that Joash was only seven years of age when he ascended the throne, and that, for a time, the affairs of the kingdom would, of necessity, be left in the hands of Jehoiada the high priest. That is an important consideration. But of greater importance is the obvious purpose of the book. The prophet makes no special reference to civil or political affairs, or to the social condition of the people. His object is to reach the heart and conscience of the nation through the calamity which has fallen on the country,—to bring his countrymen as penitent suppliants before J″. In a matter of that kind it is the priests that should take the lead. And the prophet's appeal to the priestly party is appropriate.

Again, it is urged that the prophet makes no mention of the northern kingdom. But why should he? His view is confined to the disaster which has overtaken Judah. Negative evidence—such as the non-mention of the northern kingdom, and of a king of Judah—cannot counterbalance the positive evidence derived from the peoples named in the book, and the practical purpose of the prophet in behalf of his contemporaries. The question is, 'Whether a judgment such as Joel depicts forms a suitable theme for a prophetic book?' If it does, the absence of references found in other books of prophecy, which cover a much wider field and deal with subjects of various kinds, cannot safely be pressed in discussing the question of the date.

The importance attached to the ritual is held to favour a late date. The question of the ritual is raised, generally, by the prominence assigned to the priests, and, specifically, by the mention of fasting, and of the daily offering. Fasting, in connexion with an unexpected calamity, was a common practice from an early period of Israel's history in Canaan (cf. 2 S 1[12] 12[16], 1 K 21[9. 12. 27]). The reference to fasting in Jl is quite consistent with an early date. The arrangements for the daily offering are found in P (Ex 29[38-41]). Whatever date may be assigned to P, the offering of the morning and evening sacrifice was an ancient practice, with the ritual of which the people would be familiar (cf. 2 K 16[13-15]). The direct references to ritual in Jl are as consistent with an early as with a late date. Moreover, devotion to ceremonial was not a peculiarity of post-exilic times. It may be doubted if any generation of Israelites was more attentive to external observances than those addressed by Amos (cf. Am 4[4. 5] 5[21-23]). The same may be said of Judah in the days of Isaiah (cf. Is 1), and, later, in the time of Jeremiah (cf. Jer 7). It is urged, however, that Joel attaches quite a special importance to the ritual. The interruption of the daily offering is equivalent to a breach of the covenant between J″ and Israel. And it may be doubted whether such a view can be reasonably assigned to any period between Amos and the Exile. The question is, 'Whether it is more reasonable to assign such an estimate of the ritual to post-exilic times than to an early period of reformation like that under Jehoiada?' If Mal may be trusted, Pharisaism was as unspiritual in the 5th cent. B.C. as it was in the most degenerate days before the Exile. The information available for the post-exilic period is scanty; such as it is, it can scarcely be said to support the simple, spiritual explanation of Joel.

In addition to the general character and teaching of the book, there are special expressions which are held to favour a late date. It is argued that ch. 3 [Heb. 4] [1. 17] presuppose the exile of Judah. But the words rendered 'to bring again the captivity of Judah' do not necessarily mean that Jews are actually to be brought back from exile. If this literal interpretation is insisted on, it follows that the restoration of the exiles has not yet taken place, and a date between B.C. 586 and 536 must be found—a most unlikely period for a prophet like Joel. To say that the restoration in B.C. 536 is inadequate, in view of the brilliant promises of the pre-exilic prophets, and that a restoration of a more glorious character must lie in the future, is simply to give up the literal interpretation of the words. In these circumstances, usage must be carefully considered. The words 'to bring again the captivity' seem to be used in the sense of 'to reverse a line of procedure.' Chastisement is to have an end, and that is to be followed by proofs of the divine favour (cf. Dt 30[3], Am 9[14], Hos 6[11], Jer 29[14] 30[3. 18] [where the expression is applied to the tents of Jacob], 48[47] [where the words are applied to Moab]). Moreover, it should be noted that the turning of the captivity is to take place in the same period as the outpouring of the Spirit, and, chronologically, is associated with the final judgment of the nations hostile to the Church. The prophet emphasizes this note of time, ch. 3 [Heb. 4] [1a]:—'behold, in those days, and in that time.' If this period was ushered in on the Day of Pentecost—as St. Peter teaches (Ac 2[16ff.])—the turning of the captivity and the judging of the nations are thrown into Christian times, and the reference to the Bab. exile falls to the ground. Nor does the mention of the Ionians require a date in the Pers. or Gr. period. The reference to the Phœnicians and the Philistines (3[4] [Heb. 4[4]]) connects the prophet's message with his contemporaries; the charge against these peoples is that they sold Jews as slaves to the Ionians. The Ionians were settled on the coast of Asia Minor before the 9th cent. B.C. And the ports of Asia Minor offered the nearest market-place for the sale of slaves conveyed in Phœn. vessels. Upon the whole, the evidence available, if used as in the case of other books of prophecy, seems to the present writer more favourable to a pre-exilic than to a post-exilic date.

v. DOCTRINE.—Joel contains a comprehensive summary of prophetic teaching. The calamities of life are the fruit of sin. The punishment of sin cannot be escaped without repentance. Sincere repentance will secure forgiveness, and the restoration of the divine favour. Further, such a calamity as Joel describes is severe enough, and deliverance from it a great blessing; but there is a final judgment and deliverance of which these are but types. Joel uses a grave occurrence of his own day as a basis for a prediction concerning the last times, when, on the great day of the Lord, the cycle of judgment shall close, and the deliverance of the people of J″ shall be complete. To that day of the Lord the prophet sees all things tending. The locust invasion appears to be a harbinger of that day; hence the earnestness of the prophet's appeal to the people. Such, generally, is the teaching of the book—the day of the Lord being the most important subject.
